is advancing to perfect age.—Ver. 14. How many go the rounds of all sects, parties, and creeds, and never receive satisfaction. If in the pride of reason they fall into rationalism, then if they recover, they rebound into mysticism. From the one extreme of legalism they recoil to the farthest verge of antinomianism, having travelled at easy stages all the intermediate distance.—Ver. 15. That character is nearest perfection in which the excessive prominence of no grace throws such a withering shadow upon the rest, as to signalize or perpetuate their defect, but in which all is healthfully balanced in just and delicate adaptation.—Ver. 16. The church is built up, for love is the element of spiritual progress. That love fills the renewed nature, and possesses peculiar facilities of action in edifying the mystical body of Christ. Whatever parts it may have, whatever their forms, uses, and position, whatever the amount of energy resident in them, still, from their connection with the one living Head, and from their own compacted union and mutual adjustment, they compose but one growing structure "in love."—R.]

[HODGE: Ver. 12. If Christ has appointed the ministry for the edification of His body, it is in vain to expect that end to be accomplished in any other way.—Ver. 14. Error can never be harmless, nor false teachers innocent. Two considerations, however, should secure moderation and meekness in applying these principles. The one is, that though error implies sin, orthodoxy does not always imply holiness. The character most offensive to God is that of a malignant zealot for the truth. The other consideration is, that men are often much better than their creed; that is, the doctrines on which they live are much nearer the truth than those which they profess. They deceive themselves by attaching wrong meaning to words, and seem to reject truth, when in fact they only reject their own misconceptions.—Ver. 16. The church is Christ's body. The body grows. Concerning this growth, the Apostle says: 1. It is from Him. He is the causal source from whom all life and power are derived. 2. It depends on the intimate union of all the parts of the body with the Head, by means of appropriate bands. 3. It is symmetrical. 4. It is a growth in love.—R.]

CHAP. IV. 17—V. 21.

a. The principle of the new walk, with reference to the contrast of the old and the new men.

CHAP. IV. 17-24.

- 17 This I say therefore [therefore I say], and testify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk not [no longer walk] as other Gentiles [the rest of the Gentiles]¹ walk, in the 18 vanity of their mind. Having the understanding darkened [Being darkened² in their understanding], being alienated from the life of God [,] through [because of] the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness [hardness] of the heart:
 19 Who being past feeling have given themselves over unto lasciviousness [to wanton-

20 ness], to work all uncleanness with [in] greediness. But ye have not so learned 21 [did not so learn] Christ; If so be that ye have heard [If indeed ye heard] him, and have been [were] taught by [in] him, as the truth is [as is truth]³ in Jesus:
 22 That ye put off concerning the former conversation [as regards your former way of life] the old man, which is [waxeth] corrupt according to the deceitful lusts [lusts 23 of deceit]; And be [become] renewed in the spirit [or by the Spirit]⁴ of your mind;
 24 And that ye put on the new man, which after God is [hath been] created in righteousness and true holiness [holiness⁵ of the truth].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 17.—[The reading is doubtful: \aleph^3 D.²³ E. K. L., most cursives, Syriac, Chrysostom (Rec., Tischendorf, Meyer, Eadie, Brunne), sustain $\lambda\omicron\tau\omega\acute{\alpha}$; it is wanting in \aleph^1 B. D.¹ F. G., 5 cursives, Vulgate and other versions, and rejected by Lachmann, Alford, Ellicott. The external evidence against it is slightly preponderating, but internal grounds are in its favor. It was probably misunderstood, and the omission further confirmed by 1 Thess. iv. 5.—R.]

² Ver. 18.—[\aleph , A. B.: $\epsilon\sigma\kappa\omicron\tau\omega\mu\acute{\epsilon}\nu\omicron\iota$, which, as more rare, is preferred by most recent editors to $\epsilon\sigma\kappa\omicron\tau\omega\sigma\mu\acute{\epsilon}\nu\omicron\iota$ (Rec., D. F. K. L.). The comma after "God," is required by the view taken of the construction as a parallelism:

a Being darkened in their understanding,

b Being alienated from the life of God,

a Because of the ignorance that is in them,

b Because of the hardness of their heart.

The first and third, second and fourth members correspond, the alternation being probably due to the reciprocal interaction which is also implied.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 17 a. The connection. This therefore I say [$\tau\omicron\upsilon\tau\omicron\ \omicron\upsilon\acute{\nu}\ \lambda\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\omega$].— $\tau\omicron\upsilon\tau\omicron$ refers to what follows, and with emphasis (WINER, p. 152); $\omicron\upsilon\acute{\nu}$, however, as the subsequent context shows, going back of the digression (iv. 4-16), which contains the motives of the exhortation (iv. 1-3), refers to "walk worthy." THEODORET: $\pi\acute{\alpha}\lambda\iota\nu\ \acute{\alpha}\nu\epsilon\lambda\alpha\beta\epsilon\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \pi\alpha\rho\alpha\nu\acute{\epsilon}\sigma\sigma\omega\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\ \pi\rho\omicron\sigma\mu\omicron\nu$.* But the simple "I say" is not enough for the Apostle; he adds: And testify in the Lord, $\kappa\alpha\iota\ \mu\alpha\rho\tau\iota\rho\omicron\mu\alpha\iota\ \acute{\epsilon}\nu\ \kappa\upsilon\rho\iota\omega$.—He presents himself in his apostolic authority as a witness, not in his own, but in the Lord's cause. ["By thus sinking his own personality, the Apostle greatly enhances the solemnity of his declaration" (ELLI-COTT).—R.] It is similar to Rom. ix. 1; 1 Thess. iv. 1. The Lord is the element in which he lives and in this case bears witness, and at the same time the ground on which he stands in common with the Ephesians; on this account he reckons on their acceptance of his urgent appeal. It is not— $\pi\rho\acute{\omicron}\varsigma\ \kappa\upsilon\rho\iota\omicron\nu$, per Dominum (even the Greek Fathers, and many others).

The heathen walk as a type of the natural walk in general. Vers. 17 b-19.

Ver. 17 b. That ye no longer walk [$\mu\eta\ \kappa\acute{\epsilon}\tau\iota\ \acute{\upsilon}\mu\acute{\alpha}\varsigma\ \pi\epsilon\rho\iota\pi\alpha\tau\epsilon\iota\nu$].—This infinitive is the object of $\lambda\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\omega$ (it being unnecessary to understand $\delta\epsilon\iota\nu$) expressing, however, what ought to be (EADIE) more than what is; ELLICOTT thinks an imperative sense involved ("that ye no longer must walk"), as indeed the context indicates (ALFORD).—R.] This says negatively what is expressed positively in ver. 1: "walk worthy." "No longer" denotes their once walking, as they should not and dare not now, being Christians. —As the rest of the Gentiles walk.—[See *Textual Note*¹] $\kappa\alpha\theta\omega\varsigma$ introduces the kind of walk which they should avoid. $\kappa\alpha\iota$ is joined with emphasis and admonitory force to $\tau\alpha\ \lambda\omicron\iota\pi\acute{\alpha}\ \acute{\epsilon}\theta\eta\eta$ to which class they belong.* The heathen are those who remained behind, they no longer belong to the heathen who now "walk," and how?

In the vanity of their mind, $\acute{\epsilon}\nu\ \mu\alpha\tau\iota\alpha\iota\ \tau\eta\tau\iota\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \nu\omicron\omicron\varsigma\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\nu$.—This is the briefest characterization of the natural heathen walk, presenting both its religious and moral side. It is the explanation of THEODORET ($\tau\alpha\ \mu\eta\ \delta\upsilon\tau\alpha\ \theta\epsilon\omicron\sigma\tau\omega\iota\acute{\epsilon}\nu$) in accordance with Rom. i. 21; viii. 20; 1 Pet. i. 18. This "vanity" [betokening a waste of the whole rational powers on worthless objects (ALFORD).—R.] is, of course, one brought about through sin, another nature as it were. It has penetrated even the will of the human spirit, corrupting this high faculty, the $\acute{\eta}\gamma\mu\omicron\nu\iota\kappa\acute{\omicron}\nu$ in the nature of man.† Hence there is no special reference to philosophy (GROTIUS). To this general sketch are added special traits in vers. 18, 19.

Ver. 18. Being darkened in their understanding, $\epsilon\sigma\kappa\omicron\tau\omega\mu\acute{\epsilon}\nu\omicron\iota\ \tau\eta\ \delta\iota\alpha\nu\omicron\iota\acute{\alpha}\ \delta\upsilon\tau\epsilon\varsigma$.—The masculine form indicates the reference to persons, to particular individuals, and not to the whole, $\tau\alpha\ \acute{\epsilon}\theta\eta\eta$, as such. The verb ($\sigma\kappa\omicron\tau\acute{\omega}$), only here and Rev. xvi. 10, instead of the more usual $\sigma\kappa\omicron\tau\iota\zeta\omega$, is in the perfect, to denote a state not previously existing, but having come into being, which the present participle, (δυντες) designates as present. That to which the darkness clings is set forth by τῇ διανοίᾳ,* which means the intellectual power of the mind, the mode of thought, the character, since the reference is not to the formal faculty, but to its condition. Comp. Rom. i. 21 f.; xi. 10. It is incorrect to join δυντες with what follows (RUECKERT) [EADIE]; it follows thus in Tit. i. 16 also, and τῇ διανοίᾳ forms one conception, together with the participle in its emphatic position.

* [If $\lambda\omicron\iota\pi\acute{\alpha}$ be rejected, there is still an allusion in $\kappa\alpha\iota$ to the fact that they were once thus walking, i. e., were once Gentiles. The only point of difference is, that the fuller reading implies they are so still. "Though the Ephesians did not walk so now, their returning to such a course is made the logical hypothesis" (ALFORD).—R.]

† [So EADIE and most; IODICE however takes $\nu\omicron\omicron\varsigma$ as the whole soul, just as on the other hand in Rom. vii. 23-25, he refers it to the renewed nature, in both cases sacrificing exactness to doctrinal considerations.—R.]

Being alienated from the life of God, ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι τῆς ζωῆς τοῦ θεοῦ.—See on ii. 12: “alienated from the commonwealth of Israel.” The perfect participle must be noted here also; BENDEL correctly remarking: participia præsunt, gentes ante defectionem suam a fide patrum—fuisse participes lucis et vite. Conf. renovari ver. 23.—Ζωή, the opposite of θάνατος (ii. 1), is the intensive spiritual, eternal life, belonging to God (τοῦ θεοῦ), vita, quæ accenditur ex ipsa Dei vita (BENDEL), qua Deus vivit in suis (BEZA), vera vita, qui est Deus (ERASMUS); LUTHER: the life, that is out of God. [Comp. TRENCH, Syn. § xxviii.; OLSHAUSEN, Stier in loco.—R.] See WINER, p. 175. Thus “the vanity of their mind” is designated as to its two sides, the ethically intelligent, and the ethically practical. [This clause sets forth an “objective result of the subjective ‘being darkened.’” (ALFORD).—R.] To this corresponds what is immediately added.

Because of the ignorance that is in them, because of the hardness of their heart, διὰ τὴν ἀγνοίαν τὴν οὖσαν ἐν αὐτοῖς, διὰ τὴν πώρωσιν† τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν.—These two clauses are added without a connecting particle, because they refer to the two preceding ones, as their purport requires, and because the one requires and furthers the other. “Because of the ignorance that is in them,” points to an ignorance which has become immanent, is now natural and peculiar (Acts iii. 17; xvii. 30; 1 Pet. i. 14), as the ground (διὰ with the accus., see WINER, p. 372) of the darkening, and which is ever increasing, going from ignorance to ignorance. “Because of the hardness of their heart,” renders prominent in the same way the hardness, unsusceptibility of the heart as the ground of the estrangement from the life of God. The two are ever conjoined in the natural man: There is not intellectual obscurity beside practical estrangement from God, nor ignorance beside hardness of heart; the one conditions the other, working destructively as they reciprocally affect each other. Hence it cannot be affirmed, that the former applies more to the Gentiles, the latter to the Jews (STIER and others); the Gentiles alone are spoken of, as a type of the natural character. But at the same time the “ignorance” is not to be regarded as merely a consequence, and these two clauses (with διὰ) referred to the last participial clause alone (MEYER).

[This parallelism of construction in which the first and third, second and fourth clauses are connected together is accepted, by BENDEL, DE WETTE, OLSHAUSEN, FORBES (Symmetrical structure of Scripture, p. 21), SCHENKEL and others. It is opposed by MEYER, HODGE, EADIE and ELLICOTT; but the objection they urge, that “ignorance” is not the cause of “darkness,” loses its force when it is remembered that the Apostle is speaking of a process rather than a condition. Nor is it contrary to the Apostle’s style, in which parallelisms abound, far less so than to explain: “Darkness of mind is the cause of ignorance, ignorance and consequent obduracy of heart are the cause of alienation from God” (HODGE), thus trajecting the third and fourth clauses between the first and second. This is the view of MEYER, who makes the last clause subordinate to the third (though both are introduced by διὰ): a needless complication, which leads to the removal of the comma, while the view of BRAUNE requires the insertion of one after θεοῦ. See Textual Note 2.—R.]

Ver. 19. Who, οἱ τινες [men who, such as], introduces the explanation, the proof of this condition.—Being past feeling have given themselves over ἀπηλγγκότες ἑαυτοῦς παρέδωκαν].—Ἀπηλγγκότες (from ἀπὸ and ἄλγος, ἄλγῳ), unsusceptible of pain, and according to the context, in the heart, the moral consciousness, hence not feeling the unrest and punishment of conscience, the correction of God (Jer. v. 3), they have given themselves over, ultro (BENDEL); that is the ἀνασθησία, sponte sese in gurgitem omnium vitiorum precipitans. CALVIN: Homines a Deo relictī, sopita conscientia, extincto divini iudicii timore, amisso denique sensu tanquam attoniti, belluino impetu se ad omnem turpitudinem projiciunt. [The pronoun ἑαυτοῦς is used “with terrible emphasis” (MEYER).—R.] Self-reprobation is consummated in becoming apathetic, just as Rom. i. 24: “God delivered them over, in the lusts of their hearts.” Our passage marks the freedom and guilt of men, the passage in Romans the rule, will and power of God, but both of them indicate the means: the lust corrupting even unto want of feeling; here prominence is given to the consequence, the condition which has arisen and becomes aggravated (ἀπηλγγκότες),* as there to the ground, the active power (“lusts”).

To wantonness, τῇ ἀσελγείᾳ.—The term, apparently from θέλγω, schwelgen [allied to the English swell, and meaning to over-eat, carouse, debauch], occurs quite frequently (Mark vii. 22; Rom. xiii. 13; 2 Cor. xii. 21; Gal. v. 19; 1 Pet. iv. 3; 2 Pet. ii. 2, 7, 18; Jude 4), almost always in connection with sensual sins, denoting, however, not special sin, but reckless, unbridled, extravagant and excessive character in general.

* [This is a dative of reference, giving the sphere or element in which. On the difference between it and the accusative it may be said that the latter is more objective, denoting that the darkness extended over the mind, the former more subjective, denoting that it has its seat in the mind. The word itself is here—the understanding (Verstand).—R.]

† [On the etymology and meaning of πώρωσις. See FRITZKE, Rom. xi. 7. It undoubtedly means hardness, obduracy (not blindness), used by medical writers of the “callus” at the extremity of fractured bones.—R.]

Comp. TITTMANN, I., p. 150 ff., on ἀσέλγεια and ἀκαθαρσία, [TRENCH, § xvi., and Exeg. Notes on Gal. v. 19, in this volume.—R.] It is not to be limited to sensual lasciviousness (MEYER).

To work all uncleanness, εἰς ἐργασίαν ἀκαθαρσίας πάσης.—[The preposition introduces the conscious aim of this self-abandonment.—R.] Ἐργασία marks the managing, the assiduous, connected labor [the working at it as though it were a trade], and ἀκαθαρσία, extended by πάσης,* sets forth what has come to pass in the service of ἀσέλγεια. We should apply it to all kinds of uncleanness, especially libidinous, but also to the lust of the eye and pride, natural and unnatural, refined and coarse, solitary and social, in thought, word and deed (Rom. i. 24–32). Still less is this to be limited to libidinous filthiness (MEYER), or to trade in harlotry, questus ex impudicitia (GROTIUS, BENDEL and others). The next phrase will not justify this.

In greediness, ἐν πλεονεξίᾳ.—This word means to want to have more, greediness, avarice, graspingness, limited usually to earthly possession, to money (v. 3; Col. iii. 5; Mark vii. 22; Luke xii. 15); but the limitation arises from the context, not from the word itself. The context here does not admit of any such limitation: ἐν, in, marks the ground on which the “uncleanness” moves, and this is not avarice, but greed in general unto insatiableness. Hence the GREEK FATHERS thus explain it (CHRYSOStOM: ἀμέτρως, THEODORET: ἀμετρία, EUCHEMIUS: κοῦν ὑπερβολὴν καὶ ἀνευδότως). Ἐν is not=σύν (LUTHER: together with avarice); there is not a new special vice, avarice, added to another special one, unchastity (MEYER, SCHENKEL); neither the context nor the word itself favors the explanation: gluttony (HARLESS).†

Reminder respecting Christ and Christian instruction; vers. 20, 21.

Ver. 20. But ye, ὑμεῖς δέ, in opposition to “the rest of the Gentiles” [just described].—Did not so learn Christ.—Ὁὐχ οὕτως is a very emphatic litotes=entirely otherwise, not at all in such a way that you can live afterwards as you did before. Ἐμάθετε [the historical aorist] τὸν Χριστόν marks Christ as the object, the substance of the preaching of the Apostles and of Christ Himself; His person we must attain to; He Himself must be accepted and appropriated in us (vers. 13, 15; Col. ii. 6; 1 Cor. i. 23; 2 Cor. i. 19). Hence it is not=the doctrine of Christ, as was once almost generally thought. [This use of the verb with an accusative of the person is probably unique (ELLCOTT), and properly so, for in no other learning is a Person so directly and fully the object. Hence the explanation: learnt to know, is inadmissible as without lexical authority and insufficient. BEZA's exegesis is totally unwarranted: “Ye are not so—ye have learned Christ.”—R.]

* [The unusual position of πάσης leads ELLCOTT to render: “uncleanness of every kind.”—R.]

† [HOPES renders: “together with covetousness,” which is doubly objectionable. The wider sense of πλεονεξία is accepted by EADIE, ALFORD and ELLCOTT. The last named, however, properly objects to obliterating the underlying notion of covetousness and self-seeking which seems bound up in the word. Comp. Col. iii. 5, p. 64; and TRENCH, Syn. § xxiv., who links it most closely with sins of lust.—R.]

Ver. 21. If indeed ye heard him [εἰ γὰρ αὐτὸν ἠκούσατε].—Εἰγε, as in iii. 2, marks in a fine turn of expression a definite, undoubted fact (“that he heard him”), particula non miruit, sed augeat vim admonitionis (BENDEL). It is not however=“so as” (STIER). Αὐτόν is in emphatic position; “heard” denotes the beginning of the discipleship; hence it is not merely, heard of Him (LUTHER), but heard Him Himself in spirit, even though through the instrumentality of others. He is the subject of the very first instruction. Hence Paul adds:

And were taught in him, καὶ ἐν αὐτῷ ἐδιδάχθητε.—The two designations* correspond to those in Matt. xxviii. 19, 20: “disciple all nations”—“teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.” “In,” ἐν, is neither=περί, concerning (PISCATOR, nor ὑπό (FLATT), nor διά, by (BEZA) [E. V.], nor illius nomine, quod ad illum attinet (BENDEL), but an instruction not merely having its result, a being or living in Him, but in accordance with the fellowship with Him (WINER, p. 366); in ipso=ipsi insiti et docti are equivalent (BUCER); doceri is inseri.

As is the truth in Jesus [καθὼς ἐστιν ἀλήθεια ἐν τῷ Ἰησοῦ].—“As” refers only to the instruction, to its quality; it corresponds to “not so” (ver. 20); what was there negatively and briefly indicated, is here positively expressed, and then given in detail.† “Is truth” gives prominence to the agreement of the teaching with the reality: in the instruction they hear Him really, possess Him as He is. Ἐστιν, coming first, denotes the existence, the reality, and that, too, as a present, now valid and continuing reality.

Consequens τῷ audire et τῷ doceri est τὸ discere (BENDEL): they have therefore learned, as truth is in Him. “Truth” is here opposed to the heathen “vanity;” as the latter was a self-made foundling, the former is something bestowed, real, excluding the subtleties of human origin or change of any kind. [The notion of the Greek adjective ἀληθινός is thus included by Dr. Braune. The clause setting forth the manner of the instruction (the substance follows in vers. 22–24), may be thus explained: If ye were taught so that what you received was according to what is true (true and real) as embodied in a personal Saviour. The literal rendering: “as is truth in Jesus” gives most nearly the exact force.—R.] In the expression ἐν τῷ Ἰησοῦ, the article is significant, pointing to the known Person, the personal name being chosen instead of the official title, Christ. BENDEL: Expressius ponit nomen Ἰησοῦ. CHRISTI, ideam perfectissime et fulgidissime explevit JESUS; this preserves the received instruction from obliteration.—The clause is, therefore, not parenthetical (BEZA, RUECKERT and others), “truth” is neither agnitio Dei (BENGEL), nor true doctrine of Christ (PISCATOR and others), nor true holiness, goodness (ERASMUS, HARLESS [HODGE] and others). We should not connect "in Jesus" with what follows (HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, II., 2, p. 291).

* [ALFORD renders: “If, that is, it was Him that ye heard and in Him that ye were taught,” following MEYER in regarding both as included in “ye learned Christ,” the first clause referring to the first reception, the second to further instruction. So ELLCOTT. Perhaps ALFORD restricts the meaning too much when he explains “heard Him,” “if ye really heard at your conversion the voice of the Shepherd Himself calling you as His sheep.”—R.]

The Christian walk; vers. 22-24, a. Negative side; ver. 22, b. Positive side; vers. 23, 24.

Ver. 22. That ye put off, ἀποθέσθαι ὑμᾶς. —This infinitive depends grammatically on the entire thought, that they heard Him and were taught in Him, as the truth in Jesus is (BLEEK), although STIER and BENGEL are not incorrect in connecting it in sense with "I say and testify" (ver. 17); they recognise, however, "a certain reference to the nearest words" (ver. 21). The emphasis rests on the verb, coming first, which has its antithesis in "put on" (ver. 24). It is incorrect to accept a dependence on the last clause alone (MEYER) and a contrast between "Jesus" and "ye" (JEROME, HARLESS, and others), which would be indicated by an emphatic position for ὑμᾶς and the insertion of οὐτως.* In the frequently occurring figures of putting on and off the clothes to represent the external appearance from which the internal state may be inferred, it is not necessary to find an allusion to a race before which, or a baptism (of a proselyte) at which the clothes should be taken off; the context gives no warrant for either. The Lord Himself (Luke xxiv. 49) transferred into the New Testament the usage of the Old Testament in describing an instantaneous, sudden inspiration. Comp. STIER, Words of Jesus, vii. p. 323 f. Paul extended the figure (ver. 25; vi. 11, 14; Rom. xiii. 12, 13; Col. iii. 8, 9, 10; 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54; Gal. iii. 27; 1 Thess. v. 8). The verb includes the sense of a decided casting away, not merely a gentle putting off, since this is required of the followers of Jesus, among whom a preserving of the old man and the heathen walk is intolerable.

As regards your former way of life [κατὰ τὴν προτέραν ἀναστροφὴν]. —Κατὰ introduces that with respect to which the putting off takes place. The substantive (ἀναστροφή), like the verb, includes a course of conduct arising from a corresponding disposition, the manifestation of what is within, as Gal. i. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 11, 12; i. 17, 18 (STIER), and is more than περιπατεῖν, preparing the way for the mention of the internal disposition which should be put off. It is not enough to put off merely the former heathen (προτέραν) walk.† Antitheton versus 23 totus (BENGEL).

9, 10; 17-21). "Old" designates that it is condemned to be put away, old over against Jesus the second Adam; hence "the old man" (Col. iii. 9; Rom. vi. 6) means the sinful Ego deranged by sin, the natural man in the corruption of his sin.* This condition is then described:

Which waxeth corrupt according to the lusts of deceit [τὸν φθειρόμενον κατὰ τὰς ἐπιθυμίας τῆς ἀπάτης]. —The present participle denotes the present condition, which is not however a purely passive one: "which is corrupted," but in accordance with ver. 19: "which corrupts himself." It is then neither imperfect: which corrupted himself (BENGEL), nor to be taken as referring to the future judgment (RUECKERT and others); yet it is not merely—morally destroying himself (HARLESS). The antithesis is creatum (BENGEL) and the use of φθορά and φθειρόμενος (Gal. vi. 8; Rom. viii. 20, 21) points to the whole man, body and soul. [MEYER and HODGE refer it to eternal destruction: "which tends to destruction," but this does not do justice to the present participle, the peculiar force of which, as indicating a process not entirely passive, is brought out by "waxeth corrupt" (ELLCOTT). HODGE's objection, that "old" already expresses the idea of corruption, has no force against this description of the progressive character, while his own view introduces an objective element into a delineation which is strictly subjective.—R.]

The accomplishment of the corruption is more closely defined by the phrase: "according to the lusts of deceit." The corruption is accomplished in accordance with the lusts, the factors of the corruption; and these are affairs of sin, which are here personified in accordance with the power of deceiving and betraying inherent in it (Rom. vii. 11; 1 Cor. xi. 3; 2 Thess. ii. 9). The genitive, which is that of the subject, is not to be resolved into an adjective (GROTIUS [E. V.]) and thus weakened, nor applied merely to error technicus (BENGEL). The antithesis is secundum Deum—in iustitia et sanctitate veritatis (BENGEL).

Ver. 23. And become renewed [ἀνανεοῦσθαι δεῖ]. —The contrast is marked by δεῖ, which introduces the positive side (vers. 23, 24). The verb in the passive† points to the fact that a work and operation of God is spoken of (ii. 10; iv. 24; κτισθέντα; see Tit. iii. 5, 2 Tim. i. 9). The present refers to an operation which is not concluded in a moment, but continues. The roots of the word (νέος [recent], new) points to a becoming rejuvenated, to the beginning, the coming into being, of what was not, or not yet, or no longer; καινός [novus] refers to the character of that which exists, as compared with its

*[MEYER insists that ὑμᾶς forbids the dependence on εἰδόμενε, but ELLCOTT suggests that it marks a contrast, not with "Jesus," but with the "Gentiles" and their own previous condition as implied in the next phrase. The infinitive has, not in itself, but from its independence, an imperative force, as in "walk" (ver. 1): "that ye must put off." As an aorist it probably refers to the speedy and single nature of the act. The dependence on the entire preceding thought is a satisfactory solution: The substance of what you heard, were taught, when you heard Him and were taught in Him in the correct way "as is truth in Jesus," was "to put off," "that you must put off," etc.—R.]

†[ALFORD thus indicates the train of thought: "for you were clothed with it (the old man) in your former conversation." The phrase qualified the verb, not the substantive: "That as regards your former way of life you put off."—R.]

†[The middle form of the verb is active in meaning (HARLESS), so that we must insist on the passive here. STIER objects that "to be renewed" is not a proper subject of exhortation. But the Apostle is giving the substance of the teaching (ver. 21), and as ALFORD well remarks: "we have perpetually this seeming paradox of God's work encouraged or checked by man's co-operation or counter-action." He renders: "undergo renewal."—R.]

former condition; ἀνακαίνω is to put away the ruins of the present condition and to supply new powers, to transfer into a condition of newness, as distinguished from the previous one. Hence we never find νέα κτίσις, but καὶνῇ, since νεότης is already implied in κτίσις. See TITTMANN, Syn. I. p. 60f. [TRENCH, Syn. (2 xviii.; Colossians, p. 65,) ALFORD and HODGE in loco.—R.] Ἀνά indicates not merely a setting up, but according to the participles in vers. 18, 19, a restitution of the original creation. The infinitive is in the same dependence as ἀποθεῖσθαι, although in these infinitives there is latent, a hortatory imperative, which comes out in ver. 25. Still this inheres in the thought, not in the form.

In the Spirit [or by the Spirit] of your mind [τῷ πνεύματι τοῦ νοῦς ὑμῶν].—The renewal, the letting themselves be renewed, is accomplished in this. The dative is one of reference, the genitive that of the subject. HARLESS says: ψυχὴ designates the immediateness of the personal life, καρδιά the same as the internal life of a human person, νοῦς is the habitus corresponding to this existence and life, πνεῦμα the motive power which calls forth and conditions this habitus. To this the organism of the human spirit corresponds. BENDEL: spiritus mentis, 1 Cor. xiv. 14. Spiritus est intimum mentis. That inexplicitabile coming from God (OETINGER) must be renewed, is seized by the corruption of sin, needs redemption from "the vanity of the mind." We may not take πνεύματι as instrumental on account of the genitive and understand it of the Holy Spirit (OEKUMEN, and others), nor can both explanations be combined (STIER: through the Spirit yet living in you); in that case the middle, contrary to the usage which gives it an active sense, and contrary to the Biblical view, which never speaks of men renewing themselves, is taken as reflexive. Nor is the "spirit" of man to be regarded as opposed absolutely to the "flesh," as if it could never be subject to the latter (SCHENKEL).

[The view of BRAUNE, which takes τῷ πνεύματι as a dative of reference referring exclusively to the human spirit, is accepted by most commentators. HODGE takes πνεῦμα here as the "interior life—that of which the νοῦς, καρδιά, ψυχὴ are the modes of manifestation,"—a psychological statement inferior to that of HARLESS, and probably resulting from the desire to avoid any trichotomic opinion.—MEYER has wavered in his views: adopting in the 1st, 3d and 4th eds. the usual opinion, and in the second that of FRITZSCHE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT and others. This takes the dative as instrumental, and as referring to the human spirit acted upon by the Holy Spirit (see Romans, p. 235), or to the Holy Spirit in a gracious union with the human spirit (ELLICOTT, 3d ed.). To this view I incline, but not decidedly. The other interpretation is open to objections both of an exegetical and psychological nature. This sense of πνεῦμα is now clearly established, and indispensable in exegesis. In fact as ALFORD says: "the πνεῦμα of man is only then used 'sensu proprio' as worthy of its place and governing functions, when it is one Spirit with the Lord." The trouble is, that this πνεῦμα would hardly be spoken of as the instrument; the answer being that a process is described as going on, the agent being "the restored and Divinely informed leading principle of their νοῦς."—The genitive is then possessive.—R.]

Ver. 24. And that ye put on, καὶ ἐνδύσασθαι, is an internal act done by us, having an effect upon the walk and thus manifesting itself.—The new man, τὸν καὶνὸν ἄνθρωπον, we have as present, given, outside of ourselves, in Christ; hence Rom. xiii. 14: "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ."

Who after God hath been* created [τὸν κατὰ θεὸν κτισθέντα].—This marks both the reality and the character of the new man. The designation evidently points to Gen. i. 26, 27; which is even more prominent in the parallel passage, Col. iii. 10 ("after the image of Him that created"). Comp. 1 Pet. i. 15. It should be noticed that this qualification compels us not to take "new man" as exactly=Christ; for He is not "created," but rather "God, the image of Him who creates," after whom (κατὰ) the new man is created. Hence we should refer it to the new human personality as respects Christ, which the Christian should become. Thus in the Epistle to the Colossians we find: τὸν νέον τὸν ἀνακαυόμενον, the young, tender, newly born, which is renewed, developed in contrast with the previous one. The creation of the protoplast is however merely recalled; the expressions are borrowed from it, to designate the new creation taking place in Christ and to put it in relation to the first.†

In righteousness and holiness of the truth [ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ ὁσιότητι τῆς ἀληθείας].—This characterizes the new man and sets forth the distinguishing marks of its character; the preposition adjoining to "created" that in which the created man appears, with which he is endowed, equipped. The Apostle proceeds from without to within. The two notions are united together and applied to God (Rev. xvi. 5), to men (1 Thess. ii. 10; Tit. i. 1; Luke i. 75), ὁσιος is predicated of God (Rev. xv. 4), of Christ (Heb. vii. 26; Acts ii. 27; xiii. 35), of men (1 Tim. ii. 8). Ὁσιότης refers to the inmost nature, the disposition, the immaculate purity of love (i. 4; v. 27; Heb. vii. 26), δικαιοσύνη to the action and mode of dealing, which keeps all relations within the bounds of truth and right (STIER). TITTMANN, Syn. I. 25 ff. Here we may not apply the frequent usage of Plato, who joins both notions, of which Philo says: ὁσιότης μὲν πρὸς θεόν, δικαιοσύνη δὲ πρὸς ἀνθρώπων θεωρεῖται. MEYER regards δικαιοσύνη as moral rectitude in itself, ὁσιότης specially in reference to God. SCHENKEL takes the former as respecting the world, the latter God; the latter is evidently opposed to "uncleanness" (ver. 19) and the former to "wantonness" and "greediness." [So STIER and ELLICOTT.] The genitive sets forth the ground of both; "the truth" is personified, like "love" (ver. 22), the cause of the righteousness and holiness; out of the eternal Divine basis of truth springs the ethical personal life, which is conditioned by this as true: without this man would lapse into "vanity" (ver. 17). LUTHER incorrectly renders the genitive by an adjective: in real righteousness and holiness. [So CALVIN, BEZA, HOLZHAUSEN and the E. V., while PELAGIUS explains: "in the truth," καὶ ἐν ἀληθείᾳ (the reading of D. F. and some fathers). There seems to be an antithesis between "truth" here and "deceit" in ver. 22 (HODGE, EADIE and others), which suggests that the notion "real" is prominent here.—R.] It is incorrect to take the preposition as instrumental (MONYS), or as = ergo. The new man is not created by this ethical quality but by God, nor is this the end, but the accompanying gift of this creation, as is manifest in Christ, to whom this belonged from the beginning, not becoming His in the course of His life.

*[Not created in the case of each individual believer, but created once for all (initio rei Christianae, Bengel) and then individually assumed" (ELLICOTT). Comp. Textual Note 6.—R.]

†[The doctrine of the restoration to us of the Divine image in Christ, as here implied, is not to be overlooked. MUELLER, Lehre von der Sünde, II. p. 485 ff., denies any allusion to it here, but on insufficient grounds, as indeed he himself virtually allows. Not the bare fact of Gen. i. 27, but the great truth which that fact represents is alluded to. The image of God in Christ is a far more glorious thing than Adam ever had, or could have had; but still the κατ' εἰκόνα θεοῦ—κατὰ θεόν, is true of both" (ALFORD). Comp. Colossians, p. 68.—R.]

[OLSHAUSEN's remarks are generally accepted: "δικαιοσύνη betokens a just relation among the powers of the soul within, and towards men and duties without. But δοσιότης, like the Hebrew דִּשְׁדֻּשׁ, betokens the integrity of the spiritual life, and the piety towards God of which that is the condition. Hence both expressions together complete the moral idea of perfection. As here the ethical side of the Divine image is brought out, Col. iii. 10 brings out the intellectual. The new birth alone leads to ἐπίγνωσις: all knowledge which proceeds not from renewal of heart, is but outward appearance; and of this kind was that among the false Colossian teachers. On the other hand, in Wisdom ii. 23 the physical side of the Divine image is brought out." ELLICOTT deems the last reference somewhat doubtful.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The nature of the heathen life is "vanity of the mind." This designates the type of the natural character among Jews and Christians. ["The ethical and religious element of their life was unsatisfactory and cheerless, alike in worship and in practice, the same as to present happiness as to future prospect, for they knew not man's chief end" (EADIE).—R.]

2. The "vanity of the mind" is the result of a fall from a previous possession and enjoyment of original gifts, which is accomplished in a two-fold series of acts reciprocally requiring and furthering each other; the intellectual and moral side of man's nature being in turn solicited, and thus roused in selfishness, it is ever further removed from the truth in God and from the God of truth. Indeed, the result, the vanity of the mind, is itself capable of increase and must develop into extreme corruption, if aid does not come and a retrograde movement begin.

3. The intellectual and moral side of man require and promote each other. The Reason cannot remain healthy and clear, or susceptible, as from the beginning, if the will is or becomes warped or weakened. The obscuration, weakening of the Reason necessarily enters with the enfeebling and confusion of the will. The Apostle comprises both under the term *πνεῦμα (ver. 23); the former he designates νοῦς (vers. 17, 23), διάνοια (ver. 18); the latter καρδία (ver. 18). The Apostle Paul places the initiative in the lusts (ver. 22: "corrupted according to the lusts of deceit"), as Luther sharply indicates in his incorrect translation (which corrupts itself through lusts in error). The perverted will, executing what is wrong, makes the understanding a sophistical attorney, a crafty counsellor for its unrighteousness.

4. The factors of corruption are three: God, who hardens (Exod. iv. 21; vii. 3; xiv. 4, 8; Jno. xii. 40; Rom. ix. 18; i. 24), man himself (1 Sam. vi. 6; Ps. xc. 8; Heb. iii. 8), the surrounding circumstances, through which and under which it takes place (Gen. vii. 13; viii. 15; Heb. iii. 13). According to the context man is here described as the cause of the corruption (ver. 19), because personal guilt and the evoking of self-activity is treated of, while in Rom. i. 24 God is termed the Author in the same matter, since there the final and deepest ground is touched upon. Usually its consummation appears as a history, which is pragmatically sketched by the external circumstances, the Power above the man and the concealed doings within him not being brought into prominence. What comes to pass is never loosed from the dealings of God and His holy rule, nor from the consent and opposition of man or without the influences of historical circumstances and persons. Consider, however, that thy guilt is at once God's punishment and thine own guilt, and forget not that the two appear together as a developing history.

5. The dangerous element of sin is the deceit of lust, which plays the role of pleasure, and is not really ἡδονή, but πλοῦσις and σπείρει. This is God's appointment, that what is unholy should be unwholesome, as wrong is ill; the lustful one, turning away from God, naturally ruins himself, which is possible only in self-deception.

6. Renewal is not accomplished by man in his own strength, but only in the acceptance and use of the vital strength promised and imparted to him with justification, hence in the appropriated power of God, in the strength of Divine life. Comp. notes 8, 10.

7. Renewal too, like corruption, has its history. As the latter proceeds from ἀνομία to ἀνομία, even to the end, θάνατος (Rom. vi. 19, 21), so in the former advance is made from hearing Christ to being taught in Him, from the scholar to the friend, the intimate of Christ, and from the servant of God, who permits himself to be thus termed, to heirship and participation in His kingdom. [Comp. Ezegetical Notes on ver. 23.—R.]

8. The beginning of the Christian walk is the putting off the previous vices (ver. 28-32), and from resistance, even if with feeble result, advance is made to victorious crucifixion of the flesh and its lusts (Gal. v. 16, 17, 24).

* [Whatever view may be taken of ver. 23, or whatever psychological distinctions may be allowable in the exegesis of the New Testament, there is nothing here or elsewhere to indicate that man has a "spirit" unenslaved by the "flesh," unaffected by the fall. The natural state is the more awful, because the "spirit," the higher part, the point of connection with Divine influences, is under the dominion of sin.—R.]

9. In this too knowing and willing stand in reciprocal action conditioning each other: learning Christ and putting on Christ, Christian science and Christian life. Theological faculties and the Church of Christ belong together. No knowledge should sunder itself from life, nor the science of Theology from the Christian Church. Where faith in Christ is not active, the scientific culture of individuals and churches will fare badly enough.

10. The vital power of faith must in the moral life-process prove itself real (της ἀληθείας) and permeate the whole mode of life (ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ) from within to without (ἐν δόξῃ) and thus manifest itself in the walk. Faith, in itself a moral act, must prove itself in an ethical life-process.

[11. "This passage is of special doctrinal importance, as teaching us the true nature of the image of God in which man was originally created. That image did not consist merely in man's rational nature, nor in his immortality, nor in his dominion, but specially in that righteousness and holiness, that rectitude in all his principles, and that susceptibility of devout affections, which are inseparable from the possession of the truth, or true knowledge of God. This is the Scriptural view of the original state of man, or of original righteousness, as opposed, on the one hand, to the Pelagian theory, that man was created without moral character; and, on the other, to the Romish doctrine, that original righteousness was a supernatural endowment not belonging to man's nature. Knowledge, and consequently righteousness and holiness, were immanent or con-created in the first man, in the same sense as were his sense of beauty and susceptibility of impression from the external world." HODGE.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Deal earnestly with the conduct of those committed to you, as did the Apostle, and take care that none of your children can say: Father and mother have not told me of it.—Much depends upon this, that every one in his circle and place bears witness against the walk of the natural character and in favor of Christian conduct.—Consider, no one is lost except through his own fault; but perhaps through yours too!—Sin binds the will, so that it is not free, and blinds or darkens the Reason, so that it is not healthy. The two faculties act and react upon each other; it is madness for a sinner to boast of a sound reason. It is a fearful truth however, thou wilt have life, enjoy the world and yet thou destroyest thyself, most certainly thy soul at least. Where God's life and gift, peace and pure pleasure of the heart is wanting, there man wastes himself away, grasping in darkness for light, in emptiness for fullness, in apathy for life, aiming at these, and yet, at last, comfortless and unsatisfied.—Hold to Christian instruction and constantly try, whether thou art learning Christ: He is the measure of all truth.—Never forget: He is the Light; whose is athirst, let him come to Him—and drink! You may know everything in the world, but not knowing Him, thy knowledge is nothing; you may know nothing of the world, knowing Him, trusting in Him, thy knowledge is rich.—The toil of self-denial and denial of the world cannot be spared you; but begin in the centre, in thyself, thy will and heart. What avails external alteration: that is by no means growing better. One must not be ever setting the tools and the plough in order; draw furrows through the field of thy heart and sow good seed therein, thus wilt thou reach the harvest and the harvest home. The sun makes the Spring and rejuvenates the earth, not single sunbeams, however, but the sun itself ever mounting higher, ever working longer. So Christ, who renews thee. Look how Peter with his sanguine temper became the rock-man, became constant, and John with his choleric disposition (Mark iii. 17; Luke ix. 54) was renewed into the Apostle of energetic love.

STARKE:—The natural knowledge of God is not the right one, and is far from sufficing for salvation, 1 Cor. i. 21.—The origin of all our sins is the "vanity of the mind" and the darkened understanding. We do not understand what the true good is, nor how we can attain to it. If we are to be helped, we must be helped in these respects, else a hardening results, and we become at last "without feeling."—All, even the best, in man is corrupted by nature, accordingly nothing is to be expected from his own strength.—Mark, man, the stripes of thy conscience, they are a favor from God; despise them not, lest thy heart be gradually led by the deceit of sin into obduracy.—He who does not live devoutly has not rightly learned or heard Christ.—In Christ Jesus is the truth, not a doctrine merely, but a righteous life, and this truth consists in a putting off of the old man and a putting on of the new.—He who rightly knows Christ, must, to honor Him, live holily.—It is a sheer impossibility to be a Christian and to be willing to continue walking in heathenish lusts.—Through a long habit of sinning, the understanding at length becomes so darkened, the conscience so insensible, the will so stubborn, that the man no longer perceives the danger of his sinful condition, has no more conscience about sin, and no desire to desist from sin.—Where sin began, there repentance must begin.

RIEGER:—The understanding would otherwise be a pre-eminent ornament of man, but it too has suffered much from the inroads of sin.—A proper character begins in us with the knowledge and confession of the might of sin, how it has clung to us from the time of our birth and extended itself as an old man over all our powers and members.

HEUBNER:—Where the will is corrupt, the understanding is darkened; blindness is the result of hardening.—Heathenism is life without God, Christianity life from God.—The Christian must ever begin anew and at the same time afresh. Daily repentance is needed, if we know the weakness, impurity, inconstancy of our hearts.—We will be ever seeing remnants of the old man appearing and returning here and there, and then a putting off of the old and putting on the new man is at once necessary again, and a purging process must be begun as in the case of sick people.—There is no more certain sign of an unspiritual mind, than the question: What then is so bad in me? Am I then so entirely unlike the image of God?

PASSAVANT:—The history of the heathen of all ages and countries is a history of such vanity of mind, and of vanities; and all this vain character and action is renewed, re-decked and increased in the history of the character and doings of the heathen now-a-day, of the unbelieving and God-forsaken in Christendom. In the latter case the guilt is indeed greater, the injury deeper and the vanity worse.—This story of the origin of all heathen character and action, and of all idolatry in the world, repeats itself in every heart, which permits itself to be led through lustfulness and vanity of the mind away from the only true God into unbelief, disobedience and ingratitude. The will becomes perverted and evil, seducing in its turn the understanding and all the senses of man; and the mind, when it has once become false and vain, seduces in turn the impure heart, which has forsaken truth and faith; and here, in this impurity is the damnable ground and beginning of all ignorance and obduracy. That which is most exalted in us, which shall inherit immortality, our most beautiful, thinking, poetizing, loving, that which moves our whole heart and soul, what is inmost and most intellectual, our most profound life, our "spirit" itself must be renewed within us.

STIER:—The natural man in the vanity of his mind chooses what is void, empty and perishing, instead of what is Divinely real. Lust and deceit are akin.—Hearing, learning, becoming learned, are the three orderly degrees.—Man, corrupt by nature, destroys that which was created, God's Spirit in our spirit breaks anew the first creation. Once for all in the Person of Christ is that created and prepared for us, which we are to put on.

GERLACH:—The lusts paint joy for us and then bring misery, place man in opposition to his Creator, his eternal destiny, himself, making out of the whole character a lie.

ZIEL: The heathenish nature in our Christian congregations of to-day. From the text (vers. 17-32) we may perceive as in a mirror: 1) In what inward character of the heart (vers. 17-19), 2) in what outward form of the conduct it still manifests itself among us (vers. 23-32). Conclusion: To extirpate it by the roots, each one for himself, puts and must put it away from him.

On the Epistle for the 19th Sunday after Trinity, iv. 22-28.—LANOBEIN: How it is chiefly shown in social life, that something really new is born within us? When there is found, 1) in our mouth, instead of a lie, the truth, 2) in our heart, instead of wrath, placability, 3) in our hands, instead of unjust property, the gift of mercy.

THOLUCK: The virtue of Christian love of truth. 1. How does it manifest itself a) toward God, b) toward our neighbor, c) towards ourselves? 2. How do we attain to it? a) Through the consciousness of the continued presence of that eye, which sees in secret and to which a lie is an abomination, b) by taking the right standard, the Word of God.

F. A. WOLF: On the proper conduct of all in authority for the promotion of fidelity and probity in their subordinates. 1. Strict love of truth. 2. Forbearing earnestness in discipline and admonition. 3. Zeal for the public good in our own place and calling.

FLOREY:—A new man, a new life! 1) In words of truth, 2) mastery over the passions, 3) blamelessness in walk, 4) turning away from what is unjust, 5) activity in one's calling, 6) brotherly love in the heart.—Some principles for Christian parents in the education of their children 1. To convince them of the evil nature of their hearts. 2. To be helpful to the renewal of their mind in the Holy Ghost (Baptism, Home, School, Church). 3. To contend against their darling sins (lying, quick temper, slandering, purloining, tattling) and to help to the opposite virtues.

BRANDT: The new man in Christ. 1. Truthfulness his ornament. 2. His heart breathes love. 3. He allows himself to be guided by benevolence and trustfulness. 4. Faithful and honorable, is his watchword.—A rich harvest blessing is an urgent demand to put off the old man and to put on the new. Without this 1) we do not fulfil the design of God in bestowing this blessing, 2) with all our thanksgiving we cannot please God; 3) we are in danger of turning the blessing into a curse.

SPITTA: Believing and pious Christians should not walk as the heathen. 1. How the heathen walk. 2. Why Christians should not walk thus? 3. How they show proper earnestness in this.

GENZKEN (Preparatory discourse): The blessed barter (after Matt. ix. 16 f.). The old ragged mantle of the old man is cast away (the web of lust and error); 2. The Lord Jesus is put on (the garment of righteousness and honor).

A child in the lowest form of a Sunday School, will answer questions with which the greatest minds of the old heathen world grappled in vain.—There could be no light in their mind, because there was no life in their hearts, for the life in the Logos is the light of men.—Ver. 19. Self-abandonment to deeper sin is the Divine judicial penalty of sin.—Self was the prevailing power—the gathering in of all possible objects and enjoyments on one's self was the absorbing occupation. This accompaniment of sensualism sprang from the same root with itself, and was but another form of its development.—Ver. 20. Once dark, dead, dissolute and apathetic, they had learned Christ as the light and the life—as the purifier and perfecter of His pupils.—Ver. 22. This deceit is not simply error. It has assumed many guises. It gives a refined name to grossness, calls sensualism gallantry, and it hails drunkenness as good cheer. It promises fame and renown to one class, wealth and power to another, and tempts a third onward by the prospect of brilliant discovery. But genuine satisfaction is never gained, for God is forgotten.—Ver. 24. While this spiritual creation is God's nection; 2. Their external difference.—To learn Christ 1) the Christian's first duty, 2) his highest wisdom.—The seal of true Christianity is the new birth; for 1) where this is wanting, all good works are but seeming, and 2) where it is present the life with good works must really be seeming.—The deceit of sin and the truth of redemption: 1. Sin corrupts man under the deceitful representations of evil lust; 2. Redemption heals man by restoring his original truth in righteousness and holiness.—R.]

G., many versions), accepted by Lachmann, Tischendorf (ed. 1), Wordsworth, Eadie, Ellicott and others; the same words appearing with τὸ ἀγαθόν coming first in K. and some cursives. 2. In many authorities ἰδίας is omitted, and there is a strong suspicion of its interpolation from 1 Cor. iv. 12. Here too there is variety in the order; N.² B. some fathers read: ταῖς χερσὶν τὸ ἀγαθόν (Meyer, Alford, 4th ed.), while the order is reversed in the Rec., L., majority of cursives, many fathers (Griesbach, Scholz, Tischendorf, eds. 2, 7). 3. We have besides two briefer readings, almost wholly conjectural, though each claims a Father in support: the one ταῖς χερσὶν alone (regarding τὸ ἀγαθόν as interpolated from Gal. vi. 10), the other τὸ ἀγαθόν alone.—It will be seen then that the evidence strongly sustains the position of τὸ ἀγαθόν at the end of the clause; accepting this, the only other question deserving attention is the genuineness of ἰδίας. The mass of authority is in its favor, but very good authorities omit it. The internal evidence seems to be against it, for it may have been inserted from 1 Cor. iv. 12, and the special force attached to it by Ellicott (see Exeg. Notes) scarcely amounts to an argument for retaining it.—Braune's preference is rendered uncertain by an evident typographical error, but he rejects ἰδίας.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 32.—[B. (according to Alford's personal inspection, not B³) D. E. K. L. and a number of minor authorities read ἡμῖν; accepted by Lachmann. But N. A. F. and other authorities support ὁ μὴ. The probability of an alteration from γ. 2 has decided most recent editors of the correctness of the second person.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The general basis: no lie but the truth (ver. 25); the special points as respects disposition (vers. 26, 27), as respects work (ver. 28), word (vers. 29, 30); comprehensive conclusion (vers. 31, 32).

Ver. 25. The general basis. Wherefore, δὲ, gives the connection with what precedes ("no longer walk as the rest of the Gentiles walk"), and, as the exhortations with their positive and negative sides show, with special reference to vers. 22-24. Hence immediately: having put away falsehood, ἀποθέμενοι τὸ ψεῦδος.—According to Ps. cxvi. 11 ("all men are liars"); Lxii. 10; Rom. iii. 4, the first duty of every natural man is to put away the lie, especially as the connection with the kingdom of darkness is thereby indicated. For the devil is the liar from the beginning, who slew man, leading him away out of the truth of life in God (Jno. viii. 44). Hence [the abstract]* τὸ ψεῦδος, which is not τὸ ψευδῆσαι, not=lies (LUTHER); it is the opposite of the "truth as it is in Jesus." Comp. I Jno. ii. 4; iv. 20; v. 10. It does not occur then, because it is the principal spiritual sin of heathenism and has as its result a darkening of the spirit (SCHENKEL). This requirement is of deeper scope than to allow it to be said that even heathen ethics could designate and forbid this as sin.

Speak ye truth each one with his neighbor [λαλεῖτε ἀλήθειαν ἑκάστος μετὰ τὸν πλησίον αὐτοῦ].—This exhortation is [a reminiscence] from Zech. viii. 16 (LXX.): λαλεῖτε ἀλήθειαν ἑκάστος πρὸς τὸν πλησίον αὐτοῦ. The article is wanting with ἀλήθειαν, in order to mark that not the complete, entire truth is to be spoken; that cannot be done at the beginning; only let what you do say be true. Paul substitutes the preposition μετὰ for πρὸς, in order to give special prominence to the intercommunion in the speaking with each other [STIER] and to bring to mind the Christian brother, as the context requires. The reference is not to "neighbor" in the wider sense, to all men. The Apostle is treating of the Church of Christ.

For we are members one of another [ὅτι ἐσμὲν ἀλλήλων μέλη].—This is the motive: to be members one of another and to believe one another, how contradictory (MEYER)! Est enim monstrum, si membra inter se non consentiant imo si fraudenter inter se agant (CALVIN). Christians are "members one of another," not merely members of the body of Christ, but each has to do for the other, to give to him, as well as to receive from him and permit him to do in return. The reciprocal ἐπιχρησία of speaking the truth (STIER) is marked. It is entirely similar to Rom. xii. 5-8; I Cor. xii. 15-27.† The passage is full of significance, not inexact (GROTIUS, RUECKERT and others), and is not to be applied to the Gentiles and the Jews, as is done even by BENDEL.

THE PARTICULAR POINTS: a.) As respects the disposition: anger without sin, since in the Church so great occasion to anger especially is given to the Christian with his natural man, and the fellowship is so easily disturbed thereby, and the Christian himself corrupted; vers. 26-27.

Ver. 26. Be angry and sin not [ὀργίζεσθε καὶ μὴ ἁμαρτάνετε].—The first verb is to be taken as imperative, in this series of imperatives (vers. 25-32). This is further required by the circumstance, that it is a citation (Ps. iv. 5:

אֲנִי וְאֵלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל translated by the LXX. precisely as Paul here writes it): the original and the Greek version are undoubtedly imperative. The passage in the Psalms is rendered by LUTHER: Be angry, so that ye sin not; this passage: Be angry and sin not. The sense is evidently equivalent to ὀργιζόμενοι μὴ ἁμαρτάνετε (WINER, p. 292), which not only states the case in which they would become angry, but also expresses that the anger is allowed, aye commanded and righteous. This is only the more strongly marked by the two imperatives joined with καὶ, the second of which only is negative (ui); accordingly Paul used this form, this citation.* The original text in the Psalm, in which the main matter is the transformation of the angry quousque tandem to rest and gentleness, is correctly rendered by the LXX. (HENGSTENBERG, HITZIG, STIER, against EWALD, HARLESS and others). It can only be affirmed that Paul did not wish to prove anything by the citation (HARLESS); he wishes only to use the words of David, but does not use the words of the LXX. to strengthen those which they are acquainted with; it is incorrect to suppose that nothing depends on the sense of the original passage (RUECKERT). The Sacred Scriptures, which speak of the wrath of God, showing us Christ in anger at the cleansing of the temple (John ii. 13-16; Matt. xxi. 12, 13), do not reject anger: Jas. i. 19, 20; Rom. xii. 19; Eccles. vii. 9. So here, for we do not read: Do not be angry and sin, the negative cannot be moved forward so as to qualify the first verb (WINER, p. 460). Hence we need not accept an unwilling permission of anger (DE WETTE, WINER); in that case ἀλλά would be found in place of καὶ. Nor is "be angry" in accordance with an assumed Hebraism to be taken conditionaliter on account of the connection with a following imperative (RUECKERT, ZYKO, Stud. u. Krit., 1841, p. 690), [HODGE apparently]; that would really mean: if ye are analogy that may be derived from the body (Chrysostom), but on the deeper truth that in being members of one another we are members of the body of Christ."—ELLIOTT. The analogy CHRYSOStOM draws is striking, however, and deserving of notice: "If the eye were to spy a serpent or a wild beast, will it lie to the foot?" de.—R.]

* [This is perhaps the view now generally received. Both imperatives are jussive; anger is not only allowable, but commanded in certain cases, yet the Apostle forbids the joining of sin with it; in so doing the emphasis resting on the second imperative obscures the jussive force of the first one, rendering it rather assumptive: Be angry (for this must be so) and do not sin. So RADLIE, ALFORD, MEYER, ELLICOTT and others.—R.]

* [Notice the frequent use of abstract nouns, almost personifications, in this chapter. Here "the vice and habit of lying" is meant, which is a chief characteristic of the "old man," a natural and immediate result of the essential selfishness of sin. The aorist participle is preferred here (= having put away), "because the man must have once for all put off falsehood as a characteristic before he enters the habit of speaking truth" (ALFORD).—R.]

† ["The force of the exhortation does not rest on any mere ethical considerations of our obligations to society, or on any angry, ye will not sin. The limitation of "sin not" to reconciliation (HARLESS), to the exclusion of enmity against others (ZRO), is incorrect because not in accordance with the context. The acceptance of an interrogation (GROTIUS: are ye angry?) is inadmissible on account of the quotation.

Let not the sun go down upon your irritation [ὁ ἥλιος μὴ ἐπιδύετω ἐπὶ τῷ παροργισμῷ ὑμῶν].—This thought is occasioned by the citation (Ps. iv. 5) and the matter itself. There is also in the expression "let not the sun go down," a reminiscence of Deut. xxv. 13, 15, according to which the poor man should receive his cloak, given in pledge, and wages should be paid before sundown. There is no reference to the Pythagorean precept to be reconciled before sunset; and quite as little to Christ, the Sun of Righteousness (AUGUSTINE), certainly none to the Reason (LOMBARD). The [non-classical and rare] word παροργισμός occurs only here; it is related to παροργίζεσθαι (Eph. vi. 4; Col. iii. 21; Rom. x. 19), meaning the anger aroused in us, the being or becoming angry, which should not continue, nor be carried about and nourished. Affectus noctu retentus alte insidet (BENGEL). Anger thus becomes hate, rancor. What is right towards the occurrence, viz., being angry, should not when that is past, be retained against the person, who remains. The preposition παρά does not indicate something wrong (ZANCHIUS), [WORDSWORTH], and the article, marking the momentary being angry, connected with οργίζεσθαι, is not incorrect (STIER). [Comp. Textual Note 2. ALFORD brackets the article, suggesting that the omission gives the sense "upon any παροργισμός." The word irritation preserves the reference to occasion given indicated by παρά, and at the same time distinguishes (in English) from the "wrath" which is forbidden in ver. 31.—R.]

Ver. 27. Nor yet give place to the devil [μὴ δὲ δίδοτε τόπον τῷ διαβόλῳ].—Μὴ δὲ is disjunctive and adds something new (Matt. vi. 25); while μῆτε is adjunctive, adding something which belongs to the foregoing (Matt. v. 34-35). Comp. WINER, p. 457.* Besides not sinning by prolonging wrath, they should not sin by giving place to the devil. Δίδοτε τόπον designates, as in Rom. xii. 19, affording free play, wide space, of course in the heart. But to whom? to the devil, as in vi. 11; 2 Tim. ii. 26, even though it does not elsewhere occur in this sense in Paul's writings, but more frequently describes slanderers, or a slanderous manner (1 Tim. iii. 6, 7, 11; Tit. ii. 3).† The antithesis is found in ver. 30. Hence it does not mean: the blasphemer (LUTHER and others) or talebearer, as many hold. Nor is the verse to be applied to social life (HARLESS); the context requires a reference to individuals. Sinful anger brings even the Christian's heart into the power of Satan, from whom he was freed, destroying the fellowship with the Redeemer and His grace.

Ver. 28 b. As respects work: Honesty reaching to benevolence. Let him who stealeth steal no longer [ὁ κλέπτων μηκέτι κλεπτέτω].—Ὁ κλέπτων, which is neither—ὁ κλέψας, nor —ὁ κλέπτης, marks the act or the action, not the character; hence it is stronger than "him who stole," and weaker than "the thief." Comp. WINER, p. 331. LUTHER is therefore incorrect [rendering as in E. V.]; BENGEL also: qui furabatur, adding however: præsentī hic non excluso.* The notion of stealing, however, must not be limited here by the definition of criminal law and police regulation, but be conceived of from the stand-point of Christian ethics, as in the case of the eighth commandment. That deportment of the natural man over against the possessions of his neighbor, which ought to be overcome, is here treated of. It is incorrect to suppose idle habitual thieves are meant (SCHENKEL).—In the Christian ethical sense there is added: μηκέτι κλεπτέτω. Hence it is unnecessary to inquire why nothing is said of restitution (MICHAELIS), and the opinion that this exhortation is unsuitable, because it does not correspond with the Apostle's strictness (DE WETTE), is not pertinent. The Apostle's strictness and the Christian view follow immediately:

But rather let him labor, working with his hands that which is good [μᾶλλον δὲ κοπιᾶτω ἐργαζόμενος ταῖς χερσὶν τὸ ἀγαθόν. See Textual Note 4.].—Μᾶλλον δὲ gives prominence to the antithesis. With the emphatically placed κοπιᾶτω Paul includes laziness and idleness as the beginning and ground of theft (BENGEL: sæpe furtum et otium sunt una), and all the more decidedly by designating as the antithesis: "working with his hands that which is good." The participle denotes the active, assiduous performance, corresponding slightly with ἐργασία, ver. 19 (STIER); it is not earning, gaining, as the object is not external possessions, or handicraft, trade (MEYER, DE WETTE). BENGEL is excellent: Antitheton ad furtum, prius manu piceata (i. e., hands to which whatever comes near sticks as to pitch, pix) male commissum; on "with his hands" (the hands of the thief), he adds: quibus ad furtum abusus erat.† Rom. vi. 19.

* [EADIE: "Some, shocked at the idea that any connected with the Ephesian Church should be committing such a sin, have attempted to attenuate the meaning of the word." So JEROME, CALVIN, and HODGE who accepts the past tense. But such sinners may yet have been in the Church. See 1 Cor. v. 1; 2 Cor. xii. 21. In the service of the Reformed Church for the ordination of Deacons, this gloss occurs: "Let him that stole (or who hath been burdensome to his neighbor)," as an admonition to those who too long depend on the charities of the Church.—R.]

† [ELLIOTT retains idēas and says: "The thievish man lives by the labors and hands of others: he is now himself to labor, and with his own hands, not at τὸ κακόν, but at τὸ ἀγαθόν." But such an antithesis seems doubtful. The verse is better explained thus: He who steals (whether a thief or a so-called "business-man") should stop this, and go to work, to real labor. The participial clause then adds how: let him

* [In addition to the critical grounds for rejecting μῆτε, the grammatical objection should be noted. Μῆτε here would presuppose another μῆτε, while μὴ precedes. The sequence is therefore abnormal. MEYER suggests that it might occur, if the second member were an after-thought, but it never does occur in Paul's writings. This verse is therefore connected with the preceding, but as an affirmative sentence would be through δε.—R.]

† [In two of these instances the meaning is: the devil, in the other two, without the article, it may mean slanderous (as an adjective applied to women in both cases). MEYER is probably right in affirming that the substantive διαβόλος in the New Testament always means: the devil. So HODGE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT. "A name derived from the fearful nature and, so to say, office of the Evil One."—R.]

The hands should now do the good, that in its proper time and place must be done; then there will not be wanting something to bestow upon the needy.

That he may have to impart to him who hath need [ἵνα ἐχῇ μεταδιδόναι τῷ χρείαν ἔχοντι].—"That he may have" sets forth the purpose, not of him who labors, as if the work should be done on this account, but of the exhorting Apostle, the ruling Lord.* He should have something to give (μεταδιδόναι), for "we are members one of another" (ver. 25). This should take the place of stealing. "To him who hath need," to him from whom recompense is not to be expected. Instead of stealing there is required an honesty and activity, which impels to beneficence. Whether the question about restitution is necessary and ethical earnestness and depth are missed here—is evident enough. See Doctr. Notes.

c. As respects speech: no foul word, but gracious discourse tending to edification; vers. 29, 30.

Ver. 29. Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth [πᾶς λόγος σαπρὸς ἐκ τοῦ στόματος ὑμῶν μὴ ἐκ πορεύεσθω].—The subject: πᾶς λόγος σαπρὸς is assumed as present in the mouth of the readers while the predicate forbids: let it not proceed out; not one such should be expressed, v. 5; John iii. 16; 1 John ii. 21. [Literally: "let every foul saying not come forth."—R.] See WINER p. 162 f. BENGE: si jam in lingua sit, resorbete. Σαπρὸς, from σήπω, σαπῆναι, spoiled by putrefaction, corrupt, used of fishes (Matt. xiii. 48), of fruit (Matt. xii. 33; Luke vi. 43), of a tree (Matt. vii. 17, 18; xii. 33; Luke vi. 43), denotes according to the antithesis (ἀγαθὸς πρὸς) uselessness, but it is certainly chosen to designate both what is decayed, worn-out, ruined, and what is disgusting and stinking; BENGE: vetustatem redolens. Comp. κενὸς λόγος, v. 6; ῥήμα ἄργόν, Matt. xii. 36. In these passages the emptiness and unprofitableness is more prominent, here however the loathsomeness. THEODORET: αἰσχρολογία, λοιδορία, συκοφαντία, βλασφημία, ψευδολογία καὶ τὰ τοιούτοις ποίσιμα.

But whatever is good for the building up of the need.—'Αλλὰ (sc. ἐκπορεύεσθω), εἰ τις ἀγαθὸς (sc. ἐστὶ) πρὸς οἰκοδομὴν τῆς χρείας. Over against the prohibition the acceptance of wholesome speech takes a very modest attitude; over against πᾶς we have here εἰ τις. BENGE: non postulator ab omnibus par facultia. 'Αγαθός, however, as in Rom. xv. 2, designates what is internally, as morally good, not accomplish by assiduous effort with his hands something good, instead of this past evil. The purpose of the effort follows in the next clause. The sum of the whole is: Hon- est manual labor. 1. Labor, 2. better with the hands than with the dishonest wits; 3. above all let it be honest as to means and good as to end.—R.]

*[This is evidently stated by the Apostle as "the true specific object of all Christian labor, and just to the extent that the work is done on this account, will it be itself Christian." The laborer may be unconscious of this end at times, but it is necessarily his end in labor as a Christian. The verse is worth a whole library of volumes on social science. Its precepts would make many a so-called merchant or professional man go to manual labor, while on the other hand this last clause would settle the "workman's question" far more effectually than the whole array of socialistic theories, Agrarian appeals, trades unions and "strikes." But Prud- homme is too often preferred to Paul.—R.]

merely what is fitting (HARLESS), [HODGE, EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT]; that would be too external. The genitive of reference has been aptly rendered by LUTHER: where it is needed. This refers to the time when, to the place where, to the person to whom, to the method how, and to the purport which, we are to speak. "According to Jerome it applies also juxta opportunitatem loci, temporis et personæ edificare audientes" (STIER). Col. iv. 6: "How ye ought to answer every man." [ELLICOTT also takes the genitive as one of reference; "edifying as regards the need, i. e., which satisfies the need." ALFORD follows MEYER in regarding it as the regular objective genitive—"the defect to be supplied by edification," so that the sense is "the edification of the present deficiency or need calling for it." The hypallage of the Syriac, Beza, followed in the E. V., is clearly wrong, also qua sit opus (ERASMUS and others).—R.] It is incorrect to take ἡ χρεία=οἱ χρείαν ἔχοντες (RUECKERT, OLSHAUSEN).

That it may give grace to those who hear [ἵνα δῶ χάριν τοῖς ἀκούουσιν].—"That" refers to the design of the enjoining Apostle, not that of the obeying member of the congregation. The subject of "give grace" is "good word;" we do not then read "that ye may give." LUTHER presents very well the manner, the esthetic side: "that it may be gracious;" for χάρις means also the gracefulness, agreeableness, of the discourse; just as in Col. iv. 6: "in grace," Luke iv. 22. But the inner side, the matter, must not be overlooked, nor put in a secondary place; it must be a kindness. HARLESS includes this alone, but incorrectly; a befriending, agreeable act of kindness is meant, which should make this impression on the hearers: whether it profits them, is their own affair. STIER seems to be not incorrect, in finding here (δῶ) an echo of ver. 28 (μεταδιδόναι), and a spiritual gift in the seasoned but pleasant word spoken with unction. [ALFORD retains the theological meaning of χάρις: "minister spiritual benefit; be a means of conveying through you the grace of God" (so E. V.). HODGE on the other hand follows HARLESS, holding that the phrase always means to confer a favor; "that it may benefit the hearers." ELLICOTT accepts the non-theological sense of χάρις, but adds that owing to its change of meaning in the New Testament, there seems to be even in this phrase a reference to spiritual benefit. He renders: "that it may impart a blessing."—R.]

Ver. 30. And, καί, connects closely with what precedes; so much depends on proper speech.—Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, μὴ λυπεῖτε πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον τοῦ θεοῦ.—The verb forbids injuring, disturbing, rendering sorrowful, pointing thus to an intimate fellowship, in which joyous love toward and among each other should prevail, and to a tender conduct and intercourse; for it happens per sermones putres (BENGE). The object is "the Holy Spirit of God." This full designation shows the importance of the matter and compels us to recognize the objective reality and Personality of the Holy Ghost. Shepherd of Hermas, ii. 10: μὴ θλίβε το πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον τὸ ἐν σοὶ κατοικοῦν, μήποτε ἐντεθῇ κατὰ σοῦ καὶ ἀποστή ἀπὸ σοῦ. He who speaks out the foul thing which comes from his mind to his lips, injures thus the Holy Spirit in himself, and in others also. The plural means also: Ye, each one in himself, or in others too. The Holy Ghost like God is not apathetic, but capable of being affected. Rom. viii. 26. He feels what occurs in us, as a loving Friend, who does not Himself change, but will help us and change us, so long as we grant that He be not rejected. This is a possible final result, in spite of the close connection in which He stands to us, and in spite of the help and blessedness, which He produces in us. Both ideas are added in the relative clause which follows:

In whom ye were sealed unto the day of redemption, ἐν ᾧ ἐσφραγίσθητε εἰς ἡμέραν ἀπολυτρώσεως.—The first thought is contained in the expression: "in whom ye were sealed," in whom*—in fellowship with whom, ye were sealed (i. 13); the other is marked by "unto the day of redemption" (i. 14); hic dies est novissimus, cujus representatio quædam est in die mortis; præsupponit dies ceteriores (Rom. ii. 16); in illo maxime die referet, quis invenitur obsignatus (BENGEL). Isa. lxiii. 10 (where the LXX. have incorrectly rendered ἡμέραν, παρώριον; the Vulgate is better: affixerunt) should be compared, not as though this were a citation, but on account of the similar thought.

Accordingly λυτεῖν is not to be pared down to a mere troubling (BENGEL: turbare), nor is the human spirit to be regarded as the object (DE WETTE; Christian feeling), nor is the capability of being affected which belongs to God and the Holy Ghost to be rejected or regarded as a mere anthropomorphism; the reference to the possibility of being forsaken by the Holy Ghost should not be denied (SCHENKEL). There is both great kindness and earnestness in the warning thus formulated and emphasized: "in the case of the unredeemed sin it is a transgression of the law (Rom. iv. 15, etc.), in the case of the redeemed it is a wounding of the Holy Ghost" (HARLESS), whose tempter he is (ii. 22). Not by threatenings respecting the punishment of hell, but by holy dread of grieving the Holy Ghost, and wholesome fear of the day of Judgment, which with Him is only the day of Redemption, does the Apostle seek to persuade and strengthen.†

Comprehensive conclusion; vers. 31, 32. a. The negative side, ver. 31; b. The positive side, ver. 32.

* [Not by whom (whereby, E. V.), HODGE, since God is the Sealer, the Spirit the seal; comp. i. 13.—R.]

† [It is precisely this thought of the Apostle, so correctly stated by BRAUNE, which throws doubt upon the reference to the possibility of losing the seal, found here by HARLESS, STIER, ALFORD and BRAUNE (Doctr. Note 6). But the mention of a seal is not suggestive of such a possibility, nor is "grieving the Spirit"—resisting the Spirit, the latter being predicated of unbelievers only (Acts v. 51). Besides had Paul wished to convey this idea παροφύερε (from Isa. lxiii. 10, LXX.) was probably in his memory, and this would have expressed such a thought far better. Of course the caution assumes a logical possibility of falling, which is practical enough, but the appeal is to love not to fear. While the Scriptures always thus exhort men, it seems to be a species of anthropomorphism also, for the more theological and soteriological statements preclude such a possibility. Even here where the verse begins with such a caution, there is at once added a mention of the "seal" and of "the day of redemption" as the end, which suggests the doctrine of "final perseverance" rather than the opposite. Comp. EADIE and HODGE in loco.—R.]

Ver. 31. Let all bitterness.—Πικρία (Heb. xii. 15; Acts viii. 23; Rom. iii. 14) is ill-temper, animosity, unholy indignation, as πικραίνεσθαι, Col. iii. 19. Comp. ζήλος πικρός, Jas. iii. 14. It is entirely internal, concealed in the heart ["the prevailing temperament and frame of mind" (ELLIOTT).—R.].—And wrath.—Ουμὸς is excitement, passionate movement of the temper, in selfishness, unrestrained and disorderly.—And anger.—Ὁργή is the passion concentrating itself, directed against a particular person with the purpose of hurting him. Ὁ θυμὸς γεννητικός ἐστὶ τῆς ὀργῆς (ECUMENIUS). According to the context carnal anger is spoken of; hence there is nothing to be inferred respecting ver. 26 from this passage. BENGEL is incorrect: hæcenus descendit climax; but he properly compares the first with χρηστος, the second with εὐπλαγῆχοι, the third with γαριζόμενοι (ver. 32) as their respective antitheses. Comp. TITTMANN, Syn. I., p. 131 ff. [Also TRENCH, Syn. 2 xxxvii.; DONALDSON, New Cratylus, §§ 476, 477; Galatians v. 20.]

We now pass to the breaking out of what was within, to its becoming perceptible in look, mien and gesture: and clamor.—Κραυγὴ (Acts xxiii. 9) is wild, rough crying, refers to the voice, improperly strained and sharpened, as in scolding, upbraiding, to the casting about of words uninterruptedly. It is the steed of anger (CHRYSOSTOM).*—And evil speaking. βλασφημία, pointing to the purport of the speaking, is aspersion of one's neighbor, λαλοῦσα (Col. iii. 18; 1 Tim. vi. 4; Matt. xii. 31; xv. 19), yet sharper than this, not merely like "Raca" (Matt. v. 22), abusing the mental or civil capacity of a brother, but like "thou fool," the moral capacity for God's kingdom, and hence not without a reference to God (STIER), blaspheming possibly or probably. "All," which belongs to all the substantives, refers to the various degrees, from the coarsest among common people to the most refined among the educated; so θυμοί, 2 Cor. xii. 20.

Be put away from you.—Ἀρθήτω ἀφ' ὑμῶν is a stronger conclusion of "putting away" (ver. 25); it must take place with power in the mighty help of One stronger than we, to whom all this clings.—With all malice.—Σὺν πάσῃ κακίᾳ, the fermentum of the bitterness (MEYER) and the rest ["the active principle to which they are all due"], refers to malice, malignitas and malitia (Rom. i. 29; Col. iii. 8), both the quality and its manifestation, in order to sum up in conclusion all that cannot be enumerated.

[EADIE: "This verse contains not only a catalogue, but a melancholy genealogy of bad passions; acerbity of temper exciting passion; that passion heated into indignation; that indignation throwing itself off in indecent brawling, and that brawling darkening into libel and abuse; a malicious element lying all the while at the basis of these enormities."—R.]

Ver. 32. The positive side. And become ye, γίνεσθε δε.—Thus the antithesis is strongly

* [CHRYSOSTOM adds: "Let women especially attend to this, as they on every occasion cry out and brawl. There is but one thing in which it is useful to cry aloud, and that is in teaching and preaching."—R.]

marked at the very start, as not finished at one stroke, but having a development, a history.*—

Kind one to another.—Εἰς ἀλλήλους is put first, marking chiefly the fellowship. Χρηστοί (Luke v. 39; vi. 35; 1 Pet. ii. 3; Rom. ii. 4) helping the χρεία; ingeniosus quam verius is the reference to the name: Christians (OLSHAUSEN). Comp. TITTMANN, Syn. I, 140, 195.—Tender-hearted, εὐσπλαγχνοί (like 1 Pet. iii. 8) refers to sympathy, fellow-feeling, hearty compassion. [Comp. Colossians, p. 69].—Forgiving each other. χαριζόμενοι ἑαυτοῖς (2 Cor. ii. 7, 10; xii. 13), marks the tender, considerate, forbearing, forgiving life among themselves; ἑαυτοῖς points more strongly than ἀλλήλοις to the existing unity, where one deals with another as himself (Col. iii. 13). [The former thought is from STIER, the latter from ORIGEN, but they are not to be pressed too far.—R.]

Even as God in Christ forgave you [καθὼς καὶ ὁ θεὸς ἐν Χριστῷ ἐχαρίσατο ὑμῖν].—Καθὼς is as in i. 4 (HARLESS). Kai joins the readers to God, to the clause "God in Christ forgave you" The notion is as in Matt. vi. 12, 14. God's mercy and grace is manifest in Christ, proved itself in Christ, in the death (2 Cor. v. 19) of Him who accomplished the reconciliation of the world with God. "In Christ" belongs to the verb, the predicate, not to "God," the subject. [Either connection presents a truth: God in Christ, manifested in Christ, forgave us, but God forgave in Christ, in giving Him to be a propitiation for our sins. The latter thought seems more appropriate with the aorist which refers to a definite past act; it is neither "hath forgiven" (E. V.), nor "will forgive," a gloss our feeble faith puts on it.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The lie is put first by the Apostle as a fundamental vice. It is the loveless misuse of language and the means for communicating the thoughts of the heart, with the design of deceiving our neighbor. It injures love, therefore one's own heart, and one's neighbor, it injures fellowship and truth, and thus one's own heart again, which needs these, and our neighbor, who needs them no less. The untruth must be intentional; otherwise it is merely not true, an error, not amounting to a lie. The deception must be intentional: Drama, irony, satire, joke, conventionalities are not lies; for in these it is presupposed that our neighbor understands this language and can translate it into his own. What is conventional is the language of humanity, which should come from the heart and become natural, as in Fenelon. A lie is an act of lovelessness against our neighbor, even when not intended to injure him, perhaps only to help or assure ourselves or others, to make preposterous stories, something out of nothing, like all frivolous lies, which, however innocent they may appear, are still the school for turning frivolity into mischief. The word itself does not necessarily make the lie; it may be consummated in silence, in countenance, in gesture or act; but at all events it is an abuse of God's gift for the manifestation of our thoughts and perceptions. Its opposite is truthfulness, love of truth, which is at the same time love to mankind. It is indeed not possible without some circumspection and restriction, since it does not consist in having the heart on the tongue, but in having the tongue in the heart.

This vice is less strange among men than many others, so that even the better class of people, the pious world also, has an elastic conscience respecting this point. The conventional mode of life with its illusion and deception makes truthfulness utterly impossible, unless Christ becomes a living power in us. In lying as in stealing, a beginning is made in a little thing, and then come bolder advances, until an extreme is reached: one lie is told to conceal another, instead of forgiveness being sought, and then comes shameless, impudent untruth. It comes from the devil and leads to him; it is the devil's own vice (John viii. 44). The Scripture forbids it unconditionally, especially the Lord Himself (Matth. xii. 36, 37); it does not approve of the untruths of the Hebrew midwives, of Michal, Jonathan, etc., only narrating them as facts. Although lying mainly injures fellowship, yet it is not to be so connected therewith as to be considered allowable where no fellowship exists; nor is it to be so contra-distinguished from love, that a lie is not to be regarded as such, where the latter is active, even though the untruth is spoken with an intention of deceiving. The former principle applies to robbers, murderers and thieves; the latter to children, lunatics, drunkards and passionate people. In the first case it is not allowable like stratagem in war or in peril of life, and in the other truth should not become poison or poniard.* Over against the sophistry: verbal truth should not stand against hearty love, the rigoristic principle, which allows no lie in an emergency, is justified. It is better inconsistently to deny in books and in the pulpit the right of untruth, and in life and in the household to practise it, than at the expense of truth to serve a false one. To speak an untruth on account of a neighbor's necessity out of love for him is still a lie; personal need, personal interest does not first give it this character; the necessity of a neighbor gives no justification to a lie in a case of emergency.

2. Anger, which, in God, is the energy of holy love against sin and corruption disturbing and perverting moral order, is justified in the Scriptures. Affirmed of God more than three hundred times, it cannot be wrong of itself in man who is created after the image of God; it is rather a witness and basis of active love in the surroundings of an unholy world. The right to be angry is admitted and granted, but to be angry rightly however. Loveless anger is as incorrect as angerless love. Without ardent hatred towards what is wicked, there can be no lawful anger towards those who are wicked. It is difficult to separate the two; comp. Jude 23; Rev. ii. 6, 15; Rom. xii. 9; Ps. cxvii. 10; Amos v. 15. The Apostle here gives prominence to the pernicious element of that anger which becomes a lingering grudge, and to the danger of thus falling a prey to the devil; it corrupts man inwardly and makes him the slave of Satan; the "irreconcilable remains the unreconciled, incurring the wrath and judgment of God." See PALMER, Moral, p. 373.

* [ALFORD is scarcely justified in saying that "become" removes the precept too far from the present. ELLICOTT rightly takes the verb as implying evil elements among them, yet to be taken away; hence the appropriateness of ἔσθ. See Textual Note 9.—R.]

† [This particle introduces an example, having at the same time an argumentative force; not—because, as HODGE renders it here also.—R.]

3. Property and Theft stand in the closest relation. The latter attaches not only to the lack of the former, but rather to its acquisition, preservation and expenditure. A Christian should have more than he requires for himself; there should be a surplus for others, even though he be a day-laborer. The opposite of thievishness is Industry, which leads to opulence; with this many continued and varied exercises of Christian virtue stand connected, and Benevolence, personal, private benevolence, both secret and open; this is required, not the public, municipal charity. The emphasis rests on personal benevolence, which succors and devotes itself to need, not on police alms. Honesty should proceed toward benevolence, and what hampers and weakens the latter, has the blot of dishonesty upon it. Avarice, dissipation, vanity, laziness, negligence, debauchery and idleness are theft. See BRAUNE, Die heilig. 10 Gebote, pp. 178-189; PALMER, Moral, p. 375.

[The scope of the negative precept ("steal no longer") may be inferred from the positive statement which follows: It forbids idleness in general ("labor") and laziness ("working"), implying also that those who are neither idle nor lazy may yet "steal," because their work is neither "with the hands" nor for "that which is good" (speculation, sinecures, sharp business habits, etc.). Further all labor, however assiduous, proper and honest, which does not aim at a surplus to give away is not distinctively Christian. Though no one has a right to demand from capital (i. e., the accumulated surplus of labor), yet here is the responsibility of the Christian capitalist. On the other hand, the positive principle of honesty here set forth bids us labor, that we may have a capital for benevolence; so that begging, combining to extort, or even legislating in favor of idleness, is not in accordance with the Apostle's view. Paul by his example (Acts xviii. 3; xx. 34; 2 Thess. iii. 8), as well as by the strongest precepts (Acts xx. 35; 2 Thess. iii. 10) exalts the dignity of manual labor. To despise labor is a mark of barbarism, involving as a result either the indigence of savage freedom or the injustice of not less savage slavery. Unless the curse pronounced (Gen. iii. 19) upon the man be accepted and transformed by such acceptance into a blessing, it becomes a worse misfortune. As a working man then Paul appears equally removed from the capitalist hoarding only for self and from those champions of labor who talk too much to work and who ask the same wages for the ignorant and lazy as belongs of right to skill and industry. Appealing to his hands hardened by toil, he says: "So laboring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, It is more blessed to give than to receive."—R.]

4. The entire scope of speech is here in question: The essential characteristic of Christian speech, well pleasing to God, is "good for the edifying of the need," a furthering in accordance with the necessity of the case. This applies to the preacher and pastor, to the social circle, the popular orator, be he democratic or conservative, and to the statesman as well. To have regard to place, time and auditors, and to regulate both matter and manner accordingly: this is the conscientious scrupulousness of the Christian! The minister should spare all pious phraseology which is not to edification, and not be content with showing and proving his Confession of Faith, without any regard to the necessities of the occasion. Magna vis est in colloquiis piis (BENGL). Much therefore depends on the fitting word; comp. BRAUNE, Die heil. Gebote, p. 205 ff.

5. General remarks: a. Sin is universal; it attaches not to the heathen only, but to the natural, unregenerate man as a ruling power; nor is it to be found especially in one class, race or period. —b. Sin as a whole is referred to: sin of thought, word and deed; here too the coarser or finer form, the secret or open manner makes no difference.—The Apostle so sketches the substance of sin, that at first glance we are shocked, and can imagine, it exists only in numerous circles, strata and periods, in the heathen or the remarkably degraded; but if we look more closely, we find it everywhere and in all ages, often indeed under the gloss of culture and elegant manners. The appearance of sin is in the extremities, but its seat is in the very noblest organs, from which it extends through the whole body of our race, without He helps who is the Head of His Church.

6. The motives presented are: God's mercy in Christ over us, the precious gift of the Holy Ghost in us, the thought of the day of decision before us. God's own aim is what is morally good; to injure this is to injure Him, to obstruct, disturb and destroy His working for us and in us. God's unchangeableness is not the impossibility of being affected; that would be imperfection, indolence (Jas. v. 16-18). Our new birth may, like the life of one born, be again taken away, the sealing of the Holy Ghost be again taken from us. He who does not look at the goal not yet attained and still held up, does not preserve what he has received in his spirit from the Spirit of God. We can lose the grace of God, can again fall into condemnation without recovery, much as it is denied.* Heb. vi. 4-6.

* [In the original Dr. Braune adds: "by the Methodists and Baptists," an oversight which is singular enough; it may be accounted for by remembering that these two denominations are almost the only ones which operate among German Protestants as missionaries. The representative of the State Church (Dr. Braune is General Superintendent) naturally classes them together. On the question whether the possibility of falling from grace is here taught, see Ezrg. Notes. The passage in Hebrews teaches either: no fall is possible, or: the first fall is fatal, an alternative not usually accepted by the advocates of such a possibility.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Comp. Doctr. Notes.—On vers. 22-28 (the Epistle for the 19th Sunday after Trinity) see the preceding section.—Virtue helps to cast off vice, and the casting off of vice introduces virtue, both thus acting reciprocally.—Two classes of men sin against the Apostle's precept respecting sinless anger: those who rage and those who can never be angry. Sinful anger is a raging storm which lays waste a planting of God's; righteous anger is a priest, who slays the sacrifice of righteousness and casts all care and anxiety from herself upon the Lord with a Hosanna. As in the Psalm (iv. 6) so here the allusion is to night, to intercourse with one's self, to quiescence about and in us; the day of anger should be the day of reconciliation; in prayer before God let all animosity be still; let not radiant love of God set for us, with the sun in the heaven. With anger we give a lodgement to the murderer of souls, the devil; who does not slay anger, him anger slays. Hot temples are the easiest bridges for the devil into our hearts.—As room can be given to the devil, so is there also a withdrawal of the Holy Ghost.—For the commonest virtues we need what is highest of all: the kindness of God in Christ; without this there is a relapse into the heathen vices.

STARKE:—Truth is a lovely virtue, a glorious ornament, and sparkles brighter than the most beautiful diamond. If you have the truth, speak the truth from your heart, and walk in the truth, then are you certainly a beloved child of God.—Anger must not be taken to bed and allowed to go to sleep with us, lest it become hatred. Where anger takes the upper hand, Christ goes down with His gracious light.—The slanderer and blasphemer has the devil on his tongue, and whoever purposely listens to the slander gets him in his ears, and whoever takes delight in it, has him in his heart.—There is no dignity, no office, in which peculations are not practised by many. It is only a pity that they are so bedecked and behung with the fine show and appearance and well-adorned cloak of right. Not only are the rich bound to have compassion on the needy, but those who maintain themselves by labor, should share with those who cannot work.—See how out of the glow of sin one spark after another rises up, each greater than the last, until a great fire is made out of it.

The enigmatical, mysterious, unfathomable, people, who never let their hearts be seen, do not bear this Divine stamp; it is as if they did not wish their evil tricks to be betrayed.—The Christian should never lay his head unreconciled to rest, and he has no rest, if he has injured any one, or knows himself to be at enmity with any one. Gentle rest belongs only to a heart free from passion. Examine thyself, whether any one sighs over thee. The Pythagoreans, if they had fallen out with each other in words, gave each other the hand before sundown, kissed each other, and were reconciled.—The aim of labor, of earning, should be the weal of others. The worth of labor is this, that it furnishes us the means of doing good and tasting the sweetness of doing good.

The perceptible alterations of life which must occur in the regenerate. 1. In general, in the prevailing mind, vers. 22-24. a) An entire laying off of the old evil mind, a cessation of the old lust. b) Putting on of an entirely new holy mind, of God's likeness, like God to think and will, and daily renewed zeal in reaching after the likeness of God. 2. Specially, vers. 25-28. Through the virtues which the renewed man exhibits: a) Purity, chastity. b) Truthfulness. c) Gentleness. d) Inoffensiveness. e) Honesty and Rectitude.

The great difference between Christian culture and that of the world. 1. In general. a) The world's culture leaves the old humanity untouched, unimproved, only whitewashes it. b) Christian culture ennobs man from the foundation up, by substituting the Divine mind for selfishness.

2. Specially. a. Culture hinders only the great outbreaks of vice, Christianity makes the heart pure. b. Culture teaches to shun great lies, Christianity makes inwardly true. c. Culture makes outwardly refined, Christianity gives true gentleness. d. Culture guards against coarse injustice, but Christianity makes truly honest, even where one is not remarked.—Real improvement must begin at the bottom of the heart.—Would not the world fare better, if all became real Christians?—Christians are new men.—The speech of a Christian should always have a moral purpose. Paul describes Christian eloquence both as to its matter: it speaks what is serviceable for improvement, awakens good impulses, leaves a sting behind it in the hearts of others; and as to its manner, which is to be kind, so that love is thereby expressed and made perceptible. The Christian is no babbler, does not allow himself to become a mountebank or court-fool!—The Holy Ghost can be grieved: 1. In Himself, one frustrates His work partly in his own heart, and partly in others, which especially happens through evil speeches. 2. In others, when one grieves the pious Christians, who are full of this Spirit. Consider, whom you should respect in such persons, the Holy Ghost dwelling in them!—The Christian should not be bitter, without on this account becoming sweet. Wrath is the full outbreak of hate against others. Clamor is a token of a hasty, vehement, uncontrolled, rough spirit.

PASSAVANT:—All—liars, because all, sinners, for in every sin is falsehood, a denial of the truth, a deception upon and against ourselves and before God.—Better die than lie! says an old Church Father.—In the case of the unconverted every sin is a wrong against the holy law; in the case of the converted it is at the same time a wrong against the Holy Ghost.

GERLACH:—The Holy Ghost is estranged by empty, vain babbling, but grieved by foul talk.

STIER:—To drive out every sin dwelling in the old man, the practice of the opposite virtue must be employed.—Either we slay again, or it slays us. If a man goes to bed with poison, it creeps through all his members during sleep. Anger is a murderer. Who would sleep with a murderer? To be angry is human, but to cherish it long is devilish (HEINRICH MUELLER).

[EDDIE:—Ver. 26. Anger is not wholly for-bidden; it is an instinctive principle—a species of thorny hedge encircling our birthright. But in the indulgence of it, men are very apt to sin.—“When the curfew bell rings, let us then also quench all sparks of anger and heat of passion” (THOS. FULLER).—Ver. 27. Give the devil “place” but in a point, and he may speedily cover the whole platform of the soul.—Ver. 29. Words so spoken may fall like winged seeds upon a neglected soil. Comp. Prov. xxv. 11.—Ver. 30. All this perverse insubordination is in utter antagonism to the essence and operations of Him who is the Spirit of truth, and inspires the love of it; who assumed, as a fitting symbol, the form of a dove, and creates meekness and forbearance; and who, as the Spirit of holiness, leads to the appreciation of all that is just in action, noble in sentiment, and healthful and edifying in speech.—It may be said to a prodigal son—grieve not your father lest he cast you off; or grieve not your mother lest you break her heart. Which of the twain is the stronger appeal?—Ver. 31. “Anger sets the house on fire, and all the spirits are busy upon trouble, and intend propulsion, defence, displeasure or revenge; it is a short madness, and an eternal enemy to discourse, and sober counsels, and fair conversation; it is a fever in the heart, and a calenture in the head, and a fire in the face, and a sword in the hand, and a fury all over; and therefore can never suffer a man to be in a disposition to pray” (JEREMY TAYLOR).—Ver. 32. In the exercise of Christian forgiveness his authority was their rule, and his example their model. They were to obey and also to imitate, nay, their obedience consisted in imitation.—R.]

[Ver. 25. The ground of Christian truthfulness and its negative and positive sides.—Vers. 26, 27. Anger. 1) may be right; 2) is far more likely to be wrong; 3) certainly is, if it lasts long; 4) becomes worse yet by giving entrance to the devil.—Ver. 28. Obedience here would stop many a business, and deplete the ranks of many a profession, by increasing the number of honest laborers; but how much it would do for the weal of mankind!—Legislative charity is not Christian charity, nor the payment of taxes for the support of the poor, an essentially Christian virtue.—Ver. 29. The Apostle implies here: 1. That corrupt things rise very naturally to the lips, but should never be spoken; 2. That useful things are rarer.—Much speaking is likely to be evil-speaking.—Profitable conversation: 1. How rare; 2. Little sought for; 3. Selfishness the cause.—This verse would shut many a mouth in prayer-meeting, often enough in the pulpit too.—Would that it did, for is it not by unedifying words as well as evil ones, that the Spirit is grieved?—Ver. 31. “Evil speaking,” i. e., slander, is “blasphemy” in Greek; it stands last in this catalogue. It always breaks the sixth and ninth commands, usually the seventh, and is an offence against the third also.—Ver. 32. Kindness is well, compassion is better, but forgiveness is like God in Christ.—Who forgave us? God in Christ; how did He forgive us? in Christ; whom did He forgive? us in Christ.—R.]

c. Three points of view for the new walk.

(CHAP. V. 1-14.)

1) Look above thyself to follow God!

(CHAP. V. 1, 2.)

1 Be ye [Become] therefore followers [or imitators] of God, as dear [beloved] 2 children; And walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us [also loved you],¹ and hath given himself [gave himself up] for us² an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour [savour of sweet smell].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 2.—[The better attested reading is ἡμᾶς (N³ A. B., cursives, versions and fathers). The Rec. has ὑμᾶς (N³ D. E. F. K. L., most cursives and versions); so Lachmann, Ellicott. See next note.—R.]

² Ver. 2.—[B., with some minor authorities, reads ὑμῶν instead of ἡμῶν, which is well supported. The connection with the last clause complicates the critical question however. Tischendorf, Alford and others accept: ὑμᾶς—ὑμῶν; Lachmann, Ellicott and most (Rec.): ἡμᾶς—ἡμῶν. If a uniformity in the person of the pronoun is indispensable, then the latter is preferable, but Braune, with Meyer and others, still more correctly accepts the variation (“loved you and gave himself for us”), which is lectio difficilior, accounts best for the various readings, and in detail is better supported by diplomatic authority.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1, 2 a. The exhortation. Become therefore, γίνεσθε οὖν.—This connects with what precedes (iv. 34): γίνεσθε δέ, marking an inference, and at the same time an advance and a distinction, so that it is—οὖν (iv. 25; ii. 11;

iii. 3), and like διὰ τοῦτο (i. 15), τοῦτου χάριν (iii. 1, 14), indicating a new section, as it does in iv. 1, 17; v. 15. Hence these verses are not to be joined to chap. iv. (SCHENKEL [HODGE]* and others).—Followers [or imitators] of God, μιμηταὶ τοῦ θεοῦ.—Like 1 Cor. iv. 16; xi. 1; 1 Thess. i. 6; ii. 14; Heb. vi. 12; 1 Pet. iii. 13. An injunction on the part of the Apostle to the churches, believers, to imitate what is good; we always find γίνεσθαι, never εἶναι, in this connection; thus the becoming so is marked. LUTHER, [E. V.], (be), Vulgate (estote) render incorrectly. In what sense this enormous requirement is intended is clearly indicated by the context: condonando et amando; nam sequitur amati (BENIGEL). [Hence the word “imitators,” though a literal rendering, suggests too much, and “followers” is sufficiently correct.—R.]

As beloved children [ὡς τέκνα ἀγαπητά].—“As,” “as,” denotes the reality, τέκνα ἀγαπητά, “beloved children,” the relation in which they are the objects of the love of God* and through Christ His children. THEODORET: νῦν θεσίας ἡξιώθητε, πατέρα τὸν θεὸν νομιάζετε, ζηλώσατε τοιγαροῦν τὴν συγγένειαν. Comp. 1 John iv. 12; iv. 7-11; Matth. v. 48; Luke vi. 36. Liberorum est, patrem moribus referre (GROTIVS).

Ver. 2. And walk in love.—Καί, “and,” is epexegetical, in order to define the point of the imitation: περιπατεῖτε ἐν ἀγάπῃ, “walk in love,” “even as God forgave you” (iv. 32). Ἐν ἀγάπῃ is God’s characteristic (i. 4, 5), our aim (iii. 17-19); the former makes the latter possible. On περιπατεῖν, see ii. 2.

Ver. 2 b. Closer designation. As Christ also loved you [καθὼς καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς ἡγάπησεν ὑμᾶς]. See Textual Notes—“In Christ” (iv. 32) is now explained. “As Christ also” binds the Christian walk to Christ and His work. Christ has loved you, in that He became man and dwelt among men, served them, being mighty in word and deed. [While “the Apostle makes no distinction between our being the objects of God’s love, and our being the objects of the love of Christ” (HODGE), it is quite as true that καί, also, marks an advance “from the love of the Father who gave His Son, to that of the Son, the Personal manifestation of that love in our humanity” (ALFORD). The force of the aorists should be preserved.—R.] The ὑμᾶς marks the exhortation more strongly than if the reading were ἡμᾶς, permitting the general predicate (ἡγάπησεν) to become prominent in its independent validity, over against what follows:

And gave himself up for us.—Καὶ παρέδωκεν ἑαυτόν, over against ἔδωκεν (John iii. 16) denotes two things: the voluntary giving and the giving Himself up to suffering, that is, to suffering in the general sense, including the special form, death: so has He loved. To this ὕπερ ἡμῶν, “for us,” also points. [The phrase in itself may or may not imply substitution; ELLICOTT and most think the context points indisputably in this case to the sense: in our stead.—Comp. Romans (v. 6), p. 164; also Galatians (ii. 20, and Doctr. Notes on iii. 6-14).—R.] The figure is taken from a conflict, in which, against the enemies thronging over a fallen one, a hero, full of noble courage and of love, protectingly contends; similar to this is the use of περὶ, which gives prominence to the being encircled by foes. This reference is found also in the closest definition which follows.

An offering and a sacrifice, προσφορὰ καὶ θυσίαν—According to ΚΛΕΙΟΤΗ (Liturg.

Abhandlungen, IV. p. 27 ff.) קֶרֶן (corban) is the common name for all sacrifices and offerings, bloody and unbloody, while מִנְחָה (mincha) is principally used of the unbloody (προσφορά), זֶבַח (zebach) for the bloody offerings (θυσία). Comp. Heb. ix. 9; x. 5, 8, where both words occur, and x. 10, 14, 18 with x. 12, 26, where they are used promiscuously. Still even there τοῦ σώματος is added to προσφορά, so that in accordance with the context and usus loquendi this distinction is to be maintained, and in the given order also, because He gave Himself here as a προσφορά, and became in death a θυσία, the former being the soul of the θυσία ζῶσα (STIER).—[ALFORD, EADIE, ELLICOTT, all find in the former term a more general reference to the vicarious work of Christ, and in the latter a more special reference to His death. “The great prominent idea here is the one sacrifice, which the Son of God made of Himself in His Redeeming love, in our nature—bringing it, in Himself, near to God—offering Himself as our representative Head: whether in perfect righteousness of life, or in sacrifice, properly so called, at His death” (ALFORD).—R.] Accordingly it is not necessary to supply εἰς θάνατον in thought (HARLESS [HODGE], SCHENKEL and others); the context includes more.

To God for a savour of sweet smell [τῷ θεῷ εἰς ὁσμὴν εὐωδίας].—This is—רִיחַ נְחוּם יְיָ (Exod. xxix. 18, LXX.: τῷ κυρίῳ εἰς ὁσμὴν εὐωδίας; comp. Lev. i. 9; iii. 16), where κυρίῳ in correspondence with the original text is placed last. Hence “to God,” which is inserted for the sake of clearness, is not to be joined to the verb (MEYER). The two substantives (both derived from δύω, δύω denoting the smell in so far as it is inhaled, and εὐωδία its quality, WISER, p. 562, or its effect, pleasure) give prominence to the fact that God the Father is well-pleased in the self-sacrificing love of the Crucified One, in order to strengthen, through the reference to this, the exhortation, that we too can become well-pleasing to the Father only in self-devoting love. Phil. iv. 18; Rom. xii. 1, 2; 2 Cor. ii. 15.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The principle and impulse of the Christian walk is love—love as it actually exists in God, who is Love in His character (1 John iv. 8), and as it has been felt and enjoyed by us who are beloved (ἀγαπητοί), so that we can give more and more what we have received and ever receive again. Now in Christ this love has become our portion, hence it is forgiving, reconciling, peace-

* [The point suggested by the adjective is obscured in the E. V.: “dear;” “as children beloved,” they should imitate God in love, see ver. 2.—R.]

making; to show this in their walk is here required of Christians.

2. God is the original, Christ the express image of the Father, and the ensample of His people, the Christian the likeness and copy. As the imitation of God cannot be absolute, but is to be limited to loving, to forgiving love, so the imitation of Christ cannot be directed toward expiatory sufferings, but only to self-sacrificing love for our fellows, well-pleasing to God.

3. As we are able to walk in love only as beloved of God and as vouchsafed sonship with Him, so we can only, when reconciled to God through Christ, follow Him in filial and hence in fraternal devotion; in His grace we first can walk as well-pleasing to Him. The error of the Socinians and the Rationalists who see in Christ and His self-sacrifice a mere example and nothing more, is great and pernicious. See Exeg. and Doctr. Notes on ii. 16. As the Bible highly estimates the vicarious sufferings of Christ, which are taught, not in the ἐπὶ ἡμῶν, but in the *θεοῦ and the whole Scripture (Matth. xx. 28; 1 Tim. ii. 6), so it occurs in the entire life of human society: the child lives by the mother's sacrifice, and he for whom no one suffers is miserable. So we too should live for others and suffer in their stead; though we cannot make atonement, we can still live and love self-sacrificingly in the strength imparted to us.

* [EADIE remarks: "To warrant the application of the term 'sacrifice' to the death of Christ, it must have been something more than the natural, fitting, and graceful conclusion of a self-denied life—it must have been a violent and vicarious disease and a voluntary presentation." See his full doctrinal note in loco. At the same time ALFORD is perhaps justified in terming the question, as usually discussed, an "irrelevant one here." "It is not the death of Christ which is treated of, but the whole process of His redeeming love. His death lies in the background as one, and the chief, of the acknowledged facts of that process: but it does not give the character to what is predicated of Him." This exegetical view does not however favor any theory of the death of Christ which denies its vicarious, propitiatory character as an atoning sacrifice.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Comp. the foregoing Doctr. Notes and Hom. Notes at the close of v. 6-14.

STARKE:—Wilt thou become like God hereafter, and see Him as He is, then must thou in this life be holy, even as He is holy.—No one can rightly boast himself of sonship with God, who does not imitate Him.—Christ's example is the proper mirror in which to see the true and natural form of love.

RIEGER:—The moral instruction of the Apostles is everywhere deduced from the marrow of the gospel, nor can it be put in practice by any one who does not stand in this gospel of peace. It is the character of love, to imitate as it may the Beloved.

HEUBNER:—This is a powerful precept: who can satisfy its demands? We cannot become like Him, but we can strive to follow Him in holiness and love. Imitating Christ and God is the same thing.—Christ is and remains the original, but we should be copies, the more faithful, the better.

STIER:—The Father gives His children but one command: Love!

GERLACH:—The thank-offering Christ brought for us, that we too might now offer ourselves to God; the sin-offering, that we need not suffer the same punishment.

2) Look into thyself and think of purity.

3 But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once [even] 4 named among you, as becometh saints; Neither¹ filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor 5 [or] jesting, [things] which² are not convenient; but rather giving of thanks. For this ye know [of this ye are sure,³ knowing] that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who⁴ is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of [omit of] God.⁵

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 4.—[The best established reading as respects the particles is (Rec.): καὶ—καὶ—ἡ (so \aleph^2 B. D.³ K. L., most cursives and versions). \aleph^1 has ἡ instead of the second καὶ, while ἡ is found three times in A. D.¹ F., fathers (Lachmann, Meyer, Braune), and in others καὶ throughout.—R.]

² Ver. 4.—[\aleph A. B., 3 cursives have: ἀὐτὸ καὶ ἀνέκων (accepted by Lachmann, Alford, and others) instead of τὰ οὐκ ἀνήκοντα (Rec., D. F. K. L., Meyer, Ellicott, Braune and most). The latter is well supported and lectio difficilior, but neither external nor internal grounds are altogether decisive.—R.]

⁵ Ver. 5.— \aleph B. and most: Χριστοῦ καὶ Θεοῦ. We find also Θεοῦ καὶ Χριστοῦ, Χριστοῦ Θεοῦ, and simply Χριστοῦ. The first is not only better supported, but lectio difficilior. [The second of should be omitted to indicate the close connection implied in the omission of the article before Θεοῦ.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The exhortation; vers. 3, 4.

Ver. 3. But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness [πορνεία δὲ καὶ πᾶσα ἀκαθαρσία ἢ πλεονεξία].—"But," δέ, indicates the transition to another part of the exhortation (MEYER). Πορνεία cannot here, where Christians are addressed, be taken in the heathen sense; the Scriptural meaning (in both Old and New Testament) is the prominent one. Hence it refers not to the coarsest exhibition, but to what is within, to the heart. It comes first as something general and comprehensive; applying to act, word, disposition, as indeed the context combines temper and walk in one, to men among themselves and in relation to God. "And all uncleanness" gives prominence to one particular side of this, pointing to every form and mode of the same. "Or covetousness" marks the other side, which is to be clearly distinguished, hence the disjunctive ἢ, "or," which indicates that πᾶσα, "all," belongs here also. The former refers to impure, unchaste, ungodly, dalliance and contact, solitary uncleanness; the latter to greedy lusting, from a distance and ungratified. This accords with iv. 19, where both substantives are found.

Let it not be even named among you, μηδὲ ὀνομαζέσθω ἐν ὑμῖν.—Comp. ver. 12; Ps. xvi. 4. Such a thing should not even be taken up in speech, much less be done. Ἐν ὑμῖν—ἐν μέσῳ ὑμῶν. The prohibition is of course to be limited: sine necessitate (BENGEL). It is incorrect to explain: Such a thing should not be told of them, as 1 Cor. v. 1 (GROTIUS, BENGEL).

As becometh saints.—Καθώς, as in ver. 2; with τρέπει ἀγίοις, we should compare ἀξίως (iv. 17) and δοξίως (iv. 24), with which the introduction of such things into the speech is irreconcilable. ["Were the Apostle to say, Let despondency be banished, he might add, as becometh believers, or, Let enmity be suppressed, he might subjoin, as becometh the brethren; but he pointedly says in this place, "as becometh saints" (EADIE).—R.]

Ver. 4. Neither filthiness, αἰσχροτόης.—This evidently includes more than αἰσχρολογία (Col. iii. 8). Although the antithesis (εὐχαριστία) points to shameful words (LUTHER), neither the context, which places αἰσχροτόης beside μωρολογία nor the word itself require an exclusive reference to speech. Still less is it to be limited to lewd talk. BENGEL refers it also to gestus, etc.

Nor foolish talking, καὶ μωρολογία.—[Textual Note 1. Should ἢ be accepted here, we should substitute or for nor, as is done in the case of the next substantive.—R.] According to the New Testament conception of μωρός, "fool" (Matt. v. 22; Ps. xiv. 1; liii. 2), this means godless discourse; it is not merely stultiloquium, insipid talk, silly babbling (CALVIN, [HODGE] MEYER, SCHENKEL). LUTHER hits the meaning with: Narrentheidinge, buffoonery, which denotes what is high-flown, pompous, in loose discourse. See JÜTTING: Bibl. Wörterbuch, p. 189. [TRENCH, Syn. § xxxiv.: "The talk of fools, which is folly and sin together."—R.]

Or jesting, ἢ εὐτραπेलία (from εὐ and τρέπω) means strictly urbanitas, a habit of cultivated people, not without adroitness and not without frivolity. LUTHER: jest. BENGEL aptly says: subtilior ingenio nititur; this refers to the form, the previous term to the purport. The Vulgate is incorrect: scurrilus. [Comp. TRENCH, § xxxiv. on this word. He refers to "the profligate old man" of the Miles gloriosus (PLAUTUS), who is exactly the εὐτράπελος, and remarkably enough an Ephesian, boasting as though such wit were an Ephesian birthright. See also BARROW's famous sermon on wit from this text (Vol. 1, Serm. xiv.), an extract from which is given by EADIE in loco.—R.]

Things which are not convenient, τὰ οὐκ ἀνήκοντα.—This gives prominence to the wider range, beyond the lewdness and the coarser forms. In spite of μὴ καθήκοντα (Rom. i. 28) we found οὐκ here, because the negation has coalesced with the word in one conception. See WINER, p. 452. As a predicate we must borrow an absint (BENGEL) from μηδὲ ὀνομαζέσθω. [This phrase is not to be limited to the last of the three substantives, but is "in apposition to the last two words, to both of which εὐχαριστία, as denoting oral expression yet implying inward feeling, forms a clear contrast."—R.]

But rather giving of thanks, μᾶλλον δὲ εὐχαριστία—ἀνήκει, as BENGEL aptly supplies out of the preceding context, remarking: lingue abusus opponitur sanctus et tamen letus usus, vers. 18, 19. *Non conveniunt abusus et usus εὐτραπυλῖα et εὐχαριστία, concinna paronomasia; illa turbat animam (et quidem subtilis aliquando focus et lepus tenerum gratiæ sensum ledit) hæc exhilarat. As "beloved children" they have ever again to thank God. The reference is not to grace of discourse (JEROME, CALVIN, and others, STIER includes this with the other), nor to pudicitia (HEINSIUS).

Ver. 5. Special motive. For this ye are sure, knowing [τοῦτο γὰρ ἵστε γινώσκοντες].—"For" adds a ground, in order to strengthen the exhortation as a consequence therefrom. Accordingly ἔστε [ἵστε] γινώσκοντες is to be taken as an indicative [MEYER, EADIE, ALFORD and others], not as imperative (Vulgate, LUTHER, BENGEL and others). The participle indicates the mode of knowing as of their own perception (MEYER), insight. Τοῦτο, "this," placed in advance, points to what is stated afterwards,

*[MEYER and ELLICOTT supply γινέσθω ἐν ὑμῖν; EADIE suggests that ὀνομαζέσθω still guides the construction: "Rather let thanksgiving be named—let there be vocal expression to your grateful emotions." STIER and ALFORD follow BENGEL.—"There is a play perhaps on the similar sound of εὐτραπυλῖα and εὐχαριστία, which may account for the latter not finding so complete a justification in the sense as we might expect: the connection being apparently, 'your true cheerfulness and play of fancy will be found, not in buffoonery, but in the joy of a heart overflowing with a sense of God's mercies.'—ALFORD.—R.]

the import of which cannot be unknown to Christians. WINER (p. 333) is therefore incorrect: What is said in vers. 3, 4, ye know, since ye perceive, that, etc. [This reference of τοῦτο to what follows is doubtful to say the least. It seems quite correct to refer it, as the object of ἴστε, to what precedes, γινώσκοντες being joined with οὐ. Braune takes no notice of the correct reading, an inadvertence which probably modifies his opinion of the construction. The combination of finite verb and participle is not to be explained as Hebraistic, since the verbs are different.—R.]

That no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man.—The concrete terms (πόρνος, ἀκάθαρτος, πλεονέκτης), here occurring instead of the abstract ones mentioned in ver. 3, must be taken in the same sense. [The literal sense is: "that every fornicator or (ἡ) individualizes here) unclean man, or covetous man, who is an idolater, hath not inheritance." The negation is transferred to the subject according to English usage.—R.]

Who is an idolater, ὅς ἐστιν εἰδωλόατρος.—This relative clause not only characterizes, but also gives a reason for the fact to be stated. On this account and because "who" is limited to the last term altogether without warrant, the clause is to be applied to "every whoremonger, unclean person, covetous man." It is not the covetous man alone who is an idolater, having this world's goods as his god (Matt. vi. 24; 1 Tim. vi. 10); Paul holds "belly" and "glory" also as "god" for the enemies of the cross (Phil. iii. 19). The proof lacks aptness, if that be not attributed to the first two, which is predicated of the third, who is not an idolater more especially than the former. The clause is incorrectly referred to the "covetous man" alone (MEYER, SCHENKEL, BLEEK); Col. iii. 5 does not prove this, still less can it be said that Paul's self-denial, which unselfishly offered up all, led him to affirm this of covetousness alone, since he was just as free from lust and uncleanness. [In this wide reference of the relative clause Braune is sustained by HARLESS, STIER and others, but the more limited view is that of EADIE, HODGE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT and most. It is more natural and obvious, since all that can be urged in favor of the other view but proves that the reference may be thus wide, not that it is. And covetousness is more specially idolatry, the other sins are but more subtle forms of this. If ὁ be accepted as the correct reading, then the reference is necessarily confined to the last word. See ALFORD in loco.—R.]

Hath any inheritance, οὐκ ἔχει κληρονομίαν.—See i. 11. It is not=ὀν κληρονομῆσαν, "shall not inherit" (Gal. v. 21; 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10), nor κληρονομῆσαι οὐ δύνανται (1 Cor. xv. 50). It is the fact respecting the status; permanent, prevalent sin excludes from the kingdom of God, effects the repelling of the arrhabo, the Holy Ghost (i. 13, 14); "hath an inheritance" is not=inherits the kingdom, since the former marks the heirship, the latter the entrance of the heir. To accept a certain future relation viewed as present, will not suffice (BENGEL). [See WINER, p. 249. "Has no inheritance," can have none, this being a law of

God's moral government of the world (EADIE, ELLICOTT), an eternal verity of that kingdom (ALFORD).—R.]

In the kingdom of Christ and God, ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ Χριστοῦ καὶ Θεοῦ.—Βασιλεία means the kingdom, where God in Christ is the Ruler, and His people belong to Him, and hence to be distinguished from ἐκκλησία, to which the fornicator and such characters belong, without having part in the former. (See Doctr. Note 5.) BENGEL is excellent: articulus simplex, summam unitatem indicans. The expression here depends on the fact that Christ's and God's kingdom is one (ver. 12), that Christ's kingdom is also God's kingdom; though this first appears at the end in glory (Rev. ix. 15), the development advancing through the Church. Accordingly it is incorrect to explain it as meaning the kingdom of Christ, who is also God (HARLESS) [HODGE and many others] though Christ is termed God (Rom. ix. 5), or can be thus termed [against MEYER].

[ALFORD: "No distinction is to be made, Χριστοῦ καὶ Θεοῦ being in the closest union. Nor is any specification needed that the kingdom of Christ is also the kingdom of God, as would be made with the second article. This follows as a matter of course: and thus the words bear no legitimate rendering, except on the substratum of our Lord's Divinity. But on the other hand we cannot safely say here that the same Person is intended by Χριστοῦ καὶ Θεοῦ, merely on account of the omission of the article. For 1) any introduction of such a predication regarding Christ would here be manifestly out of place, not belonging to the context: 2) θεός is so frequently and unaccountably anathorous, that it is not safe to ground any such inference from its use here." So EADIE, ELLICOTT and many others. The inferential proof of the Divinity of Christ thus afforded is well-nigh as strong as, certainly more defensible than, that resulting from the other view.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The life of the Christian, like Christian ethics, must pursue sin in its coarsest forms and manifestations even into its most secret, refined propensities; it depends upon the substance; this is to be rejected in every form. Christian culture has a sharp eye and delicate perception for evil under its elegant appearance, and a powerful will and apt word for the refusal and overcoming of the same: it can have no pleasure in elegant forms under which wickedness conceals itself.

2. What was of validity in the morals of the Persians (HERODOTUS I., 138): ἅσα δὲ σφί ποιεῖν οὐκ ἔξεστι πάντα οὐδὲ λέγειν ἔξεστι, every Christian must accept as valid to this extent, that he says: What is more becoming to do or say, that thou shouldst not even think. A word often includes more evil in itself than an act, and a thought than a word; even if the evil thought be less mischievous than the act, because it is only a thought not an act. The sinful act of the non-Christian is at all events as a rule less wicked than the Christian sinful word or temper; as the same is true of a neglected Christian child, over against one carefully trained, or of the same man, as different now and formerly, or on festival or fast day with its elevation and in the press of labor and the throng of the world.

3. The Christian's position is dignity, which preserves the worthiness of the person in a pure life no less than in pure doctrine with tender conscientiousness.

4. Every sin stands connected with idolatry: it remains the same, whether thou makest a god of the goods of this world in covetousness, or of the lust of this world in pursuit of pleasure, or of thine own Ego in pride. Paul terms covetousness not the (γ) but a root ($\rho\iota\zeta\alpha$) of all evil (1 Tim. iv. 10). The same is true of the lust of the flesh and the pride of life (1 John ii. 16).

[HONOR is however perfectly correct in saying: "The analogy between this supreme love of riches, this service of mammon and idolatry, is more obvious and more distinctly recognized in Scripture than between idolatry and any other of the sins mentioned. It is well that this should be understood, that men should know that the most common of all sins is the most heinous in the sight of God; for idolatry, which consists in putting the creature in the place of God, is everywhere in His word denounced as the greatest of all sins in His sight. The fact that it is compatible with outward decorum, and with the respect of men, does not alter its nature. It is the permanent and controlling principle of an irreligious heart and life, turning the soul away from God. There is no cure for this destructive love of money, but using it for other than selfish purposes. Riches, therefore, must ruin their possessor, unless he employs them for the good of others and for the glory of God."—R.]

5. The kingdom of Christ and of God is not precisely the church. The former marks the authority, the latter the people; that refers to the power, which orders, manages, governs, this to the grace which chooses, attracts, trains, guides and endows; the former has to do with powers, which are applied and with laws which are established and administered. Both however have one end: God's glory and the creature's salvation. The kingdom of God and Christ is wider and narrower than the church. It stretches itself over the time antecedent to the church, which should become the kingdom of God, and embraces all, who obey and permit themselves to be drawn by the will of the Ruler, God in Christ, so far as the same is known, in His laws given to His creatures in nature from the very creation, in their conscience and in the order about and above them. All moral natures of every kind, childlike, truth-seeking souls belonging thereto (Matt. viii. 12; Mark xii. 34; John xviii. 36, 37). To this belong all historical leadings of nations, all guidance to individuals, all the effects of power and wisdom, which prepare the way for the church. The kingdom is God's as well as Christ's (Matt. xiii. 41; John xviii. 36 f.). As before the church and for the church the kingdom is more extended. But at the same time it becomes less extended within the church. There it applies to those called as the people of God, to those who obey the call; those who resist, who are indifferent, who hold only externally to the church, even though they hold in high regard a moral life, as is done without the church as well, who undervalue or despise the faith of the Scriptures or the church, or rely on the latter and neglect the former,—all withdraw themselves from the "kingdom" within the church. The word is to be taken in this latter sense here (ver. 5). At the end of the world both come together: since that will be the fullness of time, when the Son of man shall appear in glory.

Comp. Doctr. Notes.

From the wanderings of the flesh in the insubordination of its appetites and of society in loose talk, we should take occasion, not to run away and forsake the world, but to guard ourselves and so to strive in ourselves, that God's pardoning love is not in vain, and sanctification is not disturbed. Neither happiness, nor pleasure, nor property is the aim and task of life, but the formation of the character, of that stamp with His image received in creation and renewed in redemption. To be covetous in what is noblest, to be impure in what is most exalted, to be disorderly in what is spiritual and heavenly is an abomination of abominations. Such a condition excludes from God and God's kingdom, in the Church, its service and government. Take heed to that, teacher and preacher. Be mindful of it always in prayer and public service.

STARKE:—In Christianity exact bounds are placed upon our words, far more so than is done by mere reason; Matt. xii. 36. Hear this, ye buffoons! ye cannot boast yourselves of Christianity.—You betray by this too well the bottom of your yet unsanctified hearts.—Could we find a register of those whom God as a just Judge will exclude from heaven, the first place as a rule would be given to those who break the Seventh Commandment.

RIGER:—The world often gives its uncleanness the name of love-affairs; but the word love in the Scriptures is far too good to be applied to any such things.

HEUBNER:—No man has such a horror of all sins of the flesh as the Christian; his destiny, his fellowship, his Exemplar, his future inheritance, all require him to be pure.—Paul describes the Christian's propriety in speech, distinguishing three kinds of obnoxious talk: 1. Such as offends and injures the sense of virtue, that is, impure, indecent, shameless talking; 2. Such as opposes the reason and offends the sense of truth, that is, foolish, silly, senseless, insipid talking; 3. Such as hinders religious earnestness, designed only to raise a laugh.—Every prevailing sin removes us from God. The covetous commit idolatry with their money, the lustful with their flesh. If then it be asked which is more compatible with religion, a disposition to lust or avarice, the latter seems less reconcilable. The covetous man imagines, because he perhaps restrains himself from many vices, that he is better, and covetousness as something relative is more difficult to recognize.—The kingdom of Christ is the medium and condition of the kingdom of God; through Christ the kingdom of God becomes predominant. The kingdom of Christ, in so far as it is an external institution, yields to the kingdom of God.

PASSAVANT:—The Greeks loved a fine joke, seasoned and adorned with wit and grace. But under the jest and its elegant dress, an impure and low sense was often concealed.—Look, wit is a dangerous gift, and to give it play brings discomfort and pain.

STIER:—The worst in front, the obscenities, double entendres; there are also obscenities of mammon, nastinesses arising from pride and worldliness, for which the Holy Ghost has the same aversion in His saints.

[EADIE:—Into Christ's kingdom the fornicator and sensualist cannot come; for, unsanctified and unprepared, they are not susceptible of its spiritual enjoyments, and are filled with antipathy to its un fleshly occupations; and specially into God's kingdom "the covetous man, who is an idolater," cannot come, for that God is not his God, and disowning the God of the kingdom, he is self-excluded. As his treasure is not there, so neither there could his heart find satisfaction and repose.—R.]

3) Look about thyself and be independent and benevolent!

(CHAP. V. 6-14.)

6 Let no man [no one] deceive you with vain [empty] words: for because of these 7 things cometh the wrath of God upon the children [sons] of disobedience. Be 8 not ye [Become not] therefore partakers' with them. For ye were sometime [once ye were] darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light; 9 (For the fruit of the Spirit [light]² is in all goodness and righteousness and 10, 11 truth;) Proving what is acceptable unto [well-pleasing to] the Lord. And have no fellowship³ with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather [even] re-12 prove them. For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret [For the things done in secret by them it is a shame even to speak 13 of].⁴ But all things that are [being] reproved are made manifest by the light: for whatsoever doth make manifest [everything which is made manifest]⁵ is light.
14 Wherefore he saith, Awake [or Up!]⁶ thou that [who] sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 7.—[Here as so frequently in compounds with συν in Paul's Epistles, συνμμετοχοι is better supported than the usual and more euphonic συμμετοχοι (Rec.). The former is found in Σ. A. B. 1 D. 1 F. G., accepted by Tischendorf, Alford, Elliott and many recent editors.—R.]

² Ver. 9.—[The reading of the Rec.: πνεύματος, is supported by D. 3 K. L., most cursives and some fathers, but is now generally rejected as a gloss from Gal. v. 22, φρόνως being sustained by Σ. A. B. 1 D. 1 F., good cursives, Syria and other versions, Latin fathers.—The parenthesis is to be retained, see Ereg. Notes.—R.]

⁶ Ver. 14.—The Rec. reads ἐγείρει (Lachmann), which has no uncial support. Ἐγείρε is accepted by nearly all recent editors and commentators, since it occurs in Σ. A. B. D. F. K. L., and other authorities.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 6. The transition. Let no one deceive you with empty words, μηδεὶς ὑμᾶς ἀπατάτω κενοῖς λόγοις.—The precept: "let no one deceive you," is entirely general, but limited by the context to social intercourse; there being nothing to indicate a further extension. Hence "no one" is to be applied to members of the Church and the non-Christians who are, or come, near them; "deceive" including unintentional as well as intentional leading astray. Accordingly the reference is not, as in Col. ii. 8, to philosophers and Jewish errorists (Grotius), nor merely to frivolous Christians (Olshausen), or to those heathen who had remained unbelieving (Mejer). The loquacious persons spoken of are false teachers with "empty words." This phrase means discourse wanting in truth, life and spirit; hoc genus est, species tres ver. 4. (Bengel). [Alford: "Empty—not containing the kernel of truth, of which words are but the shell—words with no underlying facts."—R.] Comp. 1 Cor. xv. 33. Bullinger: *Erant apud Ephesios homines corrupti, ut hodie apud nos plurimi sunt, qui hæc salutaria Dei præcepta cachinno excipientes obstrepunt: humanum esse, quod faciunt amatores, utile, quod feneratores, facit, quod jaculatores, et ideo Deum non usque adeo graviter animadvertere in istius modi lapsus. Stier is not altogether incorrect in finding an ironical opposition in: ἀπατῶν κενούς, exhorting thus: let them speak only in vain (1 Cor. xv. 14, 58).

* ["The Apostle generally condemns all apologists for vice, whoever they might be. They would of course be most commonly found among the heathen, and to them the passage most naturally points. The palliation or tacit toleration of

For because of these things, διὰ ταῦτα γάρ, introduces a reason; "because of these things" pointing beyond the genus ("empty word") to the species (ver. 4), just as in the parallel passage, Col. iii. 6 (δὲ αὐ). [The context is decisive against the reference either to the ἀπάτη of the "empty words," or to this and the sins mentioned in ver. 4. See ELLICOTT and ALFORD.—R.] Cometh, ἐρχεται, marks the fact as present, like "hath not" (ver. 5); it is neither—venire solet (ERASMUS), nor a general asseveration without any temporal qualification (HARLESS), nor does it point to the future (MEYER, SCHENKEL, BLEEK); the punishment has already begun. See Rom. i. 18.

The wrath of God, ἡ ὀργὴ τοῦ θεοῦ.—This also is not to be considered as quiescent until the final Judgment. It already comes both externally and internally as correction and punishment, upon the sons of disobedience, ἐπὶ τοὺς υἱοὺς τῆς ἀπειθείας (ii. 2).—This designates more strongly than ἀπειθεῖς those who still or again oppose God and His word within the Church. [The active and practical side of the ἀπειθῶν (John iii. 36) is here brought out. The word is a valuable middle term between unbelief and disobedience, implying their identity in a manner full of the highest instruction" (ALFORD).—R.]

Warning against association with wicked men; vers. 7-10.

Ver. 7. Become not therefore, μὴ οὖν γίνεσθε.—Οὖν, "therefore," marks the specializing of the warning and that it rests on "the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience" as its basis, while γίνεσθε, "become," indicates that this state of things is not yet present, and at the same time the danger of its entrance and its quiet, unnoticed and unregarded development.* Vulgate: Nolite effici! BENGE: Ne ira super vos veniat!

Partakers with them, συνμέτοχοι τῶν αὐτῶν, i. e. with the sons of disobedience. It is inappropriate to refer αὐτῶν to voices (SCHENKEL), and to understand συνμέτοχοι (iii. 6) of the portion of the wicked (KOPPE, STIER, who includes this also). The reference to the punishment is the foundation of the warning against compaunionship with them.

Ver. 8 presents a new reason, taken from their experience of grace, their grasp on the Lord and vice, especially sensuality, was one of the most fearful and repulsive features of heathenism; see specifically Tholuck, Influence of heathenism, Part iv. 2.—ELLICOTT. Comp. the citation from Whitby and Gauthy in EADIE. The "vain words" were publicly spoken then, now they come in more concealed form, but the same lies are uttered still on the same subject and with like result, immediate and ultimate.—R.]

* [The force of γίνεσθε is not to be explained away. ALFORD indeed strongly objects to it here as unnecessary and unequitable, but he seems to entertain a prejudice against it. A German from his familiarity with the distinction between Sein and Werden in his own language is usually delicate in his perception of the same distinction in other languages.—R.]

their task. For once ye were,* ἦτε γάρ ποτε!—That is, thanks to God, it is past! Hence ἦτε stands emphatically first; and LUTHER with his weiland [=to the antique "sometime" of the E. V.] aptly recalls a past condition, referring to a new life.—Darkness, σκότος, abstractum pro concreto, emphasi egregia (BENGE). [They were not only living or abiding in it, but themselves actual and veritable darkness (ELLICOTT).—R.]

But now are ye light in the Lord, νῦν δὲ φῶς ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ.—This, without ἔσται, is quite as emphatic and brief. "Light," as in 1 John i. 5; John viii. 12, is a comprehensive designation of the Divine life and character, both ethical and intellectual in its meaning, in contrast with darkness (iv. 18; Acts xxvi. 18; Col. i. 12, 13; 1 Pet. ii. 9). These nominatives emphasize the being full, permeated by, and are stronger than ἐν σκότει (Rom. ii. 19; 1 Thess. v. 4), ἐν φωτί. [Comp. USTERI, Lehrbegr. ii. 1, 3, p. 229, on the terms ὥς and σκότος.—HODGE weakens the sense into "enlightened," but "light" has here an active sense, which prepares the way for the subsequent exhortation, since they were not only to walk worthy of the light but be light to others (ver. 13).—R.] The added phrase, ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ, excludes the notion of having earned the present condition, marking the operation of the Lord, in order to excite thankfulness for constancy, fear of apostasy and backsliding, without the ability of helping one's self.

Walk as children of light, ὡς τέκνα φωτός περιπατεῖτε.—The status is marked by ὡς, "as." What ye are ("children of light"), be in deed and truth ("walk"). Energetically added, without any conjunction, as growing out of what precedes, as its result.

Ver. 9. For the fruit of the light, ὁ γὰρ καρπὸς τοῦ φωτός.—This is introduced as a ground (γάρ). The children of the light are referred to the fruit of the light, in order to excite them to a corresponding walk. This fruit consists in all goodness and righteousness and truth [ἐν πάσῃ, ἀγαθωσύνῃ καὶ δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ ἀληθείᾳ].—"Fruit" is in the singular, and yet three terms follow, as in Gal. v. 22: "the fruit of the Spirit" is followed by nine, in order to render prominent its unity in contrast with "the works of the flesh" (ver. 19 ff.) in their sundered character, their opposition to each other.

Goodness, ἀγαθωσύνῃ, the opposite of which is κακία, is distinguished from χρηστότης, which is mentioned in connection with it (Gal. v. 22), in this, that it refers to the depth of the disposition, χρηστότης more to the character of its manifestation; both denoting goodness however. Here are designated the character and conduct as regards possessions of every kind,

* [This order seems to bring out the emphasis best. Comp. HARLESS and ELLICOTT in justification of the omission of μερ here (against RECKERT).—R.]

† [The absence of the article with φῶς is regarded by ALFORD as significant: "here it is light, as light, which is spoken of." ELLICOTT however thinks the omission is due to the principle of correlation: "if the governing noun is without the article, the governed will be equally so."—R.]

which one has and knows another to stand in need of.

Righteousness, δικαιοσύνη, the opposite of which is ἀδικία, respects relations and the ordering of the same, claims which can be made, and obligations, which should be fulfilled, and is just in regard to all these, taking pains that nothing, neither the least nor the most difficult, receives detriment.

Truth, ἀλήθεια, the opposite of which is ψεῦδος, concerns the agreement of what is internal and external, of thought and word and deed, of goodness and righteousness, so that one is not served at the expense of the other, and harmony exists. The terms are not to be divided according to the three categories: inwardly, toward man, toward God (B-CRUSIUS), or source, outwardly, inwardly (SCHENKEL).^{*} "All," πᾶση, denotes the extent of the manifold manifestations (Phil. iv. 6: ὅσα), it is not then—all kinds. Others explain differently, but it is generally agreed, that ἔστε or συνέστηκε should be supplied. [Comp. WINEY, p. 173, against the acceptance of a Hebraism here (ἐν=Beth essentialis, Gesenius, Lexicon, under 2.C).—R.]

Ver. 10. Proving, δοκιμάζοντες.—Grammatically this participle may be the mode of the walking, ver. 9 being taken as a parenthesis. So BENDEL, HARLESS, MEYER, SCHENKEL [HODGE, EADIE, ELLICOTT, ALFORD], and others. But the exhortation may also be regarded as concluded in ver. 8; nor does ver. 9 give in the main the impression of being a parenthesis, while the participle can be, according to WINEY (p. 545), taken imperatively with ἔστε supplied, as occurs at least ten times in Rom. xii. 9-13. So KOPPE, STIER, BLEEK and others. [Such a construction is certainly allowable, where the context plainly requires it, but is not to be accepted when a simpler view is so obviously suggested as in this case.—R.] The former view is favored by the connection of "proving" and "walk," since through the walk as a child of the light material and power for the proof grows and ripens. [On the word see TRENCH, Syn., II. § xxiv.—R.] Investigation and discrimination are required of the children of light; independently, not "tossed as waves and carried about—in the sleight of men" (iv. 14), they should prove, what is well-pleasing to the Lord, τί ἐστιν εὐαρεστον τῷ κυρίῳ.—"What," τί, defines that all things, even the most refined traits and forms, are to be proved. The question is, Is it "well-pleasing to the Lord," i. e., to Christ, who with His Word is the objective measure. ["The Christian's whole course is a continual proving, testing of the will of God in practice: investigating not what pleases himself, but what pleases Him" (ALFORD).—R.] Comp. Rom. xiv. 23; xii. 2; 2 Cor. v. 9; 1 Thess. v. 21.

^{*} [MEYER properly observes that these three words present the whole of Christian morality under its three aspects, the good, the right, the true. It may be added that this verbal triad, presenting the one fruit of the light is less sentimental, but more substantial than the hackneyed cluster of words: the true, the beautiful, the good. "The right" too often gives way to "the beautiful," so-called.—R.]

Ver. 11. And have no fellowship, καὶ μὴ συνκοινωνεῖτε.—"And" connects the imperative with the similar admonition, ver. 7, there "with them" is added, here "with the works," the latter referring to fellowship with the works, the former with the persons. The verb is a strengthened form^{*} (Phil. iv. 14, Rev. xviii. 4), from συνκοινωνός (Rom. xi. 17; 1 Cor. ix. 23, Phil. i. 7; Rev. i. 9); it is a compound not usual with the Apostle, denoting however the fellowship on one side alone. Hence συν is not to be referred to the disobedient, and κοινωνεῖν to the works (MEYER).

With the unfruitful works of darkness [τοῖς ἔργοις τοῖς ἀκαρποῖς τοῦ σκοτός].—The prominent word ἔργοις, "works," is followed by ἀκαρποῖς, "unfruitful," distinguished by the article, in contrast to: "the fruit of the light" (ver. 9).† The expression is not without a certain mildness, like "empty words" (ver. 6), yet without being weak, simply denying the fruit, without positively referring to the corruption and condemnation (iv. 22; Rom. vi. 21; viii. 13; Gal. vi. 8). The expressions: "dead works" (Heb. vi. 1; ix. 14), "wicked works" (Col. i. 21), are similar. The added genitive: τοῦ σκοτός, "of darkness," appends the positive element (Rom. xiii. 12); Gal. v. 19: τῆς σαρκός.

But rather even reprove them.—Non satis abstinere est (BENDEL); hence μᾶλλον δὲ καὶ, "but rather even." Lev. xix. 17. Ἐλέγχετε requires rebuke, punishment, conviction, as in John iii. 20; xvi. 8. The object is not expressed; but the context supplies it: αὐτά (them, i. e. the works). The mode is determined by the context, since the evil works are to be punished: through proper conduct in word and work, verbis et factis luce dignis (BENDEL). MEYER and SCHENKEL incorrectly apply it to oral rebuke alone, against the passages in John, from which an oral conviction and punishment cannot be deduced. Comp. John viii. 9. The result: conversion, improvement, is in no way indicated, hence not to be accepted (OLSHAUSEN).

[ALFORD, EADIE and ELLICOTT favor the reference to oral rebuke; certainly it seems a prominent thought, but see on the next verse. The last named author thus marks the antithesis: "Do not connive at them or pass them over unnoticed, but take aggressive measures against them; try and raise the Gentiles to your own Christian standard." HODGE takes the verb as meaning: to convince by evidence, deducing from this statement: "The ethics as well as the theology of the Bible are founded on the principle that knowledge and holiness, ignorance and sin, are inseparable." Hence that our duty is simply to let "the light of Divine truth shine into the darkened minds of men, and upon their evil deeds."—R.]

Ver. 12. For the things done in secret by them it is a shame even to speak of.—

^{*} [De Wette's rendering: "take no part in," would require a genitive after the verb; the other is more literal, and is now accepted by EADIE, who at first followed DE WETTE.—R.]

† [Comp. especially Gal. v. 19, 22, where there is a similar contrast, on which JEROME remarks: vitia in semetipsa infirmunt et pereunt, virtutes frugibus pullulant et redundant.—R.]

[See *Textual Note]. Evidently a reason (γάρ) for what was said in ver. 11 is here introduced. BENDEL correctly indicates one part of it: cur indefinite loquatur ver. 11 de operibus tenebrarum, quum fructum lucis ver. 9 definite descripserit,* the other is at any rate, why he has expressed himself so briefly, generally, without qualification: ἐλέγχετε. It is incorrect to take γάρ=although (KOPPE), or to insert "although" (RUECKERT). —Τὰ γὰρ κρυφῇ γινόμενα ὑπ' αὐτῶν, i. e., the children of disobedience (ver. 6), or "those doing the works of darkness" (WINER, p. 134), can only be the works mentioned before, but more definitely characterized, in order to give a motive for the propriety of the requirement. Two elements now brought forward, constitute the characteristics of these works: κρυφῇ, "in secret," the main point standing first, and γινόμενα the second. The former marks the works as those to which ever clings something unknown, unrecognized, that may not appear, but will remain in concealment, ashamed of itself however bold; the latter, which is not =ποιούμενα, marks their involuntary, habitual character, not isolated but peculiar, while ὑπό expresses the guilt of those who do them. STIER aptly compares with our passage the profound description of the "rebels against the light"

(סִרְיָא, Job xxiv. 13-16) and "the hidden things of darkness" (1 Cor. iv. 5; John iii. 20, 21); accordingly it is not to be referred exclusively to sins of debauchery, orgies [HOLZHAUSEN] and the like, although these are included; nor are we to understand only heathen sins of the most objectionable character. The works of darkness are stretched in a way that is universally and continuously valid; of such works "it is a shame even to speak" (vers. 3, 4). Evidently λέγειν is not merely narration, indifferent mention, but includes disapproving, rebuking mention as well. Paul requires an ἐλέγχειν without a λέγειν, "without one's taking all their dirt into his mouth" (Berth. Bible), hence through the walk in word and work, so necessary on this account. Matt. v. 16; Phil. ii. 15.

[The main difficulty here is the question of connection. The views of BENDEL and KOPPE have been already suggested, and seem unsatisfactory. That of BRAUNE (so STIER, PEILE, BLOOMFIELD, following THEOPHYLACT and ERASMUS) depends on the meaning of ἐλέγχετε, and since this seems to include verbal reproof, the restriction here is at least improbable. HARLESS and others connect the verse with "have no fellowship," but this identifies "works of darkness" and "things done in secret" almost too strongly, and as ELLICOTT suggests, gives undue prominence to the negative part of the command, while the phrase "but rather even," as well as the subsequent context makes "reprove" the leading thought. Taking ἐλέγχετε in its proper sense, and accepting the connection of this verse with it by γάρ, two views present themselves: that of ALFORD and others: "I mention not and you need not speak of these deeds—much less have any fellowship with them —your connection with them must be only that which the act of ἐλέγχει necessitates;" and that of MEYER, ELLICOTT, EADIE and others: "By all means reprove them, and there is the more need of it, for it is a shame even to speak of their secret sins." This is preferable, and the reproof of the works of darkness can take place without speaking of the more disgusting forms. —R.]

Ver. 13. But all things, τὰ δὲ πάντα, denotes what is described in ver. 12. [So MEYER, ELLICOTT and others against RUECKERT and ALFORD, who take the phrase as of general application. —R.]—Being reprov'd are made manifest by the light, ἐλεγχόμενα ὑπὸ τοῦ φωτός φανεροῦται.—The light is God's, in His Word, in our conscience, character and conduct; the Christian persons falling into the back-ground behind the "light" which works in and out from them: this must work for its own sake, the efficiency does not enter with reference to our persons. Hence ὑπὸ τοῦ φωτός belongs both to ἐλεγχόμενα and φανεροῦται, as the position indicates also, since otherwise it would be repeated. In ἐλεγχόμενα the success of the ἐλέγχετε is set forth: you do not proceed ineffectually against the works of the children of disobedience, they are rebuked, struck, could not avoid it; your light has become a punishment for them. When this takes place, they are made manifest, what is "in secret" in them, becomes plain and its scandalousness is recognized; ἐλεγχόμενα is therefore a presupposition to φανεροῦται, not an extension of the predicate, but a limitation of the subject, τὰ πάντα. The context however suggests: the reprov'd acts or conditions become so to the possessor: to him they are now manifest as reprov'd, as reprov'd with right, and both reprov'd and manifested through the light of the truth in Jesus Christ and His people.

[It seems to be an unsatisfactory way out of the difficulty respecting the connection of ὑπὸ τοῦ φωτός, to join it to both the participle and the verb, and BRAUNE is probably led to adopt it by his desire to maintain the thought of a tacit reproof. To join it with the participle (DE WETTE and others) is open to objection, for this gives the ἐλέγχειν a specification not in accordance with ver. 12, while, equally with BRAUNE's view, it makes φως entirely too ethical, it being properly metaphorical in both clauses. The connection with the verb is more natural, "by the light" receiving emphasis from the order in the Greek. So MEYER, ELLICOTT, EADIE and most recent commentators. The participle is a predication of manner or time ("being reprov'd," or "when reprov'd") joined to the subject. See note at the close of the verse.—R.]

For everything which is made manifest is light.—Ἰὼν τὸ φανερούμενον, following φανεροῦται, is passive (WINER, p. 242); all, that is illuminated, made manifest, ὥς ἐστιν, itself gives light, has the nature and efficiency of light. This very general proposition is limited by the character of the subject (BENDEL: sermo de homine ipso, ver. 14), to the persons who permit themselves to be reprov'd, who must permit themselves to be enlightened, in order to become manifest, shined upon and illuminated, and finally to become themselves light. BEN-GEL: Antanaclassis; nam φανεροῦνται est passivum; φανεροῦμεν medium, quod manifestari non refugit. With STIER we may find here a recalling of: "once ye were darkness, now are ye light" (ver. 8), in order that in thankfulness and mildness towards those in the same condition in which they formerly were, they may apply the reproving and manifesting walk. Because what is shined upon, illuminated, itself shines, walk then so, that ye shame, reprove, convince those who are busy with the works of darkness, bringing them to the light; thus ye will best help them, as ye yourselves have been helped. The first part of this verse indicates the immediate result, the second the end of the ἐλέγχθῆναι or ἐλέγχειν. BEN-GEL: Simul hinc patet facilitas (STIER: because without speaking, hence without special knowledge of him who is to be reprov'd), justitia (STIER: because to the darkness the judging light is of right due), salubritas (STIER: because these can thus become light themselves) elenchi.—There is here no reference to the Gnostic light-theory of the Valentinians (BAUR), since these on the contrary wrested and distorted this passage after A. D. 150. Quite as untenable and inapt are those explanations which take φανεροῦμεν as active and πᾶν as the object—accusative (GROTIUS), or apply the ἐλέγχειν only to oral rebuke (MEYER, SCHENKEL and others), or regard the neuter as masculine merely (STORR and others).

[The view of MEYER is on the whole most satisfactory: "But all things (all those secret sins), when they are reprov'd, when that ἐλέγχετε has been effected on them, are made manifest by the light, by the light of Christian truth, which is efficient in your reproving, are brought to light as to their true moral quality, unveiled and made clear to the moral consciousness; by the light, I say, they are made manifest, for—in order to prove by a general proposition, that this cannot take place except by the light—all that which is made manifest, that is brought out of its concealment and brought to light in its true character, is light, has thus ceased to have the nature of darkness and is now of the character of light. The basis of this proof is the syllogism: "Quod est in effectu (ὡς ἐστὶ), id debet in causa (ἐν τῷ αἰτίῳ)." This is equally simple and grammatical. It avoids the common mistake of referring the words too definitely. Commentators have run into much perplexity by not accepting occasional general propositions; comp. Gal. iii. 20. EADIE, following CALVIN and others, still maintains an active or middle sense, objecting to the passive that light does not always exercise this transforming influence. But this objection holds only against a too strictly ethical sense of ὡς, to which OLSHAUSEN, STIER, HODGE (and Braune) incline. Objectively taken, it is universally true: "everything shone upon is light." "Whether this tends to condemnation or otherwise, depends on the nature of the case, and the inward operation of the outwardly illuminating influence" (ALFORD, ELLICOTT). See the last named for a clear statement, and comp. HARLESS, EADIE, but especially MEYER in loco.—R.]

The conclusion; ver. 14.

Ver. 14. Wherefore he saith [οὕτως λέγει; Braune: It is said: comp. iv. 8.—R.]—"Wherefore" refers to what precedes, and in accordance with the purport of the citation, to all that is said of the walk in the light, not merely to ver. 13 (SCHENKEL), but to vers. 8, 11 also, in order to render the exhortation more complete and forcible through a citation.* Hence λέγει is as in iv. 8. This quotation of the Apostle is not to be weakened, because no corresponding passage is found in the Old Testament, neither Isa. ix. 12 (CALVIN and most) nor xxvi. 19 (BEZA and others) nor lii. 1, 2, or ix. 1; it is not supposed that he cited a saying given directly to him (JEROME) or an apocryphal passage (MORUS and others). Certainly we should not accept a lapis memorie, as though he wished to quote from canonical Scripture and happened on an apocryphal passage that could not be authenticated (MEYER, who compares 1 Cor. ii. 9), and quite as little a combination of the passages from Isaiah (SCHENKEL, who refers to Rom. ix. 33; xi. 8, 26).† Least of all is λέγει=φησὶ, they said, it is said (BORNEMANN). The most probable explanation is, that it is a quotation from a Christian hymn that had grown out of Isa. x. 1, 2. This is confirmed by vers. 18, 19, as well as by the significance of church hymns beside the Scripture. So THEODORET with reference to 1 Cor. xiv. 26; SEVERIANUS in Tischendorf (ed. 7, vol. ii. p. 457). BEN-
GEL: Simul videtur in mente habuisse formulam, quæ in festo buccinarum adhiberi solita fuerat. Et fortasse illo anni tempore scripsit hanc epistolam. 1 Cor. v. 7. BLEEK in loco and Stud. und Krit. 1853, p. 331. STIER and others: A word of God is introduced as speaking to the Christian.

[There is one insuperable objection to these views of BRAUNE, STIER, BEN-
GEL, BORNEMANN, as well as to those of RHENFELD (one of our Lord's unrecorded sayings), WESLEY (the general tenor of Scripture), BARNES (who sees no reason for accepting a quotation at all), and that is Paul's use of λέγει, his formula of citation from the Old Testament; especially in conjunction with οὕτως. If we accept a Christian hymn based on the passage in Isaiah the difficulty is not removed, but the way opened for the multiplication of difficulties. If God speaks, (as Braune implies) through a paraphrase in the form of a Christian hymn, much more does he speak, when His Apostle interprets or applies His written word. The best solution is that of ALFORD:

* [ALFORD explains: "Seeing that everything that is made manifest becomes light—is shone upon by the detecting light of Christ—objectively—it only remains that the man should be shone upon inwardly by the same Christ revealed in his awakened heart. We have then in Scripture an exhortation to that effect."—R.]

† [The German has an obvious typographical error. It reads Johanneischen Stellen, passages from John. SCHENKEL really defends the view, "that the Apostle has freely combined several Scriptural passages in accordance with their sense and from memory," suggesting Isa. lii. 1; xxvi. 19; ix. 1. This view is favored though not definitely adopted by HODGE and EADIE. Undoubtedly, the Apostle combines passages (Rom. ix. 33; xi. 8, 26), but not so loosely. We may defend either a quotation according to the sense, or a literal combination, not both, especially in connection with the notion of free quotation from memory. Paul interpreted the Scriptures, whose words he well knew; a lapis memorie was scarcely possible in his case as a man, much less as an inspired man.—R.]

"In the first place, by the introduction of ὁ Χριστός, it is manifestly a paraphrase, not an exact citation. The Apostle cites, and had a perfect right to cite, the language of prophecy: and that he is here doing so, the bare word 'Christ' shows us beyond dispute. I insist upon this, that it may be plainly shown to be no shift in a difficulty, no hypothesis among hypotheses—but the necessary inference from the form of the citation. This being so—of what passage of the Old Testament is this a paraphrase? I answer of Isa. lx. 1, 2. There, the Church is set forth as being in a state of darkness and of death (comp. lix. 10), and is exhorted to awake, and become light, for that her light is come, and the glory of Jehovah has arisen upon her. Where need we go further for that of which we are in search?"

—The view of ELLICOTT is similar: "St. Paul, speaking under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, is expressing in a condensed and summary form the spiritual meaning of the passage." He thinks the prophet's immediate words supply in substance the first part of the quotation, while the latter part is the spiritual application of the remainder of the verse, and of the general tenor of the prophecy. ALFORD's view is safe, and rests on the Lord's own saying: "Search the Scriptures, they are they which testify of me" (John v. 39).—[R.]

Up! thou who sleepest, ἐγείρε ὁ καθυύδων.—[The word ἐγείρε is not the active for the middle but is the common form of rousing (FRITZSCHE).—R.]—This can be addressed only to the Christian (Rom. xiii. 11, 12), who at God's call opens his eyes; the Lord has come to him, awakened him, so that he, awake and alive, looks about him. [It is more correct to regard this as addressed to those who are not yet Christians, but about to become so through the effectual call of God.—This is perhaps BRAUNE's view, see Doctr. Note 3.—R.] The beginning of knowledge is thus denoted. Still there is yet a struggle with sleep; the eyes close again; the light of day dazzles.—And arise from the dead, καὶ ἀνάστα ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν, is the advance to rising from the couch, standing up and preparing for work. Ἀναστῆναι ἐπὶ ἔργον ἐγερθῆναι ἐξ ὕπνου. The sleeper is inactive, as one who is dead.—The promise incites: and Christ shall shine upon thee, καὶ ἐπιφαύσει σοι ὁ Χριστός.—The figure is that of the morning, when day breaks and man meets the sun and daylight. Christ is the light, makes the day that shines upon and enlightens us, in order that we may become light for others, as the context requires. On the forms ἀνάστα and ἐπιφαύσει see WINKER, pp. 76, 85.

[The question of the connection of this verse deserves some further attention. BRAUNE apparently follows STRIER, who thinks the quotation is introduced to exhort: "Become light, that ye may be able to convict others," which accords with his view of silent reproof. But this seems to be stepping aside from the more obvious sense. HODGE takes it as a confirmation of the assertion of the preceding verse: everything made manifest is light. This is true, but scarcely a sufficient reason for its introduction. MEYER paraphrases διό thus: Because the reproof is so necessary, as I have indicated in ver. 12, and so wholesome in its effects as shown in ver. 13, therefore, etc., and then says that the call of God confirms the necessity of the reproof, and the promise: "Christ shall shine upon thee," supports the wholesome influence of the light, under which the reproof places them. This seems preferable. So that the purpose of the Apostle is to show by a paraphrase from the Scriptures that the effect of the light is such, and that therefore Christians should reprove in order that others may become light through the illumination here promised. In general what is made manifest is light (ver. 15), but Christ's shining makes new light in a spiritual sense. Let your light shine, so as to reprove, in the hope that Christ will shine on the convicted heart. This seems to be the view of ALFORD, and is approached by ERASMUS and RUECKERT.—R.]

What JEROME says is interesting: scio me audisse quendam de hoc loco in ecclesiam disputantem—testimonium hoc, inquit, ad Adam dicitur in loco calvarie sepultum, ubi crucifixus est dominus,—illo ergo tempore quo crucifixus dominus super ejus pendeat sepulchrum, hæc propheta completa est: surge, Adam, qui dormis et exsurge a mortuis et non ut legimus ἐπιφαύσει σοι Χριστός, i. e., oriatur tibi Christus, sed ἐπιφάσει, i. e., continget te Christus, quia videlicet tactu sanguinis ipsius et corporis dependentis vivificetur atque consurgat.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. One of the weightiest points in the formation of the Christian life is the conversation and intercourse with others, the social life. Here foresight and circumspection are necessary. Sociality is a gift and has a task, and both of these are twofold: Every one has both for himself and others. For himself, that he does not suffer detriment through the idle, flat, empty, useless character of the same. There may enter a somnolence of the awakened Christian impulse and life, of moral endeavor, of zeal in sanctification, through dissipation, gossiping, amusement and jesting, or excitement of carnal zeal, dainty, proud and high-flown character, oneness and injustice in opinion and conduct. For others, that he promotes their advancement, and in the interchange of sentiment and experience elevates, confirms, clarifies, rectifies, and complements them. Do not enter into more intimate intercourse with him, who cannot and will not be to you what you ought to be to him, or guard against his influence over you, taking heed if you cannot alter him, that you do not at all events conform him in his character. You should not withdraw yourself from others, but so act that you are not withdrawn from God, who has drawn you to Himself. What He has given you hold fast, so that no one deprives you of it. Do not let what He has planted in you be rooted up by the words of others. Let the fruit of His light ripen, and do not allow it to be eaten up by the worms of the world's culture.

2. Consider the two in connection: proving what is God's will, and reproving your neighbor. The former comes first, the latter is second. The former requires care in intercourse with God through His word, personal growth in His grace and knowledge, intimacy with Him, walking in His light, as His child. The latter, on the other hand, that you become for your neighbor a conscience outside of and beside him, as your own conscience has borne witness to yourself, or that like Sarah you speak silently in your conduct (1 Pet. iii. 1); very little depends on words, at least on many of them, only on apt ones, without scolding; be free and frank, true in love and lovely in truth (iv. 15). He who is not yet your brother, may and ought to become so; but you should no longer be to him what you were before Christ won you: a companion in his evil works and words.

3. In the concluding verse the grace of God is rendered strongly prominent, but in such a way as to indicate that it is in vain, if man's own act is not also present and he does not lift himself up by applying the power brought nigh and proffered him, his own strength increasing with the use of the power from on high which he appropriates. If he when awakened does not open his eyes and wake up, if when called he does not get up from his couch, he does not reach Christ's light or the walk in the day; this however takes place only in consequence of the initiative of Divine and imparted power.*

4. Finally it may be said, that as Paul immediately afterwards speaks of psalms and hymns and spiritual songs (ver. 19), so he here places on an equality with canonical Scripture the Christian hymn which grows out of God's word. Hence the importance of church hymnology. By this too we must test every hymn and hymn-book, that nothing apocryphal or heretical throws what is Scriptural into the back-ground, but that the truly Christian element of the hymn animates, furthers and subserves the Scriptures in the congregation, in the public service and in the household. [While compelled to object to the premise here laid down for the reason stated in the additional Exeg. Notes on ver. 14, we may well approve of the influence, which is valid on other grounds than the supposed citation of a Christian hymn. See further Doctr. Notes on the next section.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

• Comp. the Doctr. Notes.

You should not fly from men, yet you should not become their admiring slave, nor esteem yourself less than God has esteemed you, nor forsake His truth to accept human errors. Society has her assemblies generally in the evening; how much is there spoken in the artificial life of crowded halls resounding with human voices, with spirit and wit (but generally without this), confidently and with the approval of the mass. But as you go home in the quiet night, under the twinkling light of the stars or the shining of the moon, test what you have heard: Can you still highly estimate it? Have you not oftenest felt its emptiness with inward sadness? You have often thought, I would have got more by staying at home and chatting with my wife and children or with some friend! How then if you test it by God's word, by Christ's life? Prove all thereby!—Let no one say to you: You must believe without examining. But do not let any say of you, that you do so.—The world may ask: what is useful? what is admirable? what is lovely? what is customary? do you only ask: what is right and well-pleasing to the Lord?—Harless very properly says: Punishment is light! But STIER is quite as correct in saying; Light is punishment!—It is good to be convinced by the light, whether it breaks forth from the walk and word of a friend or a foe. To change one's way on account of the light is well, but when it comes from an opponent, then to do so is deserving of praise. It really amounts to nothing to accept a rebuke out of fear or gratitude, or any spirit of calculation: it is however a special gift of God, when one receives and is affected by the primitive element of the light, altogether irrespective of the man who bears the light, be he dear, influential, powerful or not. For only thus does the recipient become himself light.—Cherish a spirit of independence not merely against others for the truth, but also for others against falsehood; it is the latter that especially needs nurture.—Christ will enlighten thee here, but glorify thee hereafter, if indeed you are really an enlightened Christian and not merely a man shone upon!

STARKE:—It is an old trick of Satan's to patch up the worst vices with the form of virtue and give them a free pass in the world under a false name. Craftiness is termed prudence, extravagance generosity, vindictiveness high-spiritedness, arrogance neatness, lechery politeness, avarice economy, etc.—True Christians are not credulous, silly and unreasonable people, but lights in the Lord, on the contrary the godless are such, 1 Thess. v. 5.—Where goodness, righteousness and truth cannot be met with, the Spirit of God certainly does not dwell.—Love and goodness must not go so far as to make justice and truth suffer: when these virtues, united together, kiss each other, all goes right. Christian reproof is one of the most excellent obligations of love; from its omission the lack of love and fidelity may certainly be perceived.—As much wickedness is done by the godless in secret, never coming to light; so on the other hand much good is done by the pious, that might be mentioned with praise, yet is concealed out of humility. For them it suffices that God and their own hearts know of it.

RIEGER:—One of the greatest vexations, and at the same time a correct judgment, respecting the world is, that she has so many people who talk to please her and adorn her filthiness. But all these vain words will not cover her from the wrath of God. Goodness is the imitator of God in His love, by means of which we avoid anger, hatred, tumult, blasphemy, avarice. Righteousness prevents stealing, the unmerciful shutting of the hand against the needy, and avarice which like a weight of lead sinks one into darkness. Truth shuns lies, shameful words and buffooneries, foul talk, vain and seductive discourse.

* [Eadie compares the command of ver. 14 to "that given by our Lord to the man with the withered hand—Stretch it forth." The man might have objected and said, 'Could I obey thee in this, I would not have troubled thee. Why mock me with my infirmity, and bid me do the very thing I cannot?' But the man did not so perplex himself; and Christ, in exciting the desire to obey, imparted the power to obey." If every man would understand the philosophy of waking up before he gets up, what a world of sleepers we would have!—R.]

Thus Christian prudence is attained, which never seeks to go as far as it can without sin, but after the manner of well-behaved children, is ever concerned to meet God's approval.

HEUBNER:—With vain words, i. e., deceiving talk, as though these vices belonged to things indifferent. This evil, perverted moral sense begets unbelief of morally strict Christianity and thus brings down God's wrath.—The Christian is an interested participant and yet separate and peculiar.—On the Epistle for the third Sunday in Lent; vers. 1-9. The Divine walk of the Christian. 1. Description. a) In general: Imitation of God, ver. 1; b) in particular: holy love (ver. 2) and pure, spotless life (vers. 3, 4). 2. Its necessity. a. For our own salvation; for without such walk we have no part in the kingdom of God and of Christ (ver. 5); b) for the salvation of others: for only such a walk can reprove the evil, corrupt principles of the world, and make out of unbelievers, children of wrath, believers, children of grace. What would the world be without Enochs? (ver. 6). 3. Means. a) Separate yourself from the company of the ungodly, leave the path of sinners, else you cannot walk godly (ver. 7). b) Accept the light of grace, that your darkness may be enlightened (ver. 8). c) Use the light however as you receive it, beginning with God's help to exercise your spiritual strength.—The imitation of God, to which the Christian is obligated. 1. In what it consists: a) In accepting the temper, which makes us like to Him as children to a Father (ver. 1); b) especially in love and holiness (vers. 2-4). 2. What makes this our duty: a) Our Christian calling, which should distinguish us from idolaters (ver. 5); b) our happiness, our freedom from the wrath of God (ver. 6). 3. What strengthens us thereto: a) Holding to the Church and accepting the light of the Word (vers. 7, 8); b) seeking the Spirit of God.—The spirit of Christian investigation is nothing else than Christian conscientiousness, with this rule: what pleases God? What pleases man is a matter of indifference.—The Christian is in duty bound to speak earnestly and decidedly against evil; he dare not be silent, where he ought to speak, still less approve with the men-pleasing spirit of the worldly wise.—The ground of this earnestness and reproof is the shamefulfulness of the world's vices.—What is made manifest through rebuke—is generally brought out of the darkness, in which shameful vice conceals itself, and placed in the light, so that it is thus evident to all as wicked. This is indeed the main matter.—All that is made manifest through reproof, so that the man is really made conscious of his sins,—is thereby overcome. This is the only path by which the Divine light rises within man in the place of darkness.—One must be roused, shaken, in order to be brought to consciousness. Out of the sleep of sin, in which he is not aware of the evil, he must be awakened, in order then to see what is in him.

PASSAVANT:—It is indeed an unhappy thing to be a companion of sinners, in follies and vices, in which one becomes a means of annoyance, corruption and distress to another, only to be companion in his shame and pain, hereafter in the despair of the Judgment Day.

STIER:—Words awaken lust, lust bears sin, this is the irresistible and dangerous course of deceit, against the first appearance of which in words we cannot too carefully guard ourselves.

—Where there is unbelief, there is also the wrath of God!—Have nothing in common with them, for you are unwilling to have this wrath in common with them!—Not reproving is equivalent to having fellowship.—Darkness can become light only by means of a shining light, and the walk in the light is of itself able to judge and transform the darkness.—Let yourself be enlightened, that you may live, and become alive that the light may ever more fully shine on you!

GENZKEN (Preparatory Discourse): Jesus my consolation (ver. 2), my love (vers. 1, 2), my Shield (vers. 3-7) and great Reward (vers. 8, 9).

On the Epistle for the third Sunday in Lent (Eph. v. 1-9):—KAPFF:—What belongs to the walk in the light? 1. Fellowship with God in Christ; 2. Laying off all ungodly doings; 3. Living according to God's good pleasure (justification, repentance, sanctification).—RAUTENBERG: That is real love, which goes even unto death for the brethren. 1) It covers a multitude of sins; 2) is the fulfilment of the law; 3) is well-pleasing to God; 4) brings blessedness.—How important are the sufferings of Christ for our sanctification! The Holy Ghost works in us through them 1) powerful, sacred shame, 2) pure, self-sacrificing love.—The sacrifice of Christ a sweet-smelling savor to God—on account of the love 1) which brought it; 2) which makes room for it; 3) which is awakened by it.—TUM: The eternal love, 1) in its archetype, 2) its express image, 3) its copy.

[HODGE:—Ver. 6. It is not only among the heathen, but among the mass of men in all ages and nations, a common thing to extenuate the particular sins to which the Apostle here refers. It is urged that they have their origin in the very constitution of our nature; that they are not malignant; that they may co-exist with amiable tempers; and that they are not hurtful to others; that no one is the worse for them, if no one knows them, etc. Paul cautions his readers in every age of the Church not to be deceived by such vain words.—Ver. 10. Christ is here recognized as the Lord of the conscience, whose will is to us the ultimate standard of right and wrong. It is thus that the sacred writers show that Christ was their God—not merely the God of their theology, but of their religion.—Ver. 13. According to the Apostle, the relation between truth and holiness is analogous to that between light and vision. Light cannot create the eye, or give to a blind eye the power of vision; but it is essential to its exercise. Wherever it penetrates it dissipates darkness, and brings every thing to view, and causes it to produce its appropriate effect. So truth cannot regenerate, or impart the principle of spiritual life; but it is essential to all holy exercises; and wherever the truth penetrates, it dissipates the clouds of error, and brings every thing to view, so that when spiritually discerned it produces its proper effect on the soul.—Ver. 14. The light which Christ sheds around Him has power to awake the sleeping dead.—R.] d. Exhortation to a pure walk, with careful consideration of the Christian position.

15 See then that [how] ye walk circumspectly [strictly], not as fools [unwise men], 16 but as wise, Redeeming the time [Buying up the opportunity], because the days
 17 are evil. Wherefore be ye not unwise [on this account do not become senseless], 18 but understanding¹ what the will of the Lord is. And be not drunk [made drunk] with wine, wherein is excess [or dissoluteness]; but be filled with [in] the Spirit;
 19 Speaking to yourselves [one another] in² psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, 20 singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord; Giving thanks always for all things unto [to] God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;
 21 Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God [Christ].³

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 17.—[The reading of the Rec. (συνιέντες) is supported by D³ K. L., nearly all cursives, many fathers and good versions (Tischendorf, Ellicott and most); συνιόντες is found in D.¹ F. G., some versions (Harless, Meyer, Alford, earliest editions); the imperative: συνιετε has good support (N. A. B., 6 cursives, Chrysostom, Jerome, accepted by Lachmann and Alford (ed. 4). The last appears to be a correction, the participle being lectio difficilior, so that of the two principal readings the first is to be preferred on external grounds.—R.]

² Ver. 19.—Lachmann and Alford insert ἐν in brackets before ψαλμοῖς, but as it is found only in B., 5 cursives, some versions, and could so readily enter into an explanatory gloss, it is generally rejected.—Both editors bracket πνευματικαῖς on much the same authority, doubting it as a probable interpolation from Col. iii. 16; but it might readily be omitted in a few cases from homoteleuton (Meyer).—Ταῖς καρδίαις, instead of τῇ καρδίᾳ (Rec. N.³ B. K. L.) is found in N.³ A. D. F., but is rejected by Tischendorf, Ellicott, Alford and most, as an emendation derived from Col. iii. 16.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The exhortation; vers. 15, 16. Ver. 15. See then [or take heed].—Βλέπετε with iva (1 Cor. xvi. 10; 2 John 8), with the accusative (Phil. iii. 2; Col. iv. 17), here as in 1 Cor. iii. 10 with πῶς. Sollicitudo etiam modum spectat (BENGEL). They are enjoined to take heed, and because (οὖν) as the comprehensive quotation (ver. 14) says, they are awake, have arisen, been enlightened by Christ, to a walk such as has been spoken of (ver. 1: “beloved children,” ver. 3: “as becometh saints,” ver. 8: “as children of the light”). CALVIN is therefore too limited: Si aliorum discutere tenebras fideles debent fulgure suo, quanto minus exequere debent proprio vitæ instituto; MEYER limits it also to vers. 10, 11.*

How ye walk strictly [πῶς ἀκριβῶς περιπατεῖτε].—According to the context πῶς is to be confined precisely to the ἀκριβῶς exacte ad voluntatem divinam (LUTHER's rendering: vorsichtlich [so E. V.: circumspectly] is not sufficient); marking with the indicative that it is not first to be considered how this shall be taken hold of, but that it already exists in its best feature, the walk being an actual fact (WINER, p. 282). [ALFORD: “Take heed not only that your walk be exact, strict, but also of what sort that strictness is—not only that you have a rule and keep to it, but that that rule be the best one.” The indicative is not used for the subjunctive or the future; comp. ELLICOTT in loco and Fritzschiorum Opuscula, pp. 208 f, note.—R.]

Not as unwise men, but as wise [οὐ ὡς ἄσοφοι ἀλλ' ὡς σοφοί].—“As,” marking as in i. 8 the actual condition, and not comparative (Vulgate: quasi, is apt), designates the subject referred to in “take heed,” “walk,” as “wise.” Hence “not as unwise” (BENGEL: qui præter propter viam ambulat), which is placed first for emphasis, denotes a subjective notion, which is inadmissible and unexpected as regards Christians. WINER, pp. 442, 567. Paul means Christians, in their walk, as indeed σοφός points to practice, walk, in works and evidences corresponding to the aim (i. 8; Jas. iii. 13), and not philosophers (GROTIUS), whom he ironically terms ἀσόφους.

Ver. 16. Buying up the opportunity, ἐξαγοραζόμενοι τὸν καιρὸν.—This describes the “wise” in their walk. The phrase (Col. iv. 5) recalls Dan. ii. 8 (LXX: οἶδα ἐγὼ ὅτι καιρὸν ἵμεις ἐξαγοράζετε). Nebuchadnezzar says to the Chaldeans, his servants, plainly, that they only want to gain time. Here however sapientia et ἀκρίβεια præcipitur, non ignavia (BENGEL). In distinction from the passage in Daniel, the article and the middle form are to be noticed. The right point of time, the appropriate time is the object of the ἐξαγοράζειν, the middle denotes that it is to be done for themselves, while the preposition ἐξ designates the complete entire character of the verb. Christians then should not allow τὸν καιρὸν, to escape them, should seize the opportunity (καιρός), though it costs them something in self-denial, after they have properly looked at it, like a skilful merchant, and then redeeming it out of the possession of sin, of slothfulness and pleasure, of the flesh and of darkness, should make it their own and use it for Christian walk. The time is then not to be taken as it is, nor is LUTHER correct: "adapt yourselves to the time." Nor is it, to wait prudently and to temporize (BENGEL), or merely, to use for the ἐλέγχειν (FLATT, HARLESS).

[In regard to this phrase, we may accept as established: 1. That καιρὸν means opportunity, not time, hence that the E. V. conveys a wrong impression. 2. That all special references to those from whom the purchase is made (bad men, BENGEL; the devil, CALVIN), or to the price paid (all things, CHRYSOSTOM and others), are irrelevant and unwarranted. The participle is one of manner, the ἐξ is referred by ELLICOTT and ALFORD to the collecting out of, the buying up, "calling your times of good out of a land where there are few such flowers." The exact sense then is: improve the opportunities which occur, looking out for them as a merchant, because the days are evil, and opportunities are rare; not as is often supposed: Be diligent in the use of time, because the days are few. The reference to Gen. xlvii. 9 will not justify this twisting of the next clause.—R.]

Because the days are evil, ὅτι αἱ ἡμέραι πονηραὶ εἰσιν.—See Gen. xlvii. 9; 2 Tim. iii. 1. The days, the present period of life, the αἶων οὗτος, in which sin has her glory (OLSHAUSEN), are therefore "evil" on account of sin, creating hindrances and temptations, leading even to apostasy; hence not simply full of difficulties, unfavorable circumstances (RUECKERT).

Ver. 17. The first point of view as respects the wise: the will of God. On this account, διὰ τοῦτο, refers to vers. 15, 16, not merely as [OECUMENIUS, RUECKERT, DE WETTE, OLSHAUSEN] BLEEK and others think, to the reason ("the days are evil") appended to the designation of the "wise."

Become not senseless but understanding, μὴ γίνεσθῃ ἄφρονες, ἀλλὰ συνιέντες.—This can be said to those who are wise. For ἄφρων is qui mente non recte utitur (TITTMANN, Syn. I. p. 143), and is joined with νῆπιος in Rom. ii. 20. They should not become this; they are not yet so, since they are "wise." [This is to be maintained against ALFORD, who as usual objects to rendering γίνεσθε, become.—R.] The antithesis ("but") is συνιέντες, "understanding" they should become discerning, and that is more than γινώσκοντες. A definite object is treated of, which in every case must be clear to the "wise," but which can however easily remain not understood:

What the will of the Lord is, τί τὸ θελήμα τοῦ κυρίου, i. e., of Christ.—Non solum universo, sed certo loco, tempore, etc. (BENGEL).^{*} This will reaching to what is least and most peculiar, is the object of the insight of the wise;

^{*} [The E. V. with its order: "what the will of the Lord is," suggests this definite knowledge in special circumstances, hence to alter it, as some propose, to: "what is the will of the Lord," would be not only unnecessary, but unfortunate.—R.]

the further he advances, the less is any thing to him merely permissible; everything becomes for him a precept and will from above. Acts xxi. 15.

Ver. 18. The second point of view: Their own person, its inspiration. And be not made drunk with wine, καὶ μὴ μεθύσκεσθε οἶνον.—"And" adds a second point to the first; it is not then—in particular (MEYER), as though it introduced a single vice, for which there is no occasion given by the context, since no general pleasure has been spoken of, the species of which could be named.—[The view of MEYER is accepted by most recent English and American commentators. The objection of Braune is not valid, it would seem; for the thought of pleasure does not enter in this clause either. The general notion is "not senseless, but understanding," and the special and emphatic subordinate thought is "not being drunk," a connection which is obvious enough. The state of drunkenness is viewed not as a sensual pleasure, but as a "senseless" condition. Comp. HODGE.—R.] The precept, after the reference to the will of God and from its position in antithesis to what follows, contains in the special a reference to the general as is allowed and required by the Scriptural view. Luke i. 15; xxi. 34; 1 Thess. v. 6-8; 2 Tim. iv. 5; 1 Pet. i. 13; iv. 7; v. 8. So "the wine of the wrath" (Rev. xiv. 8, 10; xviii. 3; xix. 15). The next clause points the same way.^{*}

Wherein is excess, ἐν ᾧ ἐστὶν ἁσωτία.—Ἐν ᾧ refers to the μεθύσκεσθε οἶνον;† in this there inheres as on a ground the fact (ἐστίν), which at the same time breaks out as a consequence. Ἁσωτία, the character of an ἄσωτος (ἄσωτος from σώω, σώζω), "past redemption" (Tit. i. 6; 1 Pet. iv. 4), in which one's own character is corrupted (οὐκ εἰσέλθαι, iv. 22). TITTMANN, Syn. I. p. 152 f. [Comp. TRENCHE, § XVI. The N. T. sense: dissoluteness, profligacy, seems to have arisen from the more common meaning of ἄσωτος: one who does not know how to save, i. e., a spendthrift.—R.] Hence Luther is incorrect in rendering it merely: unordentlich Wesen. JEROME incorrectly limits it to lascivious excesses; KOPPE, DE WETTE and others to excess at the Agapæ, which are not suggested as in 1 Cor. xi. 21; MEYER and [most] others to the vice of drunkenness.

But be filled in the Spirit [ἀλλὰ πληροῦσθε ἐν πνεύματι].—The antithesis is strongly marked (ἀλλὰ) and is to be found in πληροῦσθε, which stands first, as did μεθύσκεσθε, not in οἶνον and πνεύματι. [HODGE (with others) overlooks this in remarking: "To the Christian, therefore, the source of strength and joy is not wine, but the blessed Spirit of God."—R.] The imperative: Be filled! is not to be taken merely as καταλλάγητε τῷ θεῷ (2 Cor. v. 20), because it can be refused (Acts vii. 51) as well as requested (Luke xi. 13), but because Christians in the strength of God have to be faithful and to show zeal, in order to increase and become complete; much then depends on themselves. This is an entirely different becoming full from being "drunk with wine." The qualification: ἐν πνεύματι, and not πνεύματι, is not an antithesis to οὐν, but designates in and upon what the becoming full takes place, not in flesh and blood, but in the spirit of man, his better part. It is not instrumental, which cannot be established by i. 24; Phil. iv. 19, as MEYER supposes, nor does it refer to the Holy Spirit (most expositors down to BLEEK) or to our spirit and God's Spirit. That we should be filled with the Holy Ghost is indicated by the context, but not by ἐν πνεύματι. [The instrumental sense of ἐν, if accepted, must not exclude the more usual meaning: "with and in the Spirit" (EADIE, ELLICOTT). Here also, as in iv. 23, the exact sense of πνεύματι, in view of the preposition chosen, is neither the human spirit (BRAUNE), nor the Personal Holy Spirit, but the human spirit as acted upon by the Holy Spirit (ALFORD and others). Comp. Romans, p. 235.—R.] FLACIUS: præclara ebrietas, quæ sobrietatem mentis operatur! Comp. Ps. xxxvi. 8-10; Acts ii. 15-18.

^{*} [It is to be feared that the rising from the special to the general renders too indefinite the very important precept of the Apostle. We may well hold fast to the plain literal meaning: "do not be made drunk with wine," this is an injunction deserving all the prominence it receives, even if no general sense be appended.—R.]

Closer definition of becoming full in spirit [or the Spirit]; vers. 19-21. a. Social song; ver. 19 a. b. Singing in private; ver. 19 b. c. Continual thankfulness; ver. 20. d. Proper conduct in one's position; ver. 21.

Ver. 19 a. Speaking to one another, λαλοῦντες ἑαυτοῖς.—The participle denotes the most immediate expression of this being filled in spirit by the Holy Spirit, and this result as an exercise re-acts as a means for furthering the fullness. Spiritus facit fideles disertos (BENGEL). Ἐαυτοῖς, as in iv. 32; Col. iii. 16, is=ἑαυτοῖς. In intercourse, in social circles, they return, in every case, to this point of speaking as is here described. [The reference to both social intercourse and public assemblies is now usually accepted. The reciprocal action on their hearts rather than the antiphonal method with their lips, is implied in the reflexive pronoun.—R.] It is not then=meditantes vobiscum (MORUS). The double sense: from inward impulse, with one another (STIER), is inadmissible, as well as the limitation to public assemblies for worship (OLSHAUSEN).

In psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, ψαλμοῖς καὶ ὕμνοις καὶ ᾠδαῖς πνευματικαῖς.—LUTHER is incorrect: by Psalms. Since ψαλμός is something historical (Luke xx. 42; xxiv. 44; Acts i. 20; xiii. 33), the word should here retain the meaning of Old Testament Psalms, which were well-known and had been accepted in the public service (Apost. Constitutions, II. 57, 5: τοῖς τοῦ Δαβὶδ ψαλλέτω ὕμνος); ὕμνος is a song of praise, according to the context (ver. 19: "to the Lord") and to history (PLINY in GIESELER, Kirchengeschichte, I. 1, p. 136: Carmenque Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem), to Christ, hence more strictly Christian hymns, songs of Jesus; ᾠδαὶ πνευματικαὶ are spiritual songs in general, productions of the Holy Ghost in the department of poetry as regards form, out of the Christian life as regards substance, distinguished from hymns as the spiritual song is distinguished from a song for the church and congregation, by being more general as regards matter and intended more for individual needs and private use. STIER hits it very nearly with his threefold distinction: Scriptural, congregational, private. It is improper to take the first as applicable to Jewish Christians, the second to Gentile Christians, and the third as referring to an expression understood by every one alike (HARLESS) or the last as the genus, the first as a hymn with musical accompaniment, the other as a song of praise, improvised, when it is true that out of the head as well as out of the heart only that which is known can be used, or that the heaping of terms is due to the lively and urgent discourse (MEYER and others), since he is not speaking of the day of Pentecost or of the gift of tongues (Acts ii. 4; x. 46; xix. 6; 1 Cor. xiv. 15, 26) but of the orderly and regular course of things in the church; nor should all distinctions be rejected (RUECKERT).* "Spiritual" belongs to the undefined "songs," not to "psalms and hymns" (STIER), which are confessedly productions of the Holy Ghost; the word means precisely this however, and not merely that Christian thoughts and feelings find expression therein (BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS). Evidently the Apostle marks that Christians should interweave such into their conversation, often passing in joyous mood into united song, not however that such only should be recited, uninterruptedly said or sung.

Ver. 19 b. Singing in private. Singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord.—Joined as a co-ordinate clause without a connecting participle. The participle ᾄδοντες καὶ ψάλλοντες designate what is related, singing, the former in melody, the latter in recitative; the added phrase (ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ ὑμῶν) however marks something different, that is done alone and inwardly. [So HARLESS, MEYER, OLSHAUSEN, ALFORD, ELLICOTT and others. HODGE favors what was once the common view: that the clause is subordinate, defining the mode or moral quality of the preceding one. But HARLESS has shown that such a view is incompatible with the presence of ὑμῶν, and few grammatical commentators have since differed from him.—R.] Here the social song re-echoes, here also is its ground and source. This is even stronger: not merely when excited in the company of others, to become joyously full of the Spirit, but to be that when alone also in disposition and desire "to the Lord" (τῷ κυρίῳ). Acts ii. 47; Jas. v. 13.

Ver. 20. Continual thankfulness. Giving thanks always for all things, εὐχαρισ-

* [While rigorous distinctions are not to be insisted upon, we may accept in the main the view of BRAUNE. ELLICOTT: "Much curious information will be found in the article, 'Hymni a Christianis decantandi,' in Deyling, Obs. No. 44, Vol. III., p. 430 sq.; for authorities, see Fabricius, Bibliogr. Antiq. XI. 13, and for specimens of the ancient ὕμνος, ibid., Bibl. Græca, Book V. I. 24." In the fourth volume of TISCHENDORF'S Monumenta Sac. Ined., some hymns are found at the close of the Psalter, but the MSS. is incomplete, leaving us with a hymn incomplete.—In the face of such testimony there can be no question that the early church was not confined to the Old Testament Psalms.—R.]

τοῦντες πάντοτε ὑπὲρ πάντων.—Thus by the side of the joy is described that circumspect sobriety and thoughtfulness, which at all times and in all things sees and feels God's gracious hand, not merely singing, in public and private, in order to ask, but giving thanks uninterruptedly through the whole life. This is no popular, hyperbolic expression (MEYER); it is an established injunction of the Apostle (vi. 18; Col. iii. 17; iv. 2; 1 Thess. v. 19; Rom. xii. 12). Sufferings are included also (CHRYSOSTOM and others). [HODGE follows MEYER, in needlessly limiting πάντα to blessedness.—R.] It is indeed so difficult, that it is possible only for him who has God in Christ. Hence:

To God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ [ἐν ὀνόματι τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τῷ θεῷ καὶ πατρὶ].—"In the name" designates the manifested, known and acknowledged Person ("of our Lord Jesus Christ"), in whom, that is: in fellowship with whom the situation in question is experienced: giving thanks (Col. iii. 17), asking (John xiv. 13), commanding (2 Thess. iii. 6), being baptized (Acts x. 48), reproached (1 Pet. iv. 14), saved (Acts iv. 12). We either bear or experience what He permits to be laid upon us or occur to us, or we act in His service, in longing after Him, or in the consciousness of His mediation (per quem omnia nobis contingunt, BENGE); it is ἐν Χριστῷ (iii. 21); similar to διὰ Χριστοῦ (Rom. vii. 25). Without Him we would have no living God, whom we thanked, least of all in Him the Father. The article (τῷ) points to the God known to us, and the phrase "God and the Father" indicates that the same God is a Father for us, our God and Father. It is incorrect to refer πατρὶ to Christ (HARLESS, MEYER). [On this august title, comp. i. 3; Gal. i. 4; it seems perfectly proper to accept a reference of a general character: the Father, our Father and the Father of our Lord, without limiting it to either or here emphasizing either.—R.]

Ver. 21. Proper conduct in one's position. Submitting yourselves one to another.—ὑποτάσσομενοι, a co-ordinating participle [not to be taken as an imperative, CALVIN and others.—R.], refers to the position, also a gift and ordinance of God, in which one should be considerate and contented as regards superiors and inferiors (ἀλλήλοις), in piety, as well as in charity, in service in each direction, but: in the fear of Christ, ἐν φόβῳ Χριστοῦ.—According to 2 Cor. v. 11 ("the fear [not "terror," E. V.] of the Lord") and 1 Cor. x. 22 ("Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than He?"), this means fear before Him, as the present Lord, the Head,* marking the tender awe of the conscientious, the humble and zealous imitation, not the fear before the Judge (HARLESS, MEYER and others).

[HODGE connects this verse with what follows, a view which is very convenient, but not grammatically admissible, though vers. 22 ff. do carry out the thought in detail. He says his view is generally accepted, but the view of Braune is held by KNAPP, TISCHENDORF, RUECKERT, HARLESS, MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, EADIE, in fact by every recent commentator, who gives due place to grammatical considerations, OLSHAUSEN excepted. The connection is difficult however. ELLICOTT finds here named a comprehensive moral duty in regard to man (after the three duties in regard to God) the exact connecting link being "thanking God for all things (for sorrows as well, submitting yourselves to Him, yea) submitting yourselves one to another." ALFORD thinks the thought is suggested by ver. 18: "that as we are otherwise to be filled, otherwise to sing and rejoice, so also we are otherwise to behave—not blustering nor letting our voices rise in selfish vaunting, as such men do—but subject to one another," etc. So EADIE.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Christian mode of life is precisely wisdom, which has first of all as a pre-supposition the possession of the truth, and is essentially the appropriation and acquisition of truth, or the capacity and readiness, clearly perceiving the truth in every case, position and event, to use it in life, by which use it is not squandered, but increased for the possessor. It is truth becoming or already made practical. It is not a knowing much, but a unity of the knowledge of the truth, a unity referred to the kingdom of God, and hence the doing of the truth; Christian morality is true wisdom, it is of a thoroughly ethical nature, although it never renounces its intellectual character. It is the common bond of truth, love, freedom and rectitude. It takes notice of all, world and nature, the heart itself and men about it, sorrow and joy, circumstances and events, rights and duties, the past and future and present, and above all, what concerns the soul, God's word and counsel, and the course of His kingdom. It learns experience in all and gains a certain tact, which grows in clearness and confidence, so that it readily knows, what it ought to do and why, while at the same time it is willing and able to do it. Accordingly correct life and correct doctrine meet together in wisdom. Prudence is a natural gift; a child, an unsanctified man, may be prudent. It is only formal, mainly without regard to a definite object; you may be prudent in temporal, even in shameful things, as well as in Divine, eternal things; in the latter you ought to be or become so. Prudence is circumspection, insight, intelligence, discrimination, appreciation and estimation; wisdom applies it to what concerns God and the soul, to the department of practical ethics.

2. A principal trait of wisdom and Christian morality is the improvement of the time, in which it considers and effects what is eternal. Every moment of time is of value to it to be used for the eternal; it perceives the transitoriness of time, but hastens the more to use it as an opportunity, to improve it for eternity. Like a merchant, it makes traffic in time to gain in eternity. Every year, every greater or smaller portion of time, is viewed and treated with reference to the God-appointed duties, so that time appears as measured out eternity. Wisdom fears to destroy time, avoids mere pastime,* is unwilling merely to enjoy time, regarding it rather as a season, given of God's eternal grace, in which the power of body and soul bestowed by God, operates for the glory of His name and the soul's own salvation, so that from this no complaint or accusation arises.—Precisely the evil days, which continue as long as sin has power, it views as the set time and urgent occasion to wholesome improvement.

3. The two main points of view for wisdom are: Understanding of the Divine Will and active circumspection of spirit. The first is the everywhere valid and objectively given foundation of the Divine will, with which nothing that will be moral, Christian, wise, dare enter into opposition. All culture which lacks an intimate, lively regard for the will of God, is without wisdom also, hence foolish, despite all knowledge and clever character. The other however is sobriety. ETIER:—"Not only every passion, every merely sensuous pleasure, every dissipation leaving the heart unguarded and lost in the creature, every waste of time called pastime, even the most dutiful, sober 'business,' if it entirely absorbs, has in it something intoxicating; before all however is it the fanaticism of opinion, of error, which the devil will present to us in the most various mixtures, often under the most enticing appearance, out of the great intoxicating cup of the spirit of the age, 'of the power of the air' (Rev. xvii.)." Or one might present a gradation from the common intoxication with wine or brandy, to the "most spirited" form of a "lay-breviary."

[The particular precept must not be overlooked in the general application. EARIE well remarks: "There is in the vice of intemperance that kind of dissoluteness which brooks no restraint, which defies all efforts to reform it, and which sinks lower and lower into hopeless and helpless ruin. There are few vices out of which there is less hope of recovery—its haunts are so numerous and its hold is so tremendous." Especially when the craving opens the door to covetousness on the part of the dealer and manufacturer, so that the victim is poisoned as well as besotted. No wonder that such a tremendous evil has driven most philanthropists and Christians to the advocacy of forcible measures for its prevention. Still the remedy is not law, but gospel. And "the freedom of the gospel" should never become a yoke of bondage. The two apparently contradictory principles to be reconciled in Christian practice, are (Col. ii. 16): "Let no man judge you in eating or in drinking," and (Rom. xiv. 21): "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine," etc.—R.]

4. As a help to sobriety the Apostle sets forth first, the use in common of Christian hymns, which should be used, though not exclusively, in public service. In this the Psalms, as Scriptural songs, with their parallelisms, probably gave rise to antiphonal singing between minister and congregation, the songs of praise ("hymns"), as ecclesiastical songs to hypophonal singing, in which the congregation repeated the last line of the stanza sung by the choir, and the spiritual songs, as Christians, to symphonal singing. The Holy Ghost, who presides in the Church, wrought beyond the word of Scripture, made art in word and tone serviceable to the Church, exercising His power in connection with public service and even in social intercourse. So then beside the use in common there must also be a solitary digging into such poetical treasures and a private application of them. Further, every gift should be constantly esteemed, recognized and used accordingly. Finally however in humility every relation of subordination ordained by God is to be regarded and maintained unimpaired; social institutions are God's institutions.

[In regard to singing in public worship and social intercourse, ver. 19 plainly shows that other than the Old Testament Psalms were and may still be sung. There is no warrant in the word of God for the exclusion of all hymns composed since the canon of Scripture was closed. Such a view owes its origin to causes quite as much political as religious, and perhaps always more national and local than logical or theological. Still it must be said that this extreme is fostered by a proper antagonism to what is now admitted into the public and especially the social services of Christians. It were better to sing nothing else than the Psalms than to encourage the introduction into congregations of hymn-books, born, not of spiritual feeling, but of pecuniary greed. Especially is it unfortunate that the children in our Sunday Schools are taught bad taste in music, bad morals and worse doctrine by what they sing. The full effect of this mistake has not yet appeared. Comp. Colossians, p. 72.—"Christ is the centre of sacred art as well as of theology and religion. From Him music has drawn its highest inspiration. The hymns of Jesus are the Holy of holies in the temple of sacred poetry. From this sanctuary every doubt is banished; here the passions of sense, pride and unholy ambition give way to the tears of penitence, the joys of faith, the emotions of love, the aspirations of hope, the anticipations of heaven; here the dissensions of rival churches and theological schools are hushed into silence; here the hymnists of ancient, mediæval and modern times, from every section of Christendom, unite with one voice in the common adoration of a common Saviour. He is the theme of all ages, tongues, and creeds, the Divine harmony of all human discords, the solution of all the dark problems of life" (SCHAFF, Christ in Song, preface). To banish Christian hymns is to exclude from this Holy of holies, but to substitute for them unworthy, unspiritual, and unchristian rhymes is to profane it.—R.]

5. The principle, impulse and norm of all Christian morality, of the new, Divine life, is Jesus Christ, the Fulfiller of the Law and Divine Will; for He is "the manifestation of the willing Divinity and fulfilling humanity" (HARLESS, Christliche Ethik, p. 362). All other motives adulterate or counterfeit the new life.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The Christian has not like a philosopher first

* [What relaxation the body demands is certainly not forbidden by ver. 16. If any one thinks that he is better redeeming the opportunity by so overtaking his brain or his conscience either, as to die early or be laid upon a bed of sickness, or unfitted for duty by dyspepsia, melancholy or what not, he makes a great mistake. What God says so plainly in our frames is not to be overcome by seemingly pious principles; if it is, God punishes us.—R.]

to seek the truth; "as wise," he possesses it and must evidence it in his walk. With the philosopher all depends upon exactness and acuteness in the tide of his thoughts, with the Christian, however, upon his care in the course of his conduct; the former works out a system, the latter a fine character; the former will grow, while his forerunner decreases, the latter will decrease, but his forerunner must grow in him.—Christian wisdom as manifested in the acceptance and application of three proverbs: 1. Time is money! 2. Time gained, all gained! 3. Good fishing in troubled waters!—He who does not become wise in hard evil days, certainly remains a fool in good days.—It is just the evil days that you should not let pass by unimproved, for in the evil days of earthly life in this valley of tears we must gain for the good days in eternal life on God's throne.—The evil days are only the so-called bad weather so needed for the growth of the inner man and God's plants.—There are periodicals and books of all kinds, especially novels, which are like cups full of intoxicating wine, and instead of being bread, they should be burned like the books of magic in Ephesus (Acts xix. 19).—The house and household life should not be isolated from the Church and its services, especially its lovely, consolatory, precious hymns.—Thankfulness and humility are two principal emotions of a glad Christian heart: the former sees the gifts, which it has received from the Lord, the latter the duties He has appointed. Without serving love that Christian exaltation is not true, but a lie. The Christian must not ask; Who should minister to me, but: to whom should I minister?

STARKE: Foresight and wisdom belong to Christianity: not the cunning of this world, but the prudence of the righteous. It is like a bee, drawing honey from good and bad examples alike.—Redeem the time then, and give good heed to the blessed hours, when the Spirit of God knocks at thy heart. Many men are laden down with so much work in their avocation, that they often do not have the proper time for eating, still less for reading God's word, prayer, and other godly practices: it is especially necessary for these persons to forestall and even to steal time, that they may gain an occasional opportunity for spiritual exercises and collecting their heart before God; and besides this to accustom themselves to lift their heart to God in the midst of business, and to carry on the same in the fear of God.—The will of the Lord is our rule, to know and follow it is the greatest wisdom.—Wine is a good gift of God; but alas! all gifts of God are abused, and so is wine.—In one heart there may not dwell at the same time the fullness of the Spirit and the fullness of the world: God does not enter unless the creature retires thence.—Our Church has a rich treasure of spiritual songs ever increasing; it is a shame that they are so often sung without knowledge or thought.—Great benefits demand great thankfulness.—The fear of God is the bond, which should so unite all Christians together, that they submit to and serve one another.

RIEGER. The evil mixture of light and darkness with which so many are pleased, and in which they seek their wisdom, will, as folly, become their shame. In a wise walk every child of the light looks chiefly to himself and the keeping of his own way.—In the adapting one's self to the time, or redeeming the time, one looks to others also, how they are to be approached, or to be served, which is not the same in one case as in another.—Luxury in eating and drinking hinders true wisdom very much.

HEURNER: One can permit himself to be robbed of much time. Amici fures temporis. Redeeming the time is opposite of whiling away the time. It is a frivolous thought, that of regarding time as an evil. There is a great difference between the worldly wise and the Christian mode of making time profitable. The former seeks to gain as great a pecuniary advantage as possible out of circumstances of time; the Christian regards the pressure and the evil of the time as a means to spiritual gain, as an exercise to faith, and hence places himself in a spiritual attitude to the time; he is for example, prepared for great sacrifices, for privations, sorrows and afflictions, which he has to bear, for difficult duties, disturbances and the like. To the worldly man that time is evil, when his pleasure is interrupted or hindered by sickness, scarcity, &c. The Christian holds that for the evil time, when virtue decreases and is made more difficult for himself, when the good have much to suffer, and the enticements to faithfulness and apostasy are great.—There is also a great inward song, when at work, on a journey or a walk, &c. Such singing imparts a quiet, glad, godly tone to the spirit. Learn good hymns by heart therefore.—The Epistle for the 20th Sunday after Trinity; vers. 15-21: The Christian disposition—the best help in evil days. 1. It gives wisdom to understand and to use aright the evil days (vers. 15-17). 2. It gives us cheerful courage, aroused not by wild intoxication, but by God's Spirit, fitting us for proper reflection (vers. 18-20). 3. It teaches the willingness to serve one another in the right way (ver. 21).—The duty of the Christian, to adapt himself to the time. 1. What it requires? a) Wisdom which bears unavoidable evil as of God's sending, not murmuring, nor resisting, nor walking uncircumspectly therein. b) Wholesome use of it for the soul's benefit. 2. Means: a) Knowledge of the Divine Will, of the purposes of Divine Providence and of our salvation. b) Religious inspiration and meditation. 3. The blessing: a) For us; all must serve for our profit, that we give God thanks: b) For others, that we serve and help them.

PASSAVANT: It is no easy matter to set the right bounds to our joys; one drop follows another, pleasure entices to sensuality, joyousness to wantonness, forgetfulness to intoxication.—We must give thanks for every gratification even the smallest, which we enjoy from our Heavenly Father through Christ; for every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places and possessions. Whoever understands this, knows how to give thanks to the great Giver for every temporal and earthly good also, even the least.

STIER: The walk of a Christian to his goal is a worthy, exact, correct walking; only thus does he find and follow his path. In continuously increasing exactness and strictness as respects our disposition and conduct, we grow out of folly into complete wisdom.—To gain the time is something other than to gain time.—To seek and to use opportunities, to make a prudent choice of the point of time, to esteem time and be busy accordingly, to use prudently and circumspectly the time with its circumstances, this is the meaning of redeeming the time.—The special public service should not and must not be something altogether sundered from the private life of the Church.—The ministry must always reach the spirit, lay the foundation anew; but the congregation comes in with its praying, responding, singing, praising.—The thankful taking and returning of God's grace is itself true gracefulness.—The root of all apostasy and disobedience is ingratitude.

On the Epistle for the 20th Sunday after Trinity (Eph. v. 15-21): Gesetz und Zeugnis, 1862 [a German theological periodical]: How does the wisdom of the Christian display itself in walk? 1. In a circumspect walk (strait gate, narrow is the way; the days are evil). 2. In an industrious use of the means of grace (the Lutheran Church, the triumphing one, with large capital of the Holy Ghost). 3. In humble conduct. (As the most worthy proof of reason is in sobriety, and the greatest blessedness of a correct walk is shown in a life full of thanksgiving, so in various forms of submission the most delicate tact of this life appears. Thus are added the noblest limitations of life and the purest and most considerate forbearance in all relations.—LÖHE.)

BRANDT: Earnest demands of the gospel in an evil time. 1. It is a time of ignorance respecting Divine things, and it calls out to us in ver. 17. 2. It is a time of the dominion of disorderly lusts and propensities, and we are warned as in ver. 18. 3. It is a time of ecclesiastical lukewarmness, and enforces the precept of vers. 19, 20. 4. A time of restless excitement, saying to us as in ver. 21.

RAUTENBERG. The prudence of the children of God in the evil time. 1. They secure to themselves a free hand, to seek their safety—amid all the power of the evil time; 2. An open ear for God's will—amid all self-will of the evil time; 3. A well-prepared heart for the gift of the Holy Ghost—amid all the carnal mind of the evil time, a joyful spirit in the Lord—amid all the complaints of the evil time. STAUDT: The life of the new man 1) in foresight, 2) insight, 3) penetration (Durchsicht).

PRÖHLE: Rules of Christian practical wisdom. 1. Prudent foresight. 2. Earnest respect. 3. Pious insight. 4. Moderation in pleasure. 5. Practice in sacred song. 6. Constant thanks to God. 7. Due subordination.—Become full of the Spirit! 1. Full of the Spirit. 2. Full.

[EADIE: Ver. 15. Wisdom and not mere intelligence was to characterize them; that wisdom which preserves in rectitude, guides amidst temptations, and affords a lesson of consistency to surrounding spectators.—It is a strange infatuation to be obliged in pointing others to heaven, to point over one's shoulder.—Ver. 18. Drunkenness was indeed an epidemic in those times and lands. Plato boasts of the immense quantities of liquor which Socrates could swill uninjured; and the philosopher Xenocrates got a golden crown from Dionysius for swallowing a gallon at a draught.—It is a sensation of want—a desire to fly from himself, a craving after something which is felt to be out of reach, eager and restless thirst to enjoy, if at all possible, some happiness and enlargement of heart—that usually leads to intemperance. But the Spirit fills Christians, and gives them all the elements of cheerfulness and peace; genuine, elevation and mental freedom; superiority to all depressing influences; and refined and permanent enjoyment.—Ver. 19. Mere music is but an empty sound; for compass of voice, graceful execution, and thrilling notes are a vain offering in themselves.—Ver. 20. So many and so salutary are the lessons imparted by chastisement—so much mercy is mingled up in all their trials—so many proofs are experienced of God's staying "his rough wind in the day of His east wind," that the saints will not hang their harps on the willows, but engage in earnest and blessed minstrelsy.—Ver. 21. This Christian virtue is not cringing obsequiousness; and while it stands opposed to rude and dictatorial insolence, and to that selfish preference for our opinion and position which amounts to a claim of infallibility, it is not inconsistent with that honest independence of disposition and sentiment which every rational and responsible being must exercise. It lays the foundation also, as is seen in the following context for the discharge of relative duty,—it should be seen to develop itself in all the relations of domestic life.—SCHENKEL: The duty of subordination in the Christian Church: 1. It rests on the recognition of natural and historical distinctions, ordained by God Himself; 2. It has its pattern in the relation of believers to Christ, which is not one of servile fear, but of moral reverence.—R.]

CHAP. V. 22-VI. 9.

Wives and husbands.

(CHAP. V. 22-33.)

22 Wives, submit yourselves¹ unto [to] your own husbands, as unto [to] the Lord.
 23 For the husband is the head of the [Because a² husband is head of his] wife, even as Christ is the head [as Christ also is head] of the church: [,] and he is [himself
 24 omitting and he is]³ the Saviour of the body. Therefore, [Nevertheless]⁴ as the church is subject unto [to] Christ, so let the wives [also] be to their own [omit
 25 own]⁵ husbands in every thing. Husbands, love your⁶ wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself [up] for it: That he might sanctify [it,] and cleanse [cleansing] it with the washing [laver] of [the] water by [in] the word, 27 That he might present it to himself a glorious church [That he might himself⁷ present to himself the church glorious], not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should [might] be holy and without blemish. So [Thus] ought men [husbands also]⁸ to love their [own] wives as their own bodies. He that [who] loveth his [own] wife loveth himself. For no man ever yet hated [no one ever hated] his own flesh; but nourisheth it, even as the Lord [Christ⁹ also doth] the church: For [Because] we are members of his body, [being]¹⁰ of his flesh, and of his bones. For this cause shall a man leave his [omit his]¹¹ father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife,¹² and they [the] two shall be one flesh. This is a great mystery [This mystery is a great one]; but I speak concerning [I say it in regard to]¹³ Christ and the church. Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular [Ye also severally, let each one] so love his [own] wife even [omit even] as himself; and [let] the wife see that she reverence her husband.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 22.—[The Rec., with K. L., many versions (Chrysostom, Scholz) inserts ὑποτάσσεσθε after ἀνδράσιν, while in D. E. F. G., Syriac it is placed after γυναῖκες. Lachmann accepts ὑποτάσσουσιν after ἀνδράσιν on the authority of N. A., 10 cursives, Vulgate, other versions, some fathers. B. omits the verb altogether, and this reading is accepted by Tischendorf. Harless, Meyer, De Wette, Alford, Ellcott and recent editors. While one uncial manuscript would not be decisive for the omission, the variations in form and position suggest an interpolation, (comp. Col. iii. 18) and when to this is added the testimony of Jerome, who asserts that there was nothing in the Greek MSS. to correspond with his subditę sint remarking that it was less necessary in Greek than in Latin, the evidence is conclusive. Still we must supply the verb in English.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 28.—[There is a doubt as to the correct order as well in regard to the reading. Kai is omitted in the Rec., N. K. L., nearly all cursives, fathers and versions (Ellcott), but found in A. B. D. F., very good versions, and generally accepted since Lachmann.—The verb ἐκείνουσιν comes first in N. B. K. L. and other authorities (Alford, Ellcott), but Lachmann, Meyer, Kadie, Braune and most put it after ἀνδρες, with A. D. F., good versions, fathers. The longer, noninverted reading: καὶ οἱ ἄνδρες ἐκείνουσιν is perhaps preferable.—The inversion of the E. V. need not be altered however

Husbands is more correct here, though in the older English man meant husband also, as in Greek and German, a philological fact not without interest in the exegesis of this paragraph.—⁹ \aleph^1 has $\tau\epsilon\kappa\epsilon\alpha$ instead of $\sigma\omega\mu\alpha\tau\alpha$, but it is correct.—The E. V. omits own twice, apparently for the sake of elegance, but improperly since the emphasis is thus lost.—[R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 30.—[Lachmann, on the authority of \aleph^1 A. B., good cursives, a few versions and fathers, omit $\epsilon\kappa\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \sigma\alpha\rho\kappa\omicron\varsigma\text{—}\delta\omicron\sigma\tau\epsilon\omega\nu\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon$. Alford brackets them. They are found in \aleph^3 D. E. F. G. K. L., nearly all cursives, versions and fathers; accepted by Tischendorf (ed. 7), Harless, Meyer, Eadio, Ellcott, Wordsworth. The recurrence of $\alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon$ would readily occasion the omission, while the citation is not exact enough to suggest an interpolation from the LXX.—We must insert being, to avoid the connection: members of his flesh, which the E. V. suggests.—R.]

¹³ Ver. 33.—[Lachmann and Alford bracket $\epsilon\iota\varsigma$, but the external authority (B. K., a few cursives) against it is slight, and it might have been omitted because not understood.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

To WIVES; vers. 22-24. a. The exhortation, ver. 22; b. The basis of it, vers. 23, 24.

Ver. 22. The exhortation. Wives, submit yourselves to your own husbands, αἱ γυναῖκες τοῖς ἰδίοις ἀνδράσιν.—This section with its particular duties is so closely connected to the last sentence: "submitting yourselves one to another," with its general duties, that the form is thus abbreviated. Accordingly the verb to be supplied should be imperative, as in some of the various readings, as is required also by the arrangement of the section itself (vers. 25, 28, 33). BENGEL Inferiores priore loco ponuntur, deinde superiores 25, vi. 1, 4, 5, 9; 1 Pet. iii. 1, quia propositio est de subjectione: et inferiores debent officium facere, qualescunque sunt superiores. Multi etiam ex inferioribus fiunt superiores: et qui bene subest, bene preest. The term ἰδιος is almost invariably joined with "husbands" in the New Testament (Tit. ii. 5, 17; 1 Pet. iii. 1, 5; 1 Cor. vii. 2: τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα—τὸν ἰδιον ἄνδρα: xiv. 35). We even find ἰδιος ἀντρων προφῆτης (Tit. i. 12) marking in addition to the "their," that no strange (antithesis: ἰδιος) one is to be thought of. From this it follows that ὁ ἰδιος ἀνὴρ is not simply=husband (HARLESS), nor ἰδιος=ἑαυτοῦ, αὐτοῦ (WINER, p. 145). It has elsewhere its definite meaning=proprius, as WINER admits in regard to many passages, and the Apostle had in this one precept of obedience for the wife a good and sufficient reason for defining the husband with ἰδιος; this justifies the sharpening by which the command appears a natural one.* At the same time it points to the fact, that the wife is found to the husband in another way than he to her. She has here her calling, the avocation of the husband extends further. It is also to be noticed with BENGEL: Mulieres obsequi debent suis maritis, etiamsi alibi meliora viderentur consilia. See Doctr. Notes.

As to the Lord, ὡς τῷ κυρίῳ.—The singular requires according to the context a reference to Christ (vi. 1, 5, 6, 7), and "as" marks a reality; behind the husband stands the Lord Himself. Thus the obedience is characterized. The obedience is to be rendered not to the husband as man, but as "own husband" in and by whose person the Lord is honored who has established the relation, whom the husband himself must obey.* Hence it is not the husband as lord (THOM. AQUINAS, SEMLER and others).

The basis of the exhortation; vers. 23, 24.

Ver. 23. Because a husband is head of his wife ὅτι ἀνὴρ ἐστὶ κεφαλὴ τῆς γυναῖκος.—The foundation of the exhortation is introduced by ὅτι, "because." Ἀνὴρ, "husband," without the article, designates generally every husband,† who as such is "head" of the definite wife, chosen and won by him (τῆς γυναῖκος). The position of the husband is thus marked as of an organizing, managing, controlling and deciding character, which is further set forth by the comparison immediately following:

As Christ also is head of the Church—Ὡς καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς places Him as parallel with the husband (ii. 3; iv. 17). On "head of the Church," see i. 22; iv. 15. The wife and the Church are thus placed as parallels.

Himself the Saviour of the body.—This distinguishes Christ from the husband. Αὐτός emphasizes Christ: He and none other. Σωτὴρ τοῦ σώματος, Saviour of the body, the Church, is He and He alone. It is thus explanatory of "Christ," marking His peculiar dignity, and not in apposition to "head." This is not applicable to the husband as respects the wife; for him also Christ is the Redeemer. [ALFORD thus expands the Apostle's thought: "In Christ's case the Headship is united with, may gained by, His having saved the body in the process of Redemption: so that I am not alleging Christ's Headship as one entirely identical with that other, for He has a claim to it and office in it peculiar to Himself." So most.—R.] It is incorrect to take this as referring to the man also, in order thereby to remind husbands that they should make their wives happy (ERASMUS, HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, II. 2, p. 133, and others); that thought belongs to the other part

* [Ellcott: "Viewed in its simplest grammatical sense as the pronoun of the relative, the meaning would seem to be, 'yield that obedience to your husbands which you yield to Christ.' As, however, the immediate context and still more the general current of the passage (comp. ver. 32) represent marriage in its typical aspect, ὡς will seem far more naturally to refer to the aspect under which the obedience is to be regarded ('quasi Christo ipsimet, cuius locum et personam viri representant,' Corn. a Lap.), than to describe the nature of it (Eadie), or the manner (De Wette) in which it is to be tendered. Still less probable is a reference merely to the similarity between the duties of the wife to the husband and the Church to Christ, as this interpretation would clearly require ὡς ἡ ἐκκλ. τῷ Κυρ.: See Meyer.—R.]

† [Or better "a husband," as an example of the class, ὁ ἄνθρωπος would be "every husband" in each case, every one of the class (see WINER, p. 113): but the article with γυναῖκος means "his" in this case.—R.]

* ["The duty of submission is plainly based on that tenderness, specialty, or exclusiveness of relationship which ἰδιος implies" (EADIE). So ALFORD, ELLCOTT, following BENGEL and MEYER, against DE WETTE, HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN.—R.] of the exhortation (ver. 25 ff.) and would weaken the notion of σωτήρ very much. STIER is over-refined in discovering in σωτήρ—σῶμα an etymological allusion, as Phil. iii. 20, 21.

Ver. 24. Nevertheless as the Church is subject to Christ, ἀλλὰ ὡς ἡ ἐκκλησία ὑποτάσσεται τῷ Χριστῷ.—“Nevertheless,” in spite of the difference between Christ and the husband, the resemblance between the Church and the wife remains. Hence the participle is adversative: habet quidem id peculiare Christus, quod est, est servator ecclesie, nihilominus sciant mulieres, sibi maritos præesse, Christi exemplo, utcumque pari gratia non pollant (CALVIN, BENGE and others).^{*} It is accordingly neither syllogistic=ὅστε, οὖν (BEZA [E. V.] and others), nor continuative=δέ (WINER, p. 420), nor resumptive=inquam (HARLESS).

So let the wives also be to their husbands [οὕτως καὶ αἱ γυναῖκες τοῖς ἀνδράσιν].—The οὕτως καὶ strongly marks the analogy. The verb is to be supplied as in ver. 22. The emphasis rests on the final words: in everything, ἐν παντί (1 Cor. i. 5)=κατὰ πάντα (Col. iii. 20, 22). From such a command we are not to infer that the reference is to Christian wedlock (HARLESS); this must indeed also be thoroughly correct. Neither the one (1 Cor. vii. 12-17) nor the other is to be accepted. “In everything” is limited by the context to that which the husband as such commands and which the wife as such has to do, but in neither contrary to the Lord. [HODGE: “It teaches its extent, not its degree. It extends over all departments, but is limited in all,—first, by the nature of the relation; and secondly, by the higher authority of God.”—R.]

TO HUSBANDS; vers. 25-31. a. The exhortation, vers. 25-28; b. The basis of it, vers. 29-31.

Ver. 25. Husbands, love your wives, οἱ ἄνδρες, ἀγαπᾶτε τὰς γυναῖκας ἑαυτῶν. [See Textual Note 6].—Thus the husbands are exhorted, but a closer definition follows: Even as Christ also loved the Church.—Καθὼς καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς places the husbands in emphatic parallelism with Him, and the wives with the Church (τὴν ἐκκλησίαν). Si omnia rhetorum argumenta in unum conficiat, non tam persuaseris conjugibus dilectionem mutuum quam hic Paulus (BUGENHAGEN). [Comp. the apt quotation from THEOPHYLACT in ELLICOTT, and the beautiful remarks of CHRYSOSTOM, cited at length by ALFORD in loco.—R.] Ἦγάπησεν, “loved” (John xiii. 34; xv. 12; 1 John ii. 8; iii. 14) is more closely defined by proof of fact.

And gave himself up for it, † καὶ ἑαυτὸν παρέδωκεν ὑπὲρ αὐτῆς (ver. 2).—Here also we should not supply in thought: unto death

(MEYER), if by that is meant only the death on the cross; the reference is to the entire suffering including the last act as the extreme point. Thus the love required of the husband, a love self-devoting even unto death, gains a significant depth, while there still remains something important which is incomparable: Christ first created the Church through love, as His love made a reconciliation of the world with God, redemption from sin, and death, eternal life and salvation.

Vers. 26, 27. The end of the self-sacrificing love of Christ.

Ver. 26. That he might sanctify it.—ἵνα defines the end: αὐτὴν ἁγιάσῃ. There is here indicated a continued action and dealing towards and upon the Church, the result of which is expressed in ver. 27 (“that it should be holy and without blemish”); it is the positive activity, effecting the ethical form and demeanor which is well-pleasing to God. It is not merely segregare et sibi consecrare (CALVIN [EADIE, but not to the exclusion of the idea of sanctification as a result.—R.] and others). The modality is set forth in the participial clause: Cleansing it.—Καθαρίσας, as in i. 9, 13. This indicates the negative activity directed against the evil which is to be removed; both, the positive and the negative, advance together and undivided. Hence it is not: after he cleansed it (OLSHAUSEN, MEYER and others),^{*} nor, as though it were complete in a moment: and has cleansed it (LUTHER). It continues: it is not a single member of the Church that is spoken of, but the totality of Christians. By what means then is the Church cleansed from sin?

With the laver of the water, τῷ λούτρῳ τοῦ ὕδατος.—Unquestionably this means baptism; the readers must have thus understood it (HARLESS); insigne testimonium de baptismo (BENGEL). The article (τῷ) denotes something well known; besides ὕδατος and the connection with καθαρίσας. Comp. Tit. iii. 5; 1 Cor. vi. 11; Heb. x. 23; Acts x. 47; xxii. 16. But the water does not give the cleansing which is spoken of, nor the bathing or washing. It is the baptism, not the bath in the water. Hence there is further added: in the word, ἐν ῥήματι, in order to designate Christian baptism as to its essence. The notion of baptism, as a means of cleansing beside the sanctifying (see Doctr. Notes 5, 6), as well as the position of this phrase require us to take both together, and the usage respecting the word ῥῆμα and the connection by means of ἐν (like vi. 2: ἐνὸς ἐν ἐπαγγελίᾳ) admit of this. Paul uses ῥῆμα (ver. 17; Rom. x. 8, 17; 2 Cor. xii. 4; comp. Heb. i. 3; xi. 3; 1

^{*}[This view is simple, grammatical and introduces neither a truism (EADIE), nor an unnecessary limitation (WINER). It is accepted by ALFORD, ELLICOTT, HODGE and others. EADIE supposes an ellipsis, which is very objectionable. ALFORD: “But what I do say is, that thus far the two Headships are to be regarded as identical, in the subjection of the body to the Head.” Nevertheless is on the whole the best rendering of ἀλλὰ.—R.]

†[It would be more literal and perhaps better accordant with the comparison to substitute the feminine pronoun (her, she) for “it” in vers. 26, 27, but our language is very stiff in its rules for gender.—R.]

^{*}[Grammatically the participle may indicate either an act antecedent to or synchronous with that of the leading verb, either having cleansed or cleansing. The former is the view accepted by ELLICOTT, ALFORD, EADIE and HODGE, mainly on doctrinal or logical grounds derived from the reference to baptism which immediately follows.—R.]

†[This word occurs only here and in Tit. iii. 5. It means not “washing,” but “laver,” (lavacrum, Valgate); comp. ELLICOTT in loco. Dr HODGE is scarcely justified therefore in finding an argument in favor of a particular mode of baptism in our phrase, which does not mean: a washing with water, as he implies. The allusion to the bride’s bath before marriage is accepted by EADIE, and most.—R.]

Pet. i. 25) in a similar manner. [In all cases it refers directly or indirectly towards proceeding ultimately or immediately from God (ELLCOTT).—R.] The conjunction of καθαρός, ὕδαρ, λόγος, John xiii. 10; xv. 3, is well known. "The washing of water" takes place "in word," consists essentially therein, hence the reference to God's Word in general, and in particular to the name of the triune God and His promise. [ALFORD is quite correct in referring it to "the preached word of faith (Rom. x. 8), of which confession is made in baptism, and which carries the real cleansing (John xv. 3; xvii. 17) and regenerating power (1 Pet. i. 23; iii. 21)—so Augustine Tract. 80 in Joan. 3, vol. iii. p. 1840, Migne; where these memorable works occur, 'Detrahe verbum, et quid est aqua nisi aqua? Accedit verbum ad elementum, et fit sacramentum, etiam ipsum tanquam visibile verbum.'"] So substantially EADIE, ELLICOTT, HODGE and others. Comp. Doctr. Notes.—R.]

Hence it is incorrect to take ἐν ῥήματι, ἵνα as a Hebraism—to the end thereby (KOPPE and others), or as formula baptizandi (GREEK FATHERS, SCHOLASTICS and others). Nor is it to be joined with καθαρίσας (BENGEL, HARLESS, HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, II. 2, p. 135, who takes it as the word Matt. viii. 3: καθαρίσθητε), which would then have two means by the side of each other, or with ἀγίαση (JEROME, WINER, p. 130, MEYER and others), for in that case it would of necessity have been immediately subjoined. [The connection with the participle is defended by EADIE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT (who more exactly suggests: "rather with the whole expression"). The absence of the article is strongly opposed to Braune's view, while the participle might well have two added qualifications, one an instrumental dative and the other specifying with ἐν "the necessary accompaniment" (ELLCOTT). "Thus the word, preached and received, is the conditional element of purification,—the real water of spiritual baptism;—that wherein and whereby alone the efficiency of baptism is conveyed" (ALFORD).—R.]

Ver. 27. That he might himself present to himself the Church glorious, ἵνα παραστήσῃ αὐτὸς ἐαυτῷ ἐνδοξον τὴν ἐκκλησίαν.—This second ἵνα depends on ἀγίαση, the end and aim of which it introduces: "He might himself present," etc. He and none other (αὐτός), without the co-operation of others for Himself (ἐαυτῷ)* and not for others, the world or anything else, to His own good-pleasure presents the Church gloriously. The figure (παραστήσας) is taken, as in 2 Cor. xi. 2, from the adorning of a bride; hence the emphatically placed ἐνδοξον, which in 1 Cor. iv. 10 is the antithesis of αἴτιμος, is like Luke vii. 25 (ἐν ἡμετέροις) to be applied to the glorious appearance, so that the Church thus appears "worthy of the calling" (iv. 1), or "of the Lord" (Col. i. 10), "of God" (1 Thess. ii. 12; 3 John 6), respondet idee sue eternae (BENGEL). The result of the ἀγιάζειν is the δοξάζειν, both belong together:

* [More literally and correctly "to Himself," He alone presents, He receives (ELLCOTT).—R.]

sanctitas est gloria interior, gloria est sanctitas emicans (BENGEL)*.

The second clause beginning with ἵνα is not to be placed as parallel to the first, nor is the figure of an offering to be substituted for that of adorning (HARLESS). But it is to be maintained, that this state of things for the Church is not attained in this life (RUDELACH), while at the same time we may say with BENGEL: (id valet suo modo jam de hac vita). The vital process in the individual and in the whole is indeed that of a development from seed to harvest, is not complete at one stroke, has its stadia and phases. The consummation is really only at the conclusion (Second Advent). [So ALFORD, EADIE and most. HODGE has a full note on the question.—R.]

Not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, μὴ ἔχουσιν στίλον ἢ ῥυτίδα ἢ τι τοιοῦτον.—Thus the Apostle describes more clearly ἐνδοξον.—Σπῖλος † (2 Pet. ii. 13; comp. Jude 12), parallel to μῶμος, designates what clings to her from without, spot and stain, what is loathsome, the remains of the previous walk and conversation; ῥυτίς, wrinkle, refers to internal emotions, which fix themselves in the countenance, and disfigure the face as it grows old. Other antitheses, as those of GROTIUS (the former applying to carere vitio, the latter to vegetos semper esse, to what is good) are not justified by the language. The final phrase negatives the least spot or wrinkle or even what is similar, hence in general what can disfigure. ["The terms are taken from physical beauty, health, and symmetry, to denote spiritual perfection" (EADIE).—R.]

But that it might be, ἀλλ' ἵνα ἡ instead of ἀλλ' οὖσαν, in accordance with the liveliness of the Greek, who liked the transition from the participle into the finite verb. WINER, p. 537. This ἵνα is parallel to the second one at the beginning of this verse. [Hence "might" must be substituted for "should" (E. V.), to indicate the parallelism.—R.] The final end of the sanctifying is the being holy and without blemish. ‡—To the "wrinkle" proceeding from within the "holy" corresponds, to the external "spot" μῶμος, "without blemish" (i. 4).

Ver. 28. Thus, οὕτως, points emphatically to what precedes, on which account HARLESS (with ESTIUS: digressus nonnihil ad mysterium, nunc ad institutum redit) incorrectly excludes the definite comparison for wedded life, as though it were inappropriate, when only prudence, moderation are commanded. It is not to be referred to the following ὡς (B-CRUSIUS). [So ALFORD. But ELLICOTT, EADIE and HODGE agree with

* [ELLCOTT: "The Church glorious; the tertiary predicate ἐνδοξον (Donaldson, Gr. § 489) being placed emphatically forward and receiving its further explanation from the participial clause which follows." The reading of the Rec., giving αὐτῇ as the direct object of the verb, necessarily led to the obscuration of the force of the word, disturbing the grammatical structure by making τὴν ἐκκλησίαν the tertiary predicate.—R.]

† [The German editors and commentators (TISCHENDORF and MEYER, BRAUNE also) accent this word: σπῖλος, but EADIE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT adopt: σπῖλος. The iota is short apparently, hence the latter is correct. The word belongs to later Greek.—R.]

‡ ["Blameless" (ELLCOTT, ALFORD); but "without blemish" retains the etymological reference, thus according better with the figurative current of the verse.—R.]

Braune, in referring οὕτως to what precedes, i. e., "thus, in like manner as Christ," while ὡς indicates not the measure, but a fact, "as they are," etc.—R.]

Ought husbands to love their own wives [καὶ οἱ ἄνδρες ὀφείλουσιν ἀγαπᾶν τὰς ἑαυτῶν γυναῖκας].—The comparison with Christ is now especially denoted by καὶ before οἱ ἄνδρες. ὀφείλουσιν presupposes a command for this, the "new commandment" (see ver. 25), which corresponds with nature, as God has ordained it,* and, applying to fraternal fellowship, is then certainly valid for marital fellowship, as is indicated by the next phrase which introduces a motive: as their own bodies, ὡς τὰ ἑαυτῶν σώματα.—Here ὡς is evidently a designation of a reality, corresponding to the figure, that the man is the head of the wife (ver. 23; 1 Cor. xi. 3). [See EADIE for a lucid statement of the correct view respecting this participle.—R.] It is not comparative (GROTIUS), hence not—as themselves.

The result of the view that the husband is the head of the wife, while the wife is the body of the husband, as the Church is Christ's body is this thought: He who loveth his own wife loveth himself, ὁ ἀγαπῶν τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα, ἑαυτὸν ἀγαπᾷ.—Comp. ver. 33. On this general proposition what follows rests.

The basis of the exhortation; vers. 29-31.

Ver. 29. For no one ever hated his own flesh, οὐδεὶς γάρ ποτε τὴν ἑαυτοῦ σάρκα ἐμίσησεν.—The ground which follows is introduced by γάρ.† In the first place a general fact is negatively expressed. "No man ever" is not limited; not even nisi scilicet a natura et a se ipso desciscat (BENGEL). For all "unsparingness of the body" (Col. ii. 22) rests on self-deception. If he actually injures himself, it cannot even then be said that he "hateth his own flesh." Paul did not choose σῶμα here, because he already had in mind the quotation (ver. 31), which refers to the institution of marriage in Paradise before the fall; there as here all that is sinful is excluded from the σὰρξ, which is not of itself subject to sin. Μισεῖν is chosen, because the disposition is spoken of; it is to be understood like 1 John iii. 15. GROTIUS aptly recalls CURTIUS, vii.: corporibus nostris, quæ utique non odimus; SENECA, ep. 14: fateor inisam esse corporis nostri caritatem; De Clem. 1, 5: Si quod adhuc collegitur, unum republice tuæ, illa corpus tuum, vides, ut puto, quam necessaria clementia sit. Tibi enim parcis, quoniam videris alteri parcere. Comp. Prov. xi. 15, 17.

But nourisheth and cherisheth it [ἀλλ' ἐκτρέφει καὶ θάλπει αὐτήν].—Ἀλλὰ naturally takes out of οὐδεὶς the subject ἕκαστος,

* [From this passage Dr. HODGE correctly infers the falsity of the Hopkinsian view that all love and all holiness is disinterested benevolence, proportioned to the capacity of its object. We do love ourselves, and our bodies, and it is not only natural, but according to Scripture so to do.—R.]

† [The whole tenor of the argument is thus stated by ELLICOTT: "Men ought to love their wives as Christ loves His Church, as being in fact (I might add) their own (ἑαυτῶν) bodies; yes, I say the man who loves his wife loves himself (ἑαυτὸν); for if he hated her he would hate (according to the axiom in ver. 28) his own flesh, whereas on the contrary, unless he acts against nature, he nourishes it, even as (to urge the comparison again) Christ nourishes His Church."—R.] each one. The first verb, the strengthened τρέφειν, refers to the growing development brought about through nourishment (MEYER); it occurs only here and in vi. 4. The second verb (only here and 1 Thess. ii. 7) is stronger than θερμαίνειν (Jas. ii. 16) which is also more general, and denotes the warming upon and with one's self; hence it is used of brooding, Deut. xxii. 6 (LXX.); it is more than fovet (Vulgate), pfllegt (LUTHER). The two expressions are distinguished by BENGEL so far correctly that he remarks on the former intus, on the latter ad extra, but he is faulty in thinking of victus in connection with the former, amictus with the latter. The one refers to the strengthening food, renewing the life, the other to the protection and preservation of the life. HARLESS incorrectly denies any distinction, taking both as descriptive of maternal love.

Even as Christ also doth the Church [καθὼς καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν].—What is of universal validity within the sphere of creation, is found also in the Redeemer as respects His Church (He nourishes and cherishes it). STIER applies it to the Lord's Supper, which is indeed not to be excluded, thinking that after the nasci in the baptism (ver. 26) the pasci is here spoken of. It is more natural to remember how Christ calls Himself the bread of life (John vi. 48, 51), which "nourishes," not in the Lord's Supper alone, even though it takes place there in its most full and intense form, and also that He compares Himself to a hen (Matt. xxiii. 37) that covereth with her wings, thus protecting and cherishing (θάλπει) at the same time. GROTIUS (nutrit eam verbo et spiritu, vestit virtutibus) is correct only in the first part of his comment. Evidently the spheres of Creation and Redemption do not fall outside each other; the former finds in the latter its restoration and consummation, the latter in the former its basis and point of connection. What is unnatural is unchristian.

Ver. 30 proves the action of Christ to His Church through her intimate union with Him:

Because we are members of his body [ὅτι μέλη ἐσμὲν τοῦ σώματος αὐτοῦ].—"Because" connects with the foregoing thought: He nourisheth and cherisheth the Church. The Church is now the subject, which inheres in ἐσμὲν. Every individual is so, as the plural indicates. The Church as a whole as also individually, the members of the Church are then "members of His body." Here τὸ σῶμα αὐτοῦ is evidently—ὁ Χριστός (1 Cor. vi. 15; xii. 27), on which account BENGEL is correct in saying: corpus hic dicitur non ecclesia, quæ continetur in subjecto "sumus," sed corpus ipsius Christi; hence this is entirely like 1 Cor. x. 16 (STIER). The membership, which is designated by the emphatically placed μέλη, and which is conceived of as existing in the word ἐσμὲν, is designed to mark Christendom and Christians as "integral parts of His body" (MEYER). A closer definition follows.

Being of his flesh and of his bones, ἐκ τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐκ τῶν ὀστέων αὐτοῦ.—First of all the repeated preposition must be noticed, marking as it does the origin and the appertaining to. The phrase denotes the personality and corporeality of Christ, in which the Church with her members originates. The connection with and origin from Christ, from the historical, incarnate Christ, from His personal body, is designated in such a way, that we as well as the whole Church are to be regarded as His production and possession; and this is expressed with the Scripture passage, or at least with a reminiscence of the passage, which refers to the creation of the woman out of the first Adam in Paradise (Gen. ii. 23: LXX: τοῦτο νῦν ὁσὸν ἐκ τῶν ὀστέων μου, καὶ σὰρξ ἐκ τῆς σαρκὸς μου), because Christ is the second Adam (1 Cor. xv. 45, 47; comp. 1 Tim. ii. 13), and the Church, as well as each of its members, is a creation (1 Cor. v. 19). Comp. the parable of the Vine and the branches (John xv. 1 ff.). Our life in Christ proceeds in its inmost nature from holiness, is really strengthened from Him, and affects the resurrection body.

Accordingly it is inappropriate to think only of the close union of Christ with us (KOPPE), or the identity of our nature with His (LATIN FATHERS), or only of spiritual origin (GREEK FATHERS, ERASMUS, CALOVIVS, HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, II., 2, p. 137, MEYER and others), or only of the death of the cross (GROTIUS: ex carne ejus et ossibus cruci adfixis, i. e., ex passione ejus prædicata et credita ortum habuit ecclesia; SCHENKEL, who refers to ver. 24), or the Lord's Supper (KAHNIS, HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN, STIER and others), or the glorified body (GESS: Christi Person, p. 274 ff.). BENDEL, who is followed, up to a certain point, by STIER, since he also finds in the creation of the woman out of Adam a type of the creation of the Church out of Christ, must be regarded as fanciful despite the several apt remarks he makes: Moses ossa prius, Paulus carnem prius nominat; naturalem quippe structuram, de qua ille, ossa potissimum sustinent; ut in nova creatioe caro Christi magis consideratur. Porro Moses plenius loquitur; Paulus omittit quæ ad propositum non æque pertinent. Non ossa et caro nostra, sed nos spiritualiter (STIER: via spiritualiter in corporationem vergente) propagamur ex humanitate Christi, carnem et ossa habente. RUECKERT is altogether perverted in his notion that the Apostle himself had no definite idea in his mind; if he waives an explanation of the passage, so he must waive first of all his own explanation.

[In agreement with the view of Braune, in the main, the following statement is appended. The Apostle here asserts a state (ἐσμεν) of Christians, originating from Christ (ἐκ), analogous to the physical derivation of Eve from Adam and the consequent union subsequently between them. The direct reference to every nuptial union (EADIE) does not accord with the preposition or the immediate allusion. This is the mystical relation, implying as Hodge well contends, something more than that we derive our spiritual life from Christ, as Eve her spiritual life from Adam (ELLCOTT, ALFORD, following MEYER), since the peculiar language seems to involve more; and something else than that we are partakers of the substance of Christ's body, as Eve was formed out of the substance of Adam's body (CALVIN, and with various modifications most strong sacramentalists), a view which tends to materialistic conceptions of the union, and, in attempting to explain one acknowledged mystery, creates confusion instead of clearness. This middle position accepts a connection with Him, "not simply and generally by a spiritual union, but in some close and derivative way, which the Apostle calls a mystery" (EADIE), leaving the matter there. As regards the secondary application to the Sacraments, which ELLCOTT and WORDSWORTH (with many German commentators) accept, it may be remarked, that these undoubtedly constitute signs and seals, and in a certain sense means of maintaining this union, but this passage, which speaks not of "body and blood," but of "flesh and bones," does not distinctly refer to these, so that nothing can be deduced from it in regard to the communication with Christ's glorified, or transmuted, body in the Lord's Supper. Comp. the full, clear and excellent discussion of HODGE, who opposes CALVIN's views most strenuously. —R.]

Ver. 31. Paul in this verse proceeds with the passage which follows the saying of Adam respecting the woman brought to him (Gen. ii. 24, LXX: ἐνεκεν τούτου καταλείψει ἄνθρωπος τὸν πατέρα αὐτοῦ καὶ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ καὶ προσκολληθήσεται πρὸς τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ καὶ ἑσονται οἱ δύο εἰς σάρκα μίαν):

For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and the two shall be one flesh.—The changes are inconsiderable: ἀντί instead of ἐνεκεν, πατέρα and μητέρα, according to the best authorities, without the articles and pronouns, τὴν γυναῖκα at least a various reading as Matt. xix. 5. Notwithstanding this, it is not a quotation, since there is nothing to indicate this. He merely continues in the words of Moses, which he uses with slight variations, while the Lord introduces them (Matt. xix. 5) with εἶπεν, and Paul himself in 1 Cor. vi. 16, the last clause with ὁρίσιν. Further, this passage is not a part of Adam's speech, since he could say nothing of forsaking father and mother, unless it be taken as a prediction (STIER) [JEROME: primus vates Adam]; in which case, however, he would still in the last clause have prophesied respecting himself. [Comp. Genesis, p. 209.—R.] Hence it is not strange that the Apostle passes over the intervening clause, in which HARLESS unnecessarily finds a difficulty.

Ἀντί τούτου is then, if we compare ἀνθ' ὧν (2 Thess. ii. 19; Luke i. 2; xii. 3; xix. 44), for this, that the woman is taken from the man, he will cling to her; εἰς ἀμοιβήν (WINER, p. 342). Paul unmistakably thus returns to the conjugal state, after he has finished the proof (ver. 30) for "as Christ also" (ver. 29). Hence it is not necessary with BLEEK to supply after ver. 30: we are of His flesh and bones, the following middle term: as the woman is not of the flesh and bones of the man, to which ver. 31 refers. Τούτου is not to be referred to our origin from Christ, to whom the forsaking of father and mother does not apply, the forsaking of father not in the future at least (καταλείψει), and such a reference is foreign to the purpose, the clinging to the wife, the Church, since either this did not at all exist when He was born a man, or He already clung to it in love, without the necessity of first forsaking the Father. Indeed, the future (καταλείψει) may be regarded here in this saying of Moses, analogously to the future [the ethical future] of the commandments (Rom. xiii. 9: οὐ μοιχεύετε, κ. τ. λ.), as the precept corresponding to the relations as established in God's word.

Καὶ ἔσονται οἱ δύο εἰς σάρκα μίαν refers to a gradual coming to pass of unity (hence εἰς with the accusative), and that, too, in the case of two different persons (οἱ δύο, ἄρσεν καὶ θήλυ, Gen. i. 27), who from within becomes one in all external circumstances, non solum uti antea, respectu ortus, sed respectu novae conjunctionis (BENGL). Hence it is not necessary to find here only a prophecy of the Second Advent of Christ, who now as Betrothed and afterwards as husband, clings to the Church (MEYER), nor in the Messianic passage a prophetic type of Christ and His Church (STIER), nor to refer the last clause to the Lord's Supper (CALVIN, BEZA, HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN, KAHNIS).

[The main difficulty is in regard to the connection. MEYER (and many others from CHRYSOSTOM to ALFORD) refers "for this cause" to ver. 30, thus applying our verse to the relation of Christ and the Church. But the Apostle is recalling a passage at the basis of which lies the fact of Eve's being taken out of Adam, and the slight alteration he makes does not show an intent to apply it differently here. Besides the whole section treats of the relation of husband and wife, and this is, therefore, to be regarded as the leading reference unless the other is distinctly marked. This principle the Apostle himself assumes in ver. 32: "But I speak concerning Christ and the Church." At the same time we must accept a secondary application (ELLIOTT) to Christ and the Church, not simply because most commentators have done so, but because the whole tenor of the passage and the interpretation of ver. 32 seem to demand it. The view of HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN and HODGE, that the last clause alone refers to Christ and the Church, the early part being introduced merely for the sake of that clause, seems to be an exegetical make-shift. As the Apostle had left out a part of the original passage in Genesis, he might just as readily have omitted all that was irrelevant. Still less tenable is the special application, which OLSHAUSEN makes, comparing the Lord's Supper and conjugal cohabitation, showing that allegory may serve to foster the coarsest materialistic conceptions. MEYER's paraphrase is as follows: "Wherefore, because we are members of Christ, of his flesh and bones, shall a man leave (i. e., Christ at the Second Advent) his father and his mother (i. e., according to the mystical sense of Paul: He will leave His seat at the right hand of God) and shall be joined to his wife (to the Church), and (and then the two) (the husband and the wife, i. e., the descended Christ and the Church) shall be one flesh." Such a view is to be expected from this commentator, whose grammatical exactness is exceeded only by his fondness for bringing in a reference to the Second Advent, but it fails to meet with general acceptance. JEREMY TAYLOR: "Christ descended from His Father's bosom and contracted His divinity with flesh and blood, and married our nature, and we became a Church;" but this confuses our nature with the Church, as well as, impliedly, the Bride and the offspring. ALFORD is safer in regarding "the saying as applied to that, past, present, and future, which constitutes Christ's union to His Bride the Church: His leaving the Father's bosom, which is past—His gradual preparation of the union, which is present, His full consummation of it, which is future." All these views may be held as partial elucidations of the matter in hand on the side of the application to Christ and the Church, which was doubtless in the Apostle's mind, but we still insist that so detailed a passage has a primary reference to a union, where a mere man leaves his earthly father and mother, and is joined to his wife.—With all these allegorical interpretations, one thought, which inheres in the passage, as referring to the human relation, has been too much overlooked, viz., that it is the man who forsakes father and mother. It is remarkable how true this is, and how it comes out in works of fiction, in homely sayings like this: "My son is my son till he gets him a wife, but my daughter's my daughter all her life," in the feelings, since mothers and sisters are rarely jealous of the man, but so often of the woman, who marries into the family. Nor does social custom fail to recognize this. The basis of all is the principle set forth in vers. 28, 29.—R.]

Comprehensive double conclusion; vers. 32, 33.

Ver. 32. This mystery is a great one, τὸ μυστήριον τοῦτο μέγα ἐστίν.—The position of the words must be noticed. WIKER (p. 163) remarks that οὗτος usually comes before the noun, and ἐκεῖνος after, and that accords with the nature of the case. Deviations have their ground in the context. Paul lays the stress here on "mystery," the position after the noun weakens the demonstrative; it is not δεικτικὸς, does not refer to the last point alone. There is here a retrospect over the whole paragraph. BENGL is correct: mysterium appellatur non matrimonium humanum (ver. 33), sed ipsa conjunctio Christi et ecclesie. "Mystery" (i. 9; iii. 3, 4, 9; vi. 19) is a fact, which either entirely or partially transcends the understanding, as the Divine will, a decree of God, the truth in its depth, etc. Here it is the union of the man and woman in wedlock, and of Christ and His congregation in the church, which the Apostle so presents that the latter is the pattern, and the former the copy. It is irrelevant to suppose a reference to a concealed sense in the words of Moses, so that εἰρημέων, γεγραμμένων, is to be supplied (GROTIUS, STIER, RUECKERT, MEYER and others). It is termed "great," because Paul himself plus sensit, quam ille, ad quos scribebat, capere; comp. Rom. xi. 33.

[HODGE seems inclined to refer "this mystery" to the union of Christ and the Church, in accordance with his view of ver. 31. EADIE agrees exactly with BRAUNE, while ALFORD refers it to "the mystery of the spiritual union of Christ with our humanity, typified by the close conjunction of the marriage state," alluded to in ver. 31. ELLICOTT applies it to the close conjunction of the married state: He adds: "Ver. 29 states the exact similarity of the relationship; ver. 30 the ground of the relation in regard of Christ and the Church; ver. 31 the nature of the conjugal relation with a probable application also to Christ; ver. 32 the mystery of that conjugal relation in itself, and still more so in its typical application to Christ and His Church." EADIE: "Vers. 25-28 introduce the spiritual nuptial relation, ver. 29 affirms its reality, ver. 30 gives the deep spiritual ground or origin of it, while the quotation in ver. 31 shows the authorized source of the image, and ver. 32 its ultimate application guarding against mistake." On "mystery," see chap. iii. 3.—R.]

But I.—Εγώ is used only with emphasis (WINER, p. 144), and must have an antithesis, which the context gives; here it is (ver. 33); "you." Δέ, but, is merely metabatic (MEYER); therefore: I, the Apostle, the unmarried one.*—Say it in regard to Christ and the Church [λέγω εἰς Χριστὸν καὶ εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν].—Λέγειν εἰς marks the aim of the discourse, as Acts ii. 25; Heb. vii. 14; John viii. 26 (WINER, p. 370). Here λέγειν is the expression of the opinion and view of Paul, who refers the mystery to "Christ and the Church" as the archetype and prototype for Christians in the marital fellowship. The repetition of the article is emphatic, containing a caution to consider this on account of the consequence for the copy, marriage. It is incorrect to take λέγω=I apply it (STIER), or, I cite it (MEYER; Luther, too, is wrong: of Christ and the Church, and the Vulgate: in Christo et in ecclesia. On the Romanist error, which regards marriage as a Sacrament, to which the Vulgate gives occasion, see Doctr. Note 7.†

Ver. 33. Nevertheless ye also.—Πλὴν (from πλέον) precisely: further, beyond this, that is beyond the saying on my part, καὶ ὑμεῖς. There is, therefore, no digression to be accepted, from which he now returns to the subject, ver. 28 (BENGEL: quasi oblitus propositæ rei nunc ad rem revertitur; HARLESS, BLEEK), nor is it: in order to enter no further upon this mystery (MEYER).‡

Severally, let each one, οἱ καθ' ἑνα ἕκαστος, vos singuli, each one without exception, the masculine and the context point to husbands.—So love his own wife as himself, τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα οὕτως ἀγαπάτω ὥς ἑαυτόν.—Loving as one's self is a conception, which is compared (οὕτως) with the love of Christ to the Church. [Not so love his wife as he loves himself, but: in this manner (like Christ) love his own wife as being himself; comp. ver. 28.—R.]

And let the wife see that she reverence her husband.—The construction: ἡ δὲ γυνὴ ἵνα φοβῇται τὸν ἄνδρα, presupposes something to be supplied: volo aut simile quid piam (Gal. ii. 10; v. 13; 1 Cor. iv. 2; vii. 29; 2 Cor. viii. 7). BENGEL, and answers to an imperative, as indeed one precedes (WINER, pp. 295, 537). It is stronger, however, than an imperative; ἡ δὲ γυνὴ stands first emphatically. [See ELLICOTT, who accepts a nominative absolute, reaching the same conclusion as Braune. "Let the wife see," brings out the emphasis quite well.—R.] Particula vim habet, vim temperat ellipsis morata (BENGEL). Thus a special weight for house and husband is laid upon this, that she does her duty, which is summed up in φοβῇται and traced to its inmost ground in vers. 22-24. (ECUMENIUS: ὥς τρέπει γυναῖκα φοβεῖσθαι μὴ δουλοπρεπῶς. See Doctr. Note 1, 3, 4. Optime cohærebit concordia, si utrumque constabunt officia (ERASMUS). [EADIE well remarks: "What is instinctive on either side is not enforced, but what is necessary to direct and hallow such an instinct is inculcated."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The fundamental features of the moral conduct of man and wife towards each other are the principal points in this section. The Apostle refers the subject, with wholesome words and grand freedom from all casuistry, back to the main point, to its briefest expression: As regards the wife, to be subordinate to the husband (vers. 22, 24), to reverence him (ver. 33); as regards the wife, to love the husband (vers. 25, 28, 33). The former is in force since Gen. iii. 15: "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee;" it is not, however, merely a consequence of the fall and a punishment, but inheres in the position of the woman and her corresponding endowment and nature, since she was to be a help-meet for the man, that he should not be alone (Gen. ii. 18). In this is at once implied that there is here meant no servile subjection, no forced, legal obedience, no loveless, joyless fear, by indicating that the man as the head of the wife, in his mind, character and activity is placed as the representative and provider for his own in circles outside that of the house, the context defines the subordination and fear to this extent, that, as soul, heart, disposition and honor of the household, she submits herself to the regulations established by the husband in virtue of his office, and in tender thought avoids disturbing, injuring or destroying his work. Above the house stands the man's avocation, which is from God, for which God has appointed him; hence it stands higher than the house, the character and life of which should subserve his avocation in the house alone. It is therefore in substance commanded that the wife should be subject, and in tender solicitude should fear to oppose the husband, to undervalue his arrangements, to make him discontented or angry while tarrying in the house to strengthen himself for his avocation.*

* [The reference is apparently not so much to his celibacy, as to the subjective character of the application and comparison, while the slightly adversative δέ contrasts it with any other interpretation that might have been added: "the mystery of this closeness of the conjugal relation is great, but I am myself speaking of it in its still deeper application, in reference to Christ and the Church" (ELLICOTT).—R.]

† [Our English and American commentators do not fail to notice this blunder of the Council of Trent, but some people who speak English treat the Authorized Version with the same reverence; ministers preach from the sound of the E. V., not the sense of the Word of God. The Romanist can cover his blunder by the sanction given to the Vulgate by his church, but Protestants have no such excuse.—R.]

‡ [The view of MEYER is accepted by EADIE, HODGE, ELLICOTT, ALFORD, and seems perfectly tenable. Braune's view results from the effort to maintain a decided antithesis to "I" in "ye," when most commentators find the antithesis to "ye also" in "Christ."—R.]

The wife who refuses this subordination and considerate respect, who does not see and seek her mission in the house, in the service of her husband, becomes an offensive caricature: from discontent there is bad progress to growling, managing, seeking the mastery, scolding, and finally to "emancipation." Thus is stripped off and destroyed, not only what is Christian, but what is germanic, even what is womanly, especially what is peculiar and individual, the special gift of the Creator. JEZEBEL and HERODIAS are examples of this kind. The true character shines in SARAH (1 Pet. iii. 1-6).—To the husband one command is given, and in this one three requirements: Love even unto self-sacrifice, with the consequence and purpose of sanctification (vers. 25-27), and this with such energy, purity and constancy, that more is required of the husband than of the wife. The wife should love the husband, as the Church loves Christ, in entire, exclusive, indissoluble and ministering love, and the husband should love the wife, as Christ the Church, in entire, exclusive, indissoluble and protecting love. It is more difficult to

* [HODGE: "The ground of the obligation as it exists in nature is the eminency of the husband; his superiority in those attributes which enable and entitle him to command. He is larger, stronger, bolder,—has more of those mental and moral qualities which are required in a leader. This is just as plain from his history as that iron is heavier than water. The superiority of man, in the respects mentioned, thus taught in Scripture, bounded in nature, and proved by all experience, cannot be denied or disregarded without destroying society and degrading both men and women. The superiority of the man, however, is not only consistent with the mutual dependence of the sexes, and their essential quality of nature and, in the kingdom of God, but also with the inferiority of men to women in other qualities than those which entitle to authority. The Scriptural doctrine, while it lays the foundation for order in requiring wives to obey their husbands, at the same time exalts the wife to be the companion and ministering angel to the husband." As a proof that this is the position assigned to woman by her own mind and heart, we may cite the works of imagination written by the most brilliant of the sex. Their ideal of man, even when they write, personating the other sex, is one who from his nature demands their loving obedience. If it be said that many a woman is joined to a man, whose character does not thus demand the obedience of the superior mind, we must consider how often women accept the relation of wife, with a full knowledge of the right position, as taught by God in nature and in His word, and yet conscious that they neither can nor will occupy that position to the man who becomes their legal husband. Such are punished in this life, and the cry about "the subjection of woman" is often the wail of distress resulting from such punishment.—As regards the relation of the sexes in general, though nothing is expressly said in this section, much may be inferred. No doubt great mistakes have been made in drawing such inferences, but it is perfectly obvious that a distinction between the sexes is here assumed, which distinguishes, if it does not sharply divide, the sphere of duty belonging to each respectively. "Woman's work" is different from man's work, though care should be taken neither arbitrarily to exclude her from certain kinds of labor, nor to deprive her of her just recompense for her work. The Church, too, should find work of a certain kind for many who are not "wives," by constituting them "Bible-readers," "deaconesses;" the mere office of Sunday-school teacher will not satisfy many such, since for that many are not adapted.—In regard to the question of "suffrage," it is a fair inference from our passage, that for a wife to vote independently would be a disturbance of the relation as ordained by God; the question assumes a slightly different phase in regard to unmarried women of full age. Still even in the case of such, the passage at least lays the onus probandi on those who advocate the right. One popular argument urged in favor of "women suffrage" is that thus drunkenness could be stopped by force of law. But not only is that method of doubtful justice, legality and expediency, but the question fairly arises how many men are driven to drunkenness by the failure of their wives to heed the spirit of the Apostle's words.—R.]

love the wife, without egotism, without tyranny and despotism, without any severity to be the master in the house in true affection, than to be subject to the man in tender respect for his dignity as husband, and his avocation as man.

2. The combination of marriage and Church (Kirche), which appears as the main thought in this section, has a twofold reference.

a. The two are to be compared with each other: As the wife should conduct herself to her husband, so should the Church to Christ; as the husband should conduct himself to the wife, so does Christ to the Church. Marriage, like the Church (Kirche), is a life-fellowship between a head and its body; the former Christ is for the Church (Gemeinde) and the man for the wife; the latter, the Church, is for Christ, and the wife for the husband. From the relation and the demeanor between Christ and the Church light falls upon the relation and demeanor of married people to each other, just as from the latter upon the former. Thus marriage and Church serve each other for the rendering clear of that which is normal in the two. But we must guard against descending in this parallelism to small and belittling particulars: such as conjoining winning the bride, baptism, and time of betrothal and the temporal period of the Church, leading home the bride and the Second Advent of the Lord as Bridegroom, sexual fellowship and unio mystica. But we may with right speak of the religion of marriage and of the marriage of religion; on this is based, too, the position in the canon of the Song of Solomon, which is a hymn of holy love. The Church should not keep at a distance what appertains to the creature, what is natural, or even turn a disapproving countenance upon it; that would be a wrinkle in the face of the Church, thus despising her Lord's work and so growing old on one side, instead of being glorified. From the wife, who in her husband's house is never to be regarded lightly, but must manage and mould, the Church may and ought to learn how to become at once deiformis and mundiformis.

b. The two, however, stand in such close relation to each other, that from the Church proceeds the power for the proper direction of marriage, the proper conduct of married people. The wife should belong to the Church in order to receive from Christ His gifts, that thus she may be to her husband what the Church is to Christ, and quite as much must the husband be sanctified in the Church, taken hold of by Christ and permeated by His love, in order to treat his wife, as Christ does His Church. Thus the Christian Church is the foundation for a normal marriage, as the natural life becomes in the life of regeneration that which is according to God's will.

3. Marriage and Nature. Our section points into the sphere of creation. The man is from the beginning made for marriage (Gen. i. 26-28: "male and female"), and in Paradise the first human pair was brought together for wedlock, were wedded pair by the grace of God, before father and mother, and children existed. Marriage is the first union in point of time. And in point of dignity as well: from it proceeds the dignity of father and mother, through it alone comes family life, the basis of all blessing in human life. As to its nature it is the fellowship of one man and one woman, in which both more and more live together (εις σάρκα μίαν), chiefly moral, then however sensuous vital fellowship even to sexual fellowship; it is the fellowship of the body and of the worship of God, of all worldly goods, of all intellectual gifts, and, as far as it is possible with personal reason and conscience, of spiritual gifts also; the religious side of the fellowship should predominate, the moral side operate, the sensuous side may never override and repel the others, would enter only but not be repressed.*

4. Marriage and Bible are joined together also by our section, since it refers back to the oldest Scripture, deriving thence these thoughts: God has created mankind for marriage; the desire, the initiative, is on the side of man, the being desired is the part of the woman; marriage unites only one man and one woman (Monogamy); is first of all and as to its deepest ground directed to moral fellowship of life, includes in itself sexual fellowship, is directed thus towards the establishment of the family and family life, toward the bringing up and education of children; has such an inwardness and fervor, that devoted conjugal surpasses filial love, even father's and mother's love, that the marriage tie is indissoluble, unless sin should rend it asunder.† Monogamy is established from the beginning as self-evident. A Cainite, the bold and sensual Lamech, who first took two wives, Ada (=ornament) and Zillah (=shadow of the head of hair), begetting the master of fiddlers and fifers, and the master of workers in brass and iron, made the transition from monogamy to polygamy, and in the progress of civilization forsook the Divine

* [Dr. HODGE remarks on the true expression of the Apostle "as their own bodies," (ver. 28): (1.) It does not refer to any material identification. (2.) It implies nothing inconsistent with the separate subsistence of husband and wife as distinct persons. (3.) The marriage relation is not essential to the completeness or perfection of our nature in all states of its existence. It is to cease at the resurrection. (4.) It is not however merely a union of interests and feelings. In a certain sense husband and wife complement each other. (5.) There is doubtless involved a oneness of life which no one can understand.—R.]

† [Here Dr. HODGE is excellent: (1.) Marriage is a union for life between one man and one woman; consequently bigamy, polygamy, and voluntary divorce are all inconsistent with its nature. (2.) It must be entered into freely and cordially by the parties, i.e., with the conviction that one is suited to the other (and it may be added, to take the positions involved in the natural and scriptural view of the relation). All coercion on the part of parents is contrary to the nature of the relation; and all marriages of mere convenience are opposed to the design of the institution. (3.) The State can neither make nor dissolve the marriage tie. It may enact laws regulating the mode in which it shall be solemnized and authenticated, and determine its civil effects. It may shield a wife from ill-usage from her husband, as it may remove a child from the custody of an incompetent or cruel parent. When the union is, in fact, dissolved by the operation of the Divine law, the State may ascertain and declare the fact, and free the parties from the civil obligations of the contract. It is impossible that the State should have authority to dissolve a union constituted by God, the duties and ordinances of which are determined by His law. (4.) According to the Scriptures, as interpreted by Protestant churches, nothing but the death of one of the parties, or adultery, or willful desertion can dissolve the marriage contract. When either of the last-mentioned causes of dissolution is judicially ascertained, the injured party is free to contract a new marriage. The greatest social crime, next to murder, which any one can commit, is to seduce the affections of a wife from her husband, or of a husband from his wife; and one of the greatest evils which civil authorities can inflict on society is the dissolution of the marriage contract so far as it is a civil contract (for further the civil authority cannot go), on other than Scriptural grounds.—R.]

institution (Gen. iv. 19-24). The impatience of Sarah for an heir caused her to forsake her position and conduct so far as to lead Hagar to Abraham, and the selfishness of Laban made use of the love of Jacob for Rachel, so that he took Leah first, but the promised blessing came only on the child of the legitimate wife (Isaac, not Ishmael) or of the first one (Judah, not Joseph). See HARLESS, Ethik., § 52, p. 5, 7 ff. Hence it should not be said, that in the Old Testament marriage only gradually lifted itself to monogamy (SCHENKEL); on the contrary the latter was recognized as the original institution appointed by God, and the defections from it are referred to sinful tendencies, to the dominion of sin, are not approved. Christianity however has glorified marriage, establishing it firmly and securely in its nature, dignity and blessing. Redemption goes back to the natural institutions established in creation, removing the perversions and degradations introduced by sin into the heathen world and the people of Israel; what is new in Christianity is what is primeval restored. This appears especially prominent in the matter of marriage and family life, so strongly that all which is anti-christian and anti-scriptural is at the same time unnatural and inhuman, just as the impulse of anti-christian Atheism, Materialism, Satanism has led thither. Interest attaches to the view of Melancthon, who, much as he has prized his excellent betrothed, was afraid of married life, lest he might thereby be drawn too much away from his studies, and yet afterwards despite a wife suffering from hypochondria and a numerous family called the marriage state "a kind of philosophy, which required duties the most honorable and most worthy of a noble man." [So JEREMY TAYLOR: "Single life makes men in one instance to be like angels, but marriage in very many things makes the chaste pair to be like Christ" (Sermon on the Marriage Ring).—R.]

5. Beside the conduct of married people to each other and the relation between Christ and His church and the husband with his wife, there is also marked, through the purpose of Christ or the aims of the church, the end of marriage, viz., the sanctification of the personality (vers. 26, 27). This is a process of development, ever deepening and extending through the whole life, with two sides: internal, moral perfection, through growth and unfolding of talent and strength granted (δύναμις) and ever wider and clearer emancipation from all evil imposed and entering or clinging from without (ἁμαρτία). The former is based upon the internally and correctly established relation of the person to God and His kingdom, the latter upon the conduct of the same, externally corresponding to the given noun, in all the relations of life from work to word and its source in thought and temper. Hence the sanctification of the sexual appetite can be regarded as only a single purpose, for which there is not even a point of resemblance in the parallel with the church and her Head, not as the principal task of Christian family morals (SCHENKEL), as if marriage were ordained as a safeguard against whoremongery or carnal excess, when this is but a single object, or rather a coincident result, even though the main matter in this work of sanctification. From the very seeking and consummating of the marriage, the morality of the fellowship not its sensuousness, the religiousness of the married pair not the sexual fellowship, should show itself to be the decisive and impelling feature. The proper sexual pleasure to be allowed by man and wife must like every other pleasure within a social relation find its norm in accordance with the moral end of marriage.

6. On the phrase respecting baptism (ver. 26) rests with full right the explanation of Luther in the smaller catechism, 4 main part, 1: Baptism is not mere water, but it is water taken in God's command and united with God's word. For it is a pledge of the power of the atonement efficient through awakening and growing faith, an assurance of the forgiveness of sins, a guarantee of the new relation to God, of sonship with Him (Matt. xxviii. 19: εἰς τὸ ὄνομα; Acts ii. 38; xxii. 16; Heb. x. 22) and an assurance of the power, to be received in faith, of the new life in the gift of the Holy Ghost (John iii. 5; Tit. iii. 5); both together, Rom. vi. 3-11; Col. ii. 12. CHEMNITZ: Pater saluat, filius emundat, spiritus regenerat (HARLESS). Mundatio præcedit donationem gloriæ et nuptias (BENGEL).—Thus both the mechanical view of baptism as a mere initiatory rite among the Rationalists, and the Baptist sundering of sanctification and cleansing, which makes of baptism merely a seal of entire conversion, are here opposed; it stands at the commencement of sanctification, which begins with it. [The reference to baptism is undeniable, and such a reference seems to contradict at once the very low view of the ordinance which is quite prevalent among many Pædo-baptists, just as the obvious reference to the mystical union of Christ, and His Church in this section implies that the Lord's supper is more than a mere memorial service. As a specimen of the Reformed or Calvinistic views on this subject (though Calvin himself was more of a Sacramentalist than those who moulded the Reformed confessions), the remarks of Dr. HODGE are presented: When the Scriptures speak of baptism as washing away sin, they do not teach (1.) That there is any inherent virtue in baptism, or in the administrator, to produce these effects; nor (2.) That these effects always attend its right administration; nor, (3.) That the Spirit is so connected with baptism that it is the only channel through which He communicates the benefits of redemption. Positively he remarks: (1.) Baptism is a Divine institution. (2.) One of the conditions of salvation, not sine qua non, but having the necessity of precept. (3.) A means of grace, that is, a channel through which the Spirit confers grace; not always, nor upon all recipients, nor is it the only channel, nor designed as the ordinary means of regeneration. (4.) Infants are baptized on the faith of their parents; and their baptism secures to them all the benefits of the covenant of grace, provided they ratify that covenant by faith.—R.]

7. Here, as also in i. 8; iii. 3, 9; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Rev. i. 20, the Vulgate has rendered ἡ γάμος, sacramentum. This translation has been used to support the view of the high dignity of marriage recognized in this section, which exaggerates it to such an extent that the Roman Church, in opposition to her own doctrine of the celibacy of the clergy and the virginity of the saints, proclaims it a sacrament. Comp. Conc. Triden., Less. 24, cap. 1; Si quis dixerit, matrimonium non esse vere et proprie unum ex septem legibus evangelicæ sacramentis a Christo domino institutum, sed ab hominibus in ecclesia inventum, neque gratiam conferre: anathema sit.

This church (Catech. Rom. ii. 8, 23 sqq.) accepts three gracious gifts [in this so-called sacrament]: proles, fides, fidelitas quædam und vinculum, quod nunquam dissolvi potest. As respects the matter and form the schoolmen vacillate in consequence of the novelty of the subject. BONAVENTURA finds the material of the sacrament in the sexual acts, others in the partners themselves, others in their consensus. To regard and treat matrimony as a Sacrament, but only for the laity, who do attain to the perfection of the saints, while celibacy is demanded of the monk and priest, that they may be able to boast of sanctity, of actual renunciation of sexual desire, was only possible, because the antithesis between heaven and the world, from which Paul proceeds in speaking of celibacy as respects his own office, age, and individuality (1 Cor. vii. 25-40), was changed into an antithesis of spirit and flesh in such a way that a false dualism was established between Divine and human, spiritual and carnal, moral and natural. This dualism the church has overcome. Very apt are the remarks of HARLESS (Ethik, p. 512): "Marriage is the divinely appointed ordinance and form, within which the spirit of Divine love can find on earth according to the nature of the case its most unhampered rule, and in such efficiency can best give a measure of the fullness of the Divine love; but the marriage itself does not bring or become the medium of this Spirit of pure Divine love. It is only the vessel which is prepared for this Spirit; the spirit and the power do not come from the earthly copy of the Divine fellowship of love. The Christian perceives rather, that the institution in itself does not at all protect against violation and desecration through selfishness of every kind—but that [the Spirit and the power] come from the graces of the New Testament, that these graces do not come to him by means of marriage, but through the word, baptism, the Lord's Supper, repentance and faith, on which account it is impossible for him, under a misunderstanding of Eph. v. 32 to call the Divine institution of matrimony a sacrament in the sense, in which Baptism and the Lord's Supper are thus termed.—Still the evangelical church down to the latest times has not been free from Romish distortions, of a mystical, theosophic tendency; GOTTFRIED ARNOLD held the marriage state to be incompatible with true wisdom, though he himself afterwards married; with him agreed MICHAEL HAHN, who with his followers remained unmarried, and Pastor CULMANN (Ethik, i. p. 42). LUTHER himself did not regard the sexual propensity and its gratification as in itself God-willed (KOESTLIN: Luther's Theologie, II. p. 483). On the other hand ZINZEN-DORF attempted to place the marital obligation under ideal points of view.—If from the Roman Catholic side attacks are still made upon the convenience of Luther and Melancthon for their approval of the bigamy of Landgrave Philip after the example of Abraham, who had however to suffer severely on this account, it may be replied that the Catholic Church not only permitted Abbe Sieyes and Bishop Talleyrand to marry, and dissolved Napoleon's first marriage with Josephine, but even helped him to the second marriage with the Austrian Archduchess.

8. In the 13th century the Old Testament age, and the Old Testament Scriptures were often termed the "die alte Ehe" (the old marriage). This points to a mystery of marriage, like that of the communion of Christ and His Church. The former is a mystery on its natural side from the very creation; in it creative powers for soul and body are active; a mystery on the side of redemption: in it wonderful confiding love and consecrated fidelity are manifested; on the side of sanctification: in it operate sanctifying powers for eternity.—Comp. PAUL GERHART: Voller Wunder, voller Kunst, voller Weisheit, voller Kraft, voller Hulde, Gnad und Gunst, etc.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Comp. the foregoing Doctr. Notes and BRAUNE, Die heiligen 10 Gebote, pp. 147, 177.—The husband has a great advantage over his wife: he is the older, more mature part, has the choice of the wife, possesses greater power and culture for civil life, must represent his wife and household in these matters (1 Cor. xi. 7-9). So at least it should be. But he has no advantage as regards the Divine image and moral worth over her, the fellow-heir (1 Pet. iii. 7). Both must have patience with each other, but no wife should be ever for having the last word without yielding! She who patiently bears puts to shame the despotism of a husband. Nor should they spoil each other by a weak and false silence respecting unpleasantness; they should inure themselves in the draught of truth, should be confiding without inconsiderateness; neither dare cease to be a lover of the other. Even if the husband should be lacking in what is necessary to fill personally his position, the wife should not in boastfulness despise the social dignity of the husband, but above and beyond him see the Lord. Have you given your "yes," then it must be held good to the end; even if it is hard, the difficulty does not dissolve it; life must fulfil it, death alone dissolve it.—You may be married and yet not truly wedded, may have one household and yet no matrimonial fellowship; may be with him or her one flesh, but not one heart and one soul; you live together under one roof, but may have no common foundation, may walk united on earth, but heaven is wanting to your union.—No one ought to rejoice so much in Christ and His church as the wife: she and her children have gained most by Christianity; this is a reason why women and children have and ought to have so strong an attraction to Him in the church; there is gratitude involved. Submission, ministering subordination is no misfortune, but a joy, exercising a triumphing, pacifying power.—In one sense every man must die for his wife: he must die to himself, to his sinful Ego, mortify his selfishness and egotism, not his peculiarity, which he should still exercise without self-will. The man is most apt to do this as betrothed and in the honeymoon, as if once were enough. But this should occur throughout life: before death no one is entirely done with it.—Wo to him who chooses before he has to choose, when he knows neither why nor wherefore, or before he knows how to choose, when he does not know what it means, or who chooses arbitrarily, before he has bethought himself what his position requires or proved her whom he chooses! Wo to such, especially if they are or become ministers of the church. Sin separates from God, disturbs the union with Him, grieves the Holy Spirit. Sin does this also to the Divine institution of marriage. All separation of dispositions, all disturbances and discord of soul come from sin, and never merely from that of the other, but from your own sin also. The guilt in unhappy marriages, or even in the disturbance of otherwise happy ones, is on both sides, demands at least an examination of one's own sins. When there is discord and even when the other is wrong, do you listen attentively to what is said against you, and then try it as a judge upon yourself.—Never forget this: what is yours does not merely belong to you, you belong to it also.

STARKE:—How then can a godless man with alacrity be the head of his wife and require obedience of her, when he neither clings nor listens to Christ, his head?—Pious widows, you have lost one head, but the other Head (Jesus) death cannot take from you; He watches and cares for you.—Is Christ the Head of the church, then the Pope cannot be it, else the church would have two heads and so be a monstrosity.—In Christ there is at once a Head and a Saviour; the two characters must unite also in a husband who should use his dominion for the blessing, never for the oppression and damage of those whom he rules.—The fellowship of believers with Jesus gives them that great dignity, noble advantage and blessed consolation.—Without love marriage is a bitter state, with love it is sweet.—The love of Christ to His church is both cause and standard of the love of husbands towards their wives.—Love and fear stand beside each other in a well-ordered marriage: the former must sweeten the latter, the latter must ever more incite the former.

RIEGER:—The Apostle begins with married people, because, if things go wrong between them in the household, the trouble soon extends itself from them to the children and dependents. In each relation the Apostle begins with the weaker side.—Proper distrust of one's self and what is doubtful in one's natural gifts, willingness to be told what to do rather than to lead the other into temptation, is the root of this subjection.—The rule of the household is not to be put on a magisterial footing, but to be conducted by a mild and yet efficient influence, like that of the head upon the members.—What is set before the husbands: love your wives, is not easier than the being submissive. Whoever knows human nature, how loveless, changeful, easily wearied by faults, quickly angered it is, will notice how deep the foundation must be laid for a love which is not puffed up, seeketh not her own, etc.

HEUBNER:—Even with love and similarity of hearts there must be subordination. The household needs guidance and government. The wife should submit. The wife's government reverses the proper order.—Nothing can frighten a Christian heart from divorce more than this thought: It is as if you separated from Jesus. Unbelief, coldness toward Jesus has terribly wasted our married life.

PASSAVANT:—The Greeks acted more humanly, the Romans and Germans more magnanimously; elsewhere we see everywhere in the history of humanity the mothers and daughters of the nations, the weaker part, despised and oppressed by the stronger, often most cruelly degraded; and we should have, in such traits of ancient and modern heathen, and of all infidel nations and races, enough to perceive how deeply the whole human race has fallen from its original nature and destiny and what rudeness and wickedness of sin has permeated all nations and men, seeing they all have sinned.—With the appearance of the Redeemer, however, a new hour of Redemption struck also for this so misunderstood and oppressed half of the human race.—The more true, wise and manly the husband is in his cherishing of his wife, as his own body, the sooner, and if the wife is not altogether unholy in heart—the more faithfully, tenderly and sacredly will all be returned to him by the wife's sacredly affectionate care and solicitude, and he be richly recompensed.

STIER:—The church should never demean itself as merely parallel to other circles of fellowship, for she is called to become the inmost of all.—From out of the family, the concentrated life of the household, where a filial spirit is born of wedded love and household dependents regulate themselves accordingly, the moral life of a nation also grows.—The emancipation of the strong-minded woman, that most repulsive miscreation of natural corporeality, destroys not only what is Christian but what is germanic.—Love is the only right dominion; there is then in every house a church in parvo.—The Word is the proper, continuing baptism.—The mystery of marriage is a portico to the mystery of the sanctuary; from the latter too a light streams into the former.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—On the Christian conduct of marriage: 1. In marriage there is something earthly and something heavenly, which are one. There is marriage in an anxious form, when only one is satisfied, the other constrained; merely a carefully kept contract. There is marriage in a repulsive form, when the parties are accustomed to each other making as few claims as possible on each other, seeking their pleasure outside. There is a marriage in a loathsome form, when there is mutual anger and bitterness.—Ever more aroused in spirit, mollifying each other, and that in household, social life with its possessions, joys and sorrows.—2. In it there is an inequality, which loses itself in perfect equality—in perfect oneness of life.

BECHER:—Look at your households, fathers and mothers, for you are priests; your congregations impose a hundredfold greater responsibility than mine. Your priesthood is from God's own hand.—HOFMANN (ver. 22-24): The marriage state the school of Christian obedience; its ground, character, measure and aim.—(Vers. 25-29): The marriage state the home of love on earth—of born, free, heavenly love.

[HODGE:—Ver. 22. The obedience of the wife terminates on the Lord, and therefore is religious, because determined by religious motives and directed towards the object of religious affections. This makes the burden light and the yoke easy; for every service which the believer renders to Christ is rendered with joy and alacrity.—Vers. 26, 27. The church the bride of Christ. 1. The object of a peculiar and exclusive love. 2. She belongs exclusively to Christ. 3. The relation more intimate than between Him and any other order of creatures. 4. The church the special object of delight to Christ.—Ver. 29. A man may have a body which does not altogether suit him. He may wish it were handsomer, healthier, stronger, or more active. Still it is his body, and he treats it as tenderly as though it were the best and loveliest man ever had. So a man may have a wife whom he could wish to be better, or more beautiful, or more agreeable; still she is his wife, and, by the constitution of nature and ordinance of God, a part of himself.—Ver. 33. The sentiments which lie at the foundation of the marriage relation, which arise out of the constitution of nature, which are required by the command of God, and are essential to the happiness and well-being of the parties, are, on the part of the husband, that form of love which leads him to cherish and protect his wife as being himself, and on the part of the woman, that sense of his superiority out of which trust and obedience involuntarily flow.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 22. In those days wives when converted and elevated from comparative servitude, might be tempted, in the novel consciousness of freedom, to encroach a little, as if to put to the test the extent of their recent liberty and enlargement.—The insubordination of wives has always been a fertile source of sorrow; and yet Christian ladies in early times drew forth this compliment from Libanius, the "last glory of expiring paganism": proh, quales feminas habent Christiani!—Ver. 23. There is only one head; dualism would be perpetual antagonism. Each sex is indeed imperfect by itself, and the truest unity is conjugal duality.—Ver. 24. In the domestic economy, though government and obedience certainly exist, they are not felt in painful or even formal contrast; and, in fact, they are so blended in affectionate adjustment, that the line which severs them cannot be distinguished. The law of marital government is an "unwritten law."—Ver. 25. Husbands are not to be domestic tyrants; but their dominion is to be a reign of love.—The church did not crave Christ's love: He bestowed it. It was not excited by any loveliness of aspect on the part of the church, for she was guilty and impure, unworthy of His affection. Who can doubt a love which has proved its strength and glory in such suffering and death?—Ver. 27. As He originally loved her in her impurity, how deep and ardent must be His attachment now to her when He sees in her the realization of His own gracious and eternal purpose!—Vers. 31, 32. So close and tender is the union between Christ and His church that the language of Adam concerning Eve may be applied to it. These primitive espousals afforded imagery and language which might aptly and truly be applied to Christ and the church, which is "of His flesh and of His bones;" and the application of such language is indeed a mystery—a truth, the secret glory and facility of which are known but to those who are wedded to the Lord in a "perpetual covenant."—Ver. 33. "He rules her by authority, and she rules him by love: she ought by all means to please him, and he must by no means displease her" (Jeremy Taylor). When this balance of power is unsettled, happiness is lost, and mutual recrimination ensues. "A masterly wife," as Gataker says, "is as much despised and derided for taking rule over her husband as he, or yielding to it."—R.]

[In view of the well-known fact that an immense proportion of the conversation of many women is about their husbands, their children and their servants, showing how their lives are bound up in these relations, it would be well for them to study (and for pastors occasionally to teach in a prudent way) what the Apostle says in this part of the Epistle (chap. v. 22—chap. vi. 9) about their duties as wives, mothers and mistresses.—R.]

b. Children and parents.

CHAP. VI. 1-4.

1, 2 Children, obey your parents in the Lord:¹ for this is right. Honor thy father 3 and [thy]² mother; which is the first commandment with promise; That it may be 4 well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth. And, ye fathers, provoke [or fret] not your children to wrath: but bring them up in the nurture [discipline] and admonition of the Lord.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—[Lachmann, Rueckert, and Mill omit ἐν κυρίῳ on the authority of B. D. 1 F., some fathers. It is bracketted by Alford; but Harless, Meyer, Ellicott accept it on the strong support of N. A. D. 23 K. L., nearly all cursives and versions, express statement of Chrysostom; especially since, as Meyer urges, we would have found ὡς τῷ κυρίῳ in case of an insertion from v. 22, and if from Col. iii. 20, it would have been placed after δικαίον. Braune's note here speaks of the absence of the phrase in Col. iii. 20, a manifest error.—R.]

² Ver. 2.—[The E. V. omits "thy," without reason and unfortunately, for the article occurs in the Greek, and the same emphasis rests on thy mother as on thy father.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The precept for children; vers. 1-3. Ver. 1. Children, τὰ τέκνα.—The next step from the married state is the family. The wedded pair become parents through God's gift, which may also be denied. The address to children in a letter to the Church presupposes, that the Apostle regards them as belonging to the Church, present at public worship, understanding the word read to and applicable to them; indeed they must be regarded as baptized, since ver. 1: "in the Lord," ver. 4: "in the admonition of the Lord," obliges us to do so (SRIER, HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, II. 2, p. 192.)* See Doctr. Note 1.

Obey your parents in the Lord [ὁπακούετε τοῖς γονεῦσιν ὑμῶν ἐν κυρίῳ].—The verb coming first has the emphasis: this one precept comprises the main part of filial duty in itself. The word is stronger than ὑποτάσσασθαι (BENGEL: id plus etiam dicit quam subordinamini; obedire est imperitioris: subordinari cujusvis imperitoris). To the more mature and experienced persons, who are God's representatives and the child's supporters, and guides in fidelity, love and wisdom, obedience is to be rendered, not because they are Christians, or good and rich, or masters over the child, but because they are the parents ("your parents"), with the duty of bringing up (ver. 4) as they have brought forth. As Christians the children, however, must obey "in the Lord," in Christ (vers. 10, 21; ii. 21; iv. 1, 17; v. 8; WINER, p. 364); analogous to "in the fear of Christ" (v. 21), "as to the Lord" (v. 22). Thus the kind of obedience, not immediately and chiefly the kind of parents, is more closely defined, as specifically Christian in ground, measure and limit. It is incorrect to take it as—κατὰ τοῦ θεοῦ λόγον (THEODORET), or to refer it to God (CALVIN), in Deo, or to connect it with "parents," or to take it as merely a designation of the mode of obedience (HARLESS).*

For this is right [τοῦτο γὰρ ἐστὶ δίκαιον].—Quickly, briefly Paul presses the proof (γὰρ) forward. "This" refers to the whole: the obedience of children to their parents in Christ. In τέκνα and γονεῖς there is a reminder of the μυστήριον (ver. 32), which lies in

* [To this MEYER objects, but in its stead lays down a principle which approaches the strict Reformed view: "The children of Christians through their vital fellowship with their Christian parents were even without baptism ἄγιοι (see 1 Cor. vii. 14; Acts xvi. 15), and should render to their parents obedience ἐν κυρίῳ."—R.]

* [HODGE seems to follow HARLESS, but EADIE, ELLICOTT, ALFORD rightly take ἐν κυρίῳ as indicating the sphere or element of the action. ALFORD adds, in reference to the common view that the Apostle gives a hint as to commands not according to the will of God: "I should rather believe, that he regards both parents and children as ἐν κυρίῳ, and the commands, as well as the obedience, as having that sphere and element. How children were to regard commands not answering to this description, would be understood from the nature of the case." Certainly, if the reference be, as is thought by most, to baptized children, then this presupposes the parents ruling "in the Lord." On the limits of obedience, ELLICOTT refers to TAYLOR, Duct. Dub. III 5, Rule 1 and 4 ff.—R.]

the τόκος and γονεῖα (STIER). Hence δίκαιον, "right," refers to the relations both as given in nature and ordained by Divine law. BENDEL: etiam natura; MEYER: according to nature and law. This LUTHER wishes to express with his "it is proper." It should not be referred to the Divine law alone (THEODORET, MEYER, SCHENKEL), to which prominence is given in the next verse. [The natural obligation seems to be brought out here, the enforcement through the Divine law is added in the next verse (so EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, HODGE, following BENDEL, ESTIUS and THEOPHYLACT).—R.]

Ver. 2. Honour thy father and thy mother.—This is the commandment, Exod. xx. 12; Deut. v. 16; Matth. xv. 4. In τίμα there is more included than obedience. Obedientia testimonium est ejus honoris, quem debent parentibus. Sub voce honoris complectitur officia, quibus serio tuam erga parentes observantiam et pietatem testantur filius (CALVIN). In Matth. xv. Jesus deduces from the honor the nourishment, and provision and care. Sirach iii. 8. LUTHER: serve, love and esteem. With emphasis the commandment places on an equality over against the children "thy father and thy mother;" in Lev. xix. 3 the latter even comes first.

Which is, ἡ τις ἐστίν, introduces a reason, as in iii. 13; it is not—ἦ, quæ, but ut pote quæ.* —The first commandment with promise. —Ἐντολὴ evidently refers to the Mosaic law, the Decalogue, of which what has just been said is one commandment, hence without the article; on the thought that it is a command of God an emphasis rests,† which is strengthened by the added phrase: πρώτη ἐν ἐπαγγελίᾳ: at first; it is not the first. According to the context it is as respects the time in which it applies to human beings, a first one: children must first honor God's representatives, in order to learn how and to be able to keep those which precede and follow (STIER). And it is indeed placed on the promise, conceived in promise, because thus the obedience to parents becomes joyful, and upon this obedience salvation actually rests both internally and externally (1 Tim. iii. 1, 2). BENDEL: Honor parentibus per obedientiam præsertim præstitus initio ætatis omnium præceptorum obedientiam continet. It is not necessary therefore to say that it is in the series of commandments the first with a promise (HARLESS and others) [see below], as if there were not a promise annexed to the first or second [the Catholic and Lutheran first, our second] (Exod. xx. vers. 9, 10), or as though it were the first with a promise in the second table (AMBROSE and others). It belongs to the first table, and such a distinction is not "a comment of modern theologians, a distinction not founded in the sacred Scriptures" (ERASMUS), since it is definitely stated in Deut. v. 22, and the tenor of the commandments are distinguished accordingly. (Matth. xxii. 37-40; Lev. xix. 18, 34; Deut. vi. 5; x. 12.) Least of all does πρώτη mean the most important, a chief commandment (KOPPE [HODGE] and others). But while it is incorrect to take ἐν ἐπαγγελίᾳ = annexa, addita promissione, it is quite as much so to understand it as—in point of promise (WINER, p. 366; and others).

* [This is the view of MEYER and formerly of ELLICOTT, but the latter now accepts the explanatory force of the pronoun, since, as ALFORD intimates, the other view throws "the motive to obedience too much on the fact of the promise accompanying it, whereas the obedience rests on the fact implied in ἐντολὴ, and the promise comes in to show its special acceptableness to God."—R.]

† ALFORD's remark in loco must be taken with caution. He says the reference is to "the Decalogue, which naturally stands at the head of all God's other commandments; and which, though not formally binding on us as Christians, is quoted, in matters of eternal obligation (not of positive enactment), as an eminent example of God's holy will."—R.]

[The view of STIER, advocated by Braune, is not altogether satisfactory, that of KOPPE and HODGE is still less so. Nor is any importance to be attached to the absence of the article with πρώτη. The simplest view, one that usually suggests itself to the children, is that of HARLESS and MEYER, accepted by EADIE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT: first in order; in point of, involving a promise, the preposition showing that in which the priority consists. The second commandment has attached simply "a broad declaration of the great principles of the Divine government," not a specific promise. As regards the difficulty that no commandment follows in the Decalogue with a promise, we may either accept the explanation of HARLESS that "first" refers only to what precedes in this case, or that of MEYER, which finds the rest of the series in other Mosaic commands (so ELLICOTT).—R.]

Ver. 3. That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth.—This is the purport of the promise. Exod. xx. 12; Deut. v. 16; LXX: ἵνα εὖ σοι γένηται καὶ ἵνα μακροχρόνιος γένη ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, ἥς ὁ κύριος ὁ θεός σου δίδωσί σοι. The Apostle only alters: καὶ ἔσθι μακροχρόνιος, omitting the last relative clause, which as a commandment of God designates, not merely Canaan, but every country appointed by Him as a home, Palestine in the case of the Jews. According to the quotation ἵνα a must be retained in the second half with the future, although the conjunctive occurs in the first half. WINER (p. 271) explains the construction with the future as a lapse into a direct discourse, despite similar examples. MEYER finds indicated in the conjunctive the mere actualization, in the future the certain entrance and continuance, hence a logical climax.* Undoubtedly ἵνα is to be taken as telic, and on account of the phrase, "thy father and thy mother," to be applied to individuals, not toti eorum genti (BENDEL, who prudently says beforehand: non tantum singulis; HARLESS and others). The well being is put in the front rank, the long life in the second. Even among the most decayed people it will go well with him who honors his parents in obedience, and his life will be long, at least quoad sufficientiam for eternal salvation (STIER). Godliness has indeed a promise for this life also (1 Tim. iv. 8), but certainly for that which is to come. To limit the promise to the spiritual possessions of the heavenly Canaan (JEROME, OLSHAUSEN) is incorrect. Tenior ætas pro captu suo allicitur promissione longæ vitæ (BENGEL). The attracting promise is chiefly to be taken in the sense and spirit of children, who hope for a long life; the history of nations and families confirm the truth of the promise. Hodie æque bene vivunt p̄i in omne terra, atque Israel olim in illa (BENGEL).

[We must reject both the generalizing and spiritualizing interpretations of the promise, and accept an individual reference of present validity. On this most recent commentators agree. And the promise is fulfilled in the usual course of providence with obedient children. The only question is: Did the Apostle by omitting the latter part of the commandment, which had a special reference to Canaan, himself apply the promise to obedient children in all lands, or did the original commandment imply this (the given land being the home in every case), so that the Apostle omits the last clause as unessential for his present purpose and really implied in τῆς γῆς? The former is the view of EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, and HODGE, the latter of BRAUNE and others. Either is preferable to MEYER's notion that the Apostle omitted the clause because his readers were familiar with the passage, and understood it in the general sense, though its original reference was only to Palestine.—R.]

The precept for fathers; ver. 4. And ye fathers.—Quickly and closely he connects this with καὶ.* He addresses the "fathers," because he regards the mothers as "submitting to their own husbands" (v. 22, 24, 33), who are their responsible representatives. Facilius parentes et heri abutuntur potestate sua, quam mariti (BENGEL); that lies in the freer position of the former. We are not to refer this to grown up children (OLSHAUSEN), since "bring them up" follows; nor is there any oriental depreciation of the mother (RUECKERT), since ver. 2 commands: "honor thy mother," and Gen. xxiv. 67; xxxvii. 10; 1 Kings ii. 19; Judges v. 7; 2 Sam. xx. 19 teach us otherwise.†

The prohibition: Provoke [or fret] not your children to wrath, μὴ παροργίζετε τὰ τέκνα υἱῶν.—It is parallel to the παραζηλοῦν, Rom. x. 19; it is explained by Col. iii. 21 (ἄ: παροργίζετε, others: ἐπεθίζετε—ἵνα μὴ ἀθυμώσιν). It is the hasty, rough, moody treatment of children, so that, without childish confidence, without joyful obedience, they are repelled and enticed to opposition, defiance and bitterness. Righteous, wholesome parental anger is not excluded, but painful, arbitrary, grumbling treatment, as well as rough, unjust treatment, without sparing the childish nature. [ALFORD: "The Apostle seems to allude to provoking by vexatious commands and unreasonable blame, and uncertain temper, in ordinary intercourse."—R.]

The command: But bring them up, ἀλλὰ ἡμετέρε αὐτὰ (v. 29).—This points to children who still require care. But it should not be the mere growing up of the proletarians, but spiritual also. Hence:

In the discipline and admonition of the Lord, ἐν παιδείᾳ καὶ νοουθεσίᾳ κυρίου. Thus the element is denoted in which the bringing up should be consummated.* The former consists in work, the latter in word; the former is discipline (LUTHER), not merely punishment, also strict ordering of the household, accustoming to self-denial, serviceableness, confession of faults without shuffling. Heb. xii. 6, 7. The latter (LUTHER: admonition) comprises earnest warning (1 Cor. x. 11) and kind exhortation (Tit. iii. 10; Rom. xv. 14; Col. iii. 16; i. 28; 1 Cor. iv. 14; 1 Thess. v. 14; 2 Thess. iii. 15), which evidently predominates over serious rebukes. It is important that the former comes first, and this last. Hæc altera occurrit ruditati, altera oblivioni et levitati; utraque et sermonem et reliquam disciplinam includit (BENGEL). [Comp. TRENCH, Syn. § xxxii., whose views correspond in the main with those suggested here, and are adopted by EADIE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT.—R.] Hence the first is not general, the training of children in general, the latter special, the reproof for the purpose of improvement (HARLESS, MEYER), nor are they indistinguishable synonyms (KOPPE). The genitive belongs to both words: the Lord does it through the father as His representative; it is therefore a genitive subjecti. [So HARLESS, DE WETTE, MEYER, EADIE, HODGE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT and others: the discipline and admonition prescribed by the Lord and to be regulated by His Spirit.—R.] It is not then: to the Lord (LUTHER), nor=well-pleasing to the Lord (FLATT), or=de Christo (MICHAELIS), nor are we to accept that the Apostle himself scarcely knew how to explain it (RUECKERT).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The presupposition for the conduct of children to parents and parents to children is the relation of both to Christ. The children should do their duty "in the Lord" (ver. 1), the parents "in the discipline and admonition of the Lord" (ver. 4), and that too from infancy ("bring them up"). Baptism, infant baptism, is thus presupposed as the basis for the children as well as for the treatment of children. And all the more so, that there is expressed for the children no termination or cessation of their conduct toward their parents and for the parents no beginning of the influence on the children, nor is any hint given of the baptismal act to be effected or experienced, which could scarcely be wanted after iv. 5 ("one baptism"), since the fellowship of the Lord is indicated in the case of children as well as parents. HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis, II. 2, p. 193) properly recalls Acts xvi. 15. For before mention was made of the household of the jailer, and without any impression of what had occurred having been made upon his household, it was said to him: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ

* [ELLICOTT suggests that the particle "marks that obligation was not all on one side, but that the superior also had duties which he owed to the inferior."—R.]

† [EADIE limits this precept to fathers, urging that mothers are apt to spoil the child by indulgence, while fathers are apt to chastise in a passion. But the other view is preferable.—R.]

and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." We should therefore with AUGUSTINE (De Gen. X. 23, Serm. X.) and ORIGEN (ad Rom. vi.) regard infant baptism as an ordinance instituted by the Apostles. It was practised in the days of TERTULLIAN, but no mention is made of its having been introduced. Accordingly our passage refers the nurture of children to the basis of baptism and the family: family education and baptismal education are enjoined. [The relation to Christ rests not on the baptismal act, but on the relation to the believing parents, hence children are to be baptized "as members of Christ's Church" (Ref. Church, form of baptism), are thus publicly acknowledged and sealed as Christian children, whose personal piety is to be looked for in faith just as it is prayed for in faith. Despite all abuse of this Christian truth, it is the truth, and holding it fast we may hope for a piety which rests on an educational, not a spasmodic, basis.—In regard to the apostolic origin of the ordinance, the negative proof is overwhelming. Besides the allusion here and in Acts xvi., it is inconceivable that the Jews, who attacked Paul on every actual point of difference, could have omitted opposition here, had he failed to perpetuate in some distinct form the Old Testament doctrine of covenant blessings on the household.—But as negative proof it leaves room for honest adherence to that marked individualistic form of Christianity, which is necessary, it would seem, for many minds of that cast.—R.]

2. The Apostle requires obedience on the part of the children to their parents as God's representatives. This is a manifestation of that honor which God requires. It is established, regulated and limited through Christ, and is the foundation of earthly happiness. While ὑπακούειν denotes obedience as a reverent hearing, listening to the parents' will, not merely in order to know it, but rather to be directed by it, so the German word: gehören [derived from hören—our English hearken], related to hörig, gehörig, zugehörig [all meaning: belonging to, but strengthened in the longer forms], refers to the internal relation of dependence which finds its answering expression in gehorsam [obedience]. Both refer to the relation of piety [i. e., filial piety, since piety toward God and parents are recognized as identical in the Latin word pius], and include as the innermost motive love, which devotes itself with recognition of the parental dignity, even when parental worthiness is wanting. Over against the will of the parents the will of the child is illegal; but this statement is valid only so far as the parents exercise their will as the representatives of God, and their will is not opposed to God's will. In this there is a hint that the Fifth Commandment belongs to the first table (BRAUNE, Die heil. 10 Geb. pp. 85-88). This requirement, to agree to the will of parents, does not cease in the course of years, though it receives limitations from the avocation and position of the children, as in the case of our Lord (John ii. 4)

3. The blessing of the Fifth Commandment points to this fact, that in God's world and God's government His law, which is in accordance with the whole as well as with each individual part, is and must be of validity, and because it is valid for life, is given in correspondence with the ordinances of His Creation and Providence. The blessing is not an arbitrarily placed reward, but a result of obedient, actual and true obedience. One cannot creep into the blessing through constrained or feigned obedience. Obedience, this deeply rooted act of a will, growing morally, is not an affair of selfish calculation, still less can an immoral or demoralizing observance of a natural law be spoken of. Nor is the blessing promised for the life of the earthly family and people to be so lightly esteemed, that it must be transferred to the inheritance of the heavenly Canaan. Welfare and long life will be constantly regarded and used by the Christian as a gift of the gracious God; if something is lacking, he will never murmur nor doubt, as if God did not keep His promise, since our obedience of His commandment is never so perfect that it can be brought into an account with Him; it is rather the case that He has always vouchsafed and still vouchsafes to us more than we deserve.

4. Christian education must be consummated in the family, and if the family, in which children are born, is broken up by death, or destroyed by social, individual or sinful relations, and made incapable of fulfilling the task of education, each child should still be transferred to a family, or every institution which undertakes the task must be formed as a family.—Christian nurture must begin with the earliest childhood, with the beginning of the child's life (ἐκπύερε). On this account ἐν παιδείᾳ comes first, and νομοθεσία follows. Matters pertaining to the ordering of the household, to habits, to treatment without speaking, even to punishment, come first. Comp Heb. xii. 6; Prov. iii. 11, 12; xxii. 15; xxiii. 13.—But it must add to this and pass over into admonition by word, both alike "of Christ," not of self-will, but under the Lord to whom we are responsible. Hence this education must be Christian.*—Further it connects itself with baptism; hence it is Churchly. Comp. VON ZESCHWITZ, System der Christlich Kirchlichen Katechetik, II. 1, § 2. [More Christian than Churchly however. Hence in those lands where the Church as such must needs control education, there is little gain for the Church or for Christ. Were the family instruction what it ought to be, there is no fear of children becoming irreligious from attending common schools (i. e., schools of the State, not of the Church).—The question of Sunday Schools ought to be far oftener studied in the light of this section.—R.]—The mother is not excluded, but only subordinated to the father (vers. 2, 4). The mother's influence on the formation of character is quiet and deep, reaching both to the tenderest germs and the profoundest depths of the heart. 2 Tim. i. 5.—Finally the individuality of the child must be well considered, and one not be treated as another. Such a difficult task can be performed only in the strength of the Lord, by whom we are ourselves educated.

* [HODGE: "As Christianity is the only true religion, and God in Christ the only true God, the only profitable education is the nurture and admonition of the Lord. That is, the whole process of instruction and discipline must be that which He prescribes and which He administers, so that His authority should be brought into constant and immediate contact with the mind, heart and conscience of the child. It will not do for the parent to present himself as the ultimate end, the source of knowledge and possessor of authority to determine truth and duty. This would be to give his child a mere human development. Nor will it do for him to urge and communicate everything on the abstract ground of reason; for that would be to merge his child in nature. It is only by making God, God in Christ, the teacher and ruler, on whose authority everything is to be believed, and in obedience to whose will everything is to be done, that the ends of education can possibly be attained." But it must still be maintained, that the place where this close contact with Christ as Ruler and Teacher and Saviour is to be brought about is not the school, whether parochial school or Sunday School, but as a rule the household, since the command is addressed to "fathers," who, standing in loco Dei in the family, should not too readily abdicate from their responsible position.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Comp. Doctr. Notes and BRAUNE, Die heiligen 10 Gebote, pp. 84–106.—True obedience is so difficult, that it becomes possible only to the Christian child in the strength of the developed baptismal grace; not the natural, only the spiritual man is capable of proper obedience and becomes more and more so. On the other hand Christian training is so difficult, that only Christian parents can grant it, and this too without having learned the art, often without being conscious of it.—By the child's cradle you still humbly look up to God; you cannot boast that you have given the child life; must indeed confess that you have imparted sin to them.—Eve preferred her first-born Cain (=weapon) to Abel (=shadow, nothingness).—Be sparing of words in your discipline; let your children obey without asking why and punish rather before than after five years of age, else they will punish you.

STARKE: God joins certain promises to His commandments, that we may be the more willing to live in accordance with them. If obedient children have a promise, disobedient ones have a threatening.—The training of children is an art not easily learned. Parents, you must study this, that you may learn it, and implore this grace from God; but especially must you be watchful over all your own conduct, that you give no bad example to your children; and above all implant the true fear of God in their hearts.—If parents bring up their children to the glory of God and the advantage of the world, that is more and better than to leave them great earthly treasures.

RIEGER: The phrase: in the Lord, leads us to perceive that they must be chiefly guided and impelled therein by God's commandment, the walk of the Lord Jesus on the earth; the hope of future recompense from the Lord; but also that it sometimes requires courage to be obedient in all things, and for the Lord's sake to rise above even the parents who stand in the way.—It is often asked how shall we encourage and incite children to their duty? and it is generally thought that the love of honor and the excitement of this feeling are the best means. But he who in accordance with God's word meets their sense of truth with this thought: for this is right, proceeds far more securely. There is often in children a far purer feeling than we suppose, we frequently corrupt it by presenting so many frivolous motives.—With the power of self-will love would never suffice for constant obedience, did it not derive support from reverence.—All promises of God must however be treated believingly, i. e., humbly, for they allow nothing to be extorted from them. Provoking to wrath takes place not only through unmerciful beating, but also through other unskilful treatment, even though it often has the appearance of right.—God has Himself given us the best pattern of “bringing up.” At first without the sharp condemnation of sin designed in the law He led men by His eye and kept them walking before Him. After the stricter imputation of sin through the law, He guided them through His grace in Christ.

HEUBNER: The forbearance, the mildness, the fairness towards children, which Paul enjoins, consists in this, that one neither unmercifully punishes them on account of faults and infirmities, nor teases them with their education and conversion, but leads them with love and earnestness, removing hindrances, and for the rest commending them to the care of the Lord, who loves children. The child has not yet a very lively sense of sin, hence you must not overdo this matter of conversion.—Thus much is certain: religious culture should begin early; the child's heart can be early won and be influenced by love to Jesus. This is the spirit of Christian nurture, which proceeds without constraint and cannot play much with dogmatics.

PASSAVANT: How difficult for a child's heart is child-like obedience! for all are sinners, and in all sin there is self-desire, self-will, opposition.—Ill-bred children rarely become good subjects to the king, good citizens for the State, good brethren, good friends, or good parents to their children.

STIER: The obedience of children is due according to natural and revealed right.—The first school of obedience for man is his relation as child.—The mother's love must compensate when the father's character inclines to severity; the father's earnestness and strictness must step in where the mother's natural tenderness is insufficient.

SCHLEIERMACHER: The nature of filial obedience: 1. From what it should arise: neither hold out rewards, nor threaten punishments; nor gratify forward asking for reasons; solely out of filial respect. 2. On what grounds it is recommended: citing the old promise.

ANACKER: To what education must be directed, that it may bear fruit for time and eternity. 1. That the youth learn proper obedience; 2. That they are led through love to obedience; 3. That mildness and strictness be rooted in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

HOFMANN: The personal work of the parents: anger their greatest hindrance; their surest means: nurture your children into the Lord.—The nurture of the Lord: The fundamental traits and principles of Divine training, presented in the history of salvation from the beginning of our race on and in the conversion of individuals through the training of the Holy Ghost; some applications thence to our training: doing acts of love, blessing (Meyer), preserving from ungodly influences, promising, punishing.—Admonition of the Lord: reminder that Christ should be glorified in the children and that they should become happy men, skilful warriors of God.

ZIMMERMANN: From what you seek in your children, measure what you owe to them! 1. You desire obedience from them, show yourselves full of love to them. 2. You desire that they honor you, apply to them the right nurture. 3. You desire that they protect and adorn your old age, so help them to inherit the promise: that it may be well with thee and that thou mayest live long on the earth.

[HODGE: Children should obey their parents. This obedience should be in the Lord, determined and regulated by a regard to Christ. The ground of the obligation is: 1. It is in itself right; it is enforced by an express command in the Decalogue, to which a special promise is annexed, vers. 1-3.—Ver. 4. A parent had better sow tares in a field from which he expects to derive food for himself and family, than by his own ill-conduct nurture evil in the heart of a child.—R.]

[EADIE: Ver. 1. The love which Jesus showed to children, when He took them in His arms and blessed them, should induce them, in a spirit of filial faith and fondness to obey their parents, and to regard with special sacredness every parental injunction. And that obedience, if prompted, regulated, and bounded by a sense of religious obligation, will be cheerful, and not sullen; prompt, and not dilatory; uniform, and not occasional; universal, and not capricious in its choice of parental precepts.—Filial obedience, under God's blessing, prolongs life, for it implies the possession of principles of restraint, sobriety, and industry, which secure a lengthened existence.—Ver. 4. Such training leads to early piety, and such is ever welcome to Christ and His Church. For the sun shining on a shrub, in its green youth, is a more glad some spectacle than the evening beam falling dimly on the ivy and ruins of an old and solitary tower.—R.]

[While ver. 4 does not mean (see Exeg. Notes) instruction and admonition concerning Christ, it is still true that a father, who, by proper discipline tempered with love, ever keeps the heart of his children in intimate and trustful allegiance, by his very demeanor teaches lessons concerning Christ and God, that are rarely learned so easily in other ways. Many a son is kept from utter ruin by remembering a mother's love and piety, but happy is he who has had such a father as Paul here sketches in bold outline, for amid every doubt that assails head and heart alike, the reality of that father is an evidence, in kind though not in degree, of what God is to us, which no speculations can overbear.—R.] e. Servants and Masters.

(CHAP. VI. 5-9.)

- 5 Servants,¹ be obedient to them that are your masters [to your masters] according to the flesh,² with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto [to] 6 Christ; Not with [or in the way of] eye service, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ,³ doing the will of God from the heart; With good will doing 7 service, as⁴ to the Lord, and not to men: Knowing that whatsoever⁵ good thing any man doeth [each one shall have done], the same shall he receive⁶ of the Lord, 9 whether he be bond [bondsmen] or free. And, ye masters, do the same things unto [towards] them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also [their Master and yours]⁷ is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 5.—[Lachmann (N. A. B., a few cursives and fathers) places κατὰ σάρκα before κυρίως, but Tischendorf and recent editors regard this as a conformation to Col. iii. 22.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 7.—[The Rec. (with D³ K. L.) omits ὡς, but it is well sustained and generally accepted.—R.]

of the other readings. \aleph^1 has $\epsilon\alpha\nu\tau\acute{\omega}\nu$, while six other variations (in position or through omission) occur. The Rec. ($\delta\upsilon\mu\acute{\omega}\nu$ $\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{\omega}\nu$) is poorly supported, but probably arose early, as a correction, the reference to the slaves being misunderstood; partial attempts at restoration led to changes in position (see Meyer).—The idea presented, that of a common Master, seems to be better preserved by omitting the word both, which a literal translation would insert before theirs.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The precept for SERVANTS; vers. 5-8. a. The precept, ver. 5. b. Closer definition, vers. 6, 7. c. Praise and promise, ver. 8. Comp. Col. iii. 22-25.

Ver. 5. The precept. Servants, οἱ δοῦλοι.—In this context this means the domestics, the serving members of the household, as ver. 3: "as the servants of Christ," shows, and ver. 8: "whether bond or free," requires; it includes here the free servants also (BENGEL, STIER, BLEEK), does not refer to slaves alone (MEYER, SCHENKEL).^{*} Thus this section gains its continued validity and importance for all relations of subordination, that of subject and citizen also (GROTIUS: eadem est ratio in republica et in familia). The passage says nothing for or against slavery. See Doctr. Notes.

Be obedient, ὑπακούετε.—Thus the Apostle places the servants on an equality with the children, in the same dependence upon the masters, who are the parents to the children.

To your masters according to the flesh, τοῖς κυρίοις κατὰ σάρκα.—Thus the masters are designated as bodily (LUTHER) according to Rom. i. 3; ix. 3, 5, where the last phrase denotes external, temporal, earthly relations. There is also thereby involved at the same time the δεσποτεία πρόσκαιρος καὶ βραχὺία (CHRYSOSTOM) and the limitation of freedom in external relations (CALVIN).[†]

The obedience is more closely defined: with fear and trembling, μετὰ φόβου καὶ τρόμου.—Comp. Phil. ii. 12; 2 Cor. vii. 15; 1 Cor. ii. 3. This is solicita reverentia, which has in mind as regards the masters the copied majesty of God, remembering the judgment and recompense before Him. [So HODGE]. It does not refer then to anger and rebuke and punishment (BENGEL), nor is it to be weakened into tender, anxious conscientiousness (OLSHAUSEN, MEYER, SCHENKEL). [So ALFORD, ELLICOTT. EADIE remarks: "The Apostle in the following clauses hits upon those peculiar vices which slavery induces, and which are almost inseparable from it: indolence and carelessness."—R.]

To guard against every misunderstanding there is added: in singleness of your heart, ἐν ἀπλότῃ τῆς καρδίας ὑμῶν.—This not only consists in considering the one interest of the master (HARLESS), but like 2 Cor. viii. 2, 3;

^{*} [Nearly all English and American commentators accept the exclusive reference to slaves, bondmen (CONYBEARE); and with good reason, since the word means "slave" over against a hired servant (Luke xv. 17, 19), and since the greater proportion of servants in those days were slaves. Ver. 8 may be quite as readily urged in favor of the exclusive reference. Still the passage has, and was designed to have, a continued validity, which is better indicated by retaining the word "servants."—R.]

[†] [On the distinction between κύριος and δεσπότης, which Paul uses in 1 Tim. vi. 1; Tit. ii. 21, see TRENCH, Syn. xviii; it is neglected here probably because the former word was to be used again (ver. 7) in a higher sense, as indeed κατὰ σάρκα implies. The deduction from the latter phrase, that spiritual freedom was left intact is generally accepted, though it is doubtful whether the phrase itself implies this.—R.]

xi. 3, includes willingness and the opposite of πανουργία, excluding all untruth. [This phrase sets forth the element ($\epsilon\iota\varsigma$) of the obedience, as the last phrase expressed its accompanying features. "Singleness" is an apt rendering of the word, which marks that openness and sincerity of heart which repudiates duplicity in thought or action. On the classical use of the word see HARLESS; comp. TRENCH, Syn. II. § vi.—R.] Quoniam pessimos etiam quosque pœnæ timor cogebat, Christianos servos ab impiis discernit affectu (CALVIN). It is all to be done: as to Christ, ὡς τῷ Χριστῷ, tanquam (ERASMUS), not sicut (Vulgate) Christo; v. 22. ["He being the source and ground of all Christian motives and duties" (ALFORD). "As common and secular inducements can have but small influence on the mind of a slave, so the Apostle brings a religious motive to bear upon him" (EADIE). It may be added that if this motive could be brought to bear on the class to whom the exhortation of the Apostle most directly applies in these days when "the workman's question" is so much discussed, the solution of that question would be less difficult.—R.]

Vers. 6, 7. Closer definition. Not with [or in the way of] eye-service as men-pleasers, μὴ κατ' ὄφθαλμοδουλείαν ὡς ἀνθρώπου πρέσβου.—The first phrase, as the opposite of "in singleness of your hearts," denotes the mode, method, maxim of the service (STIER).^{*} Paul uses the plural in Col. iii. 22: ἐν ὀφθαλμοδουλείᾳ. THEODORET explains the word as τὴν οὐκ εὐκρινεὺς καρδίᾳ προσφερομένην θεραπείαν, ἀλλὰ τὸ σχῆματι κεχωρμένῃν. (EUCYMENUS also remarks: μηὶ ὅταν παρείσιν οἱ δεσποταὶ καὶ ὁρῶσιν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀπόντων αὐτῶν. The reference is not simply to compulsion, but the appearance of faithful service is designated. They are really "men-pleasers," they wish to please men alone, who can only see what is before their eyes; thus they use their master's human weakness to their own advantage. The studium placendi hominibus is expressly rejected from the Christian point of view.

The antithesis follows: but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart.—The first phrase is opposed to: "as men-pleasers," the second, which characterizes the servants of Christ,[†] to: "with eye-service." The servants of Christ naturally do the will of God, which is also the will of Christ (John x. 30; v. 30), and that too "from the heart," without discontent with their service or murmuring in their service; this necessarily distinguishes them from others, even from those who may be doing the will of God.[‡]

[†] [RECKE makes the first phrase subordinate to the second, removing the comma after Χριστῷ (so TRICHENDORF, ed. 7, against recent editors generally); but this destroys the obvious antithesis.—R.]

[‡] [EADIE, HODGE and ALFORD render: "the slave of Christ,"

Ver. 7. One thing more is added, which completes the last designation: with good-will doing service, as to the Lord.—Μετ' εὐνοίας δουλεύοντες marks the personal dependence on the masters, in which they serve them (LUTHER, [E. V.]: "with good-will"), so that they serve them, "as to the Lord," tanquam domino, i. e. Christo. This is rendered emphatically prominent by the antithesis: and not to men, καὶ οὐκ ἀνθρώποις.—On this account "from the heart" is not to be separated from "doing" (ver. 6) and joined to "doing service" (CHRYSOSTOM, JEROME, BENIGL, HARLESS, STIER), which in that case would unnecessarily receive two adverbial qualifications. [So LACIMANN, DE WETTE and ALFORD (who makes a good defence), but the other view is maintained by TISCHENDORF, MEYER, ELLICOTT, HODGE and EADIE. ELLICOTT, however, defends the view of HARLESS (against MEYER), that ἐκ ψυχῆς seems to mark the relation of the servant to his work, μετ' εὐνοίας pointing to his relation to his master.—R.] Still less is "with good-will" to be joined with what precedes and this verse rendered: Let yourselves think that you serve the Lord and not men (LUTHER). Thus the precept of ver. 5 has been more closely described and a return made to it.

Ver. 8. Basis and promise. Knowing, εἰδότες. [ELLICOTT: "seeing ye know."]—Thus Paul refers the servants to their faith, to the certain confidence: that whatsoever good thing each one shall have done, the same shall he receive of the Lord.—Ὅτι ὃ ἐάν τι ἕκαστος is grammatically clear: ἐάν often is ἐν in relative clauses (WINER, p. 291) and ὅτι is thesis (BENIGL): ἕκαστος is not to be extended to both masters and servants; the context ("whether bond or free") limits it to those addressed; each one of you. [This view assumes that "bondman or free," refers to two classes of servants, but the more commonly received opinion includes the masters under the latter term, thus giving the verse the character of a general proposition. This is the more obvious reference, and has the advantage of giving an easy transition from the exhortation to the bondman to that to the free man (masters, ver. 9).—R.] In ποιήσῃ ἀγαθόν the verb stands first with emphasis; something depends on the doing; the will of God must be done by you, as well as on you. [The rendering: "shall have done," brings out best the relation to the time of recompense, i. e., the Second Advent of the Lord.—R.] Ἀγαθόν, "good," is only what takes place for Christ's sake, in love and obedience to Him. Τοῦτο is the "good," which the servant has done, and which παρὰ κυρίου κομισαί, "he shall receive of the Lord." The verb is joined with μισθός, 2 Pet. ii. 13; with ἐπαγγελίαν, Heb. x. 36; xi. 39; and with similar expressions, 1 Pet. i. 9; v. 4; it means: sibi auferet, reportabit (ERASMUS), recipiet (Vulgate) [E. V.: receive], from the Lord, from Christ in the Judgment. [ALFORD: "This in full," this exactly, he shall then receive in its value as then estimated, changed, so to speak, into the currency of that new and final state."—R.] Thus the complete recompense is marked (τὴν ἀνταπόδοσιν τῆς κληρονομίας, Col. iii. 24).—Whether he be bondman or free, added quickly without a verb; it is better to supply: fuerit (ERASMUS), than sit (MEYER and others). [ELLICOTT: "Whatsoever be his social condition here, the future will only regard his moral state." Comp. the citation from CHRYSOSTOM in ALFORD.—R.] From this it cannot be inferred that Paul had not conceived of the cessation of slavery before the Second Advent.

The precept for MASTERS and its basis, ver. 9. a. Positively; b. negatively; c. basis.

Ver. 9. And ye masters, καὶ οἱ κύριοι, who are thus recognized, just as "and ye fathers" (ver. 4).—The positive precept: do the same things towards them.—Τὰ αὐτὰ ποιεῖτε refers back both to "the will of God from the heart, with good-will" (RUECKERT), and to "submitting yourselves to one another" (v. 21); as the former should serve (δουλέιν), so the latter should rule (κυριεῖν). He does not require a δουλέιν from the masters (CHRYSOSTOM). Amor officia servilia et herilia moderatur (BENIGL). "Towards them" denotes the equal footing, as was already required in Deut. xv. 12; Levit. xxv. 42, 43; Job xxxi. 13-15, and enlarged in Christ. [EADIE: "The Apostle had stooped to the slave, and he was not afraid to speak with erect attitude to the master. The language is general, and expresses what Calvin well calls jus analogum,"—R.]

The negative precept: forbearing threatening.—Ἀνείντες, placed emphatically first, is according to Acts xvi. 26; xxvii. 40: to leave off, cease from; τὴν ἀπειλήν (Acts iv. 17, 29; ix. 1) they should not only moderate; for the singular does not mean a single threat, but threatening, minatio (Vulgate). ["Your usual, too habitual threatening" (MEYER, following ERASMUS; so ALFORD and ELLICOTT). The last named author says: "St. Paul singles out the prevailing vice and most customary exhibition of bad feeling on the part of the master, and in forbidding this naturally includes every similar form of harshness."—R.] Deposita fere a dominis servilia erat, suscepta fide; nunc etiam minae remittendae, ne ostentent servis potestatem suam ad terrendum (BENIGL). Thus Paul defines the action of the masters according to their disposition; in different forms of action the same disposition. Aequalitas naturae et fidei potior est, quam differentia status (BENIGL).

Basis: Knowing that their Master and yours is in heaven, εἰδότες ὅτι καὶ αὐτῶν καὶ ὑμῶν κύριός ἐστιν ἐν οὐρανοῖς. [See Textual Note 7].—"Knowing" (as in ver. 8) "that their Master and yours" conceives of both masters and servants as standing on an equality before Him, who helps the latter to their rights and will and can give the former their due. He "is in heaven," omnipotens, (BENIGL); before Him earthly power does not appear, is of no value; in His time He comes from heaven as Judge (1 Thess. iv. 16; 2 Thess. i. 7). Hence: neither is there respect of persons with him, καὶ προσωπολήψια οὐκ ἐστὶν παρ' but this is a harsh expression; ELLICOTT: "bond-servants." The idea of purchase and possession is probably implied.—R.]

αὐτῶν.—The substantive (Rom. ii. 11; Col. iii. 25; * Jas. ii. 1) is used by Paul in every case with reference to the Judgment. This is decidedly excluded, and the phrase suggests what one may expect to receive from Him (παρ' αὐτοῦ, ver. 8). Comp. Wisdom vi. 5-9; Gal. ii. 6.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Paul takes occasion elsewhere also to speak of the relations of service and the state of slavery (1 Cor. vii. 21-24; Col. iii. 22-25; 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2; Tit. ii. 9, 10), as does Peter (1 Pet. i. 18-25), without condemning these relations. But sympathizing, in a specially detailed manner, the gospel instructs those who serve, having for them an affectionate heart, an interesting discourse, a consoling word. It does not without further delay declare the slaves free, but it makes them free from within. Paul sent back to Philemon his escaped slave.† In the Church the master remains a master and the slave a slave. The Apostles see in the service of the bondmen, and in the position of servants, though established by wrong and deformed by sin, the fundamental traits of master and servant, as these are established by God. What the ancients already knew, that the slaves participated in the dignity of humanity and had the rights of humanity as well as their masters (SENECA: servi sunt? imo homines; servi sunt? imo contubernales; servi sunt? imo conservi, si cogitaveris tantundem in utrosque licere fortune), that was not first taught by Christianity. But it brought to masters and slaves one Redeemer, in whom both are brethren (Gal. iii. 28; Philem. 16); it wrought upon the disposition from the inner life of faith, so that at once the burden was lightened in Christian families, and in the course of centuries the relations were altered and the state of slavery was done away. Still "it must not be overlooked that Paul's mode of viewing the already present relation of freedom and slavery cannot be used to justify slavery introduced by Christians, the enslaving of free men, the slave-trade," etc. (MEYER). The most modern form of slavery, the Helotism of industry, cannot be viewed in the same way as something existing and historical; it remains a disgrace on which Christianity must prove, whether it is antiquated or retains its eternal powers.

2. The care of the Apostle in teaching servants

* [In Col. iii. 25, the same thought occurs in the former part of the exhortation, with a slightly different reference therefore. See Colossians, pp. 78, 79.—MEYER and ALFORD cite Seneca, Thyest. 607: "Vos, quibus rector maris atque terræ jus dedit magnam necis atque vitæ, imite infelatos tumidosque vultus. Quicquid a vobis minor extineat, major hoc vobis dominus minatur; Omne sub regno graviore regnum est."—R.]

† The reader is referred to the remarks of Dr. HACKETT, Philemon, pp. 29 ff., and the extracts there given on the subject of Christianity and slavery. On the general principles which this section implies most commentators agree; and these principles did abolish slavery in the early Christian centuries. Unfortunately there are times when and places where these principles, while theoretically accepted, do not operate toward the desired result; then God's Providence does quickly and retributively what men would not let His gospel do. Still emancipation is not necessarily Christian freedom. The gospel method begins within; the other lays upon Christ's Church the responsibility of so teaching the truth that "the truth may make free" those suddenly released from bondage. That is but the beginning of freedom.—R.] is for every preacher as well as for the Church an earnest exhortation to take up the oppressed.

3. Servants, subordinates, subjects must, irrespective of the example and conduct of their masters, demean themselves according to the commandment and direction of God. Benevolentiam, quæ in servo est, ne asperitas quidem heri extrinquit, ut in catellis (BENGEL).—[The general principles underlying this section are applicable to all relations of employer and employee. The latter is warned against eye-service, exhorted to faithful labor "as in God's sight," bid look to a higher recompense than the temporal wages, because serving a higher master; the former is reminded of the equality before God, how position does not avail before Him, and of the duty to Him involved in the duties of an employer. How many then may study these words with profit. Comp. Colossians, p. 79.—R.]

4. The following applies to the masters: ut Dominus vos tractavit, ita vos tractate servos; aut ut vos tractatis servos, ita ille vos tractabit (BENGEL).

5. The Judgment of God finally awards strict recompense. ["The Christian doctrine of reward is too often lost sight of or kept in abeyance, as if it were not perfectly consistent with the freest bestowment of heavenly glory" (EADIE).—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

God's service and the master's service.—Eye-servants and God's servants.—Those who serve are a necessary evil for the masters, who are unable by themselves alone to take care of their own, rather than the employers for the servants, who often first learn of them something of order, cleanliness and skill.—Ernest the Pious once said: Masters and mistresses can never answer to God, if they keep their domestics away from church-service.—STARKE: Those who murmur and growl in the services, as though weary of them, murmur against God Himself.—Servants can lay up for themselves in continued service a blessing or a curse: a blessing if they faithfully serve in the fear of the Lord, a curse, however, if they act falsely and faithlessly.—A pious serving-man, whose fidelity and industry is not perceived by his employers, and whose wages are improperly withheld or cut down, is known by God, who will give him the best reward.

RIEGER: Compulsory measures, severity and cunning are of no avail. They only make the servants more crafty.—A servant has often nothing in the world but his good name; and anxiety about this can easily lead one into eye-service; but with singleness of heart better progress is made in this direction.—Eye-service spoils the heart, wasting those powers, which would remain united in the fear of the Lord and preserve from weariness also.

HEUBNER: The higher Master frees from slavery. The Lord regards all; servants and slaves are as well-known to Him as masters and princes. Before Him the heart alone gives rank, and even the most trifling services, if rendered with an honest heart, receive their reward. What a transformation the Lord's Judgment will bring about! How much the serving class has to thank Christianity! It has made a freer feeling in service and better masters, and effected all this without a violent subversion of relations.—The rough and coarse master makes rough and coarse servants, the gentle master makes gentle servants. The master should not have an imperious, despotical feeling, but a ministering one.

PASSAVANT: This is true, and those who stand high and rule in the world, cannot bethink themselves of it too earnestly and humbly: Before God we are all alike, all of one origin, one nature, one sin—and all partakers of one grace, one redemption, one glory.—You look for so many virtues and perfections in your maid or man; with such conditions do you think you would be worthy or capable of being man or maid-servant?

GERLACH: Obedience to the bodily master should constantly be directed toward Christ.

[EADIE: "And with respect to servants of every denomination, equity requires that we treat them with humanity and kindness; that we endeavor to make their service easy, and their condition comfortable; that we forbear rash and passionate language; that we overlook accidental errors, and remit trivial faults; that we impose only such labor as is reasonable in itself and suitable to their capacity; that our reproofs be calm and our counsels well timed; that the restraints we lay upon them be prudent and salutary; that we allow them reasonable time for refreshment, for the culture of their minds, and for attendance on the worship of God; that we set before them a virtuous example, instil into them useful principles, warn them against wickedness of every kind, especially against the sin which most easily besets them; that we afford them opportunity for reading and private devotion, and furnish them with the necessary means of learning the way of salvation; that we attend to the preservation of their health, and have compassion on them in sickness; and, in a word, that we contribute all proper assistance to render them useful, virtuous, and happy" (from LATHROP, Ephesians).—R.]

5. Concluding exhortation.

CHAP. VI. 10-20.

- 10 Finally, my brethren, be strong [Finally be strengthened]¹ in the Lord, and in the 11 power of his might [in the might of his strength]. Put on the whole armour of 12 God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. For we wrestle [our² wrestling is] not against flesh and blood, but against [the] principalities, against [the] powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world [the world-rulers of this darkness],³ against spiritual wickedness [the spiritual hosts of wicked-13 ness]⁴ in high [heavenly] places. Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done [accom-14 plished] all, to stand. Stand therefore, having your loins girt [girt your loins] 15 about with truth, and having [put] on the breastplate of righteousness. And your feet shod [having shod your feet] with the preparation [preparedness] of the gospel 16 of peace; Above [In addition to]⁵ all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall 17 be able to quench all the fiery darts⁶ of the wicked [evil one]. And take⁷ [or receive] the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of 18 God: Praying always with all prayer and supplication [With all prayer and supplication praying at all times] in the Spirit, and watching thereunto⁸ with [in] all 19 perseverance and supplication for all [all the] saints; And for me [or on my behalf], that utterance may be given⁹ unto [to] me, that I may open my mouth boldly, [in the opening of my mouth, in boldness] to make known the mystery of 20 the gospel,¹⁰ For [or In behalf of] which I am an ambassador in bonds [literally in a chain]; that therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 10.—[The Rec. reads: τὸ λοιπὸν ἀδελφοί μου, but μοῦ λοιποῦ occurs in \aleph^1 A. B., 3 cursives, and some fathers; it is accepted by Lachmann, Rückert and Alford, but the other form is retained by Tischendorf, Meyer, Ellicott on the authority of \aleph^3 D. F. K. L., most cursives and fathers. Most editors, however, reject ἀδελφοί μου, which is found only in \aleph^3 K. L. (though in others with the omission of μου, and in a different position) most cursives and fathers; besides the good external authority for the omission (\aleph^1 B. D. E., good versions), the phrase is open to double suspicion: first, as usually following τὸ λοιπὸν, and hence likely to be inserted second, as not used in direct address in this Epistle (Olshausen). Meyer holds that the reading τοῦ λοιποῦ is a mechanical repetition from Gal. vi. 17, urging the insertion of the added phrase in favor of τὸ λοιπὸν, (see his critical note).—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 19.—[The words τοῦ εὐαγγελίου are omitted in B. F. G., and bracketted by Lachmann, but accepted by more recent editors (Tischendorf, Alford, Wordsworth, Ellicott) on the evidence of N. A. D. E. K. L., good cursives and versions.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Summary: 1. Internal strengthening, ver. 10; 2. Necessity of armor on account of the enemies, vers. 11-13; 3. The armor itself, vers. 14-17 (a. the preparation, vers. 14, 15; b. the defensive armor, vers. 16, 17 a; c. the one offensive weapon, ver. 17 b); 4. The prayer and intercession, vers. 18-20 (a. prayer in general; b. intercession in general, ver. 18; c. intercession for the Apostle, vers. 19, 20).

Ver. 10. Finally, τὸ λοιπόν.—Particula sive formula concludendi et ut ad rem magnam excitandi, 2 Cor. xiii. 11, formula progrediendi (BENGEL). Phil. iii. 1; iv. 8; 1 Thess. iv. 1; 2 Thess. ii. 1. LUTHER is good: finally. Τοῦ λοιποῦ [see Textual Note 1] would mean: henceforth, in future (Gal. vi. 17); here it would be unintelligible.

Be strengthened in the Lord, ἐνδυναμοῦσθε ἐν κυρίῳ.—What in the active form is ascribed to the Lord, who strengthens (Phil. iv. 13; 1 Tim. i. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 17), is expressed by the passive* here, without further qualification, Acts ix. 22; more closely defined in 2 Tim. ii. 1: "in the grace;" Rom. iv. 20: "in faith;" Heb. xi. 34: "out of weakness" (ex morbo convalescere). It cannot be middle (PISCATOR), nor can κυρίῳ refer to God (B-CRUSIUS). The general qualification: in the Lord is then more closely defined: and in the might of his strength, καὶ ἐν τῷ κρᾶτει τῆς ἰσχύος αὐτοῦ.—Kal is explicative here. ["This appended clause serves to explain and specify the principle in which our strength was to be sought for, and in which it dwelt" (ELLICOTT).—R.] On the whole phrase see Exeg. Notes, i. 19. This gives prominence to what comes to us from Christ (1 Cor. xii. 9); Christ's strength becomes our strength; only in Him are we strengthened.

The necessity of armor (panoply) on account of the enemies; vers. 11-13.

Ver. 11. Put on the whole armour of God [ἐνδύσασθε τὴν πανοπλίαν τοῦ θεοῦ].

* ["Be strong" does not bring out this passive force; hence "be strengthened" is generally substituted by English commentators and revisers.—R.]

—To those being strengthened in the Lord it is said: "put on;" ἐνδύσασθε has something of a paronomasia between ἐνδυναμοῦσθε and δύνανται. The internal strengthening must appropriate the proffered means of assistance, in order to become powerful in conflict. For this the Christian requires τὴν πανοπλίαν* τοῦ θεοῦ (here, ver. 13; Luke xi. 22). The figure of a conflict is frequently used by the Apostle (2 Cor. x. 4; 1 Tim. vi. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 7; Rom. vi. 13, 23; 1 Thess. v. 8; comp. Isa. lix. 16-19; Wisdom v. 17-24). The word πανοπλία refers to the entire equipment; it will not suffice to choose, or put on one or another piece of this military equipment; AMBROSE: universitas armorum; LUTHER incorrectly limits it to: Harnesch [old English harness, defensive armor], both here and ver. 13. But it must also be "the panoply of God," arma, quæ offeruntur, suppeditantur a Deo (CALVIN, CALOVIVS), therefore a Divine armament; the arms should be altogether of a Divine kind, in contrast to the arms of the opponent. The emphasis rests on the whole idea: God's equipment, neither on πανοπλία alone (MEYER), nor on θεοῦ alone (HARLESS).† It is not a detailed and playful imitation of 1 Thess. v. 8 (DE WETTE), but rather an independent reference to Isa. lix. 16-19, which is used in a different way for the Judgment in (Wisdom v. 17-24). Whether a Roman or Jewish warrior was in Paul's mind is in itself an unprofitable question; the former met him constantly, the latter not.

That ye may be able to stand, πρὸς τὸ δύνανσθαι ὑμᾶς στήναι. The first verb is repeated in ver. 13 (δυναθῆτε) and ver. 16 (δυνήσεσθε). Στήναι πρὸς τίνα is a military phrase, the opposite of φεύγειν, and denotes the acceptance of a conflict with him who attacks. ["To stand one's ground;" ELLICOTT remarks on the sense of πρὸς in this phrase, that it means

* [The E. V.: "whole armour," is the only possible translation of this word; "panoply" is simply the Greek word with an English termination, and is less readily understood by the ordinary reader. That both offensive weapons and defensive armor are included will appear at first glance from ver. 17.—R.]

† [EDIE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT follow MEYER, urging that the emphasis on τοῦ θεοῦ would imply some other spiritual armor, but BRAUNE's view avoids this objection, and is preferable on account of the double antithesis: "the wiles of the devil."—R.]

adversus, with the implied notion of hostility ('contra'), which is otherwise less usual unless it is involved in the verb. Comp. WINER, p. 378.—R.]

Against the wiles of the devil, πρὸς τὰς αἰθερίας τοῦ διαβόλου.—LUTHER very aptly renders it: "against the crafty assaults of the devil." The plural marks both the multiplicity of the concrete cases, and the obstinacy of the repeated attack (STIER).* Craft and strength are both present in the assault, but the latter is concealed under the former, thus becoming dangerous and destructive. "The devil" is mentioned as the precise enemy, even though it be sin that is to be immediately contended against (Heb. xii. 1, 4). "The panoply of God" and "the wiles of the devil," are thus opposed to each other. The power of the latter is by no means inconsiderable and the contest is difficult, hence the next statement.

Ver. 12. For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood [ὅτι οὐκ ἔστιν ἡμῖν ἡ πάλη πρὸς αἷμα καὶ σάρκα.] — "For" (ὅτι) introduces a reason for the proposition: "to stand against the wiles of the devil" is in question. The form οὐκ ἔστιν ἡμῖν ἡ πάλη is remarkable; ἡμῖν includes with emphasis the Apostle; a proposition valid for all is treated of; ἔστιν πάλη denotes the present conflict, while πάλη (πάλλειν, to throw, to swing), the wrestling-match, lucta (ERASMUS), collocutio (AUGUSTINE, Vulgate), is used in order to characterize the close, personal, struggle. Paul had in view the subject-matter and the readers, not mere rhetorical beauty. The article denotes the contest, which exists and which every one already knows. The Apostle denies the contest "against blood and flesh" because pone homines, qui nos infestant LATENT spiritus (BENGEL). Underneath and behind what is human and sinful, Satan himself is active (STIER). Paul insists on the final ground, the deepest cause of the contest, the guiding principle, the commanding general; flesh and blood is to him only the division of the army which presses forward, occasioning special danger. Comp. WINER, p. 463. AUGUSTINE: Non est nobis collocutio adversus carnem et sanguinem, i. e., homines, quos videtis vivere in nos. Vasa sunt, alius utitur; organa sunt, alius jungit. We have οὐκ—ἀλλά, hence not—non tam, non tantum—quam (GROTIUS, STIER and others). [Most commentators now oppose the softening down of the negation (following WINER and MEYER). The word πάλη (only here) has been generally considered a change of metaphor or taken in a general sense. It undoubtedly marks the hand to hand conflict, and should therefore be taken literally. MEYER, who formerly accepted a change of metaphor, now maintains that this figure enters only in the negative clause, and that some general word is to be supplied after ἀλλά. This avoids a mixing of metaphors, but the learned author does not seem to notice that it weakens the sense just where it ought to be strongest, in the positive clause. He also takes the article as generic, but ALFORD suggests that ἡ πάλη refers to "the only conflict which can be described by such a word—our life and death struggle, there being but one such," which is better.—R.]

The contest with flesh and blood is not, however, on this account excluded. The usual order is σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα (Matt. xvi. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 50; Gal. i. 16), in Heb. ii. 14 we find as a vigorous reading [probably the correct reading, as it is supported by our best uncial authorities.—R.]: αἷματος καὶ σαρκός. Since the formation of the flesh proceeds from the blood (Wisdom vii. 1, 2), reference is made here to the origin of man and his corrupt nature denoted, according to the context. The position of the two words is not accidental (MEYER). Elsewhere the phrase means human nature in itself (1 Cor. xv. 50), including what is sinful, Matt. xvi. 19; Gen. i. 16. One's own flesh and blood is also included here; it is not to be referred only to the human persons against one's self (BENGEL, HARLESS, MEYER, and others).

But, ἀλλά supply ἔστιν ἡμῖν ἡ πάλη.—Against the principalities, πρὸς τὰς ἀρχάς.—The repetition of the preposition with each term gives prominence rhetorically to the several notions. WINER, p. 392. Ἀρχάς indicates the organization of the kingdom of the devil, denoting the chiefs and heads of the separate groups.—Against the powers, πρὸς τὰς ἐξουσίας marks the efficient, attacking powers, comp. i. 21; iii. 10.—Against the world rulers of this darkness, πρὸς τοὺς κοσμοκράτορας τοῦ σκότους τούτου.—This term (also in the Hebrew [Rabbinical term] קְיִינִימִי) denotes the world-ruling power: for "the whole world lieth in darkness" (1 John v. 19; ii. 14) and Satan is "the god of this world" (2 Cor. iv. 4), "the prince of this world" (John xvi. 11; xiv. 30); his angels are under him world-rulers, whose sphere is designated by the genitive: "of this darkness." Κόσμος more closely designates the local extension and region of the dominion, τοῦ σκότους its quality as to origin and corruptness, but it is limited by τούτου, which points to something transient and bounded. On this account we should neither weaken the meaning of κοσμοκράτορες into "rulers" (HARLESS), nor is it necessary (with BENGEL, STIER [E. V.] and others) to read τοῦ αἰῶνος after τοῦ σκότους. BENGEL: *Bene quod non sunt omniterales: magna tamen non solum ipsius diaboli, sed etiam eorum, quibus præest, potentia est. Videntur alia esse genera malorum spirituum, quæ magis domi in arce regni tenebrarum muneant, imperia, potestates, aliud hoc tertium, quod foris mundanas quasi provincias obtinet munditinentes. The power is made prominent in the first two terms, and in the third the sphere; there follows next a designation which gives prominence to the character:

Against the spiritual hosts of wicked-

* [The word is generally used in a bad sense, though Diogenes Siculus uses the verb of geometrical investigations (ALFORD). EADIE renders it: "stratagems." ALFORD: "schemes." The form αἰθερίας is found in N. A. B. 1. D. F. K. L., many cursives, but not generally received, as the variation is supposed to be due to itacism (comp. iv. 14).—R.]

* [ELLIOTT: "The dogmatical meaning is correctly explained by the Greek commentators: the evil spirits exercise dominion over the κόσμος, not in its mere material nature, but in its ethical and perhaps intellectual character and relations, the depravation of which is expressed by τοῦ σκότους τούτου." MEYER's note (mainly adopted by ELLIOTT) in loco is interesting and valuable.—R.]

ness.—Πρὸς τὰ πνευματικὰ (Vulgate: spiritualia) is an abstract term, the concluding antithesis of "flesh and blood," comprising all the spiritualities, which, in contrast with the kingdom of the Holy Ghost, deserve the characteristic: τῆς πονηρίας, as the spirit of revolution; to such belong moral wickedness and malice, which is directed to the destruction of others. It is incorrect to take πνευματικῶ=πνεύματα (LUTHER: with evil spirits), or collectively as Geisterschaft (MEYER), or to translate the phrase spirituales nequitias (ERASMUS). [This view, supported by Braune, is that of STIER, but it is by no means so satisfactory as that of MEYER, accepted by HODGE, EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT and others. This takes the term collectively (see WINER, p. 224, and MEYER), as implying something more than "spirits," rather the bands, hosts, armies, confraternities of spirits, best expressed by the German term: Geisterschaft. See ELLICOTT against the altogether untenable rendering of the E. V., as well as against the abstract meaning in general.—R.]

In heavenly places, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις.—This is to be connected grammatically with τὰ πνευματικὰ (omnium doctorum opinio, JEROME), and, as in iii. 10; i. 3, 20; ii. 6; has a local signification, designating a region in antithesis to the earthly, to what is in any manner perceptible to the sense; here, where angels are spoken of, it means the region assigned to these beings who are purely spiritual over against men, and although there are angels who have not remained in their original fellowship with God, yet there still remains to them a region corresponding to their nature, of course not in nearness to God. It does not then mean in statu celesti as a moral notion, but only as a physical one, so that it may be taken as parallel to ἀήρ, ii. 1, though it is not exactly equivalent; ἀήρ is spoken of from the stand-point of man, τὰ ἐπουράνια from the nature of angels, marking the dangerous element of the contest with these spirits and their spiritualities. Hence before all we are to reject the explanation: "for heavenly possessions" (GREEK FATHERS, CALOVIVS, MORUS and others), since the position of the words will not permit this phrase to be joined with πάλη in the beginning of the sentence, passing over ἀλλά, nor is ἐν=ἐπὶ, διὰ, while the signification of the phrase is uniformly local. [Comp. i. 3.] It does not designate the place of the conflict, the kingdom of heaven (MATTHIES),* nor the place, but in a symbolical sense, out into the fathomless air, in order to show that the contest is unequal Marte iniquo (RUECKERT), or in such a way that region and subject meet, as though a conflict was spoken of in our souls, but respecting calling and sanctification, our praying and preaching of God's grace (STIER); nor yet are we to think of the spiritual world and its affairs (B-CRUSIVS). Finally with the proper view of the connection we should neither interpolate a "formerly" (SEMLER), as though only the previous condition of the angels was denoted, nor does it suffice to accept the limitation to a locality excluded (HORMANN, Schriftbeweis, i. 455), nor is it admissible to treat the notion of heaven as an elastic one, so that these angels are still relatively in a heaven, the atmospheric one (MEYER). Nor does it at all mean a pretended stay, so that the expression is apt irony in view of the arrogation of equal dignity, power and glory with God (SCHENKEL).

[The connection with the phrase immediately preceding is accepted by nearly all recent commentators, but there is necessarily difference of opinion about the exact force of the term. ELLICOTT objects to any precise specification of locality, though referring to HOFMANN, whose view is properly rejected by MEYER. SCHENKEL'S view is a pure invention. Such irony was not befitting the earnestness of Paul's discourse, and was scarcely so "apt" as SCHENKEL thinks, if no one else but himself has hitherto appreciated it. ELLICOTT aptly expresses the sense: "supernal spirits of evil." The E. V. shows the reluctance to apply the word "heavenly" to evil spirits. See MEYER and EADIE for notice of other shifts.—R.]

Ver. 13. Wherefore, διὰ τοῦτο, because we have to contend against such.—Take up the whole armour of God.—Comp. ver. 11. Ἀναλάβετε is a technical term for taking up the arms.—That ye may be able to withstand.—Instead of πρὸς (ver. 11) we here have ἵνα; the goal is denoted there, the purpose here; ἀντιστῆναι is somewhat livelier, indicating the attacks of the spirit, whom he in spirit sees making an assault.—In the evil day, ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ πονηρᾷ.—At all events this means a particular day, immediately impending, but quite as certainly is it not the same for every one, since a common contest is not implied, not a battle, but a πάλη, "wrestling," in which the victory is decisive for "the day of redemption." Therefore the decisive, imminent day of conflict for each one is marked. BENGE: bellum est perpetuum; pugna alio die minus fervet; dies malus vel ingruente morte, vel in vita; longior, brevior, in se ipso saepe varius. [So HODGE, EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT.] See Doctr. Notes. It is neither the day of death (SCHMID), still less the day of Judgment (JEROME), nor in general every day of conflict with its calamity (THEODORET, PELAGIUS, HARLESS and others), [nor the present life with the accompanying thought of brevity, CHRYSOSTOM, EUCUMENIUS, THEOPHYLACT,] nor the particular common day [of the last great Satanic outbreak] before the Second Advent (KOPPE, MEYER, STIER and others), nor is it merely the evil hours (LUTHER).

And having accomplished all, to stand [καὶ πάντα κατεργασάμενοι στήναι].—To ἀντιστῆναι, referring to the conflict, the Apostle appends (καὶ) στήναι, which designates the victorious keeping the field on the place of contest; it is the opposite of fleeing, yielding, being thrown down. Ἀπαντα κατεργασάμενοι, placed first, denotes a performing, effecting, the object of which is more fully designated with πάντα, more comprehensible than πάντα, omnia operati (JEROME), well executing all (LUTHER); comp. Rom. vii. 13; Phil. ii. 12.

* [EADIE adopts this view: "The celestial spots occupied by the Church; on them this combat is to be maintained. Those evil spirits have invaded the Church—and therefore believers must encounter and fight them 'in the heavenly places.'" To this view nothing in the context points, while it seems a too remote connection to join this phrase with πάλη.—R.]

The Apostle here treats of the doing of the Divine will in all directions and relations, the ethical activity and efficiency of the Christian, which cuts its way through all assaults and conflicts from the side of the demons, without being led astray or weakened. It is neither—παρασκευασμένοι, omnibus rebus probe comparatis ad pugnam (BENGEL and others), nor—debellare, phrasis bellica (GREEK FATHERS, GROTIUS, KOPPE, HARLESS and others), nor does it refer to the conflict itself (MEYER and others), nor yet is it: in omnibus perfecti (Vulgate).

[The participle is never used by Paul in the sense of "having overcome;" it is therefore best to accept the usual meaning: "having accomplished," especially as we might expect a masculine object instead of the neuter ἀπαντα, were the former sense intended. At the same time the view of BENDEL is evidently too restricted for the extended meaning of both participle and object. There remains still another question respecting the scope of the clause. BRAUNE follows LUTHER in referring the infinitive to keeping the field; in that case the participle necessarily refers to all the antecedent action. EADIE, ALFORD, and ELLICOTT however apply the term to standing firm until the end of the combat, which seems preferable in view of the continued reference in context to the conflict itself. The participle, with its object, then means: having done all that the exigencies of the conflict require, "being fully equipped and having bravely fought."—R.]

The armor itself; vers. 14-17. a. The preparation; vers. 14, 15. b. The defensive armor; vers. 16, 17. a. c. The one offensive weapon; ver. 17 b.

Ver. 14. Stand therefore, στήτε οὖν, in the conflict, in order after the conflict to stand as victor. [MEYER, ELLICOTT: "stand ready for the fight;" ALFORD: "whether 'ready for the fight' or 'in the fight' matters very little: all the aoristic participles are in time antecedent to the στήτε—and the fight ever at hand."—R.]—Having girt your loins about with truth, περιζωσάμενοι τὴν ἀσπίδα τῆς ἀληθείας.—Being girded about their loins, they have on the girdle, or waist-belt (ζωστήρ, ζώνη), which covers the groin and the stomach below the breastplate, the most vulnerable part of the body, the region of the hips and loins; this is the first and a very important piece (Isa. v. 27; xi. 5; Luke xii. 35; 1 Pet. i. 13). [MEYER: "An ungirded soldier would be a contradiction in terms." The girdle kept the armor in place, formed in itself a part of the cuirass, and was also used to support the sword. The latter notion ALFORD regards as confusing here, but it hardly seems so, since the sword was objective truth.—R.]—Ἐν ἀληθείᾳ that with which the loins are enveloped, like καίειν ἐν πυρὶ, καλύπτειν ἐν ἡματίᾳ (WINER, p. 363*); here it means the objective truth revealed in the word, which is appropriated. Veritas adstringit hominem, mendaciorum magna est laxitas (GROTIUS). On this account we should neither exclude the former

(HARLESS, MEYER), nor understand merely the moral truth of willing (HARLESS) or the agreement of knowledge with the objective truth given in the gospel (MEYER), or sincerity (CALVIN and others), or apply this to ornament (HARLESS). [“Truth” here is subjective truth, since the article is wanting and the objective truth is mentioned in ver. 17. Still it is based on the faith and standing of a Christian (ALFORD): “the assured conviction that you believe” (EADIE). It should be noticed that faith (by implication) enters here and in the mention of the sword, as well as explicitly in the figure of the shield.—R.]

And having put on the breastplate of righteousness [καὶ ἐνδυσάμενοι τὸν θώρακα τῆς δικαιοσύνης].—Here καὶ adjoins another piece. *Ἐνδυσάμενοι means putting on like a part of the clothes. Τὸν θώρακα is added by the Apostle without a designation of the part of the body (στίθος) which it covers because that is self-evident. The genitive (τῆς δικαιοσύνης) is appositional; here it means the righteousness of faith and of life, justification and sanctification before God and men (Rom. vi. 4, 13). In pectore sedes est conscientiae, quae munivit iustitia. Hostis per omnia ipsi contraria vincitur (BENGEL). MEYER finds here the ethical rectitude, as in the previous clause the intellectual, which is only so far correct, that here we should find an ethical reference, there an intellectual one, as in v. 9; Isa. xi. 5. HARLESS: The righteousness of faith, with which alone one does not stand on the place of conflict, which also passes over into the life. [So ALFORD: “The purity and uprightness of Christian character which is the result of the work of the Spirit of Christ; the inwrought righteousness, not merely the imputed righteousness.” The latter reference is defended by EADIE and HODGE; the former pressing the article in support of it, the latter urging that no moral virtue forms part of the armor and then saying that the subjective sense of righteousness was included already in the word “truth.” The wider reference is preferable, for the more restricted one belongs to a view of the word δικαιοσύνη, which is too forensic, sundering in twain an indivisible truth. For the correct meaning of the word, see Romans, pp. 74, 75, 78, etc.—R.]

Ver. 15. Having shod your feet, καὶ ὑποδησάμενοι τοὺς πόδας.—This adds the third piece, and the terms are again significant. Here we must think of the war-sandals, προκημίδας, ocreae militares†, which give firm footing and gait.—With the preparedness of the gospel of peace [ἐν ἐτοιμασίᾳ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου τῆς εἰρήνης].—That in (ἐν) which the feet stand, is for the warrior of Christ ἐτοιμασία, readiness, promptitudo animi, internal and external, the ready courage and preparedness for conflict, firmitas et constantia, which the gospel gives; hence τοῦ εὐαγγελίου is auctoris, the contents and pledge of which is set forth by τῆς εὐφροσύνης chiefly with God, (Rom. v. 1; viii. 31, 38 f.), then in one's self and peaceableness toward men as such.* The Christian fights in peace for the sake of peace, viz. the eternal one. That is an ozymoron (SCHENKEL): the gospel of peace instills readiness for conflict. We should not then, because pedum aere (Rom. x. 15; iii. 16 sqq.; Luke i. 79) conjuncta mentio cum evangelis et cum pace (BENGEL), allow ourselves, contrary to the context to think of the proclamation of the gospel (LUTHER: ready to carry on the gospel, HARLESS and others). [So CHRYSOSTOM and now CONYBEARE, but the Apostle was addressing the whole church as engaged in an individual conflict, mainly defensive too.—R.] Notwithstanding the frequent use of ἐτοιμασία to translate the Hebrew מִגָּן (LXX. Ezra ii. 68; iii. 3; Ps. lxxxix. 15; Dan. xi. 20, 21), it is not to be rendered as=fundamentum (BENGEL and BLEEK and others), although what is positive is not to be excluded. Εὐφροσύνη is neither to be limited to peace with God (HARLESS, MEYER and others), nor referred to peace between Gentile and Gentile (MICHAELIS). ERASMUS is irrelevant: evangelium—nontumultu, sed tolerantia tranquillitateque defenditur.

* [MEYER, ELLICOTT and others take the preposition as instrumental, but ALFORD is more exact: “not instrumental, but local; the girt person is within, surrounded by the girdle; but this is necessarily expressed in English by ‘with.’”—R.]

The defensive armor; vers. 16, 17a.

Ver. 16. In addition to all, ἐπὶ πᾶσιν (WINER, p. 367), as in Luke iii. 20: "Added this above all;" xvi. 26. ERASMUS: super omnia, for a protection over all. Incorrect: before all things (LUTHER). [MEYER, HODGE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT agree with BRAUNE (as does EADIE, who formerly defended the local sense) in taking the preposition as=in addition to, rejecting the local (Bengel and others) and ethical references (E. V.). If ἐν be accepted as the correct reading (see Textual Note 5) the meaning would be: in all things, i. e., on all occasions.—Having taken up, ἀναλαβόντες, aptly chosen here:† the shield of faith.—Τὸν θυρεόν (from θηρα, originally that which closes an entrance) is chosen by the Apostle because he has in mind the scutum, which was four feet long and two and a half broad, Πῦξ (Ps. xxxv. 2; Ezek. xxxiii. 24, LXX.) and not ἀσπίς, clipeus, ῥῆγ, the smaller, round shield. The concern is that the whole person be covered, as indeed faith (τῆς πίστεως, genitive of apposition as in vers. 14, 17) entirely covers and defends the Christian: as God's gift effecting salvation (ii. 8) [MEYER: fides salvifica], bringing about forgiveness of sins in the past (i. 7), affording for every moment access to God (iii. 12), assuring in advance of eternal life, by securing to us the gift of the Holy Ghost (i. 13, 14), rendering holy and without blame (i. 4). Comp. Rom. viii. 14-16, 31-39. Man's own holiness is not a shield for him, as in Wisdom, v. 20;

God's holiness is his shield; God Himself is our shield (Gen. xv. 1; Ps. xviii. 31; Prov. xxx. 5; 1 Pet. v. 9; 1 John v. 4). It is faith, entirely and constantly giving itself up to God in Christ, on the part of a child and heir, hence not the faith of miracles, nor justifying faith alone (SCHENKEL).

Wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the evil one.—Thus the Apostle describes the protection of faith against dangerous attacks. 'Εν ᾧ is on which, not with which (LUTHER and others). [It means either, lighting on it and being quenched in it, or "as protected by and under cover of which" (ELLICOTT). The former is perhaps preferable.—R.] The figure and the reality are here so much complicated in each other, that we should not think of a shield with wet hides (OLSHAUSEN), but of faith on which the destructive fire from Satan is extinguished, without causing damage. The future (δυνάσασθε) refers to the impending conflict.* In this are thrown τὰ βέλη τοῦ πονηροῦ τὰ πεπυρωμένα; these are malleoli (darts), falarice (javelins), tela ignita (made of reeds, with tow and pitch), which are ignited and then hurled (Ps. vii. 14; LXX. xxi. 8). The evil one, i. e., Satan† (Matt. v. 37; xiii. 19, 38; John xvii. 15; 2 Thess. iii. 3) throws temptations of many kinds; hence πάντα comes first and τὰ πεπυρωμένα is placed last for emphasis (WINER, p. 127)‡. Certainly we are to understand in part dangerous and corrupting words and speeches which come to one's ears, impart thoughts cast into the heart, the fire of passions, etc. In the σβίσαι the figure is simply exceeded by the reality. Of course we need not think of poisoned darts (RUECKERT and others), which are not burning, but inflict burning wounds. Yet it cannot be said that we should not think of burning desires (CHRYSOSTOM), because these are present within man (SCHENKEL); faith is an affair of the heart, and in the heart the conflict of redemption is fought and won; besides fire and iron could scarcely be two deadly elements, which aptly illustrate the attacks of Satan. [SCHENKEL].

Ver. 17. And take [or receive] the helmet of salvation [καὶ τὴν περικεφαλαιάν τοῦ σωτηρίου δέξασθε.—This advance is natural. In accordance with the genius of the Greek language a translation is made to the finite construction; it is not simply Paul's lively method (MEYER), but that of the language. The genitive, τοῦ σωτηρίου, is one of apposition, as in vers. 14, 16.] The word is entirely general as in Luke ii. 30; iii. 6; Acts xxviii. 28 (from Isa. lix. 17, LXX. with a reference to the name of Jesus, in which the battle is fought and won,

* [Not, however, as MEYER thinks, to the last great future fight. ALFORD thinks the future implies the certainty that the shield of faith will thus quench. ELLICOTT regards it as only "a conditioned present."—R.]

† [Should the article be omitted (see Textual Note 6) the participle would be a tertiary predicate; "a fire-tipt as they are" (ELLICOTT), "when inflamed, even in their utmost malice and fiery power." (ALFORD).—R.]

‡ [ELLICOTT: "Not 'evil,' ὁ πονηρὸς, but in accordance with the individualizing and personal nature of the conflict which the context so forcibly depicts—the Devil." ALFORD: "The conflict being personal, the adversary must be, not an abstract principle, but a concrete person."—R.]

* [This view of the passage is now generally accepted (MEYER, ALFORD and many others). On the word ἐτοιμασία, used principally in the LXX. and ecclesiastical writers (the classical form was ἐτοιμάτης), see MEYER and ALFORD in loco.—R.]

† [EADIE: "The pieces of armor already mentioned being fitted on to the body and fastened to it, each by appropriate mechanism, have each its characteristic verb—but shield, helmet and sword need no such special fastening; for they are simply taken up or assumed, and therefore they are joined to the one general participle, ἀναλαβόντες, and the verb βέβασθε."—B.]

whom faith appropriates) and is used for σωτηρία. The salvation of the Messianic kingdom is represented as a helmet, covering the head. For the warrior does not hide himself behind his shield, but looks over it into the face of his opponent.—Δέξασθε, accipite oblatam a domino. Salute erigitur caput et munitur. 1 Thess. v. 8; Psal. iii. 3, 4 (BENGEL). Salvation is the subject of the faith, in which the salvation is apprehended (HARLESS). [HODGE: "That which adorns and protects the Christian, which enables him to hold up his head with confidence and joy, is the fact that he is saved." The German has an alliteration here: Den Helm des Heils nehmt, which Wicliffe gives in the Old English of his version: "the helme of helthe."—R.]

And the sword of the Spirit, καὶ τῇν μάχαιραν τοῦ πνεύματος.—There is no mention, in addition, as in 1 Sam. xvii. 47; of the "spear," or of the "bow" (Gen. xlviii. 22; Josh. xxiv. 12; Psal. xlv. 7). The Christian has only to contend cominus, personally, not eminus. The sword is "of the Spirit;" τοῦ πνεύματος is a genitive auctoris: He gives it, makes it. It cannot be appositional (HARLESS and others), as before, since the apposition follows in the relative clause.*

Which is the word of God.—Ὁ ἐστὶ which is neuter by attraction of ῥῆμα θεοῦ, relates to μάχαιραν, and is not to be construed with πνεύματος (OLSHAUSEN), for the Holy Ghost is not the Word of God; the latter is the product, the former is the Producer of what is in the word of God. Concinne subsequitur mentio Spiritus, adeoque coll. ver. 13 habetur mentio s. trinitatis (BENGEL). The Holy Ghost is meant, in antithesis, both to the letter and to the flesh, hence not the human spirit (MORUS), which in itself is also σὰρξ. "The Word of God" is not to be limited to commandments (FLATT), or threatening against the enemies of the kingdom (KOPPE).

This completes the equipment. Two things are to be maintained: 1. The difference of the arms and the ethical or supersensuous realities set forth in them should not be arbitrarily weakened. It should not be said: universa potius armorum notio tenenda est. Nor can a proof of this be deduced from 1 Thess. v. 8, where we read: "the breastplate of faith and love, and for an helmet the hope of salvation." From a different stand-point there can be afforded a partially different point of view. 2. The figures are not to be pressed beyond measure and the lively objective metaphor of the Apostle to be dissected in arbitrary subjectivity to practical use.†

* [Still less probably is it a genitive of quality, ἡ μάχαιρα πνευματικὰ (CHRYSTOSTOM), or a simple genitive of possession in reference to the τρωαντική ἐνέργεια (JAVER, ap. CRAM. Cat.) of the Spirit, both of which seem to be at variance with the general tenor of the passage, which represents the 'armatura' as furnished to us by God. Thus then it is from the Spirit that we receive the sword, that sword being the Word of God, the Gospel (ver. 15), which is the δῶναις θεοῦ (Rom. i. 16; 1 Cor. i. 18) to every one who believeth; comp. Heb. iv. 12] (ELLIOTT).—R.]

† [Eadie mentions among the works which are open to this objection: GURNALL, Christian in complete armour, Glasgow, 1763; AINSWORTH, Tactica Sacra, 1657; LYDIUS, Synagoga de re militari, ed Van Til, 1698, Dort.—The best practical commentary on this section is undoubtedly to be found in BUNYAN'S Pilgrim's Progress, especially the armory in the

The prayer and the intercession; vers. 18-20. (a.) Prayer in general, ver. 18 a. (b.) Intercession in general, ver. 18 b. (c.) Intercession for the Apostle, vers. 19, 20.

Ver. 18. With all prayer and supplication praying.—[The connection of this verse is with στήθε (ver. 15), not with δέσασθε, which is a subordinate thought referring to a definite act, hence inconsistent with the "all," "always" of this verse (MEYER). MEYER is scarcely justifiable in disconnecting διὰ πάσης προσευχῆς καὶ δεήσεως from προσευχόμενοι on the ground of tautology and logical difficulty. Each phrase expresses a proper qualification of the participle, and to pray always with every form of prayer involves no contradiction. HODGE seems to have been led into MEYER'S view. CONYBEARE improperly takes the participle as an imperative and begins a new paragraph with this verse.—R.]

The participle (προσευχόμενοι) is closely connected with the summons to the conflict and the putting on of the armor. The summons to prayer did not appear independently. Prayer is rather to be regarded as attending the taking up of the weapons and the conflict, as the present strongly indicates. The phrase: διὰ πάσης προσευχῆς καὶ δεήσεως, placed first, only requires, that prayer should not be neglected and that constant prayer of every form be earnestly offered up. The first term means prayer in general, the second the special request. [So HARLESS, MEYER, FRITZSCHE, TRENCH (Syn. II., § 1), ELLICOTT, ALFORD and most recent commentators.—R.] The opinion [GROTIUS] is untenable, that the former refers to the bestowment of a blessing, the latter to the averting of an evil (Jas. v. 16, 17).

At all times in the Spirit.—Ἐν παντὶ κατ' ῥῶ gives prominence to the prayer as persevering, despite all change of relations and circumstances, at every opportunity, ἐν πνεύματι to prayer, as fervent and Christian occurring in the impulse of the Holy Ghost.* BENGEL: Quoties cunque oratis, orate in Spiritu, quippe qui nullo tempore excluditur.

Intercession in general. And watching thereunto in all perseverance and supplication for all the saints.—With reference to the already described prayer (εἰς αὐτὸ) there should also enter (καὶ), "watching" (ἀγρυπνοῦντες, from ἀγρυπνός, Mark xiii. 33; Luke xxi. 36), which is elsewhere also joined with prayer (Matt. xxvi. 41; Mark xiv. 38; Col. iv. 2). [ALFORD: "continual habits of prayer cannot be kept up without watchfulness to that very end."—R.] This should take place: "in all perseverance and supplication for all the saints." The feeling of fellowship in the conflict finds its immediate expression in the supplication for all the fellow-combatants, whose standing fast is strength and assistance to their neighbor. The Christian should have a clear view about him, to the companions in conflict at other positions, in other places, and besides continue constant in such supplication. ["Perseverance and supplication" here amounts to "persevering supplication," though it is not a grammatical Hendiadys, since the order would be inverted in that case. ELLICOTT says it is "a virtual or what might be termed a contextual ἐν δὲ αὐτοῖς." EADIE: "In praying for themselves they were uniformly to blend petitions for all the saints."—R.] How much depends on this is exemplified in what follows.

Intercession for the Apostle, vers. 19, 20. Ver. 19. And for me [or on my behalf], καὶ ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ.—[Kai brings into prominence a particular instance; Winer, p. 407.—R.] On the change of prepositions (see Exeg. Notes on chap. v. 2) it may be remarked: As regards the saints the figure of encirclement by attacking foes is the one, hence περί, but in the case of the Apostle in prison, that of a fallen combatant, hence ὑπὲρ. Or the former is—on account of, propter, the latter—for, pro (1 Pet. iii. 18), making known a stronger personal interest.*

That utterance may be given to me.—ἵνα μοι δοθῇ, that there may be given me from the Lord as His gift.† Non nitebatur Paulus habitu suo (BENGEL). But what? Utterance, in the opening of my mouth, λόγος ἐν ἀνοίξει τοῦ στόματος μου.—This is one conception: λόγος without the article, indefinite, is more qualified by the prepositional phrase. Ἀνοιξεις τοῦ στόματος is a pregnant expression (Matth. v. 2; 2 Cor. vi. 11), signifying joyful courage, streaming fullness, as well as granted freedom and fit opportunity (STIER). It is an emphatic designation of the inworking of God upon him who should speak in His name (HARLESS). Comp. Exod. iv. 12; Psa. li. 17; Isa. li. 66; Ezek. iii. 27; xxix. 31; xxxii. 22; Matth. x. 19; Luke xxi. 15. CHRYSOSTOM: ἡ ἀλυσὶς ἐπικρατεῖ τὴν παρρησίαν ἐπιστοιμίζονσα, ἀλλ' ἡ ἐν χεὶρὶ ἡ ὑπετέρα ἀνοίγει μὴ τὸ στόμα, ἵνα ἐν αὐτῷ παρρησιάζομαι. CALOVIUS: Petit sibi sermonem dari, non catenas solvi; petit apertionem oris, non vinculorum; petit sermonis παρρησίαν in ipsis vinculis, non liberationem ab iisdem. A word thus uttered in the opening of the mouth effected by God is God's word. He therefore wishes a word, not for himself in his heart, but a word in his mouth for others, in furtherance of the conflict which tends to peace. This differs then from Col. iv. 2, where external opportunity is in question, while here the internal life of the Apostle is treated of. Accordingly it is incorrect to render: ut aperiam os meum (BRZA [E. V.] and others); in that case

* [MEYER, ELLICOTT and others attach little or no importance to the change of preposition here, but HARLESS, EADIE, ALFORD and others are not satisfied with the explanation that the change was occasioned by mere desire for variety. That is unlike Paul. To mark the variation in English, ALFORD renders: "concerning all the saints and for me." The Revison by Four Anglican clergymen gives: "for all the saints and on my behalf." ELLICOTT in his translation gives: and in particular for me, but this is a paraphrase of the specializing καὶ.—R.]

εἰς would occur instead of ἐν. So too: when I speak or open my mouth (MEYER and others) [so substantially EADIE, ELLICOTT, ALFORD and HODGE]; it is not merely a graphic and solemn expression, that would be too flat. Nor is an im-provisation referred to (ECUMENIUS), or an internal moral quality of Paul, the frankness=ἐν παρρησίᾳ (CALVIN, KOPPE [BLEEK, SCHENKEL] and others), or occasione data (GROTIUS and others), nor is it to be joined with what follows. [The connection with what precedes (not, as in the E. V., with what follows) is now generally accepted. "The opening of the mouth" most naturally refers neither to the quality nor to the source of the discourse, but to the simple act or fact of speaking, so that the view of MEYER is on the whole preferable. As the phrase occurs here in the purport of a prayer, it may refer to an act of God in opening the mouth, as Braune claims, but in that case another form would have made the sense much clearer.—R.]

In boldness to make known the mystery of the gospel ["So that with boldness I may make known," etc].—This expresses that for which he wishes that to him "utterance may be given," "in the opening of my mouth." He would gladly "make known," and this was permitted to him in Cesarea (Acts xxiv. 23) and in Rome (Acts xxviii. 30, 31; 2 Tim. i. 16) in spite of his bonds. But he wishes to do it ἐν παρρησίᾳ (iii. 12), hence the phrase stands emphatically in advance. What he will gladly make known is the "mystery" (i. 9; iii. 9), which is the substance "of the gospel." [ELLICOTT takes it as a genitive subject, "the mystery which the gospel has, involves."—R.]

Ver. 20. For which [or in behalf of which] (ELLICOTT: "in commodum cujus, to preach which"); see below on the exact reference.—R.]

I am an ambassador.—He thus expresses the reason why he would so gladly stand up and labor for the gospel [not merely why he was in bonds.—R.] As Christ's ambassador he holds that office for all nations, and for the gospel; hence ὑπὲρ οὗ, not οὗ. Πρεβεῖω is: I am an ambassador (2 Cor. v. 20) and that too in bonds, ἐν ἀλύσει.—What a contrast: to be an ambassador in a chain! BENGEL: Paradoxon; mundus habet legatos splendidos. WETSTEIN: Alias legati jure gentium sancti et inviolabiles, in vinculis haberi non poterant. The verb does not however indicate that he was accredited to the Roman court (MICHAELIS), nor does the noun in the singular refer to the single chain with which he was bound to a soldier, to the custodia militaris (BAUMGARTEN and others).* GROTIUS is incorrect: nunc quoque non desino legationem, for we do not read: καὶ ἐν ἀλύσει πρεβεῖω. Nor is it=πρεσβεῖων ἐν ἀλύσει εἰμὶ (RUECKERT). Finally οὗ does not refer to μυστήριον or to τὸ ἐν παρρησίᾳ γνωρίσαι. [EADIE refers it to the whole preceding clause, but this is indistinct; MEYER, ELLICOTT and ALFORD (apparently most correctly) refer it to "the mystery of the gospel," since this was the object of γνωρίσαι, and what he should make known would naturally be that for which he was an ambassador in bonds. R.—]

That therein I may speak boldly, ἵνα ἐν αὐτῷ παρρησιασώμαι.—ἵνα introduces an end, and the final one: “that therein I may speak boldly.” [“His being thus a captive ambassador, was all the more reason why they should pray earnestly that he might have boldness” (ALFORD). On the grammatical connection see the concluding note.—R.] The gospel is the immediate task of the free discourse, in this, however, there is also a message of Divine power, is the source and ground of the boldness. When there is first vouchsafed to him “an utterance in the opening of his mouth,” then also does he obtain “boldness” in the gospel, and that too: as I ought to speak, ὥς δεῖ με λαλῆσαι.—The emphasis rests on the ὥς as in Luke xii. 11 (STRICK). Much depends on how it is done, hence “as I ought to speak.” He must indeed testify; that is his “necessity” (1 Cor. ix. 16); but to him belongs also, beyond the εὐαγγελισασθαι, the manner worthy of the ambassador of Christ. This defines the fulfilling of his task, his duty. Comp. Col. iv. 4; 1 Thess. ii. 2. Accordingly ἵνα in this verse is not co-ordinate with the first ἵνα in ver. 19 (MEYER, BLEEK and others), since this is the final end of the Church’s supplication, to be attained through the fulfilment of the first ἵνα; nor is it dependent on προσβῆναι (BENGEL), which is inconceivable.

[EADIE, ALFORD, HODGE and ELLICOTT, all agree with MEYER, in taking this ἵνα as co-ordinate with that in ver. 19, thus setting forth a second purpose of the watching and the supplication for the Apostle. This involves no tautology, as HARLESS supposes, since the reference here is to a conditioned boldness, and “therein” indicates not the source or ground, but the sphere of the boldness: “in the matter of, in dealing with the mystery of the gospel;” God is the source. Such a co-ordinate ἵνα occurs in Rom. vii. 13; Gal. iii. 14; 2 Cor. ix. 3. It is true as Braune suggests, that this design is accomplished only through the fulfilment of the previous purpose (ver. 19), but grammatically the clause must be either co-ordinate or subordinate (the view of BENGEL being altogether untenable); if the latter, then it would express the purpose, not of the whole previous context, the supplication and consequent utterance, but simply of the gift of utterance, a view which Braune himself does not accept. We prefer therefore the other construction as more grammatical and not militating against the special point our author would bring out. For convenience a paraphrase of vers. 18-20 is appended: In this conflict therefore stand, not only armed thus, but with all (every form of) prayer and supplication, praying at all times (perseveringly and under all circumstances) in the (Holy) Spirit, and watching thereunto (in respect to this varied and constant prayer) in all perseverance and supplication (abiding even as you pray in persevering supplication) for all the saints; and (in particular) on behalf of me, that to me may be given (from God) utterance, in the opening of my mouth (when I am called upon to speak), so that with boldness I may make known the mystery of the gospel (whose contents are the gospel), in behalf of which (gospel mystery) I am an ambassador in bonds (a chained ambassador); (praying for me too in view of my office and condition) that therein (in the matter of the gospel mystery) I may speak boldly, as I ought (as becomes my office) to speak.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The kingdom of Satan. There is an organized kingdom of evil (ΙΑΝΝ, Theologie des N. T., I. p. 347), opposing the kingdom and people of God. In this there is a head, διάβολος (ver. 11; ii. 2; iv. 27); there are different groups, ἀρχαί, ἐξουσίαι (ver. 12; iii. 10; comp. i. 21), superior and inferior, with dominion over the world, κοσμοκράτορες. The nature of the prince and his dependents is pneumatic (ver. 12: τὰ πνευματικά) and super-terrestrial, ἐν τοῖς ἑπουρανίοις (ver. 12); thus prominence is given to their might over against men; they are super-terrestrial, with angelic power. Their character, however, is marked by the terms “wickedness” (ver. 12: τῆς πονηρίας), “darkness” (τοῦ σκότους, ver. 12) and “the evil one” (ver. 16); at his service are multifarious wiles (ver. 11: αἱ μεθοδῖαι), which perceive the necessities and weakness of the object to be assaulted in all relations, preparing the attacks accordingly. [EADIE: “To rouse up the Christian soldiery, the Apostle brings out into bold relief the terrible foes which they are summoned to encounter. As to their position, they are no subalterns, but foes of mighty rank, the nobility and chieftains of the spirit-world; as to their office, their domain is ‘this darkness’ in which they exercise imperial sway; as to their essence, they are not encumbered with an animal frame, but are ‘spirits;’ and as to their character, they are ‘evil’—their appetite for evil only exceeds their capacity for producing it.”—R.]

2. The contest in its essence is a single-handed struggle in wrestling (ver. 12: ἀλλὰ, ἢ ἐστιν ἡμῖν ἡ πάλη), in which each for himself is attacked. The danger lies in the power and character of the enemy and of his wiles (see 1), in which he does not himself openly appear; he casts βέλη, many (πάντα) and fiery ones (ver. 16), as also in the end of the vanquished one, who belongs to “darkness” (ver. 12) as a result of the “deceit” (iv. 14). The means for assault and conflict are afforded to the Evil one by the world, which is at his disposal, and by “flesh and blood” (ver. 12), which war against the soul and become allies in the service of Satan, against whom the contest really is waged, standing behind these as he does with his stratagems and artifices. What is natural and created is not the precise antagonist against whom we must contend. The Apostle sketches the conflict as a present one (ἐστιν, ver. 12), concerning every member of the church, the Apostle and every Christian, having however its history, its various stages up to the day of decision (“in the evil day,” ver. 13) for which we must be prepared by opposition from the very start, being practiced in the turns and twists of the contest. Hence we are to understand the temptations and antagonisms, which meet every Christian in this world, which are spared to no period of the Church. They appear as contests with flesh and blood, with the world and its influence through its possessions, pleasures and honors, but back of this there stands really and in truth the kingdom of darkness.* At certain times and hours they are intensified into specially decisive conflict. The evil day may be either the most fierce persecution and bitter sorrow, or quite as readily prosperity and undisturbed earthly happiness, in which some may fall even deeper and the Church itself be corrupted into unfaithfulness. This is true in particular for every Christian and his Christian life, and also in general for the Christian Church in its groups and its course of development. As the power of the Evil one is a cosmical one, and not merely a human one, humanly individualized, so the conflict itself is a cosmical one also, and not merely an individual one.

3. The panoply. In such a conflict the Christian needs an equipment, given by God and covering the whole man (ἡ πανοπλία τοῦ θεοῦ, vers. 11, 13). Man of himself, in his own power and strength, is unable to withstand the attacks; he has assailable and vulnerable points, which he must protect against the assaults of the Evil One, but which he alone cannot protect; only with the Lord Christ and in His power can he do it, even though he stands isolated; without God in Christ never!—The separate pieces of this armor (vers. 14-17) are: truth, righteousness, zealous but not passionate witness, faith, which concerns the whole personality, hope, which exalts, and God's Word. The first three pieces betoken the garments, the next two the defensive armor, the last the one only weapon of offence and attack adapted only for single-handed and close combat, which belongs to the Christian warrior, to the Christian assailed by the Evil One and yet courageous and assured of victory. No one piece can be undervalued or neglected: each one requires the other; they together form one whole.—The putting on of this armor presupposes a being strengthened, points to an internal and vital appropriation, and requires faithful fulfilment of duty (ἀπαντα καταρτίζαμενοι, ver. 13). Neither a knowledge which is a matter either of the memory merely or of the reflecting understanding, nor an external mechanical skill in the handling of these spiritual pieces of armor, will suffice for the conflict and the victory. Even the standing ready for the combat is not enough; there must be a solicitous regard as to what is to be done, and performance of the immediate task in peaceable walk. But above all must we cling to the Lord, in order to become inwardly strengthened by Him.—Hence Paul adjoins to the lively sketch of the panoply in close connection soberly without a figure.

* [HODGE remarks respecting the conflict: "It is one also in which great mistakes are often committed and serious loss incurred from ignorance of its nature, and of the appropriate means for carrying it on. Men are apt to regard it as a mere moral conflict between reason and conscience on the one side, and evil passions on the other. They therefore rely on their own strength and upon the resources of nature for success. Against these mistakes the Apostle warns his readers. He teaches that everything pertaining to it is supernatural. The source of strength is not in nature. The conflict is not between the good and bad principles of our nature. He shows that we belong to a spiritual as well as to a natural world, and are engaged in a combat in which the higher powers of the universe are involved; and that this conflict, on the issue of which our salvation depends, is not to be carried on with straws picked up by the wayside. As we have superhuman enemies to contend with, we need not only superhuman strength, but Divine armor and arms. The weapons of our warfare are not natural, but Divine."—R.]

4. Praying and watching (ver. 18), just as the Lord enjoined it and practiced it in the struggle in the garden of Gethsemane (Matth. xxvi. 36-46); God's Word to and for us teaches and leads us to open our hearts before Him in our word to Him. There must be at length intercourse between Him and our souls, in order to strengthen us more and more and enable us to do our duty. In prayerful intercourse, that grows ever more fervent, free, joyous and constant, we obtain God's power. But we must with true open look see about and within ourselves, so that our weakness, the motions of the flesh, the surrounding agitation, the state of the times, the assaults of the enemy, God's will and word, do not escape us.

5. We must advance to intercession for all saints and for the special warriors of the present. The Christian stands in single-handed combat, but is not isolated; the fall of one may involve the fall of another, perhaps of many. The victory of one preserves many from a fall. The conflict of the Christian is a common concern, the cause of the Church. That is an evidence of watching, when in the supplication for all special thought is given to those who are fighting in the van and most of all exposed to assaults. That is watchfulness, when one sees that the matter is not that the external condition of the assailed one is altered and improved, that the prison should be opened for the prisoner, but rather that he continues internally in joy and boldness to be an unhampered witness of the gospel, especially of the marrow of the gospel, full of life, of the profoundest contents of revelation, thus enabled amid all outward disgrace before the world to preserve the inward dignity of a child and servant of God, of His ambassador.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

About nothing does man have such indistinct views as about his own strength. Every one, be he never so weak, thinks himself strong: this is proved by his resolutions, his plans, which have been mostly frustrated and shattered. It is with strength as with beauty, which no one even the ugliest thinks is far off. Indeed man is often afraid for himself just where there is nothing to fear, as the miser of unnecessary expense, the ambitious man of renouncing something, not knowing their own weakness. That in the Lord alone, the strong and mighty One, strength is to be sought and found, all those do not consider who are unwilling to ground true freedom in the service of God; only the children of God are strong, and he who stands fast on the soil of Divine precepts, eternal principles, has unconquerable might. He who is overcome by God and holds to Him, overcomes himself and the enemies without him.—The conflict is stirred by a powerful enemy without us, who is the more dangerous, the more allies he finds within us in our flesh and blood, in our natural man. Were there no false friends in us, the enemy, Satan, without us would not have so great power.—The Christian alone is assailed; he who is not assailed is no Christian, either no longer, or not yet. Satan does not attack his own, but rather uses them only in assaulting believers.—In the panoply of God all temptations of the devil turn out to be trials from God, in which we become stronger and more invincible.—The girdle of the Christian warrior is a chain of eternal truths, his breast-plate is righteousness which avails before God, his war-shoes are skill in Gospel testimony in word and deed without precipitancy in peaceableness; his shield is that faith of the heart which hangs on Christ, securing against seven darts, those of sin, virtue, the world, the cross, despair, calumny and death (H. MUELLER); the helmet is the hope of everlasting salvation, and the short sword is the apprehended word from God, which has the edge and point to parry as drawn by the Lord Himself. Only learn how to choose and use such texts as Matt. iv. 4, 7, 10! See thou hast the sword of the Spirit! 1. The sword which is of the Spirit is a word, God's word, but this word is a sword. 2. The Spirit, whose the sword is, is the Holy Spirit, not theology, not polity, nor confession, neither letter nor man's reason.—Without God's word reason and strength were a leaden banner, a lance without a head, a sword without an edge.—To handle the sword of the Spirit thou needest the strength of God. HAMANN says aptly, the breast-plate is no bodice but a breast-plate, to which a champion is as much accustomed as patrons to their loose clothes. From supplication we first learn how to pray for ourselves rightly.—More depends on internal than on external freedom. To be free in chains and bonds, to be full of pure joy in tribulation, to be oppressed and yet freehearted, is the Apostle's wish and precept.

STARKE: Do you suppose that Christianity comes off without a conflict or that you will receive a crown of glory without having contended? You deceive yourself. Daily must you be in the combat and show good knighthood in faith. Do you ask: who then are my enemies? Look into your own breast and there you will find sinful lusts, warring against you; sloth and sleepiness, clouding thy spirit, unbelief and doubt, wounds of conscience, disturbing you, etc. Without you are Satan and the world, setting their nets. If you are not properly armed in faith against these enemies, you will go to ruin.—Since artifice is so much more dangerous than force, we must specially protect ourselves against this.—He who is well armed can composedly look the devil in the face and stand up to him foot to foot; he will assuredly conquer.—A good conscience is the Christian's breastwork.—The less sin, the less the power of the devil.—Let a believing Christian take especial care that he guards his heart.—When the enemy is there it is too late to begin to arm; prepare yourself beforehand and be always ready.—Where there is no faith, there is no armor that avails against Satan; all is lost.—The word of God is necessary for all men, even for the overcoming of spiritual adversaries. How can the Romish Church answer for this, that they have refused this to their poor people?—Prating is not praying. He who has not the spirit of prayer, cannot pray aright.—Strong, well-fortified and blessed souls need our intercessions also.—Ye hearers, why is it that your teacher is so dull and that he cannot speak with power to your conscience! The answer is: you do not pray for him! Oh, as often as he enters the pulpit, so often should your mind and your whole heart rise to the Lord, praying earnestly that he may with boldness and great impression speak to your souls.—Oh how much useless stuff is often brought out from the pulpit! Let him who appears before the Lord, see to it that he speaks nothing else than God's word.

RIEGER: A good warrior needs inward courage and then outward armor.—The devil has a great advantage when his power is denied or deemed trifling. For there is then the less arming against him.—The magnificent names which the Apostle applies to these powers arranged in the kingdom of darkness, we must never look at in themselves, for then they might appear to be expressed only to increase the fear of our hearts; but when we consider in addition the destruction of all these works which is announced in the Gospel, they serve rather to exalt the name of Christ.—In the entire period of life, during which we find ourselves placed on the field of conflict, there still occurs some one occasion which constitutes the evil day, and upon which it depends whether the purpose of the enemy be repelled, our will for good, taken from God's word and Spirit, become strengthened and thus God's will toward us be accomplished.—It is really a principal part of the honorable condition of the children of God, that they cannot only present their own concerns in prayer to Him, but also assume those of others in supplication.—There is here however no approval of an indolent leaning upon the intercessions of others, such as Simon sought with a heart "not right" (Acts vi. 24), or of a self-interested application of intercession, such as our Saviour rebuked in the Pharisee (Matt. xxiii. 14), but we are to understand a common contest and mutual help in prayer.

HEUBNER: Weapons of human prudence, the straw-armor of our reason, as Luther says, are not sufficient against the evil, spiritual powers. If God is not with us, with His counsel and His strength, all is in vain.—The Christian must ever stand, ever be armed, because there is always a conflict. A fool does not know what kind of a contest there is going to be! He calls the evil powers the fancies of benighted ones.—As among the Spartans the saying was: "either with this or on this," so the Christian should either preserve his shield of faith or die on it.—No one is so strong that he can do without the intercession of others. Even a Paul still needed strengthening and stimulus. The word to be preached is given by the Lord; the Lord opens the mouth. From Him must come the impulse to speak; he who preaches according to his own fancies and pleasure accomplishes nothing. The Gospel is to the perverted heart always a mystery.

PASSAVANT: Paul was a man of God and as such of varied and great experience in all these conflicts.—The more earnestly Paul contended, the more earnestly did his love for the Christians, the brethren, the churches of the Lord, fear and tremble.—Paul is the ambassador on behalf of the Gospel and on account of the preaching of it in bonds.—This office has its sorrows and dangers; it has heights and also abysses, a destruction, a condemnation, a death.

STIER: As certainly as you can count upon God's help, so necessary is your own activity in the use of means, which God proffers that you may offer resistance.—To withstand the enemy and to stand is already the entire, difficult triumph.—We are not however once for all done with girding, putting on, grasping our arms and armor; in the midst of the conflict we must constantly look after them and keep them in order.—The contest, the enemies, the field of battle, the equipment,—that is all; but the arms, which the Spirit gives, can be managed only with the prayer of our spirit, can be attained, put on and grasped only through prayer.—An ambassador in bonds! But although bound, he can still proclaim unhindered and conduct properly his embassy.—GERLACH: Bound with a chain to a soldier, Paul preached the Gospel and dictated this Epistle, from which the Christian Church in all ages has received so much love and pleasure.

What kind of equipment he must have, what is the best armory, the best arsenal. 4. Who are his worst enemies. 5. How he ought and must accustom himself to his armor. 6. What a severe regimen he must carry out. 7. Finally what he has to expect, if he conduct himself in a knightly manner.—LISCO: The sacred combat of the Christian: 1. The cause for which he contends (vers. 10, 11); 2. The enemies against which he contends (vers. 12, 13); 3. The weapons with which he contends (vers. 14-17).—RAUTENBERG: Be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might! How the equipment with the whole armor of God is 1) so indispensable, 2) so accessible, 3) so glorious.—HARLESS: The bond of Christian fellowship consists: 1) in the assurance of the same contest for all; 2) in the possession of the same arms; 3) in the command to accordant love.—Gesetz und Zeugniß [a German periodical]: The secret conflict of the Christian. 1) The secret of his danger, 2) of his strength, 3) of his victory.—MUENKEL: The Apostle's war-sermon shows 1) the enemy against whom, 2) the armor in which, 3) the kingdom for which we contend.—PRÜNLE: The Christian warrior. 1. The host of foes against him (ver. 12); 2. The heroic spirit in which he goes forth (vers. 10, 11); 3. The armor he bears (vers. 13-17).

[HODGE: Vers. 10-13. As a conflict is inevitable, the believer should: 1. Muster strength for the struggle. 2. He should seek that strength from Christ. 3. Since his enemies are not human, but superhuman, he needs not only more than human strength, but also Divine armor.—Ver. 10. He who rushes into this conflict without Christ has not strength even to reach the field. When most empty of self, we are most full of God.—Ver. 14. With the flowing garments of the East, the first thing to be done in preparing for any active work was to gird the loins. To enter on this spiritual conflict ignorant or doubting, would be to enter battle blind or lame.—A warrior without his breast-plate was naked, exposed to every thrust of his enemy, and even to every casual dart. In such a state flight or death is inevitable.—Ver. 15. In ancient warfare swiftness of foot was one of the most important qualifications for a good soldier. As the Gospel secures our peace with God, and gives assurance of His favor, it produces that joyful alacrity of mind which is essential to success in the spiritual conflict.—Ver. 16. It is a common experience of the people of God, that at times horrible thoughts, unholy, blasphemous, sceptical, malignant crowd upon the mind, which cannot be accounted for on any ordinary law of mental action, and which cannot be dislodged. There are others which enkindle passion, inflame ambition, excite cupidity, pride, discontent, or vanity. Against these most dangerous weapons of the evil one, the only protection is faith.—Ver. 17. This sword puts to flight all the powers of darkness; it is true in the individual experience of the Christian, and in the experience of the church collective. All her triumphs over sin and error have been effected by the Word of God. When anything else takes its place, the Church, or the Christian, is at the mercy of the adversary.—Ver. 18. To obtain strength to use this armor aright, and to secure victory, we should pray. These prayers should be: 1. Of all kinds; 2. On every occasion; 3. Importunate and persevering; 4. By the aid of the Holy Spirit; 5. For all saints.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 10. The valor is as spiritual as the armor.—Ver. 11. The great enemy of man, a veteran fierce and malignant has a method of warfare peculiar to himself, for it consists of "wiles." His battles are the rush of a sudden ambuscade.—Ver. 12. It is no vulgar herd of fiends we encounter, but such of them as are darkly eminent in place and dignity.—Ver. 16. The biography of Luther and Bunyan affords apposite examples of these fiery darts.—Ver. 17. The Captain of salvation set the example, and once and again, and a third time, did He repel the assault of the prince of darkness by three brief and simple citations from Scripture.—Ver. 18. "'Praying always'—what does it mean? Being always on our knees? always engaged in the act of prayer? This I believe to be one of the grossest glosses that Satan casts on that text. He has often given it that gloss; monkery, nunnery, abstraction from the world in order to give up one's self to prayer, are but the effects of that false gloss" (EVANS).—"All the saints" pray for us, and in a spirit of reciprocity it becomes us to pray for them.—Ver. 19. "The mystery of the Gospel." It is a system which lay hidden till God's time came for revealing it. To know it there must be a Divine initiator, for its truths are beyond the orbit of human anticipations. The God-man, a vicarious death, gratuitous pardon, the influence of the Spirit—are doctrines which man never could have discovered. This Gospel, without mutilation, in its fulness and majesty, and with all its characteristic elements, the Apostle wishes to proclaim with plain and unflinching freedom.—Ver. 20. The Apostle's earnest wish was, that he might expound his message in a manner that became him and his high commission, that his imprisonment might have no dispiriting effect upon him, and that he might not in his addresses compromise the name and dignity of an ambassador for Christ.—R.]

IV. CLOSE OF THE EPISTLE.

CHAPTER VI. 21-24.

1. Personal intelligence is brought by the bearer of the letter.

CHAP. VI. 21, 22.

- 21 But that ye also may know¹ my affairs, and how I do [the things concerning me, how I fare]², Tychicus, a [the] beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, 22 shall make known to you all things [shall make all known³ to you]: Whom I have sent unto you for the same [this very] purpose, that ye might [may]⁴ know our affairs, and that he might [may] comfort your hearts.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 21.—[The order in B. K. L., great majority of cursives, fathers, is: εἰδῆτε καὶ ὑμεῖς (so Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford); N. A. D. E. F. G., Latin fathers: καὶ ὑμεῖς εἰδῆτε (so Lachmann, Ellicott). The former admits of the best explanation of the variation (see Meyer).—R.]

² Ver. 21.—[How I fare is less ambiguous than How I do, while the things concerning me is literal and avoids the somewhat unphonetic juxtaposition: my affairs, how I fare.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 22.—[May instead of "might," "in accordance with the law of the succession of the tenses" (Ellicott).—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 21. But that ye also may know, ἵνα δὲ εἰδῆτε καὶ ὑμεῖς.—Passing over to another subject (δε) the Apostle hastens from the intercession for himself to a conclusion. He wishes that in order to make proper intercession for him, they might also know his condition more exactly, referring them here, however, to oral communications. The καὶ before ὑμεῖς points to others (BENGEL; perinde ut alii). The immediate antithesis is Tychicus and those who are near Paul in his imprisonment. Not merely those about him (ver. 22: τὰ περὶ ἡμῶν), even those more remote should know respecting him. It cannot be in antithesis to the Apostle himself (RUECKERT and others); this gives no meaning. Even STIER's view: You also on your part should know what I on my part experience and suffer, does not correctly explain the καὶ before ὑμεῖς. To think of the Colossians (HARLESS, MEYER, BLEEK) or of Timothy (comp. 2 Tim. iv. 12) is not warranted by anything in the passage.*

The things concerning me, how I fare, set forth a double object of the communication: τὰ κατ' ἐμὲ (Phil. i. 12; Col. iv. 7) denotes the external circumstances, τὴν πρᾶσιν the personal demeanor and state in the same.*—Tychicus—shall make all known to you—Πάντα comprises what has already been referred to, pointing to the full and detailed deportment (γνωρίσει) of Tychicus, who is mentioned in Acts xx. 4; Col. iv. 7, 8; 2 Tim. iv. 12; Tit. iii. 12, without imparting any further information than that he was a native of Asia and a serviceable companion of Paul, who here characterizes him as:

The beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord.—Ὁ ἀγαπητὸς ἀδελφός designates him as a stout-hearted Christian, καὶ πιστὸς διάκονος as a reliable servant, a servant of the gospel, in accordance with the context, which indicates that Tychicus would come not for personal reasons, but in the interest of the Church (παρακαλῶν τὰς καρδίας ὑμῶν), and in agreement with Col. iv. 7 (where "minister and fellow-servant in the Lord" marks him as a servant who with Paul is a δοῦλος of Christ). We should not then think (of the ecclesiastical office of the diaconate (ESTIUS), nor yet of a personal servant to Paul himself (MEYER).† The added phrase ἐν κυρίῳ "in the Lord," is to be joined with both ἀδελφός and διάκονος, since they are connected without the article, thus confirming the reference to the ministry of the gospel,

* [ALFORD: "As I have been going at length into the matters concerning you, so if you also on your part, wish to know," etc. But this is scarcely an obvious antithesis. HODGE explains indefinitely: "You as well as other Christian friends who have manifested solicitude about me in my bonds." The presence of καὶ here has been used as an argument in favor of the priority of the Epistle to the Colossians, who are supposed to be referred to (antithetically) in καὶ, but though its presence would be naturally explained were the priority of that Epistle fully established, it scarcely amounts to an argument in favor of that hypothesis.—R.]

* [Not "what I do," for Paul always did one thing (MEYER).—R.]

† [ALFORD and ELLICOTT follow MEYER, in taking διάκονος in the sense of "servant," Paul's servant, not the servant of the gospel; they also join ἐν κυρίῳ with this term alone, as indicating that his service for Paul was yet in Christ. But Branne's view is the more natural one.—The adjective πιστός here means "trustworthy," "trustworthy," but with no reference to the trustworthiness of his message, as CHRYSTOSTOM and BENGEL imply, since he was probably known to the Ephesians, though not to the Colossians (MEYER).—R.]

through which he is a brother; his Christian character he manifests in the service of Christianity. Christ is the sphere of life and effort for Tychicus; hence ἐν κυρίῳ, which refers back to ἀδελφός also.

Ver. 22. Whom I have sent unto you for this very purpose. ὃν ἐπεμψα πρὸς ὑμᾶς εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο, for the very purpose, which has been already mentioned ["I have sent" is on the whole preferable to "I send" (WORDSWORTH) or "I sent" (ALFORD).—R.]—That ye may know our affairs.—ἵνα must be parallel to the first one, as γινώτε τοις εἰδήτε, Τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν merely extends the circle: the situation, not merely of the Apostle, but of his companions also (Col. iv. 10-14; Philemon 10, 23, 24). Paul does not send there merely in his own interest.

And that he may comfort your hearts, καὶ παρακαλέσῃ τὰς καρδίας ὑμῶν.—This denotes the consequence of communication, or the impression which accompanies it. Accordingly it is not necessary to give prominence to ministerial address as the signification here (STIER). BENDEL: Ne offenderetis in vinculis meis. ["It is better, however, owing to our ignorance of the exact state of the church, to leave the precise reference undefined, and to extend it generally to all particulars in which they needed it" (ELLIOTT).—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Personal and Congregational interests stand in close connection. Still the latter are the preponderating ones; the former must fall into the back-ground. 2. Independency. The proposition of Robinson in the beginning of the 17th century: cætum quemlibet particularem esse totam, integram et perfectam ecclesiam ex suis partibus constantem immediate et INDEPENDENTEM (quoad alias ecclesias sub ipso Christo), cannot be justified from the Apostolic age, in which the local churches stood in active intercourse and received suggestions from various quarters. [Every attempt to carry into practice this extreme view of Robinson has resulted either in ecclesiastical anarchy or a quasi-independency, such as exists in Congregational churches.—R.]

3. Our times are successful in spreading intelligence in many ways from one parish to another. This is well both for those who desire such personally imparted communications, and for those who make a sacrifice in this service, in order to receive as well as give refreshing, revival, consolation and strength. It always happens so, where the inner life is in action, even though the organization and polity are still incomplete, as in the early churches. Care however should be taken, that there be not mixed with this a dissipation of the strength required for the immediate task, or the merest of curiosity. It is precisely the fresh, glad taking root in the local churches which bears flower and fruit to be imparted for the edification of other churches. [These remarks, so pertinent to such an event as the sending of Tychicus, have a bearing on the influence of ecclesiastical bodies on the congregations within whose bounds they assemble, but more especially on the labors of those ministers who travel from place to place as "evangelists," "revival preachers." The good and the evil attendant on their labors are clearly indicated above. Such journeyings find their parallel not in the travel of the Apostles, but in those of Tychicus.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Comp. Doctr. Notes.—STARKER:—Preachers should behave to each in a friendly, peaceable, affectionate, brotherly manner.—It pleases God very much, when preachers are concerned for their hearers, and hearers for their preachers.—RIEGER:—More particular intelligence respecting each other awakens also the more fitting intercession for each other.—[It ought to be the aim of the "religious newspaper," to do for churches and families what Tychicus was to do for Paul: Communicate such personal intelligence as would comfort the hearts of those who read. Those editors who do this rather than to minister to pride or to provoke angry discussion, well deserve the title "beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord."—R.]

2. Twofold salutation to the Church.

(CHAP. VI. 23, 24.)

23 Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father and the Lord 24 Jesus Christ. Grace be with all them that [those who] love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity [incorruption]. Amen. [omit Amen.]¹

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 24. [The Rec. inserts ἀμὴν, with N⁸ D. K. L., most versions and fathers, but, as it is not found in N¹ A. B. F. G. 2 cursives and good minor authorities, it is rejected by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Elliott and most recent editors, as a liturgical gloss. In regard to such concluding words, the obvious rule is that good authority is sufficient to warrant a rejection, preponderating external evidence being of itself insufficient to establish the genuineness.

The SUBSCRIPTION in the Rec., with K. L., is: πρὸς Ἐφεσίους ἀπὸ Ῥώμης διὰ Τυχικοῦ B² has πρὸς Ἐφεσίους ἐγγράφη ἀπὸ Ῥώμης. N. A. B.¹ D.: πρὸς Ἐφεσίους, to which F. adds ἐτελέσθη. Comp. the subscriptions to the Epistle to the Colossians. —R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The form of the greeting is altogether unusual; the third person, not the second, is used in spite of the direct address (vers. 21, 22); instead of ὑμῖν we find in ver. 23: τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς, in the usual position of ὑμῖν after the first word of the salutation, and in ver. 24 we read: μετὰ πάντων τῶν ἀγαπώντων instead of ὑμῶν. Thus a general application corresponding with the universal Epistle is strongly marked. Further we find here divided into two salutations what is elsewhere comprised in one. This points emphatically from the actual effects of grace within the Christian heart and life to the ultimate real ground of the same. Finally, the first salutation begins with "peace," which elsewhere forms the close, and the second with "grace," which is the usual beginning. See on chap. i. 2. The explanation must accept the sense of the words as used elsewhere, unless other reasons compel a departure from it. In addition this original form supports the originality of this Epistle, its Pauline origin, against the acceptance of a pseudopigraphic work.

Ver. 23. The first salutation. Peace be to the brethren and love with faith.—Εἰρήνη καὶ ἀγάπη μετὰ πίστεως expresses a wish for two things.* Grammatically the three substantives stand in different relations to each other: the first two are connected as co-ordinate with καὶ, the third is joined to them with μετὰ, which unites more closely than καὶ and σύν, the latter denoting external connection, while μετὰ points to an external one, to a belonging together (WINER, p. 353). This has its influence on the explanation of the substantives, which must designate internal, ethical things. The first is "peace," as the fruit of "grace," out of which it springs (see all the Pauline salutations) [comp. Romans, p. 57], communicated through "mercy," as the salutations in Epistles to Timothy conjoin; we must therefore refer it to peace of heart, peace with God, rest of soul. The next, "love," is something springing out of the "peace," hence love to the brethren, who with us have become children of Him who is Love; this love too is in the closest union with faith. "Faith is the characteristic of proper love (as Gal. v. 6), love is the characteristic of proper faith" (HARLES). "There remains, however, a distinction, inasmuch as faith is the ground and beginning, bringing love with it, not the reverse" (STIER). BENGE: Fides presupponitur ut donum Dei. By "the brethren" we are to understand Christians in general, not those in Asia (GROTIUS), nor Jewish Christians in particular (WIESLER), nor yet the readers merely (MEYER).† It is incorrect to take εἰρήνη=concordia (CALVIN), ἀγάπη as God's love (BENGEL), or μετὰ=according to (MEYER). It is arbitrary to introduce here, in accordance with the salutations in the Epistles to Timothy, ἔλεος instead of ἀγάπη (RUCKERT), nor is it pertinent either, since "mercy" effects "peace," and would not occur after the latter.

From God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.—Ἀπὸ denotes the source, as always in the salutations. Paulus conjungit (καὶ) causam principem (θεοῦ πατρός) cum causa secunda (κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ). Comp. i. 2, 22; Phil. ii. 9.

Ver. 24. The second salutation. Grace be with all, ἡ χάρις μετὰ πάντων.—Elsewhere (Rom. xvi. 20, 24; 1 Cor. xvi. 23; 2 Cor. xiii. 13; Gal. vi. 18; Phil. iv. 23; 1 Thess. v. 28; 2 Thess. iii. 18; Philemon 25) we find ἡ χάρις τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ; the simple ἡ χάρις only here, Col. iv. 18; 1 Tim. vi. 22; 2 Tim. iv. 22 (where, however, ὁ κύριος μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος σου precedes); Tit. iii. 15. Paul, after the wish which is directed to what is subjective and ethical, points to its objective ground. The article (ἡ) marks the grace as that which is well-known to all, of which the Epistle bears testimony. The single limitation to "all" is given by the following characteristic designation:

Those who love our Lord Jesus Christ, τῶν ἀγαπώντων τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν.—Thus Paul gives prominence to what should be the agens in every called and baptized Christian. The twofold salutation, bordering on a parallelism, is thus to be distinguished; the first part points to the inner life of the Christian, the second to the principle on which this life is based, with its immediate effect, love to Christ. In this we find then both an advance and a justification of the explanation of ἀδελφοί. [MEYER and most find here alone the wider reference to all real Christians, corresponding to the Anathema in 1 Cor.—R.] So 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Comp. John xiv. 21, 23. Hence the first wish is not for all members of the church, and the second for genuine disciples (STIER); as if the effect were to be wished for the former, and the efficient cause only for the latter! WIESLER finds a most remarkable reference, in the first, to the Jewish Christians, as especially "brethren" after the flesh, in the second to the Gentile Christians, as though they were not brethren; no reader would have thought of this.

In incorruption, ἐν ἀφθαρσίᾳ (from ἀφθαρτος, incorruptus, corruptioni et interitui non obnoxius, 1 Cor. ix. 25; xv. 52; Rom. i. 23; 1 Tim. i. 17; 1 Pet. i. 4, 23; iii. 4), is used here as in 1 Cor. xv. 42, 50, 53, 54; Rom. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 10, where the resurrection of the body is spoken of, and is not to be applied differently. BENGE:

to refer to the same persons, viz., all Christians. The former view is the more obvious one, but the latter accounts for the peculiar form of the salutation, and accords with the universal character of the Epistle. Still it lays a great stress upon a form that may have no special significance.—R.]

* [Two, not three, for the term "brethren" presupposes "faith" there already. The form indicates also, that he wishes for them "peace" and "love" in inseparable connection with the already present "faith." Of course the increase of "love" necessarily implies the increase of faith, but the wish is strictly a double one.—R.]

† [MEYER, followed by EADIE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT, takes "the brethren" here as—"you," finding in the second benediction a wider reference; Braune, on the other hand, seems ἀφάρθια δεικνύσας labis expertem et inde fluentem perpetuitatem. The phrase is an adverbial qualification of ἀγαπῶντων, as Tit. iii. 15: τοὺς φιλοῦντας ἡμᾶς ἐν πίστει. [So MEYER, ALFORD, HODGE, and most recent commentators.] Accordingly it is inadmissible to connect it with χάρις (supplying ἔστω) with the explanation that it is ἐν ἀφάρτοις, in whom it manifests itself (HARLESS, STIER and others), still more so, to join it with Χριστόν (SEMLER), as though the glorified Saviour, and not rather the One in the form of a servant, were the object of the love. It is not—in eternity (MATTHIES), that would be εἰς αἰῶνα, nor in sincerity [E. V.],* either of love (CALVIN, CALOVIVS and others) or of life (GREEK FATHERS, ERASMUS, ESTIUS), that would be ἐν ἀφάρθια (Tit. ii. 7). LUTHER renders it well: unverrückt [immovably]; the phrase denoting that the love is one belonging to incorruption, not succumbing to the fluctuations and changes of the world. BENDEL, who joins it with χάρις, remarks aptly, however: Congruū cum tota summa epistolæ: et inde redundat etiam ἀφάρθια in amorem fidelium erga Jesum Christum. [Comp. the terse and lucid note of ELLICOTT in loco, who, after defending the view not commonly accepted, on grammatical and lexical grounds, adds: “in incorruption, i. e., in a manner and in an element that knows neither change, diminution nor decay. Thus then this significant clause not only defines what the essence of the ἀγάπη is, but indicates that it ought to be perennial, immutable, incorruptible.” “Not a fleeting earthly love, but a spiritual and eternal one” (ALFORD).—R.] There inheres a mighty earnestness in these closing words, which however may not be spared even with a child; the smallest child can love its mother.

Thus the conclusion returns again to the beginning, and this is the more significant, when one remembers, that Paul, who did not himself write his letters, but always dictated them (Rom. xvi. 22), penned the salutation alone with his own hand, as Col. iv. 18: 1 Cor. xvi. 21; 2 Thess. iii. 17, probably also Gal. vi. 11–18.† See LAURENT, Neutestamentliche Studien, pp. 4–9.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Epistle began (i. 2) and now it closes with the greeting: “grace be with you!” This grace, God’s condescending love in Christ, is the ground and the goal of all human effort directed toward salvation. 2. From grace there is first brought about in the heart of the Christian, peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, the reconciliation, which drives away the unrest caused by the re-echo in our conscience of the accusing and condemning law, making real rest of soul. Then in and by the side of peace toward God there enters love toward our neighbor; both, peace and love, in the convoy of faith which casts itself upon Christ as Lord. The objective grace works subjectively through faith and peace and love, unfolding and moulding the strength and beauty of the human character in every department of life. Christianity animates and exalts in noble activity the Divine in the human, as a whole and in particular, to a blessed and beautifying permanence. 3. We should not be brethren merely through the external church relation, but prove ourselves such in love to the Lord. This will depend on the healthfulness of our faith, which in spite of external “progress,” hindrances, dangers, influences, proves itself from the beginning to the very close by incorruptible love to the Lord Jesus.

[4. The closing benediction (ver. 24). It differs from all other Pauline benedictions; not in what is wished, but in its definition of those for whom it is wished. This definition makes it a fitting close to our Epistle, the leading idea of which is: “the Church in Christ Jesus.” For we thus have a final definition of those who constitute this Church: “those who love the Lord Jesus Christ in incorruption.” Extensively, then, the Church is not bounded by those external limits necessarily established by ecclesiastical organizations, nor by those logical ones as necessarily defined by detailed dogmatic statement, still less by those empirical ones set up by morbid, fanatical or spasmodic religionism. The empire of love is not co-incidental with such boundaries. Still this is not the “broad” territory of indifference, ignorance, doubt or unbelief, for the definition is intensive also. The love has for its object “the Lord Jesus Christ,” whom Paul loved. And those who love as Paul loved, must apprehend this Object in good measure as Paul apprehended Him. No one can define how far speculative doubt about the Person of Christ leaves scope for a real love to Him as “the Lord Jesus Christ,” but love seeks to know the dear object, and those who seek Him will find Him, here or hereafter, “as He is.” Love is the best preceptor in Christology. Mere sincerity is not enough; the love must move in a sphere, partake of a character, “perennial, immutable, incorruptible.” That Christ’s grace alone can beget such a love is evident both from the Apostle’s words and human experience. Those who have it are “in Christ,” of His Body, which, in a fuller, higher sense, like the Head, shall live and love “in incorruption,” through the same “grace.”—R.]

Comp. Doctr. Notes.

RIEGER: The sum of the whole Epistle was. God in Christ, before the world began in purpose, God in Christ in the accomplishment of our destined Redemption, God in Christ in the saints’ appropriation of this salvation provided for us, unto its consummation in glory; hence the benediction at the conclusion concentrates itself upon fellowship with God and His peace and His love. The smallest child in Christ, and he who is the strongest through God’s Spirit in the inner man, can unite on the precious heart-point of love to

* [ALFORD, with right, urges that this would make the Epistle end with an anticlimax, “by lowering the high standard which it has lifted up throughout to an apparent indifferentism, and admitting to the apostolic blessing all those, however otherwise wrong, who are only not hypocrites in their love of Christ.”—R.]

† [Comp. Galatians, in loco, where the additional notes defend the view that the whole of that Epistle was penned by Paul himself. This opinion includes the presupposition that he rarely did so, strengthening therefore, not weakening, the point Dr. Braune here introduces.—R.]

Jesus. The grace remains immovable, and out of this the love also reaches to something amaranthine, which in the heat of the contest does not fade away.

HEUBNER: The love to Jesus must abide, must be immovable, whatever fortunes meet us, however the spirit of the age may change; else it is not pure. Laus in amore mori.

PASSAVANT: Here we have an apostolic conclusion. It is a reminder, first, of that peace, which comes down from God's heaven alone upon our earth, into our hearts; secondly, of that love, which is pure, holy, Divine; thirdly, Paul reminds the Christians of that faith, which, inseparable from love, living and active through it, born of God, alone is pleasing to God, alone gives to God His glory, alone exalts the soul to Him. Fourthly, we are reminded of that grace, through which first and alone there comes to us all true, eternal, blessed good, continuing ours out of pure mercy and unto eternity.—The whole of vital Christianity is contained in love to Jesus. Those then who love this Jesus with their whole heart, so that in this love they look to Him alone, desire Him alone, follow Him alone, deny themselves for Him, willingly bear His cross and their cross after Him, living to Him and dying to Him—those are Christians, are God's children, His special, His constant and dear objects of regard.

STIER: If any one loves our Lord Jesus Christ, in vain and in wrong would all the churches pronounce the ban against him, nor are formulas of faith valid against him.

GERLACH: The grace which is the cause of our love to Christ, becomes at the same time the reward of our love to Him; all may be hoped from Him, if one loves Him, all feared, if one does not love Him.

EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLE.

The following schedule exhibits to us the heads under which these may be arranged:—

SEC. I. ADDRESS AND SALUTATION (i. 1, 2).

SEC. II. SITUATION AND LABORS OF THE APOSTLE AT ROME (i. 3-26).

(1) The Apostle's gratitude and joy before God on account of the church at Philippi (i. 3-11).

After joyful thanksgiving for the fellowship of the church in the gospel (3-5), and the expression of his confident hope that God will make this perfect (6-8), he offers a fervent prayer for them (9-11).

(2) The gospel, in spite of insincere or false brethren and threatening danger of death, makes progress during the Apostle's captivity at Rome (i. 12-26).

After referring to the happy effects of his ministry in bonds (12-14), among sincere and insincere witnesses for Christ (15-17), he expresses his views respecting this varied experience (18-20), and calmly revolves the question whether life or death may be better for him (21-26).

SEC. III. THE LORD'S EXAMPLE AND PATTERN FOR THE OBSERVANCE OF THE CHURCH (i. 27—ii. 18).

(1) A true Christian deportment the condition of the Apostle's joy in the church (i. 27-30). Characteristics of a Christian walk (27, 28 a); encouraging motives (28 b-30).

(2) Christ's example on the way through humiliation to exaltation (ii. 1-11).

After entreating them earnestly and eloquently to stand together in harmony (1-4), he holds up to view the person of the Redeemer (5, 6), His state of humiliation (7, 8), and His state of exaltation (9-11).

(3) God strengthens believers to walk in Christ's footsteps along the painful way of obedience (12-14), to its glorious end (15-18).

SEC. IV. PAUL'S ASSISTANTS AND CO-LABORERS (ii. 19-30).

(1) Timothy and his speedy mission to Philippi (19-24).

(2) Sending back of Epaphroditus (25-30).

SEC. V. WARNING AGAINST JUDAISTIC FALSE TEACHERS AND WICKED DECEIVERS IN CONTRAST WITH THE APOSTLE (iii. 1—iv. 1).

(1) The spirit of these teachers as distinguished from that of Paul (iii. 1-16).

He warns them against the disposition of such errorists, especially their pride (2-7), points out the opposition between the righteousness of the law and that of faith (8-11), and speaks of his humble striving after perfection (12-14), with an exhortation to harmony among the Philippians (15-16).

(2) Opposite destiny of false and true Christians (iii. 17—iv. 1).

He confirms his exhortation to imitate himself and others like-minded (17) by two contrasts: the destruction of the worldly, and the glorification of the righteous believers (18–21); and concludes (iv. 1) with an exhortation to steadfastness.

SEC. VI. FINAL EXHORTATION TO CO-OPERATION BETWEEN HIMSELF AND THE PHILIPPIAN CHURCH (iv. 2–20).

(1) Individuals exhorted to harmony (2, 3).

(2) General exhortation to joyfulness (4–7).

(3) General and final summons to Christian progress (8, 9).

(4) Thanksgiving for the gifts of love from them (10–20).

His joy on this account (10), caution against misapprehension (11–13), grateful recognition of their kindness (14–17), and assurance of the Divine blessing (18–20).

SEC. VII. SALUTATION AND BENEDICTION (iv. 21–23).

The ground tone of this Epistle is found in the antithesis of joy and sorrow which runs through every part of it, not only in Paul's references to his own joy in his diversified relations (i. 4, 18; ii. 2, 17; iv. 1, 10), but also in his exhortations to the church to cherish this spirit. The feeling of joy animates the Apostle in his darkest hours, and that joy is the mark which he has always in view. With ZÖCKLER (VILMAR'S Pastoraltheologische Blätter, 1864, Heft 5 and 6, p. 239 sq.) we shall find the ground-thought in that divine mystery which Peter (1 Pet. i. 11) designates as "the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow" (τὰ εἰς Χριστὸν παθήματα καὶ τὰ μετὰ ταῦτα δόξας), and describes as an object of hope and longing to the angels in heaven. Expressed in one sentence it is this: Only humble, loving self-denial, after the example of Christ, who has passed through the condition of self-abasement to His exaltation in heaven, can lift us up to true honor, to a full, abiding enjoyment of the Christian life.

§ 2. CHARACTER AND IMPORTANCE OF THE EPISTLE.

(1) The character of the letter distinguishes it in a marked way from the letters to the Ephesians and Colossians. The theme is not here as in those letters divided in its treatment into a theoretical and a hortatory part. It is a genuine outgush of the heart, and bears more than any other a familiar character (WIESINGER). It is a natural and unstudied expression of feeling, without doctrinal purpose or strict plan (ZÖCKLER), although the beautiful organism of the letter is not to be overlooked, and HOLTZMANN (HERZOG'S Real-encyk. Vol. XX. p. 401) should not say that it is wanting in close connection and progress of the thought. Even the single but extremely important doctrinal passage (ii. 5–11) is ethically conceived, and bears directly with all its force upon practical life. As MEYER well remarks: "The entire contents breathe an inmost and touching love for this favorite Church. No other letter is so rich in heartfelt expressions and tender allusions—none so characteristically epistolary, without exact arrangement, without doctrinal discussions, without Old Testament citations and dialectic argumentations. None is so completely a letter of the heart, an outburst of passionate longing for the fellowship of love amid outward desertion and affliction; so that although at times almost elegiac in its tone, it is a model of the union of tender love with apostolic dignity and boldness." Although the letter of a prisoner near death, it is melior alacriorque et blandior ceteris (GROTIUS). Written in view of death, yet full of unshaken hope of life, under heavy oppression, yet full of unbending courage, amid grievous conflicts, yet full of fresh zeal, it passes from expressions of tender love for the church to the severest denunciations of dangerous adversaries. With passages full of elegant negligence (i. 29), like Plato's dialogues, and Cicero's letters, it has passages of wonderful eloquence, and proceeds from entirely outward, special, relations and circumstances to wide-reaching thoughts and grand conceptions.

(2) Hence the importance of the letter, apart from the one doctrinal passage (ii. 5–11), lies in the province of practical life. It treats of the mutual relations of the minister and his church, and also of the general Christian life, especially in regard to self-discipline and proper demeanor in circumstances of difficulty and towards various persons.

The Church has therefore selected from it four portions to be read on the fourth Sunday after Advent (iv. 4-7), on Palm-Sunday (ii. 5-11), on the twenty-second (i. 3-11) and the twenty-third Sunday after Trinity (iii. 17-21).

§ 3. UNITY OF THE EPISTLE.

This unity appears from §§ 1, 2, and it would be unnecessary to refer to it, had not HEINRICH (Novum Testamentum ed. Köppe VII. Proleg. p. 31 sqq.) and Paulus (Heidelb. Jahrb. 1817, 7, p. 702 sq.) brought forward the idea that there were two letters here, the one (i. 1—iii. 1, as far as χαίρετε ἐν κυρίῳ, and iv. 21-23) addressed to all the Philippians, and the other (iii. 1 b—iv. 20) addressed to his more intimate friends, the ἐπίσκοποι and διάκονοι; and that the exoteric and esoteric parts were first united by another hand. This view finds no exegetical support in λοιπὸν (iii. 1), τέλειται (iii. 15), as the explanation of the passages shows. It deserves to be forgotten, or to be mentioned only as a curiosity.

§ 4. AUTHOR OF THE EPISTLE.

(1) The letter itself designates the Apostle Paul as the author (i. 1), represents Timothy as one of his associates (i. 1; ii. 19), and refers to his imprisonment (i. 7), and to his former preaching in Macedonia (iv. 15), in a manner entirely natural and in harmony with his actual relations. On this point, therefore, there is no room for doubt.

(2) The external testimonies maintain Paul's authorship. Polycarp cites it (ad Phil. iii. 11) as a letter of Paul's, according to its position in MURATORI's Canon, after the Epistle to the Ephesians, and before that to the Colossians (Eph. § 4, 2), and in this he is followed by IRENAEUS, CLEMENS of Alexandria, ORIGEN, TERTULLIAN, and EUSEBIUS who reckons it among the ὁμολογούμενα. MARCION also regards it as an epistle of Paul.

(3) It bears undeniably the Pauline impress in its contents and spirit, its delicate turns and allusions, its language and mode of representation (MEYER, comp. § 2, 1). It should be remarked too that from the subordination of the doctrinal element, as also from the prominence of its characteristics as fresh, original, and called forth by a special occasion, all suspicion of forgery in the interest of doctrine is excluded (MEYER). Hence OLSHAUSEN could still say that this letter belongs to the few writings of the New Testament of which the genuineness has never been disputed.

(4) SCHRAEDER leads the way to the more recent assaults on this Epistle (Der Apostel Paulus, V. p. 233 sq.). According to his view, the passage iii. 1—iv. 9 is interpolated between ii. 30 and iv. 10, destroying the symmetry of the letter and its character as a letter of friendship. This arbitrary assumption falls away at once before an unprejudiced interpretation of the passage in question.

The leader of the Tübingen School, BAUR (especially in his Paulus, 1845, pp. 458-475) whom his pupil, SCHWEGLER (Nachapost. Zeitalter II. 133-135), ably supports, makes the attack in a different way. BAUR's arguments group themselves under three heads:—

(a) The letter moves in the circle of Gnostic ideas, not combating them, but attaching itself to them. Consequently the passage, ii. 5 sq., must have this import: ἀπαγμός points to the Valentinian Sophia, which strives to force itself into the being of the Father (ἰσα τῷ θεῷ εἶναι) and thus sinks down from the πλήρωμα into the κένωμα; "Being found in the likeness of men," etc. (ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων and σχήματι εἰρηθεῖς ὡς ἄνθρωπος) are Docetic; and the division into the three regions of ἐπουρανίων, ἐπιγείων, καταχθονίων is purely Gnostic. This view also is utterly untenable in the light of impartial exegesis.

(b) The character of the letter justifies a doubt of its Pauline origin. The expression κίνεσ (iii. 2) is indelicate; and the antithesis of κατατομή and περιτομή forced and out of place. The statement in iii. 2 sq. is copied from 2 Cor. xi. 18 sq., and that in iv. 15 contradicts 1 Cor. ix. 15 (ἐγὼ δὲ οὐ κέχρημαι οἰδενὶ τοῦτων), or at least 2 Cor. xi. 9, according to which the contribution did not reach him at the beginning of his Macedonian labors, but at a later period. The passage in Philippians arose probably from that in Corinthians by an exaggeration. The passage iv. 16 is not historically correct, since Paul did not make a long stay there; further iii. 1 (τὰ αὐτὰ γράφεῖν) indicates poverty of thought; and iii. 6 (δικαιοσύνη ἐν νόμῳ) is un-Pauline. These charges also prove unfounded when we examine the passages.

(c) The historical relations all point to a post-Pauline period. Κλήμεντος (iv. 3), in connection with ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας (iv. 22), compels us to think of the relation of the Emperor TIBERIUS FLAVIUS CLEMENS, who on account of impiety (ἀθεότης) was condemned to death, and thus for the first time the προκοπή τοῦ εὐαγγελίου (i. 12) becomes clear, together with Paul's joyful hope of a speedy release (ii. 24). Further, in the fact that this CLEMENS, a genuine disciple of Peter, had become a συνεργός of Paul, we see the writer's tendency to harmonize the representatives of the Jewish and Gentile Christians, Εὐδοκία and Συνήχη (iv. 2). Ἐπισκόπους καὶ διακόνους (i. 1) is an anachronism in a Pauline Epistle. As to these objections also an unbiassed exegesis removes every difficulty.

Such objections to the genuineness of the letter become in reality vouchers for it. If there are no others against Paul's authorship, we need not be concerned. They serve only to make us feel how uncertain are the decisions of critics who recognize such delicacy of feeling on the part of the writer, and yet complain of monotonous repetitions, poverty of thought, and a want of any definite theme or purpose. LÜDEMANN (Pauli ad Phil. Ep. contra Baurium defendit, 1847) and BRÜCKNER (Ep. ad Phil. Paulo auctori vindicata contra Baurium defendit, 1848) have triumphantly vindicated the genuineness of this letter.

§ 5. RELATIONS OF THE READERS.

(1) Their external relations. Not merely in the superscription (i. 1, ἐν Φιλίπποις) does the Apostle designate the place of the church, but also (which he seldom does except under deep emotion) in the body of the letter, where he mentions their gifts of love to him (iv. 15: φιλιππησίου). Philippi is first mentioned in Acts xvi. 12. It was originally called Κρηνίδες from the great number of fountains in that region, afterwards Δάρος, and finally, when Philip, the son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, enlarged and fortified it as a bulwark against the Thracians, about B. C. 358, it was named Φιλιπποι. It became still more celebrated on account of the battle fought there B. C. 42 between the Triumviri Brutus and Cassius (which decided the fate of the republic), after which it was made a Roman colonia (κολωνία, Acts xvi. 12) with the jus italicum; but it obtained its greatest glory as the first city of Europe in which the gospel was preached with great success by Paul (A. D. 53) on his second missionary journey (Acts xvi. 9–40). When it is said (Acts xvi. 12): ἐκεῖθεν εἰς Φιλίππους, ἥτις ἐστὶν πρώτη τῆς μέριδος τῆς Μακεδονίας πόλις, this πρῶτη evidently designates only its local position (ἐκεῖθεν, i. e., from Neapolis), not its political importance. It lies not far from the sea,* and after Neapolis, the port of Philippi, reckoned at that time as in Thrace (VAN HENGEL Comment. Ep. ad Phil. p. 4), is the first city reached on coming from Neapolis to Macedonia. The capital of Macedonia was Amphipolis (Liv. 45, 29). Comp. Acts of the Apostles, LANGE'S Series, p. 304. Paul, along with the happy results of his preaching in the conversion of Lydia and the jailor, had suffered many trials there (1 Thess. ii. 2: προπαθόντες καὶ ὑβρισθέντες). After probably a short stay at Philippi on his third missionary journey (Acts xx. 1, 2), he remained there somewhat longer on his return, though still not a long time (Acts xx. 6).

[Some of the later commentators (even MEYER, Comment. über die Briefe an die Philipper, etc., p. 1, 1859) speak of a village, Felibah, as still occupying the ancient site. This is incorrect. COUSINÉRY wrote nearly forty years ago: "La ville célèbre de Philippi ne renferme aujourd'hui que des animaux sauvages; l'oiseau de Minerva se y régénère au milieu des débris" (Voyage dans la Macédoine, p. 17, tome 2, Paris, 1831). The nearest human habitation at present is a Greek κατέλμα, or caravansary, a mile or more from the ruins, though the ancient name undoubtedly still lingers among the peasants of the country. The nearest village is Bereketli, several miles distant. The ruins consist principally of the remains of a theatre or amphitheatre on the side of the hill which formed the acropolis of Philippi, mounds of rubbish containing broken columns and fragments of marble, two lofty gateways supposed to have belonged to a colossal temple of the emperor CLAUDIUS, and a portion of the ancient city wall on the east side towards Kavalla (Neapolis). Latin inscriptions are still found there, which show that the place was once occupied by Romans. (See the addition to COLONY in the American edition of SMITH'S Bible Dictionary, Vol. I. p. 447.)

* It is somewhat less, certainly, than 10 miles. The recent French explorers (Mission Archéologique) make the distance from 12 to 13 kilomètres, i. e., about 9 Roman miles. From the crags which overlook the road across Symbolum from Kavalla, the ancient Neapolis, to the site of Philippi, the traveller has both places in sight at the same time.—H.]

The river of which Luke speaks in Acts xvi. 13 is undoubtedly the Gangas or Gangites mentioned by ancient writers (Herod. vii. 113), and said to be known still as Anghista. It is not a permanent stream, but, like many of the so-called rivers (ποταμοί) in the East, may be entirely dry in summer, but flow with water in the rainy season. When the writer was there on the 13th of December, 1859, it was a rapid torrent, rushing and foaming over its rocky bed, varying in depth at different points from one and two feet to four and five feet, and covering a bed of about thirty feet in width. The stones at the bottom showed the action at times of a still more powerful current. The channel of this stream is only a few rods beyond the circuit of the city, as indicated by the parts of the wall which still remain. For other information respecting the site of Philippi and its harbor, Neapolis, the present Kavalla, see Bibl. Sacra, Vol. XVII. 873 ff. It was on the bank of this stream that the Jews or Jewish proselytes assembled for worship (Acts xvi. 13), and hence, as Luke's expression indicates (for we are to read there, ἐκ πύλης, out of the gate and not ἐκ πόλεως, out of the city), they had only to pass out of the gate, and would then come at once to the river-side.—H.]

Nearly all the inhabitants of Philippi were heathen, among whom were a few Jews, who did not have even a synagogue, but only a place of prayer (Acts xvi. 13, LANGE'S Series, p. 304), without the city, near the river, where also a few proselytes worshipped with them. Among these undoubtedly the Apostle gained his first converts. The church must have been composed principally of Gentiles. We cannot infer, on sufficient grounds, that the church was wealthy, either from the case of Lydia or the jailor, or from their gifts to the Apostle. Polycarp indeed, in his letter to the Philippians, censures their love of money; but he died A. D. 168 at the age of 86, and wrote his letter at least fifty or sixty years after Paul wrote to the Philippians. During this period great changes may have taken place even in the outward circumstances of the church.*

2. The internal condition of the church was, on the whole, very favorable. The church could not have remained weak, as the Jewish congregation there had been; for it had ἐπίσκοποι καὶ διάκονοι (i. 1). It must therefore have been also well regulated. We must not overlook the fact that Paul writes πᾶσιν τοῖς ἁγίοις ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ (i. 1). This πᾶσιν is omitted in his letter to the Colossians, who were known to him, and in his letter to the Ephesians, while in his letter to the Romans, who were as yet unknown to him, and in his second letter to the Corinthians, it occupies a different position. He also not merely salutes πάντα ἅγιον (iv. 21), but rejoices in them all (ii. 17). In like manner Epaphroditus longs earnestly, not after Philippi merely, but even after them all (ii. 26), and is anxious because they have heard of his sickness. More than once, before the Apostle arrived at Corinth, did they contribute to his support (iv. 15, 16), nor did they probably fail to share in the gifts of love which were sent from Macedonia to Corinth (2 Cor. xi. 9), and now again they have forwarded by a messenger their gifts to him at Rome (iv. 10-20). It was this last act, together with the return of Epaphroditus (ii. 25-30), which gave occasion for the letter. They have their trials (i. 29), but remain faithful. Adversaries (ἀντικείμενοι) come among them (i. 28), also false teachers (iii. 2 sq.), and enemies to Christ (iii. 18, 19), but it is always evident that they do not come forth from them nor succeed among them. He has no fear of intellectual or doctrinal errors among them, but only calls their attention to the approaching danger. The false teachers are Judaistic, as among the Galatians, but with this difference, that among the latter they had arisen in the church itself, and had met with success, whereas here they had entered the church from without, and had hitherto met with no success. He is obliged indeed to exhort them to harmony (ii. 1-4; iv. 2, 3), to pray for their furtherance in knowledge and experience (i. 9), to warn them against strife and vanity (ii. 3, 4); but not in a tone of accusation or of reproach on account of grievous errors, as in the case of the Corinthians and others. If therefore officiousness or a striving for pre-eminence existed among them, or the conceit of moral perfection (WIESINGER), the rivalry of spiritual pride, which leads one by turns to arrogate to himself or to disclaim Christian perfection (MEYER), the tinder of this pride, ever ready for the spark, namely, a tendency to excessive self-estimation (SCHENKEL), or ascetic jealousy (DE WETTE), we are to understand this as applicable to single persons, or occurrences, or as pertaining to the natural man, from whom even the true Christian is not freed. Without this view of the case, Paul's high commendation of the Philippians (iv. 1, χαρὰ καὶ στεφανὸς μου), the praise awarded to them at the beginning of the letter (i. 3-11), the account of his external condition (i. 12-20), and also of his state of mind (i. 21-26; iii. 7-15), become unintelligible.

* POLYCARP charges two members of the Philippian church with the vice of avarice, but exonerates the church as a whole from any participation in their sin. See Prof. LIGHTFOOT'S Commentary, p. 63, note 1.—H.]

§ 6. TIME AND PLACE OF COMPOSITION.

(1) Facts of the letter. According to i. 7, 13-20; iv. 22, it is evident that Paul is a prisoner: that he has freedom and opportunity to preach: that he has been in that situation for some time, and is in such relations with the well-known Prætorium (τῷ πραιτωρίῳ) that his person and work have become known throughout that camp (ἐν ὄλῳ) and among all the others (τοῖς λοιποῖς πᾶσιν) who would here come into question. There is a church there, which is also not without witnesses for Christ, of whom some indeed are "contentious" (οἱ ἐξ ἐριθείας), so that we are to think of an important place in which such dissension would be comparatively of little account; and as, finally, the imperial palace (ἡ Καίσαρος οἰκία) is there, the place thus variously indicated must be Rome.

Since Paul has been there for some time, he cannot have written this letter in the beginning of his imprisonment, but must have written it towards its close;—an inference which is confirmed by his uncertainty as to whether he will be finally released, or meet with a martyr's death. Hence we conclude that this letter was written at Rome, A. D. 63 or 64, a year after that to the Colossians, and in the spring, which we infer not from ἀνεβήκατε (see on iv. 10), but from the return of Epaphroditus, which the opening of the spring navigation rendered practicable. The subscriptions of the Codices from the fourth century and onwards (B. and others at the end) favor this conclusion.

The Church, which divided the letters of Paul into those addressed to churches and those addressed to individuals, arranged them according to their stichometric length, and thus our letter stands before Colossians. Only the epistle to the Ephesians, which with its 155 verses contains only six more verses than Galatians (in the cod. Sin. however, 48 στοιχοί), is placed after Galatians, because in comparison with the latter composition the difference in length was of minor importance. (LAURENT, Neutestamentliche Studien, p. 43 sq.).

(2) The following are different views: OEDER (De tempore et loco epistolæ ad Phil. scriptæ. ONOLDI, 1731), transfers the letter to the time of Paul's sojourn of a year and a half at Corinth (Acts xviii. 11). But the Apostle was not then in prison, and not in danger of death, as at Rome.

D. PAULUS (1799), BÖTTGER, (Beiträge, GÖTTINGEN, 1837), and others, refer the letter to the time of Paul's imprisonment at Cæsarea. BÖTTGER, not without acuteness and learning, founds his argument upon the misunderstood judicial procedure, according to which an appeal must be answered within five or ten days. Maintaining that Paul's imprisonment at Rome, resulting from his appeal to the emperor, could last only five days, he assumes (since Paul was in prison there during two years, Acts xxviii. 30), a second imprisonment, and by a forced explanation understands τῷ πραιτωρίῳ (i. 13), and ἡ Καίσαρος οἰκία (iv. 22), of imperial edifices out of Rome, and on account of ἐν τῷ πραιτωρίῳ Ἡρώδου (Acts xxiii. 35) he places these at Cæsarea. But on this view he does not explain the other indications (above noticed) which point out the time and place of composition, and creates a new perplexity, namely, how Luke (Acts xxviii. 16-23) forgot to mention that Paul was released, and was not imprisoned at Rome until a later period.

EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE PHILIPPIANS.*

SECTION I.

I. ADDRESS AND SALUTATION.

CHAPTER I. 1, 2.

- 1 Paul and Timotheus [Timothy],¹ the [omit the] servants of Jesus Christ² [Christ Jesus], to all the saints in Christ Jesus, which [who] are at Philippi, with the 2 [omit the] bishops³ [overseers] and deacons⁴ [helpers]: Grace (be)⁵ unto you and peace, from God our Father and from [omit from] the Lord Jesus Christ.

* Πρὸς Φιλιππησίους. N. ABFSK, et al.; DE have πρὸς Φιλιππησίους preceded by ἀρχεται (found also in FG). There are fuller titles, as in the case of the Epistle to the Ephesians.

⁴ Ibid. [Instead of "deacons" (διακόνους), as in A. V., BRAUNE renders "helpers" (Helfern), but LUTHER "servants" (Dienern).—H.]

⁵ Ver. 2. [The Greek has no verb after χάρις. LUTHER, whom BRAUNE follows, omits the copula here. The A. V. in this elliptical form of salutation omits or supplies "be" without any rule. In respect to the nature of the ellipsis, see remarks on Philem., ver. 4 (Vol. VIII., p. 12 b).—H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Paul and Timothy, servants of Christ Jesus.—(Παῦλος καὶ Τιμόθεος δούλοι Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ.) See on Eph. i. 1 and Col. i. 1. Timothy is not mentioned here as joint writer of the Epistle (MEYER), for the first person singular immediately follows in ver. 3, and in ii. 19 Paul appears as his director, nor for the sake of honoring him and of securing him greater influence in the church (SCHENKEL). [It has excited surprise that Luke is not named here as well as Timothy, since he was with Paul at Philippi, when the church was gathered (Acts xvi. 11), and was with Paul at Rome shortly before the time when he wrote to the Colossians (iv. 14). It is conjectured that some unknown exigency may have called him away from Paul just at the time when he wrote this epistle.—H.] The designation servants (δούλοι) marks their common relation to the Lord of the church, and corresponds to the familiar character of the epistle, as well as its object, which was to express his thanks for the supplies sent to him from Philippi. The church has by this act served not merely Paul and Timothy, but the Lord whose servants they are. BENGE: Familiarius scribit ad Philippenses, quam ad eos, ubi se apostolum nominat. Sub hoc prædicato communi discipulum Timotheum mediate vocatum sibi humanissime adjungit, qui recens Paulo adjunctus Philippos venerat (Acts xvi. 3-12).—[We certainly miss here Paul's customary official title of Apostle, omitted elsewhere only in his two earliest Epistles, namely, those to the Thessalonians, and that to Philemon, which relates to a private matter. We are to attribute this, says SCHENKEL (Briefe an die Epheser, etc., p. 112), not to his courteous regard for Timothy, for he assumes the title in Col. i. 1, where, as here, he associates Timothy with himself; but to the almost purely personal occasion of the letter, and its tone of familiarity, which naturally left out of view his official position. Besides, no one here at Philippi had assailed his apostolic authority, and hence he had no reason for giving prominence to his official dignity.—H.]—To all the saints in Christ Jesus, who are at Philippi.—Comp. Eph. i. 1. Πᾶσι τοῖς ἁγίοις, comprises all the members of the church. It is worthy of notice that this "all" recurs again and again, as in i. 4, 7, 8, 25; ii. 17, 26; iv. 22. We are to attribute this to the orderly condition of the church, which rendered exceptions unnecessary; not to the ardor of his love (MEYER), or his impartiality with respect to the disagreement (iv. 2, 3) which existed in the church (DU WETTE), or by way of emphasis with respect to his more confidential friends, for whom chaps. iii. and iv. are intended (HEINRICH), or because he would include also those who had not contributed to his support (HENGEL). On τοῖς οὖν ἐν Φιλιππίαις see Introduction, § 5, and on Eph. i. 1, and Coloss. i. 1.—With bishops and assistants—σὺν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνους. The ἐπισκοποι are the πρεσβύτεροι (Acts xx. 28), ποιμένες (Eph. iv. 11), the presbytery. At the head of the church stood, therefore, not one bishop, but several elders. Concerning the διάκονοι see Acts vi. 1, 2; 1 Tim. iii. 8, 9. Illi tum interna, hi externa curabant proprie (1 Tim. iii. 2, 8), nec tamen hi non interna, neque illi non externa. Hæc una ad Philippenses epistola ita inscribitur, ut cum emphatica paraphrasi conjungatur mentio episcoporum et diaconorum (HENGEL). Paul indicates that as the individual members are united to each other (πάσι), so the church with its officers forms a living, beautiful unity, as evinced also by the contribution sent to the Apostle and collected in the church by its officers. More remote, if at all involved, are the supposed references to the fact that it was a regularly constituted church (RHEINWALD), which is not to be presumed as true only of the one at Philippi; to the recognition of officers in the church (WIESINGER); to the special zeal of the bishops and deacons (MATTHIES); to Epaphroditus, as one who belonged to the ἐπισκόποις (GROTIUS, et al.), or to the fact that the collection came from the members of the church, without its having an official character (SCHENKEL).

Ver. 2. Grace (be) unto you and peace, from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ, Χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπὸ θεοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν καὶ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.—This accords with Eph. i. 2, which compare.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Comp. on Eph. i. 1, 2, and Col. i. 1, 2.

1. Paul comprises under δούλος Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ the relation of both Timothy and himself as servants. So great and glorious is their Master that before Him all distinctions in rank and importance vanish. These distinctions are authorized, and yet care is to be taken that they be not overstrained, or hierarchically established, or abused. It is one thing for the Apostle in his humility to associate himself with his assistant, and quite another for the latter to arrogate to himself an equality with the former.

2. The Apostle in the first place distinguishes between the church and its servants; but, secondly, he does not separate the two, so that the servants stand exalted above the church, but places them in the church, from which they are taken, and for which they are employed. Thirdly, he distinguishes also the different servants of the church, and names some ἐπισκοποι and others διάκονοι, without stating any thing more definite in regard to them, except that the former are employed especially in the training and instruction of the Church, the latter in the care of the poor and sick. But, fourthly, he unites these together as belonging to one body and subordinate to one head. Fifthly, he speaks of a single church as having not merely διάκονοι, but also ἐπίσκοποι, so that we do not discover here the beginning of the Episcopal system, but find rather a college of presbyters at the head of a single congregation.

HOILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Comp. on Eph. i. 1, 2; Col. i. 1, 2.

Be not confused by the distinctions among men, nor in the presence of them, that thou mayest clearly recognize the common position of all before the Lord. But do not, on account of this equality in His sight, despise the distinctions which He has appointed. Thou who art more highly honored, follow Paul; and thou who art less elevated follow Timothy. The pastor is not lord over the church which has a claim upon him and his office. The church may have stronger grounds of complaint against him than he against the church.

STARKE:—One must not seek for saints in heaven only, but find them already upon earth. He who does not become a saint here will not be one there.

RIEGER:—Paul places himself here by the side of his young co-laborer, Timothy, that others also may feel a well grounded confidence in him. The kingdom of Christ is throughout a kingdom of love. No one there desires to be alone, or misuses his gifts and advantages for the injury or depreciation of another, but, on the contrary, every one desires to lift up the younger and weaker ones, and to draw them after him. The welfare of the church is the main work. Bishops and servants are appointed to care for its interests and to maintain good order in it.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—When we say "peace," we know that it is the deepest, grandest, expression of our hearts for the soul's true welfare.

[ROBERT HALL:—"Peace," ver. 2. This was the term in which the primitive Christians were accustomed to salute each other in the common meetings, and in the streets, and market places. This was sanctified by Jesus Christ. He said: "My peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth give I unto you (by compliment, etc.): let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." They were accustomed to express all this by the term peace; and the best thing we can wish for our fellow-Christians and for ourselves is, that "peace may be multiplied."—H.]

SCHENKEL:—The true importance of the office in its relation to the church: (1) as an office in the church; (2) as an office from the church; (3) as an office for the church.

SECTION II.

Situation and Labors of the Apostle at Rome.

CHAPTER I. 3-26.

(1) The Apostle's gratitude and joy before God on account of the church (i. 3-11).

After joyful thanksgiving for the fellowship of the church in the gospel (3-5), and the expression of his confident hope that God will make it perfect (6-8), he offers a fervent prayer for them (9-11).

3, 4 I thank my God upon every [all] remembrance of you, Always in every prayer
5 of mine for you all making [the] request [prayer] with joy, For your fellowship in 6 [unto] the gospel from the first¹ day until now; Being confident of this very thing that he which [who] hath begun [began] a good work in you will perform [complete] it un-7 til [up to] the day of Jesus Christ;² Even as it meet [just] for me to think this of you all, because I have you in my heart; inasmuch as both in my bonds and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel ye all are partakers of my grace [of the grace with 8 me]. For God is my record [witness]³ how greatly I long after you all in the bowels [heart] of Jesus Christ. And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more 10 and more in knowledge and in [omit] all judgment [discernment or experience]; That ye may approve things that are excellent [or, prove things that differ]; that ye 11 may be sincere [pure] and without offence till [unto] the day of Christ; Being filled with the fruits [fruit] of righteousness which are [is]⁴ by [through] Jesus Christ,⁵ unto the glory and praise of God.

² Ibid. [Instead of Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (T. R.) some copies invert the order as in ver. 1 (LACHMANN, ELLICOTT, TISCHENDORF, ALFORD). The evidence seems not to be conclusive.—H.]

⁵ Ibid. [Whether the order here is Jesus Christ or Christ Jesus, with the present evidence, is uncertain.—H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 3. I thank my God (εὐχαριστῶ τῷ θεῷ μου). Exactly like Rom. i. 8; 1 Cor. i. 4; Phil. 4. Comp. Col. i. 3.—Upon all [or the whole] remembrance of you.—Ἐπὶ states the ground or basis (πάσῃ τῇ μνηίᾳ) on which the thanksgiving rests. This remembrance of Paul extends through his life; he contemplates it as one, as a whole. LUTHER well says: "As often as I think of you." See WINER's Gram. pp. 110, 392.* MEYER, urging the force of τῆς with the article, explains: My remembrance of you is entirely and throughout connected with thanksgiving to God; and SCHENKEL: So far as he remembers them. These explanations are wrong; for the thanksgiving and the supplication go together. Still less can ἐν be gen. subj., as if Paul were giving thanks for their remembrance of him (BRETSCHNEIDER). Further, μνηία is not=mention (WINER, VAN HENGEL), as in μνηίαν ποιῆσθαι (Rom. i. 9; Eph. i. 16; 1 Thess. i. 2; Phil. 4). Comp. μνηίαν ἔχειν (1 Thess. iii. 6; 2 Tim. i. 3).

* [The reference here and elsewhere is to the translation of the seventh edition of WINER's Grammar of the Idiom of the New Testament, revised and edited by Prof. J. HENRY TRAYER (Andover, 1869).—H.]

Ver. 4. Always in every prayer of mine for you all (πάντοτε ἐν πάσῃ δεήσει μου ὑπὲρ πάντων ὑμῶν). In Rom. i. 8 we have πάντων ὑμῶν; in 1 Cor. i. 4, πάντοτε περὶ ὑμῶν; and in Eph. i. 16, only ἐπὶ τῶν προσευχῶν μου after οὐ πάνομαι. Here, after πάσῃ τῇ μνηίᾳ (ver. 3) we have the idea of totality repeated three times: πάντοτε, πάσῃ, πάντων. Latium erat cor Pauli (BENGEL), by his joy in the church.—This clause is to be joined with the following: Making the prayer with joy (μετὰ χαρᾶς τὴν δέησιν ποιούμενος). [The article before δέησιν recalls δεήσει as the prayer in each instance which he offers in their behalf.—H.] Πάντοτε in the preceding clause shows that his thankfulness goes hand in hand with his constant prayer, and ἐν πάσῃ δεήσει that his prayer for the church, and indeed for all its members, never ceases; while here in μετὰ χαρᾶς we have his frame of mind disclosed to us, and the prayer noted as a fact. It is peculiar to this place. THEOPHYLACT: τὸ μετὰ χαρᾶς μνησθῆναι σημεῖον τῆς ἐκείνων ἀρετῆς. BENGEL: summa epistolæ: gaudeo, gaudete! Nam perpetua gaudii mentio (ver. 18 ff.; ii. 2, 19, 28; iii. 1; iv. 1, 4). Proces imprimis gaudium animat. For δέησις and προσευχή see on Eph. vi. 18. It is incorrect to join πάντοτε (WIESINGER), or ὑπὲρ πάντων ὑμῶν (HÖLEMANN), with εὐχαριστῶ (ver. 3). It is wrong also to make the participial clause parenthetical (HEINRICHs). [Taking this verse and the preceding one together, we have then three steps in the development of the thought: First, the apostle never remembers the Philip-pians but with thanksgiving; secondly, he remem-bers them in fact as often as he prays; and, thirdly, this remembrance of them was always a source of joy to himself, as well as a cause of thanksgiving to God.—H.]

Ver. 5 brings forward the cause of his thanks. —For your fellowship unto the gospel.

—'Επί with the dative (preceded by εὐχαρισ-τεῖν) quite often indicates the object of the thanks-giving (1 Cor. i. 4). See WINER'S Gram. p. 393.

—Τῇ κοινωνίᾳ ὑμῶν represents the fellowship of the Philip-pians as already existing, and not now as first to be prayed for, and the object of this fel-lowship is the gospel (εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον). Κοινωνία is found without the gen. obj. in Gal. ii. 9 and in 2 Cor. ix. 13, where we have also εἰς αὐτοῖς, analo-gous to κοινωνεῖς εἰς λόγον (iv. 15). The article is not repeated before εἰς εὐαγγέλιον, because it ap-pears as one conception, gospel-fellowship. The connection of this clause with the participle is in-correct (CALVIN, et al.), for we expect here a statement of the ground of his thanksgiving, and τὴν δέσπιν has already been defined as ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν. It is wrong also to take κοινωνία actively, as sup-port, contribution (ESTIUS, et al.), as in Num. xv. 26 (κοινωνίαν τινὰ ποιῆσθαι), Heb. xiii. 16 (εὐποτίας καὶ κοινωνίας), where the context demands that meaning; to refer it to their fellowship with Paul (CHRYSOSTOM, VAN HENGEL), for μετ' ἐμοῦ (1 John i. 3) is wanting; to regard it as ἀγάπη ὑμῶν in ver. 9 (MEYER); to refer it to the fellowship of the Philip-pians with other Christians (WIES-INGER); or to render it: quod evangelii participes facti estis (GROTIUS, et al.). —From the first day until now, ἀπὸ πρώτης ἡμέρας ἄχρι τοῦ νῦν, marks with emphasis this well-tried fellowship of faith and love as existing from the first preaching of the gospel among them (Acts xvi. 13) until the moment of Paul's writing the letter. [The church at Philippi had existed now about ten years. Among the proofs of this spirit of fellowship and zeal for the gospel (though not limiting himself to them) Paul no doubt had more or less distinctly in view the supplies which the Philip-pians had sent to him; first, once and again at Thessalonica, soon after his first departure from them (iv. 16), and still more re-cently at Rome, by the hand of Epaphroditus (iv. 18). Nothing but the want of an opportunity on the part of the Philip-pians to transmit their gifts, had prevented his receiving still others during the intermediate period (iv. 10). The re-corded instances of their liberality, therefore, might well be mentioned as characteristic of their later history as a church. The article before πρώτης is unnecessary, the ordinal being suf-ficiently definite by itself. See WINER'S Gram. p. 124.—H.] It is incorrect to connect from the first day, etc., with εὐχαριστῶ (BENGEL), or with πεποιθώς (MEYER). The aim is to characterize the fellowship, but not the thanksgiving or con-fidence of the apostle.

Ver. 6. The apostle is confident (πεποιθώς) that God will still work for them and in them. This participle marks his confidence as antecedent to the εὐχαριστῶ. Hæc fiducia nervus est gratiarum actionis (BENGEL). Αὐτὸ τοῦτο shows that his confidence rests upon God and nothing else (Eph. vi. 18, 22; Col. iv. 8). —That he who began a good work in you will complete [or finish] it, ὅτι ὁ ἐναρξά-μενος ἐν ὑμῖν ἔργον ἀγαθὸν ἐπέτελεσει. Without doubt God is meant (ii. 13), and ἐν ὑμῖν is in animis vestris (ii. 13), while the context requires us to think of all the members of the church as addressed (vers. 4, 7). Comp. Gal. iii. 3; 2 Cor. viii. 6 (var. προενήρξατο). To explain it as meaning "among the Philip-pians" (HÖLE-MANN) is against the context. Not only the context, but Paul's doctrine forbids us to un-derstand "every good one" with ὁ ἐναρξάμενος (WAKEFIELD). By ἔργον ἀγαθὸν is meant not "the good work" (LUTHER), but the κοινωνία ὑμῶν εἰς εὐαγγέλιον (ver. 5), a work which is not finished at a single blow, but is carried forward through a gradual development from step to step, through many a fluctuation and danger from within and without, to be made complete in eternity. BENGEL: Initium est pignus consummationis. Ne homo quidem temere aliquid incipit. —Up to the day of Jesus Christ, ἄχρις ἡμέρας Ἰησοῦ Χρισ-τοῦ. The day of the Lord's coming for judgment is meant (ver. 10; ii. 16; 2 Cor. i. 14). The nearness of the day is not indicated (MEYER), or the day of each one's death intended* (ESTIUS, et al.). —Even as it is just for me to think this of you all.—Καθὼς gives the reason for the subjective confidence in the objective fact (Eph. i. 4). 'Εστὶν δίκαιον ἔμοι τοῦτο φρονεῖν de-scribes this confidence, which extends to each in-dividual (ὑπὲρ πάντων ὑμῶν), as a duty and obliga-tion which he owes to his readers (vers. 4, 8; Eph. vi. 1; Col. iv. 1). To withhold it seems to him a wrong against them (BENGEL: justas invenio causas). —Because I have you in my heart—διὰ τὸ ἔχειν με ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ ὑμῶν. The context demands με as the subject; with this agrees the sing. καρδίᾳ. See WINER'S Gram., p. 329. It is contrary to the order of the words, as well as to the context, to take ὑμῶν as subject (AM ENDE, FLATT, et al.). He has them in his heart, because he is separated from them. This cer-tainly shows his deep, abiding affection for them. But this again would be only a subjective mat-ter, like his confidence. Hence what follows is to be closely joined with it: He has them in his heart, and loves them as sharers of the grace of God.—Inasmuch as both in my bonds and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye all are partakers of my grace—lit., grace with me; ἐν τε τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου καὶ ἐν

* [ALFORD (in loc.) supposes Paul to assume here "the nearness of the coming of the Lord." But that view is apparently inconsistent with 2 Thess. ii. 2; for the Apostle there declares this opinion (which some had falsely imputed to him) to be unfounded and without sanction in any thing that he had said or written. If at that early period (2 Thess. being the second of all his extant Epistles) Paul did not entertain but definite expectation, much less should we ascribe it to him after the lapse of so many years, during which this visible coming of Christ had been delayed. The reason why Paul refers here to a more distant event, instead of saying that God would strengthen the Philip-pians and enable them to persevere to life's end, may be that the day of one's death co-incides so essentially in its moral consequences with the Lord's final advent, and hence was habitually near (as it should be to us all) to the feelings and consciousness of the first Chris-tians. On this topic see remarks of the writer in his Commentary on the Acts, pp. 80–82 (revised ed.). See also ELLICOTT'S notes on Phil. i. 6, in opposition to ALFORD'S view.—H.]

τῇ ἀπολογία καὶ βεβαίωσει τοῦ εὐαγγελίου συγκοινωνοῖς μου τῆς χάριτος πάντας ὑμᾶς ὄντας. The nerve of the argument lies in συγκοινωνοῖς μου τῆς χάριτος πάντας ὑμᾶς ὄντας; πάντας ὑμᾶς corresponds to ὑπὲρ πάντων ὑμῶν, and they are all characterized as fellow-partakers (συγκοινωνοί) with the Apostle in the grace of God. The pronoun μου depends in sense upon σὺν, τῆς χάριτος upon κοινωνοῖς; they share with Paul in the same grace, which he has received. [For the dependence of the two genitives on συγκοινωνοῖς (comp. also ii. 25, 30), see WINER'S Gram., p. 191—H.] The context (vers. 6, 7), defines it as the grace of God mediated through the gospel, i. e., salvation and blessedness in eternity. It is thus not suffering for the gospel (v. 29, 30), as MEYER thinks, or merely gratiosa evangelii donatio, (HÖLEMAN), or the apostolic office upheld and made more efficient by the liberality of the Philippians (STORR, AM ENDE), gratitude—i. e., to them (RILLIET), or gaudii (Vulg.), [which seems to rest on the assumed reading, χαρὰς.—H.]. The importance of this co-partnership is the greater on account of Paul's situation at the time. Hence he characterizes the situation under two aspects before he speaks of their personal relation to each other: ἐν τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου and ἐν τῇ ἀπολογία καὶ βεβαίωσει τοῦ εὐαγγελίου. The first expression refers to his imprisonment, and the second to his work as a prisoner, embracing his labors both in opposition to adversaries, and for the confirmation of Christians (Acts xxviii. 23). It is not therefore merely his judicial defence that is meant (VAN HENGE), or his general Christian activity alone (WIESINGER), but both together. It is incorrect also to regard the last two substantives as ἐν διὰ δυοῖν (HEINRICH), or to separate τοῦ εὐαγγελίου from ἀπολογία, and to refer this last only to his person (ESTIUS), since neither ἐν, nor the article before βεβαίωσει, is repeated. The explanation which makes the two entirely synonymous (RHEINWALD) has as little in its favor as that which makes the one a defence by word, the other a confirmation by act (ERASMUS). The most natural connection is with ὑμᾶς συγκοινωνοῖς—ὄντας and not with ἔχειν ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ (CHRYSOSTOM, also MEYER). [We prefer with CHRYSOSTOM, NEANDER, DE WETTE, MEYER, ALFORD, and others, to connect the words in question with what precedes, and not so closely with what follows. Nothing surely could be more pertinent here as a proof of Paul's affection for the Philippians (ἔχειν—ἡμᾶς), than to say, that not all his trials and anxieties as a prisoner at Rome, and not all his arduous labors in the church and for the conversion of sinners, could divert his thoughts from them or interrupt or weaken at all his attachment to them. This view of the connection, too, better explains the solemn appeal in μάρτυς—ὁ θεός, which (note the γάρ, ver. 8) seems too impressive to be referred merely to διὰ τὸ ἔχειν—ἡμᾶς.—H.] To infer from vers. 29, 30, that the bonds and the defence and confirmation of the gospel were common to Paul and the Philippians, (SCHENKEL) is not permitted either by δεσμοῖς μου, or by πάντες.

Ver. 8. For God is my witness, μάρτυς γάρ μου ὁ θεός. Comp. Rom. i. 9. He would confirm here his declaration that he has them in his heart. [His earnest desire to see the Philippians was both a proof and a consequence of his earnest affection for them.—H.].—How I long after you all.—Ὡς shows the degree, the prep. in ἐπιποθῶ, the direction of the ποθεῖν, ii. 26; 1 Thes. iii. 6; 2 Tim. i. 4. The object of ἐπιποθῶ is πάντας ὑμᾶς, none being excepted. Observe the energetic repetition of the πάντας.—In the heart of Jesus Christ, ἐν σπλάγχνοις Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ, characterizes the ἐπιποθεῖν of Paul. Σπλάγχνα, σπλῆν, viscera, is the physical designation of the inmost seat of the affections, of the emotional life in the soul (Col. iii. 12: οἰκτιρῶν; Luke i. 78: ἐλπίου); hence ἐν local. BENGE explains it well: In Paulo non Paulus vivit, sed Jesus Christus; quare Paulus non in Pauli, sed Jesu Christi movetur visceribus. Nexus hic est: ego vos tamquam consortes gratiæ in corde meo habeo (2 Cor. vii. 3) *atque desidero, neque id affectu naturali, sed pietate Jesu Christi, inde persentisco eodem erga vos affectu esse ipsum potius dominum, qui rem a principis ad suos exitus est deducturus. See ἔμοι γὰρ τὸ ζῆν Χριστός, in ver. 21, and comp. ζῆ ἐν ἔμοι Χριστός (Gal. ii. 20). WINER'S Gram. p. 189. It is incorrect to regard ἐν as the rule or norm, (RILLIET), for it is not—κατά; or to explain the genitive as, in animo penitus affecto, ut animus fuit Christi. (VAN HENGEL). It is incorrect to join the word with ὑμᾶς, and to supply ὄντας (STORR). We are to reject every such weakened explanation as amore vere Christiano (GROTIUS), or digna Jesu Christi affectione (CASTALIO).

Ver. 9. And this I pray.—To the prayer of thanksgiving in vers. 3, 8, καὶ adds further, the fact that he prays, and what he prays for, in behalf of the church (τοῦτο προσέχομαι). The subject or contents of this prayer are first stated with emphasis, and therefore placed in connection with the subject and ground of his thanks; hence not προσέχομαι τοῦτο. It is not true that καὶ connects what follows with ver. 8, and joins still another act, i. e., προσέχομαι, with μάρτυς μου ὁ θεός, ὡς ἐπιποθῶ. (RILLIET).—That your love may abound yet more and more.—Ἥνα points out the direction, purpose, of the prayer, and so the contents, purport of it. Comp. Eph. i. 17; Col. i. 9. Ἡ ἀγάπη ὑμῶν ἐστὶ μᾶλλον καὶ μᾶλλον περισσέη, pre-supposes this love to be already existing, and that in no small degree, like ἡνα πληρωθῆτε. Col. i. 9. BENGE: Ignis in apostolo nunquam dicit, sufficit. Love of the church is meant, which, as shown by the cause of his joyful thanksgiving (ἐπὶ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ ὑμῶν εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, ver. 6), and by the ground of his confidence and longing (συγκοινωνοῖς μου τῆς χάριτος, ver. 7), is more exactly defined to be Christian love. It is therefore neither merely love towards one another (MEYER), nor works of love for the cause of the gospel (SCHENKEL), nor love to the Apostle (CHRYSOSTOM, et al.), nor to God and Christ (CALOV), although all these are involved. The accumulative, ἐστὶ μᾶλλον καὶ μᾶλλον, marks the earnestness of the supplication. Comp. πολλῶ μᾶλλον κρείσσον, ver. 23. Περισσέη indicates an increase of this love of the church above the ordinary measure of its possession. (Comp. 1 Thes. iv. 1, 10, περισσεύειν μάλλον).—How that shall take place is shown by what follows: In knowledge and in every perception, or discernment, ἐν ἐπιγνώσει καὶ πάσῃ αἰσθήσει. The first (see Eph. i. 17) is a more perfect knowledge of the truth in contrast with a knowledge which is defective, uncertain, confused; and therefore an intellectual act and intensive. The other (αἰσθήσει, here only in the N. T.) is the perception by the mind or senses of what takes place or exists around us; here in its ethical sense as opposed to a weak judgment, to inexperience, inconsiderate conduct, and, having to do with the entire range of man's acts and relations, is therefore extensive, on which account also πάσῃ (=every form of) is added. [This faculty (αἰσθήσει), as WORDSWORTH remarks, is that delicate tact and instinct which almost intuitively perceives what is right, and almost unconsciously shrinks from what is wrong.—H.] Both of these, the theoretical knowledge and the ethical tact, belong and go together. The prep. ἐν marks each as the sphere, or element, in which the increase of love is to take place. The progress is also a natural one, from knowledge to knowledge, from experience to experience, each promoting the other. Comp. Col. ii. 7. It is incorrect to deny here an increase of love, as if that were already complete (MEYER), or to find that the Philippians were not wanting in love, but in knowledge, their zeal being still οὐ κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν (Rom. x. 2), i. e., blind, indiscriminating, liable to error (SCHENKEL).

* [Did I speak of having you in my heart? I should rather have said that in their heart of Christ Jesus I long for you.] A powerful metaphor describing perfect union. The believer has no yearnings apart from his Lord; his pulse beats with the pulse of Christ; his heart throbs with the heart of Christ (LIGHTFOOT).—H.]

Ver. 10. That ye may prove things that differ.—Εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν denotes the immediate end of the περισεύειν. It is in practice, the conduct of life that we are to prove τὰ διαφέροντα. As the senses are to be exercised, πρὸς διάκρισιν καλοῦ τε καὶ κακοῦ (Heb. v. 14), so here love should increase in knowledge and experience, that we may prove the things in regard to which we are to decide or act. Δοκιμάζειν means to test, distinguish the genuine from the spurious (χρυσίου, 1 Pet. i. 7), to distinguish between things which are different (τὰς καρδίας ἡμῶν, 1 Thess. ii. 4; πάντα δὲ δοκιμάζετε, τὸ καλὸν κατέχετε, v. 21), or between men who differ (1 Tim. iii. 10). The things which experience presents to us are different in degree as well as kind. Non modo prae multis bona, sed in bonis optima. (BENGEL). The rendering ut probetis potiora (Vulg., et al.) is incorrect.—The purpose of this increase of love is: That ye may be pure and without offence unto, or against the day of Christ. ἵνα points out the direction of the prayer for the increase of their love. A firm decision for the good follows a correct judgment respecting what is good and evil. The knowledge and experience brought into activity lead to a certain condition and conduct (ἦτε): ἑilikρινεῖς καὶ ἀπρόσκοποι. The first (Grimm, Clavis s. v: ab. εἰλη s. ἐλῆ, splendor solis, et κρίνω, qui ad solis lucem explicatus et examinatus purus deprehenditur,* ex aliorum conjectura ab εἰλος, εἰλεῖν, vo- tubile agitatione secretus et purgatus) elsewhere only in 2 Pet. iii. 1, is positive, internal; the second, negative, outward, as referring to persons and relations; hence active, as in 1 Cor. x. 32, while in Acts xxiv. 16, it is passive. We are to look here not to the church or the world, not to the present or the past, but to God who ἐπιτελέσει ἄχρις ἡμερᾶς Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ (v. 6); hence εἰς ἡμέραν Χριστοῦ, against, for the day of Christ [not until, A.V.] in which this character will be made manifest. They should prepare for this as their great aim (see ii. 16; Eph. iv. 30).—Being filled, πεπληρωμένοι. The passive refers to what has been experienced or attained, and the perfect to the continued effects of this experience, and thus the participle characterizes the ἦτε ἑilikρινεῖς καὶ ἀπρόσκοποι.—The fruit of righteousness which is by or through Jesus Christ (καρπὸν δικαιοσύνης τὸν διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ). The acc., as in Col. i. 9, points out that with which they are filled. The sing. καρπὸν marks the harmonious unity, as Gal. v. 22. Comp. v. 19; Rom. vi. 22; James iii. 18. The gen. δικαιοσύνης indicates the cause, source. The omission of the article makes it a single conception: righteousness-fruit, more strongly descriptive of the character of the fruit: this fruit is itself righteousness in its very nature. Hence we must not think here of justification (HÖLTMANN). But this fruit of righteousness is not produced by the unaided strength of the Christian without the mediation of Jesus. See Eph. iv. 7, 8; Gal. ii. 20, iii. 22. This truth humbles us because it rebukes self-exaltation, but makes us rejoice also because it shows how glorious this fruit is.—Unto the glory and praise of God (εἰς δόξαν καὶ ἑπανοὴν Θεοῦ) is an addition to πεπληρωμένοι. Comp. Eph. i. vi., 12, 14. Such fulness is of itself the glory of God, because it shows His excellence, and leads to His praise, because men declare it in every way. ["Herein is my Father glorified," says Christ, "that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples" (John xv.).—H.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The salvation of individuals is the chief topic of this section, viewed however not theoretically, but practically, in its relation to a living body of Christians. It is a work, a good work, (ἔργον ἀγαθόν), wrought in the individual (v. 6: ἐν ἑμῶν), in whose inmost personality it is accomplished. Hence in its first province it is a human work.

2. In its nature salvation is righteousness, the fruit of which appears in the life (ver. 11: καρπὸν δικαιοσύνης), and love (ver. 9: ἡ ἀγάπη ἡμῶν), which is self-sacrificing. Hence it is opposed to self-seeking and self-will, and is fellowship with God, Christ, and the brethren. It is, then, in its next effect, a social work.

3. The source of salvation is to be sought in God alone (ver. 6: ὁ ἐναρξάμενος) without any merit or worthiness on the part of the subject who needs salvation, and is capable of receiving it, so that he is only the object, the recipient, of the blessing (συγκοινωνοὺς τῆς χάριτος, ver. 7). Hence in its beginning it is a divine work, which excludes as well the αὐτεξούσιον of the Greek Fathers, especially Clements and Origen, as it does

*The above is the generally received etymology. But some derive ἑilikρινεῖς from εἰλη—ἀλη, band, 'troop,' and κρίνω, 'to separate,' and hence gregatim, 'distinct,' 'unmixed.' HESYCHIUS defines: ἑilikρινεῖς τὸ καθάρην καὶ ἀμύγας ἑτέρου. LIGHTFOOT adopts this derivation. ELLICOTT prefers the second of the views mentioned in the text (see in loc.).—H.]

Pelagianism, denying the transmission of sin (which Socinianism warmed again into life), and Semi-pelagianism (which Arminianism revived), weakening the conviction of this sinfulness in conformity with its idea of universal grace.

4. Nor in its entire progress is this less a work of God who does not draw back where He has put His hand, who, in the realm of creation and of redemption, in all His works in nature, and in the lives and hearts of men, is ever present, not only as a witness (μάρτυς μου ὁ θεός, v. 8) but to complete also (ἐπιτελέσει, ver. 6), what He has begun.

5. The work of salvation is mediated, objectively, through the person of Jesus Christ (ver. 11), the preaching of the gospel (ver. 5), and supplication. With regard to the how nothing more definite is here said, because it does not come into question.

6. The subjective mediation is indicated under different aspects, (a) Christ, He who is preached coming near to us in the preaching, and received in us by His word, becomes our life, His heart our heart, His pity our pity, so that we love with Him, with His heart, with His love (ver. 8: ἐν συμπάσῃς Χριστοῦ ἡ ζωὴ); (b) He who does not resist Him, receives His strength and gifts, so that by means of these he works in turn; won for Him, drawn to Him, united with those who are like-minded, he lives, and acts, and walks in love (ver. 9: ἡ ἀγάπη ὑμῶν ver. 5: ἐπὶ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ ὑμῶν εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον); (c) Personal activity is not excluded, but called forth (vers. 9-11), self-exaltation is destroyed, and Synergism has no place here.

7. Love, combined with an active faith, is the central force which penetrates the inmost personality, directs the life, and goes forward step by step towards its perfection. This progress shows itself in a two-fold way: a) Internally, the Christian becomes intellectually more intimate with God and with His thoughts (ἐπιγνωσις). Love thus becomes clearer, deeper, stronger. It increases in knowledge, grows in that and with that. As an ethical effect, also, the love perceives, experiences, feels (πάσα αἰσθησις), the power of the kingdom of God with its manifold ordinances, and richly endowed membership. It thus becomes stronger, fuller, riper. It increases in experience, grows in that and with that. Thus Christians come to a surer judgment respecting the things which are about them, and concern them (εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν τὰ διαφέροντα) within and without, good and bad. The result is purity (ἐλευκρίσεις). b) Externally, love acts spontaneously, without calculation, with nice moral tact, with tender conscientiousness, giving no offence, (ἀπρόσκοποι). The eye ever directed to the end (εἰς ἡμέραν Χριστοῦ) animates this love thus progressive to the final day (ἄχρις ἡμέρας Χριστοῦ). Pantheistic necessity, all physical compulsion in the Christian's progress, are excluded. Our moral responsibility remains entire.

8. Love in two respects is an object of the Apostle's joy. It actuates all, one as well as another (ver. 7 a, and 7 b, 8), and redounds to the honor of God (ver. 11). First, though there is a difference in the strength, purity, breadth, and capacity of this love, from Lydia (Acts xvi. 14, 15) and the jailer (ib. 30-34) down to the weakest member, the fellowship between them is not disturbed. Every one looks upon the other with humility, and without envy, and cleaves to him. Secondly, the majesty of love becomes manifest, while gratitude for God's gifts is shown in word and work.

9. It is instructive to observe how the Apostle demeans himself here. He is thankful for what is given or done to him; God's act is final; his own doing is as nothing. He rejoices in spite of his imprisonment, since the internal welfare and the salvation of the church are of more importance to him than his own outward suffering. He is full of confidence, for, amid all the dangers to which the members of the church are exposed, from flesh and blood, as well as from the world about them, he has cast his cares upon Him who is greater than he that is in the world, and greater than his own heart. (Comp. 1 John iii. 20; iv. 4). He prays for them heartily, as well as confidently. Without pride of office, without selfishness, without carnal calculation, without meagre consolation, or satisfaction in comparing them with other churches, as in Galatia and Corinth, he looks with grand humility, with noble joy, with childlike confidence, and paternal care, upon the condition of this particular church.

10. [NEANDER:—Paul here (vers. 9-11) gives to love the first place, and ascribes to its quickening presence the knowledge and capacity required for distinguishing the good and the bad, the true and the false; as he himself expresses it, "that your love may more and more abound in all knowledge;" meaning, that therein its effect is seen—that increase of knowledge is the fruit of more abundant love. But as here the theoretical proceeds from the practical, the new direction of the judgment from the new direction of the will, of the moral disposition; so is the theoretical in like manner to react upon the practical, the enlightened judgment upon the conduct. Hence Paul adds, as the object to be thus attained, that they should continue "pure and irreproachable" in their Christian walk, until all shall appear before the Lord; "being filled with the fruit of righteousness, which is by Jesus Christ, to the glory and praise of God."—H.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The minister, in view of the past, should have reason to give thanks for the success of the divine word, and in view of the present should rejoice in the growth of love, and in view of the future be consoled as to more immediate danger, and hope for a glorious end. The church should find in him a helper of their joy; ever active, yet without official conceit, a friend, full of sympathy, without selfishness, a hero who lifts praying hands over them, a father who cares earnestly for their future inheritance, vers. 3-11.

STARKE:—God has indeed deserved our thanks. He never ceases to do us good. So also our thanks should have no end. Ps. c. 5.—He will be able to pray to God with joy who regards his prayer not merely as a duty, but also as a gospel right, in virtue of which he may come to the throne of grace, and be looked upon graciously.—To begin is well and necessary, but to complete still better, and more necessary.—The more thou art pressed the more cry out. Remain firm, and be not deterred. Through scorn we come to the crown.—The longer in the Christian life the happier, the better, is the true testimony. He who does not increase, decreases; at least, standing still is not the right way.—Since the chief powers of the soul are understanding and will, the growth must show itself in them both: the one can no more be separated from the other than understanding from the will.

HEUMER:—If men do not recognise God as their God, they have no religion at all. It is not a living piety unless they have found God in their inner and outer life.—True love and friendship is ever a religious, mutual remembrance. Remembrance of God is a holy admonition that we live for, with, and in one another. Thus we see how Christianity enlarges the heart. Christian love embraces many; yea, all. (Vers. 4-7).—Every shepherd must pray daily for his church. Paul had much to do, but he always had time for prayer.—True, inward fellowship of hearts, is a cause for thanksgiving. It is a source of true happiness which nothing can surpass. In our days a repugnance to the closer religious associations often shows itself; for in them religion comes nearer to men, and touches the heart. In like manner too great an equality of many with each other is offensive to some. Among ministers a dread of work is often the cause of this aversion.—There are special days of salvation and grace in our life. These memorable days are not merely birth-days, but rather those in which we have been awakened to a spiritual life.—We have still churchly assemblies, but those really Christian are rare.—For progress in what is good one needs grace as much as at the beginning: it is this which accomplishes all. God's Spirit leaves nothing half done. He completes His work if man only lets Him rule. It is disgraceful to us, after God has begun the building, to allow it to stop, or to tear it down. God does not destroy His work, we destroy it.—If thou art anxious about thy progress, cling only to God.—Christian love should not make blind, but clear-sighted. Love lifts up the spirit. The truth is always better discerned through love, and the medium of a practical Christianity. When borne up by others, one sees further, more clearly, (ver. 9).—Love has a keen, critical character. The Christian has a delicate sensibility, by means of which he finds the right. A Christian's growth is growth in the spirit of examination, and the more the Christian discriminates, the freer does he become from all blemishes. It is only the pure, clean heart, which makes us blameless before Christ, (ver. 10).—Paul gives here a definition of good works: they correspond to the law, spring from the Spirit of Christ, and redound to the honor of God: this last is their highest object, (ver. 11). But measured by this rule, many good works so-called lose their value. The Christian should have also not merely single, isolated, good works, but a fullness of them (ver. 12).—As the Epistle for the 22d Sunday after Trinity: The intimate connection of the Apostle with his church.

1) Ground: faith and love. 2) Effects: growth, new zeal.—Christian friendship: 1) Its nature; 2) Blessing; 3) Conditions.

PASSAVANT:—Without His grace over us, and

His Spirit within us, all in us is vain and impure.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—The beginning, though very often the most difficult, is also in many cases the easiest, and not until afterwards do the difficulties which must be overcome, appear. The former exertions then seem, as it were, mere play in comparison with the persistent zeal, which must be shown, if the work is to be brought to an end.—If a man is impelled by the power of genuine love, he is not content with mere experience of life, or with a knowledge of the divine word, by itself, but he seeks to bind both together, so that the one shall ever accompany, support, and promote the other.

KRUMMACHER:—Love for all the saints urges, 1) to thorough self-examination; 2) to joyful emulation; 3) to hearty and humble praise of the free grace of God.—The fellowship of the saints: 1) The duty of thankfulness towards God; 2) Communications from the history of His kingdom; 3) Well-meant counsel: pray and watch.

ASHFELD:—At the end of the church year we observe a thanksgiving festival for the spiritual blessings of the year. 1) We give thanks for the gifts bestowed; 2) We trust God, that He will continue them to us; 3) We pray that we may constantly adorn our faith with richer fruits of righteousness.

LÖHE:—1) The Apostle's joyful thanksgiving for the fellowship of the Philippians in the Gospel; 2) His joyful confidence that the good work which has been begun, will be completed until the day of Christ; 3) His great longing for the Philippians, and for their perfection.

RAUTENBERG:—The signs of genuine thankfulness for the precious gift of the gospel: 1) Hearts which beat for it; 2) Lips which testify for it; 3) Hands which work for it.

ORTINGER:—The greatest joy of the faithful is fellowship in the gospel: 1) Of the perfect joy in pure fellowship; 2) of the incomplete joy in mixed fellowship.

MUENKEL:—The good work: 1) Begun through the gospel; 2) Proved in sorrow; 3) Completed in the love that gives no offence.

The priestly heart of the Apostle Paul: 1) A mirror for repentance; 2) A copy for faith; 3) A pattern for sanctification.

PRÖHLE:—True Christian friendship: 1) The source whence it flows; 2) The signs by which it verifies itself; 3) The blessing which rests upon it.—Most holy thought: God is my witness! 1) A thought of delight; 2) or of fear.—The way to a right understanding of Christian truth is through the heart: 1) It inclines the understanding aright; 2) takes away the bandage which keeps it from discerning divine things in their true form; 3) adds an inward experience to the testimony of the convictions of the understanding.

[NEANDER:—It is customary with Paul to commence his letters with a recognition of whatever is praiseworthy in the church to which he is writing. In this appears his wisdom as a spiritual guide. The confidence of men is far more easily won, and a hearing secured for whatever one has to say in the way of admonition and rebuke, if it appears that he nowise overlooks or undervalues what is good in them, that he does not willingly find fault, but is ready to acknowledge every real excellence with cordial approbation. Good and bad, moreover, stand frequently in close connection with each other. The good lies at the foundation; but the evil mingles its disturbing influence with the good, and hence it is through the latter that we can best reach and remedy the former. It is in the clear perception of this relation, and in the skilful use of it for the correction of error, that Paul manifests his wisdom (see vers. 5-7).—II.]

(2) The gospel, in spite of insincere or false brethren and threatening danger of death, makes progress during the Apostle's captivity at Rome (i. 12-26).

After referring to the happy effects of his ministry in bonds (12-14) among sincere and insincere witnesses for Christ (15-17) he expresses his views respecting this varied experience (18-20) and calmly revolves the question whether life or death may be better for him (21-26).

12 But I would that ye should understand [know], brethren, that the things which happened unto me [my affairs] have fallen out rather to the furtherance of the 13 gospel; so that my bonds in Christ are [have become] manifest in all the palace¹
14 [Prætorium, or Prætorian camp] and in all other places [to all the rest]; and many 15 [the greater part] of the brethren [in the Lord], waxing confident [in the Lord]
16 by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word without fear. Some indeed
17 preach Christ even of envy and strife; and [but] some also of good will. The one²
18 of love, knowing that I am set for the defence of the gospel; but the other [others]³
19 preach Christ of contention [contentiousness or party spirit] not sincerely, sup-20 posing [thinking] to add⁴ [raise up] affliction to my bonds. What then? notwith-21 standing⁵ every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is preached; and 22 I therein do rejoice, yea, and will [shall] rejoice. For I know, that this shall 23 [will] turn to my salvation through your prayer, and the supply of the Spirit
24 of Jesus Christ, according to my earnest expectation, and (my) hope, that in nothing 25 I shall be ashamed, but (that) with all boldness, as always, (so) now also, Christ shall 26 be magnified in my body, whether (it be) by life, or by death. For to me to live is 27 Christ, and to die (is) gain. But if I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labor;
28 yet what I shall choose I wot [know] not. For⁶ I am in a strait betwixt two, having 29 a [the] desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better. Nevertheless, to 30 abide in the flesh is more needful for you. And having this confidence, I know that I
31 shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith; that 32 your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ, for [in] me by my coming 33 to you again.

² Vers. 16, 17 are so arranged in N A B, et al. A few copies have them inverted, as in LUTHER's version, evidently to conform with ver. 13. [The A. V. transposes the verses in accordance with the received Greek text. The object of the transposition was to introduce the subjects of the verbs in verses 16 and 17 in the order in which they occur in verse 13; whereas in the text the subject last mentioned is taken up first.—II.]

⁶ Ver. 23.—Δέ is found in N and the majority of MSS.; γάρ has but slight support. [It is found in some of the best MSS., and “yet a reading, which to the relief of a disjointed syntax, must be regarded with suspicion” (LIGHTFOOT). MEYER regards δέ as the true reading.—II.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 12. But I would that ye should know, brethren.—The position of γινώσκειν renders it emphatic: contrariis rumoribus præoccupari potuissent ecclesiæ (BENGEL). Δέ marks the transition from the condition of the church at Philippi to that of the Apostle at Rome. Ὑμᾶς βοῦλομαι, together with the friendly address ἀδελφοί, shows that this desire springs from Paul's heart. Comp. 1 Cor. xi. 3; 2 Tim. iii. 1.—That my affairs (ὅτι τὰ καὶ ἐμέ, as in Eph. vi. 21; Col. iv. 7,) have fallen out rather to the furtherance of the gospel. The comparative μᾶλλον refers to the anxiety of the Apostle and the Philippian. (WINER's Gram., p. 243.) [The result was favorable rather (μᾶλλον) than adverse, as Paul and the Philippians had feared.—H.] The perf. (ἐλήλυθεν) indicates an effect which still continues. Comp. ver. 25. HÖLTMANN'S explanation quam antea contigerat, is wrong, for there is no comparison here of past and present.

Ver. 13. So that my bonds in Christ have become manifest.—ὥστε explains how it was that his imprisonment at Rome had contributed to the progress of the gospel (εἰς προκοπὴν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ἐλήλυθεν). Τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου φανεροῖς ἐν Χριστῷ γενέσθαι mentions the first result of his imprisonment in regard to hearers who were not Christians. As in 1 Cor. iii. 13; xi. 19; xiv. 25, φανεροῖς γενέσθαι means to become manifest. It is incorrect to explain φανερός as illustris, conspicuus (CALVIN). It is the opposite of κρυπτός, ἀποκρυφός. The order of the words demands the connection of ἐν Χριστῷ with φανεροῖς. Paulus cum aliis captivis traditus par eis visus est; deinde innotuit, aliam esse Pauli causam et sic invaluit evangelium. (BENGEI.) The nature of the information thus diffused, is shown by ἐν Χριστῷ. Paul's bonds are those of a Christian. He is δεσμὸς τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ἐν Κυρίῳ (Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1; Philem. 9; 2 Tim. i. 8). His bonds had indeed been manifest before this time, but had not been manifest ἐν Χριστῷ. The emphasis lies on the fact that in this relation they had become manifest or known, and on that account φανεροῖς precedes.—In all the Prætorium or Prætorian camp, (ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ) designates the place where this knowledge had spread. On the subject, see Acts xxviii. 16–31.* The castrum prætorianorum (SUETON. Tib. 37, Tac. Ann. 42) is meant, (which was built by Sejanus in the reign of Tiberius, near the porta Viminalis), not the aula Cæsaris (BENGEI); for πραιτωρίον is not the same as Καίσαρος οἰκία (iv. 22), as many hold. “Repressaque in præsens exiliabilis superstitio rursus erumpebat, non modo per Judæam, originem ejus mali, sed per urbem etiam.” (TACITUS Ann. 15, 40). [Prof. LIGHTFOOT at present understands πραιτωρίῳ in the sense of “prætorians,” and not “prætorian camp,” as formerly. (See his Commentary in loc.) But with that direct personal sense we might have expected the dative without ἐν, as in the other clause (comp. Acts iv. 16; vii. 13; 1 Tim. v. 15); whereas with the local sense as the direct one, and the personal as indirect, the change of construction becomes perfectly natural. EWALD'S periphrastic rendering “in all the Prætorium among the soldiers” (Sendschreiben des Apostel Paulus, p. 441), gives the correct sense.—H.]—And to all the rest, καὶ τοῖς λοιποῖς πᾶσιν, points to others besides the Pretorians, for many besides these could hear, and did hear Paul preach. But we are not to think of heathen merely (VAN HENGEL), regarding the expression as analogous to 1 Thess. iv. 13. The prep. ἐν should not be repeated, and τοῖς supplied (CHRYSTOSTOM, et al.); for that would be making the circuit too extensive. It is plain from ὅλῳ and πᾶσιν (which shows how widely the gospel had become known) that the letter could not have been written very soon after Paul's arrival, but at a later period.

[Paul (if we make a distinction between ἐξίαν, Acts xxviii. 23, and μισθώματι, ver. 30) may have spent a few days after his arrival at Rome at some place of public or of private hospitality; but after that he “dwelt in his own hired house,” yet under the surveillance of soldiers, who, according to the Roman custom, were detailed from the Prætorian camp to attend him as a guard. But the Prætorian camp occupied an extensive circuit, and “might have contained within its precincts lodgings rented by prisoners under military custody” (LIGHTFOOT). Hence as different Prætorians relieved each other in the performance of this office, Paul would in the course of time become favorably known to many of them, and through these to other comrades. Thus it was soon understood far and wide that Paul had been imprisoned not for any immorality or crime alleged against him, but for preaching the gospel of Christ.—H.]

Ver. 14. Here we learn another fact which was a consequence of the Apostle's captivity, and favorable to the gospel: And the greater part of the brethren (καὶ τοῖς πλείονας τῶν ἀδελφῶν). [LUTHER renders πλείονας many, as does also the A. V. They constituted the majority, but Paul intimates at the same time that all the Roman Christians did not derive the same benefit from his example.—H.] The reference is to Christians, members of the church, who stood at the Apostle's side as assistants, co-laborers; not to teachers (SCHENKEL).—Waxing confident in the Lord by my bonds (ἐν κυρίῳ πεποιθὼς τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου) explains why they acted thus. The perf. part. marks this confidence as already attained, and still in operation; ἐν κυρίῳ is the nearest object of the verb (Philem. ver. 21). OECUMENIUS well remarks: εἰ γὰρ μὴ θεῖον ἦν, φησί, τὸ κήρυγμα, οὐκ ἂν ὁ Παῦλος ἠνείχετο ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν δεδεσθαι. Paul's bonds are to those qui antea timuerant (BENGEI) an actual pledge of the entire truthfulness, power, and glory of the gospel (MEYER), and, indeed, as the emphatic position of ἐν κυρίῳ shows, their confidence rests entirely on Christ, and not on any human calculation or reflection. See WINER'S Gram. 137 sq.; Gal. v. 10; 2 Thess. iii. 4. LUTHER incorrectly connects ἐν κυρίῳ with ἀδελφῶν, while BENGEI joins it with τοῖς.—Are much more bold, (περισσότερος τοῦ μὲν), states in what degree they were animated by the Apostle's zeal. The comparative supposes the case of Paul's being free from bonds, (i. e., more boldly than if he were not imprisoned) and does not refer to the time of his arrival at Rome (SCHNECKENBURGER), or to that of his former freedom (SCHENKEL).—To speak the word without fear, (ἀφόβως τὸν λόγον λαλεῖν) shows what they are now much more bold to do, though even before

* [In regard to the passage referred to, it should be said that the words “the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard: but—” in the A. V. (Acts xxviii. 16) are probably the translation of a later addition to the Greek text. See Mr. ABBOT'S note in SMITH'S Bible Dictionary, Vol. I., p. 384 (Amer. ed.). At the same time the words state correctly what was unquestionably true in regard to the Roman usage of committing prisoners like Paul to the care of the Prætorian prefect or commander of the Prætorian camp. (See PLINY'S Epist. X. 65). The reference therefore to Acts xxviii. 26 is still pertinent, though not so decisive as if the words were genuine. The false rendering of ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ by “in all the palace” (A. V.) destroys the interesting connection between the Epistle here and that passage. See above on the text.—H.]

this time they had attempted it. Hence περισσوترως is not to be joined with ἀφόβως, (BAUMGARTEN-CRUSTIUS). Τὸν λόγον is absolute, as Gal. vi. 6, i. e., God's word, which every Christian in his sphere is to speak and to bear witness to. The article denotes, according to the context, that it is the word which the Apostle preaches. The verb is used not merely of teachers (Eph. vi. 20; Col. iv. 3, 4), but also of members of the church (Eph. v. 19).

Ver. 15. Some indeed preach Christ, also of envy and strife (τινὲς μὲν καὶ διὰ φθόνου καὶ ἐριῆς); in contrast with τοῖς πλείονας τῶν ἀδελφῶν we have τινὲς μὲν—τινὲς δέ, in contrast with τὸν λόγον λαλεῖν we have Χριστὸν κηρύσσουσιν—καταγγέλλουσιν (ver. 17), and in contrast with ἐν κυρίῳ πεποιθότας, we have διὰ φθόνου καὶ ἐριῆς. The καὶ, also, introduces something additional (MEYER) i. e., others besides those mentioned in ver. 14, who are also teachers. Their motive (διὰ) is a base one, namely, envy, excited by the Apostle's activity, and prompting them to strife for the purpose of disturbing or checking this activity, or of injuring his person.—And some also of good will (τινὲς δὲ καὶ διὰ εὐδοκίαν) forms the antithesis to what precedes. We are to take εὐδοκίαν therefore in the sense of having pleasure or satisfaction, i. e., in Paul's work and person, which includes indeed, complaisance, or a desire to please, but not exactly benevolence. Those here meant are not identical with those designated in v. 14. It is not therefore that they act from conviction: ideo quod ipsi id probarent (GROTIUS) nor alios salvare volentes (PELAGIUS). Τὸν Χριστὸν κηρύσσουσιν belongs to the two contrasted groups. In their teaching concerning Christ they do not essentially differ, but they differ entirely in their motives, their moral classification, their character. This is more clearly explained in vers. 16, 17.—The one of love (οἱ μὲν ἐξ ἀγάπης) points to the latter group, οἱ δὲ (v. 16) to the former. See WINKER'S Gram. p. 561. The latter are characterized as οἱ ἐξ ἀγάπης as in Gal. iii. 7: οἱ ἐκ πίστεως sc. ὄντες. They are viewed as children of love; ἀγάπη is their nature. Comp. on εἶναι ἐκ τῆς ἀγάπης in 1 John ii. 16, (LANGE'S Series, XV.) By ἀγάπη (BENGEL: erga Christum et me), the generic or essential characteristic is meant; by εὐδοκία the specific as a manifestation or result of the other.—Knowing that I am set for the defence of the gospel, εἰδοότες presents the motive (as Eph. vi. 8, 9) ὅτι εἰς ἀπολογίαὶν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου κείμει. The verb κείμει (as in Luke ii. 34; 1 Thes. iii. 3; 1 Tim. i. 19) represents his bondage as a divine appointment or destiny. Incorrect and opposed to the context (ver. 12) is the idea of his being prostrate in conditioe misera (VAN HENGEL), or in bonds (LUTHER), because by their preaching they make up for his impeded activity, supplet hoc meum impedimentum sua predicatione (ESTIUS). The task which devolves upon him in his situation has for its object the defence of the gospel, ἀπολογίαὶν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου (ver. 7), in which these Christians support the Apostle by their co-operation. It is incorrect to refer this to his account before God (CHRYSOSTOM), or his defence before the court, coram iudice (VAN HENGEL).

Ver. 16. But the others of contentiousness or party spirit.—οἱ δὲ ἐξ ἐριθρίας, as in ver. 17. Comp. Rom. ii. 18. Out of this spirit of rivalry or ambition (ii. 3; Jas. iii. 14, 16), which is their characteristic, spring envy and strife, φθόνος καὶ ἐρις (v. 15). Ἐριθρία from ἐριθός, day-laborer, ἐριθίω to be an ἐριθός, and then in the middle, to use unscrupulous means for one's advantage, is the ambitus of the Romans. See PASSOW. Lex. s. v. The context requires us to retain the idea of intrigue or party-spirit. SCHENKEL incorrectly assumes the meaning to be "work for pay."—These do the same as the other class: they preach Christ (τὸν Χριστὸν καταγγέλλουσιν, v. 15, κηρύσσουσιν). Both verbs designate preaching, but have this shade of difference, that the latter signifies to proclaim Christ to those who have a very slight, or absolutely no knowledge of Him, while the former means to announce Him as present, near. Col. i. 28; Acts xvii. 3, 23. We are to join the finite verb with ἐξ ἀγάπης (ver. 16) and ἐξ ἐριθρίας (NEANDER), since otherwise we have a needless accumulation of epithets, and we miss a characteristic designation of the two different classes. The preaching of the opponents is the same in substance as that of the others, but in a different spirit: not purely, οὐχ ἁπλῶς, i. e., properly, not untainted, not free from coarser, or more refined accessory motives (iv. 8; 2 Cor. vi. 6; vii. 11; xi. 2). It is saying negatively that these do not preach from pure, unalloyed love for Christ.—This is further explained, positively:—Thinking to add affliction to my bonds (οἰόμενοι θλίψιν ἐγείρειν τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου). The participle as present states an attendant motive or belief which the import of the word itself characterizes as unfounded, and the result also shows to be false (vers. 18-20), in contrast with the actual knowledge of the true witnesses respecting the Apostle's work and destiny (ver. 16, εἰδοότες). Ἐγείρειν refers to the stirring up of further, additional, θλίψις, affliction, connected with the imprisonment (τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου), not merely the prisoner, its effect being to aggravate his sufferings. [Prof. LIGHTFOOT finds a metaphor in θλίψιν ἐγείρειν—to make my chains gall me. "This word (θλίψις), though extremely common in the LXX, occurs very rarely in classical writers even of a late date, and in those few passages has its literal meaning. The same want in the religious vocabulary which gave currency to θλίψις also created 'tribulatio' as its Latin equivalent. The reading ἐγείρειν, besides being supported, carries out the metaphor better than ἐπιφέρειν of the received text."—H. J.]—How this aggravation of his trials was to take place, φθόνος, ἐρις (ver. 15) and ἐριθρία (ver. 17) indicate. Though the Apostle's enemies preach Christ as do the others, they do not, like them, seek to edify the church, and to assist the Apostle, but stir up strife and hatred against him. They preach Jesus as the promised one, that those who hear may say: 'This is indeed also Christian preaching; we need not run after Paul.' They thus draw the church to themselves, and withdraw it from Paul. They preach concerning Christ essentially as he does, only either more strictly to please those who are zealous for the law, or more loosely for the sake of those who are still weak, or in a more rhetorical way, not to offend the cultivated, as does the Apostle. Thus they not merely weaken the attachment of others to him, and draw away his followers, but excite enmity against him, and thereby make his imprisonment still more oppressive. In their preaching of Christ they go beyond their convictions from dislike to Paul; they make them more Christian in form to do him injury. To understand θλίψις of an increased severity in his imprisonment by command of the emperor Nero (the Greek commentators, and PELAGIUS, ERASMUS, GROTIUS), accords as little with the context, as it does to limit the term to his personal mortifications.

Ver. 18. What then? τί γάρ;—The question implies a denial of the belief (οἰόμενοι) Quid refert? utrinque juvor (ver. 12). BENDEL.—Notwithstanding every way whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is preached. Πάντῃ presupposes a difference (that is, of motives), while, at the same time, it brings forward what is common to the parties. Under παντὶ τρόπῳ are included what is outward, the manner of representation, the compass, articulation, the systematic arrangement and tendency of this teaching, not its contents as being Ebionitic, or other Jewish views, or Gnostic conceptions (Gal. i. 8). The more exact definition of πᾶς τρόπος follows in εἴτε προφάσει εἴτε ἀληθείᾳ. Both mark the relation of the word preached to the character of the preacher; εἴτε προφάσει points to the difference, εἴτε ἀληθείᾳ to the harmony between the two, as regards the word, doctrine and motives of the respective preachers: on the one side, insincerity, self-seeking, party spirit; on the other, conscientiousness, faithfulness. The first description embraces those mentioned in ver. 15 a and ver. 17, and the second those mentioned in ver. 15 b and ver. 16, and also ver. 14. It is incorrect to regard προφάσει = per occasionem (Vulg., GROTIUS). It is also incorrect to include under προφάσει those mentioned in ver. 15 b, as if these also merely showed themselves pleased with the apostolic type of doctrine (SCHENKEL). Χριστὸς καταγγέλλεται in ver. 17, sets forth what is common to the different witnesses.—And I therein do rejoice, καὶ ἐν τούτῳ χαίρω. For the construction see iii. 1; iv. 4, 10; Col. i. 24. The cause of his joy is that in every way Christ is proclaimed. The difference in the mode of proclamation cannot disturb his joy, though he must condemn the unworthy motives of his opponents. This joy is not merely a present, but an abiding one.—Yea, and I shall rejoice (ἀλλὰ καὶ χαίρήσονται)—let the result of it as to himself be what it may. In like manner ἀλλά (iii. 8) opposes the pres. ἡγούμεαι to the perfect ἡγήναι. We supply mentally a negative clause—'I do not merely at present rejoice.' Hence we are not to insert a period after χαίρω, as in LACHMANN'S N. T., see WINER'S Gram., p. 442. We are not to think here of its being less difficult for Paul to show a spirit of resignation or acquiescence because the danger at Rome did not concern his apostolic authority as in some other instances (MEYER); for joy and an elevated tone of mind pervade the entire letter, and the Roman church was an object of the Apostle's special regard and solicitude, as the Epistle to the Romans testifies. Manifestly the teachers are not like those spoken of in iii. 2 sq., nor are they Judaizers, or Jewish Christians, disinclined to the Pauline view of Christianity (SCHENKEL). They must have been inclined to Paul's system of doctrine, and have approximated to it, but they were unfavorable to his mode of treatment, and unfriendly to his person. Their motives were corrupt (ii. 21), and they were not sincere friends of the Apostle. [For NEANDER'S views on this question see note below.*]

Ver. 19.—For I know (οἶδα γάρ) emphasizes the declaration as to his joy.—That this shall result to me (ὅτι τοῦτο μοι ἀποβήσεται). The demonstrative (τοῦτο) refers to ver. 18 (παντὶ τρόπῳ Χριστὸς καταγγέλλεται), and explains why he rejoices, and not to ἀλλήν ἐγείρειν (ver. 17), as CALVIN, VAN HENGEL and others think. The use of the verb is similar to that of ἐλάνθην in ver. 12. [It explains why nothing hereafter can occur to rob him of this assurance and joy

of which he speaks. He feels assured that the opposition of his enemies will be the means not only of advancing the cause of Christ (ver. 18), but, as stated here, of exciting him to greater zeal and activity, and thus also indirectly of promoting his own spiritual welfare and ultimate salvation. The reference of τοῦτο to the opposition of Paul's enemies (so also LIGHTFOOT) is the most natural, both on account of the sequel, and because the statement that the preaching of Christ must advance the cause of Christ is too obvious to need a formal confirmation (γάρ).—[H.]—Unto salvation (εἰς σωτηρίαν), like εἰς προκοπὴν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου in ver. 12, with the meaning (comp. also ver. 20), that in himself Christ and His gospel will be glorified and advanced. Hence it does not refer to his release from imprisonment (CHRYSTOSTOM, et al.), to the preservation of his life (OECUMENIUS), to his victory over his enemies (MICHAELIS), ad salutem multorum hominum (GROTIUS), to salus vera et perennis (VAN HENGEL), or to his own salvation in a spiritual sense (RHEINWALD). [Among others, ELLICOTT and LIGHTFOOT adopt this last explanation. The pronoun (μου) indicates a personal result, and the future of the verb shows it to be one not yet secured. This meaning, too, of σωτηρία is the prevailing one in Paul's Epistles; comp. ver. 28; ii. 12; Rom. i. 16; 2 Thess. ii. 13. See further on ver. 20.—[H.]—Through your prayer and assistance of the Spirit of Jesus Christ.—The way to this result (ἀποβήσεται) is, first, through (διὰ) the supplication of the Philippians (τῆς ὑμῶν δέησις), to which the Apostle attaches great value (Philem. 22; Rom. xv. 30, 31; 2 Cor. i. 11); secondly, through the assistance of the Spirit of Jesus Christ (καὶ ἐπιχορηγίας τοῦ πνεύματος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ), which therefore the Holy Spirit affords, who is indeed the Spirit of Jesus Christ, directs His cause, and hence is designated as His Spirit. The genitive makes it unnecessary to repeat the article (τῆς), as also the close connection of the two substantives makes it unnecessary to repeat διὰ. On ἐπιχορηγία see Eph. iv. 16; comp. Rom. viii. 9, 10; Gal. iv. 6, 7. Precationem in celum ascendentem, exhibitionem de celo venientem (BENGEL). Hence it is wrong to regard καὶ as exegetical, and ἐπιχορηγία as the contents of δέησις (MEYER); nor can τοῦ πνεύματος be shown to be gen. obj. from Gal. iii. 5. [Yet the close connection of the nouns indicates that the gifts and guidance of the Spirit were among the favors for which they prayed in his behalf.—[H.]

Ver. 20.—According to my earnest expectation and hope (κατὰ τὴν ἀποκαρδοκίαν καὶ ἐλπίδα μου). Having stated the end or result (εἰς σωτηρίαν), and the means (διὰ τῆς ὑμῶν δέησις), he now presents the measure (κατὰ) of the ἀποβήσεται. The first substantive (ἀποκαρδοκία, see Rom. viii. 19) denotes the soul's subjective, intenser longing (ἀποκαρδοκέω, erecto capite specto); the second (ἐλπίς) the more objective, outward, ground or object of expectation.—The object of this longing and expectation is: That in nothing I shall be ashamed (ὅτι ἐν οὐδενὶ αἰσχυνήσομαι). Ὅτι is declarative, not argumentative (ESTRUS); for οἶδα γάρ brings forward the reason of his rejoicing. Αἰσχυνέσθαι=ἰν (Ps. xxxiv. 4, 29; Rom. ix. 33; 2 Cor. x. 8) is to become ashamed, to fail of one's purpose, be disappointed. The meaning is not pudore confusus ab officio deflectam (VAN HENGEL), since, as MEYER well observes, it relates not so much to the conduct as to the fate of Paul. Still less does it refer to an ignominious issue of his trial. Ἐν οὐδενὶ excludes the being put to shame in any particular, as ἐν μηδενὶ in ver. 28. It is incorrect to regard it as masculine, and to apply it to his opponents (HÖLEMANN, LIGHTFOOT), especially as the case is one not of individuals, but of parties.—But (ἀλλ') joins the positive side to the negative.—That with all boldness as constantly, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body (ἐν πάσῃ παρρησίᾳ ὡς πάντοτε καὶ νῦν μεγαλυνήσεται ὁ Χριστὸς ἐν τῷ σώματι μου). Ignominiam a sese removet; sibi parrhesiam, Christo ipsi gloriam tribuit (BENGEL). In the person of the Apostle who is in bonds Christ is to be thus glorified. This positive statement shows fully what is meant by the preceding negative statement. Παρρησία is not=joyfulness, for see I John ii. 28, where σχῶμεν παρρησίαν is opposed to καὶ μὴ αἰσχυνώμεν, as here. Ἐν πάσῃ corresponds to ἐν οὐδενὶ, and the μεγαλυνήσεται of Christ in Paul's person, to Paul's αἰσχυνέσθαι designed and sought by his enemies. As formerly this had been done in many a difficult position, amid great obstacles, so also now in this severest crisis (καὶ νῦν) will Christ be glorified in him. He desires for himself what he entreats for the church (see ver. 11). On μεγαλυνήσεται comp. Luke i. 46; Acts x. 46. This exaltation of Christ is effected as much indeed through Paul's activity and boldness (ἐν πάσῃ παρρησίᾳ), in word and deed, before individuals and crowds, friends and foes, as through his sufferings (hence ἐν τῷ σώματι μου instead of ἐν ἑμοί). It is not, therefore, the παρρησία of the teachers (vers. 15-18) (HÖLEMANN), nor does the verb (contrary to usage) refer to the growth of Christ in Paul (RILLIET), which surely does not take place in Paul's body. [He says ἐν τῷ σώματι μου, not ἐν ἑμοί, because he is thinking of the possibility of a violent death.—[H.]—Both clauses: Whether by life or by death (εἴτε διὰ ζωῆς εἴτε διὰ θανάτου) are conditioned by ἐν τῷ σώματι μου. The meaning is, that whether he is to live or suffer death, the result will be for the glory of Christ. In the first case, by the Apostle's activity; in the second, by his joyful death. In either case, his παρρησία or 'boldness' would be made manifest. [The manner, therefore, in which the Apostle's trials, his perplexities and annoyances (τοῦτο, ver. 19) might be made to conduce to his salvation (εἰς σωτηρίαν) is evident. If, on the one hand, they should discourage him and lead him to relax his efforts, and render him unfaithful, they would endanger his hopes and safety, or at all events dim the lustre of his crown of glory in the heavenly world. So, on the other hand, if, through the prayers of his friends and the assistance of the Holy Spirit, these same trials should be overruled (as he was confident they would be) so as to strengthen in him the graces of the Christian and excite him to greater fortitude and zeal as a preacher of the gospel, they would then render the fact of his salvation more certain, and in the measure of its fullness more complete and glorious.

And it was not a vain confidence which the Apostle has expressed here. At a later period, on the eve of his actual martyrdom, he was enabled to exclaim: "I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing" (2 Tim. iv. 6, 7).—H.]

Ver. 21. [The Apostle is uncertain whether in a personal point of view he should choose to live or to die (vers. 21-24).—H.]—For to me to live (is) Christ, and to die (is) gain.—'Εἰμοὶ γὰρ introduces a confirmation of the thought that it is entirely the same to him whether Christ be glorified through his life and activity, or by his death; with others (hence ἐμοὶ at the beginning) it may indeed be different. Τὸ ζῆν, which is made more specific by ἐν σαρκί, ver. 22, defines the nature of the preceding ζῶν; this is Χριστός (predicate). Quidquid vivo (vita naturali), Christum vivo, Christi causam, dum vitam in mundo ago, meam esse censeo (BENGEL). [Living consists in union with and devotion to Christ: my whole being and activities are His. The context shows that Χριστός, besides the idea of union with Him, must also involve that of devotion to His service (ELLICOTT).—H.] Καὶ τὸ ἀποθάνειν κέρδος imports: If the imprisonment end with my being condemned to death, even this as regards my person is also gain, as more fully explained in ver. 23. Hence the inf. aorist is used to mark the simple fact, while ζῆν is a continuative present. It is incorrect to understand ζῆν of the spiritual life (RILLIETT), or to make Χριστός the subject in the sense of preaching Christ, κέρδος the predicate, and τὸ ζῆν καὶ τὸ ἀποθάνειν as accusative relations, tamen vita, quam in morte (CALVIN, et al.). It is also wrong to make it parenthetic: His assurance that death will be gain will give him strength to die joyfully, and so he will glorify Christ (MEYER, et al.). [Since κέρδος is defined as σύν Χριστῷ εἶναι in ver. 23, 'the gain' cannot be a result viewed simply as advantageous to the cause of Christ or the salvation of others.—H.]

Ver. 22. But if the living in the flesh, this (is) the fruit of my labor.—Εἰ δὲ begins the comparison of two cases. Εἰ pre-supposes an undoubted fact, in opposition (δέ) to the last thought (τὸ ἀποθάνειν κέρδος). Τὸ ζῆν is more fully defined by ἐν σαρκί, because there is a life out of the flesh which ἀποθάνειν calls to mind. Τοῦτο rhetorically brings the two antecedent words together, and μοί, for me, is placed emphatically before the predicate without the copula (ἐστὶ): καρπὸς ἔργου. In καρπὸς we have a parallel to κέρδος (ver. 21), and τὸ ζῆν ἐν σαρκί is thus also a gain, a living, ever ripening fruit, the nature of which the genit. of apposition more closely defines, like flumen Rheni, virtus liberalitatis (BENGEL), and comp. Eph. i. 14; vi. 14, 16 f.; Col. ii. 24. See WINER'S Gram. p. 531. So that Paul ipsum opus pro fructu habet, alius ex opere fructum querit (BENGEL). Ἔργον is the Apostolic activity. It is wrong to regard εἰ=an (BEZA) [whether (LIGHTFOOT)]; τοῦτο ἔργον as the apodosis=this is fruit, etc. (PELAGIUS, BENGEL, A. V.); καρπὸς ἔργου=operæ pretium (GRO-

TIVUS); or to suppose an aposiopesis: non repugno, non ægre fero (CONR. MUELLER, RILLIETT). HÖLEMANN translates against the context and the language: If to live is a fruit, in the flesh, death is a fruit indeed. [Instead of ἔργον as genit. of apposition, we prefer that of origin or source: If the living in the flesh (εἰ, not hypothetical, but syllogistic=since it is, etc.) this (which simply repeats and emphasizes τὸ ζῆν) is (brings forth, secures) fruit, i. e., the salvation of men, from work (his continued Apostolic activity; comp. ii. 30; 1 Thess. v. 13; 2 Tim. iv. 5), also then, etc. (as in the next clause). With this modification the explanation of Dr. BRAUNE as above agrees essentially with that of DE WETTE, MEYER, ELLICOTT, ALFORD, and many other interpreters.—H.]—Then also what (i. e., which of the two) I should choose I know not (καὶ τὸ αἰρῆσθαι, οὐ γινώσκω). To the supposition τὸ ζῆν=καρπὸς Paul now adds also or then (καὶ) the uncertainty of the choice to be made (οὐ γινώσκω). For this use of καὶ comp. 2 Cor. ii. 2. It is not a Hebraistic form of the apodosis. [TISCHEENDORF has correctly only a comma after ἔργον. In this concomitant use of καὶ, as we may term it, its proper force is not wholly lost. It implies that if one theory be true, then another will be true also: if the life be thus useful, the choice must also (καὶ) be difficult. See ELLICOTT in loc.—H.] On τὸ αἰρῆσθαι, see WINER'S Gram. p. 229. It is a future with the force of the conjunctive, the two being closely related; and τὶ is for πότερον, as in Matth. xxi. 31. See WINER'S Gram. p. 169. The middle denotes the choosing for himself, with γινώσκω=non definitio mihi (BENGEL). [In the first edition of his Commentary, MEYER renders 'I am uncertain,' but in the second and third editions he renders 'I do not make known,' 'give no decision.' The latter is the prevalent sense in the N. T.—H.]

Ver. 23. For I am in a strait betwixt the two (συνέχομαι δὲ ἐκ τῶν δύο).—The negative statement in οὐ γινώσκω passes here to a positive statement in συνέχομαι, and the latter is made emphatic by its position and strengthened by δέ=rather. The verb means to be held together, to be pressed hard (2 Cor. v. 14; Luke viii. 45 (συνέχουσι σε καὶ ἀποθλίβουσι), xii. 50), and is followed by the instrumental dative (Matth. iv. 24; Luke iv. 38; viii. 37; Acts xviii. 5; xxviii. 8). Here the preposition with the genitive (ἐκ τῶν δύο) marks the origin or source of his perplexity about the two conditions, i. e., ζῆν and ἀποθάνειν already mentioned. The sense of the verb (see above) is manifest from ver. 24. It cannot refer to outward affliction or anxiety.—Having the desire to depart (τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν ἔχων εἰς τὸ ἀναλίσθαι).—Paul is in a strait or perplexity, since for himself he prefers death to life. The article marks the desire as the one which Paul feels, not one already mentioned (HÖLEMANN), which is not the case. The prep. εἰς points out the direction; whereas the genit. τοῦ would represent death as the object of his desire. Paul is not wearied of life, but his thoughts pass beyond death as a transition, and fix upon that which is to follow. Death is conceived of under a similar figure, viz., that of a journey (Matth. xxvi. 24, ὑπάγειν), that of a voyage (2 Tim. iv. 6, solvere ancoram), and also without a figure, as cedere (Luke xii. 36, BENGEI).—And to be with Christ—καὶ σὺν Χριστῷ εἶναι.—Comp. 2 Cor. v. 8 (ἐνδοξάζει πρὸς κύριον); Heb. xii. 22, 23; Acts vii. 59. The departure (ἀναλῦσαι) brings him into this higher life of fellowship with Christ. There is no thought here of an intermediate state.—Which is far better—πολλῷ γὰρ μάλ-λον κρείσσον.—The accumulation of comparatives (2 Cor. vii. 13; Mark vii. 36) indicates the strength of his desire. WISER's Gram. p. 240.

Ver. 24. Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you—Τὸ ἐπιμένειν δὲ stands opposed to ἀναλῦσαι. 'Εν τῇ σαρκί has the article here in the correct text (not ἐν σαρκί, as in ver. 22); hence in his flesh as it now is. This remaining is more necessary (ἀναγκαϊότερον) as distinguished from his departing (ἀναλῦσαι), which is better (κρείσσον), as far as relates to his own preference. But here a calm survey and consideration of the circumstances, a regard for the welfare of others, beloved ones, among whom are to be named especially those to whom he writes (δὲ ὑμᾶς), decide the question. His Apostolic calling and his service to the church, which are of far greater importance to him than his own heart's desire, control his decision. It is incorrect to explain ἀναγκαϊότερον=prestat (HEINRICH), as "too necessary" (VAN HENGEL), or to consider the glory of Christ as the ground of his wish to live longer (CALVIN).

Ver. 25. And having this confidence I know (καὶ τοῦτο πεποθῶ; οἶδα). Τοῦτο points back to ἀναγκαϊότερον, and indicates the ground of his confidence, and the perf. part. marks this confidence as one which he has had, and still entertains. We are not to join τοῦτο with οἶδα (ERASMUS, et al.) or to explain this last as probabiliter sperare (BEZA, VAN HENGEL, RILLIET). Comp. Philem. ver. 22. Though uncertain as to what he ought to choose for himself, yet he is quite sure that he will remain.—That I shall abide and continue with you all.—Ὅτι μὲν ὅ is the opposite of ἀναλῦσαι. On μένειν comp. 1 Cor. xv. 6; John xxi. 22, 26. It is more fully explained by καὶ συμπαραμένῳ πᾶσιν ὑμῖν. Παραμένειν is to remain here, while σὺν adds the idea of association with others (πᾶσιν ὑμῖν). This fellowship helps him to give up the more desired ἀναλῦσαι, especially as his remaining has its consequence and fruit, as well as the being with Christ (σὺν Χριστῷ εἶναι).—For your furtherance and joy of faith.—This is explanatory of δὲ ὑμᾶς (ver. 24). Εἰς states the purpose of Paul's remaining; it is twofold: their furtherance in the faith, and their joy in the faith, τὴν ὑμῶν προκοπὴν καὶ χαρὰν τῆς πίστεως. This is Paul's life—to preach Christ and to strengthen the faith of others. On προκοπή see ver. 12; 1 Tim. iv. 15. Nothing is here said of a favorable termination of his imprisonment (BEZA). It is also incorrect to assume a hendiadys: in incrementum gaudii vestri, quod ob agnitionem evangelium accepistis (HEINRICH); or to understand it of Paul's joy on account of the faith of the Philippians (ERASMUS), or to connect τῆς πίστεως only with χαρὰν (VAN HENGEL); for in this case the pronoun would need to be repeated with πίστεως.

Ver. 26. That your rejoicing may be more abundant.—Ἰνα states the final purpose of the subordinate one, expressed by εἰς; comp. vers.

9, 10, 11. Τὸ καύχημα ὑμῶν is significatio gaudii, affectus gaudii plen (BENGEL), glorying, as 1 Cor. v. 6. It is the natural result of the increase and joy of their faith (τὴν ὑμῶν προκοπὴν καὶ χαρὰν τῆς πίστεως), but it is not the object of them. Hence καύχημα is not materies gloriandi (MEYER), nor is it boasting against Judaizing teachers (FLATT), or Paul's glorying (CHRYSTOSTOM). But this glorying, as well as faith, is to increase (περισσεύειν) in Christ Jesus (ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ) as its sphere.—In me (ἐν ἐμοί) points to the Apostle's person and activity as the outward sphere of this glorying which admits of increase in Christ. Neither ἐν Χριστῷ (CALVIN), nor ἐν ἐμοί (FLATT), belongs to καύχημα. The idea expressed by ἐν ἐμοί is rendered still more definite by the statement of the means.—Through my return to you (διὰ τῆς ἐμῆς παρουσίας πάλιν πρὸς ὑμᾶς)—by which the faith of the Philippians shall be confirmed and their joy be increased. On πάλιν, which has here the force of an adjective, see 2 Cor. xi. 23. Paul is thinking of his release from imprisonment; but no safe conclusion can be drawn from this as to the fulfilment of this expectation.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The evil and sorrow of the world, as imprisonment, and death, become a trial, a cross, on which hang victory and a glorious issue, only then, when he who experiences them can say: "For me to live is Christ" (ἐμοὶ τὸ ζῆν Χριστός). Not the sorrow which men experience makes a bearer of the cross, with its power of attraction, the sign in which we conquer; but the Christian's disposition and behaviour in sorrow make the sorrow a cross. In this consists the true value of martyrdom, and not in the fact alone of suffering and dying. Like the cross of Christ, it must also be a necessity, imposed by the Father, from which we can withdraw only by a violation of conscience, and a refusal to deny self, and to seek our own and our neighbor's edification. See HARLESS, Ethik, § 39.

2. The Christian shows himself, in calamity, to be one who is not overpowered, vexed, swept away by sorrow, or engulfed by it, like one who toilsomely wades through deep water, but he compels it to yield him strength and joy, like the stars of heaven in the night, after he has conquered it and made it his attendant. He is not the object of weak compassion and pity, but of admiration and love, like a conquering hero. He is like a praying one who speaks to God; and as one to whom God speaks, is an object almost of religious veneration.

3. The blessing of the cross is seen in three respects—a) The suffering soul becomes free, more joyful, riper, stronger (ver. 19, εἰς σωτηρίαν, comp. 12, 18, 20, 21 sq.), since it becomes more closely united to the Lord, purified from what is earthly and mortal, more intimate with the Eternal Will, and more joyful in it. b) Men on every side, Christians (ver. 14), as well as heathen, even Prætorians (ver. 13; Matth. xxvii. 54; Mark xv. 39; Luke xxiii. 47), are improved and benefited; for the glory of the peaceful fruit of righteousness becomes better and better known, and the deep need of its possession is felt in the hearts of men. c) The gospel secures for itself a recognition of its true character by preaching, which brings to view the person and his history (vers. 12, 20), for thus the adaptation of the gospel to the hearts and lives of men is seen and confessed.

4. Death, which, like imprisonment and the world's enmity, is an evil, becomes in the Apostle's view an insignificant event, which closes indeed the life upon earth, but changes not the essence, the life of the soul, only the place and form of its existence (ver. 21, ἀποθανεῖν; ver. 23, ἀναλίσσειν). To experience it is no merit, but to conquer it by faith and patience is a grace. Death leads the faithful from the misery of imprisonment to be more completely with Christ. In what way we pass through death into fellowship with Christ, is not said; and still less is there any indication here of an intermediate state. This agrees with the word of the Lord to the thief on the cross (Luke xxiii. 43), and with the teaching of the parable of the rich man (Luke xvi. 23), and still more significantly with the efficacy of Christ's death and resurrection in regard to the relations of life and death, in heaven and on earth (1 Cor. v. 1; Eph. iv. 8; comp. 2 Cor. v. 8; Acts vii. 58).

5. [Unless Paul believed that the death which released him from the trials of this life was to introduce him at once to the presence of Christ and a state of blessedness, we see no adequate reason for the struggle between his desire to depart and be with Christ, and his anxiety to labor still for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom on earth. If he believed that he was to remain for an indefinite time without consciousness in the grave, his zeal for men's salvation and his contempt of personal dangers and trials in the pursuit of that object, would lead him to desire to live as long as possible, on account of the importance of his ministry to mankind. On the other hand, if we suppose him to have regarded his attainment of the joys and rewards of heaven as simultaneous with his departure from this world, we have then an adequate explanation of his perplexity (vers. 21-24). For other passages which seem to involve the same doctrine, see Luke xxiii. 43; 2 Cor. v. 6, 7; and Rev. vi. 9.—H.]

6. The substance of Christian preaching is the person of Christ (vers. 15, 17, 18), as the exaltation of His person is the end of Christian life (ver. 20). This should be the preacher's testimony, his proclamation.

7. The difference in the teaching here consists not so much in the difference of the doctrine of Christ, as in the difference of disposition of the teachers towards Paul (vers. 15-18). The agreement in their teaching, which could scarcely fail to admit of certain variations, is of more account to him than their hostility to him. So much the more magnanimous is his joy in the doctrine which they hold in common.

8. That church fellowship (τὸ καὶ κῆμα ἡμῶν περισσεύει ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ) should promote Christian fellowship is exemplified in the intercourse of Paul and the Philippians (ἐν μοι δὴ τῆς ἐμῆς παρουσίας πάλιν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ver. 26). It is important to observe and maintain this connection.

9. The minister of Christ is helped and served in two ways—(a) by the assistance of the Holy Spirit, which is the Spirit of Christ; and (b) by the supplications of the church: thus from above and from below. He needs the supplications of the church of Christ not less than the church needs his testimony. The protection of praying hands is no insignificant one.

10. Observe the moral greatness of the Apostle! In the constraint of a prison, in the face of death, amid the enmities of some of his associates, he exults for joy in his fellowship with Christ, and allows it to suffer no abatement on account of an error. He hopes to be able to return again to the Philippians, free from his bonds (ver. 26), as shortly before he had expressed a similar hope to Philemon (Philem. ver. 22). This hope indeed he afterwards gave up (2 Tim. iv. 6), and four years before this had declared that he should not see again the Ephesians (Acts xx. 22-25). In this uncertainty his official gift remains intact, which, as a prophetic endowment, has to do with God's word, not with times and seasons (Acts i. 7). He does not, however, declare definitely (ver. 27) that he will come, but leaves it to God's disposal.*

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

For ministers, three teachings: 1) See that thou overcomest sorrow, and that thou art not overcome by it; 2) that Christ is praised thereby; 3) that the church by this very thing is advanced and built up in the faith.—Rejoice without envy in the preaching of thy worthy official brother. The word of God and the preaching of Christ should be to thee of too much value and importance to allow an unfriendly disposition to mortify or vex thee.—For the church, three teachings: 1) Take not offence at the greatness of the evil in the world, especially of the violent enmity which befalls thy pastor, but follow his deportment in the case; 2) persist in hearty supplication for him; 3) aid him full of confidence with thy testimony.—Only one thing must be regarded: that Christ alone, the Saviour of the world, be preached. Thou art not to judge the disposition of the preacher, but only the correctness of his preaching.—In general: Persecution or, at the utmost, death, is the greatest evil which the world can inflict upon the Christian, but this effects for him what launching does for a ship:—it brings him into his proper element. As the ship is thus sent forth upon the ocean for which it is designed, so is the Christian by this means brought to heaven, which is his home. To die, is but to come to our inheritance, if Christ is our life. From Him comes the unselfish love of life for others' sake, which is at once a joy in life and a joy in death, so that from our joy in death there comes no death to our joy. It is unchristian for one to wish for death because he is weary of life, or cowardly to fear death; and worse still are they who desire death while they fear it. Evil does not make us holy, death does not make us happy. Man does not become happy by dying, but the Christian dies, being happy.

IGNATIUS:—Let me become the prey of wild beasts, that God may become my possession. I am God's wheat; the teeth of the wild beasts will grind me so that I may become the purified bread of God. I shall become a true disciple of Jesus Christ when the world no longer sees my body. The iron and the cross, the breaking of the legs, the raging of the wild beasts, the mauling of the limbs, and the bruising of the body—all these diabolical torments may be exercised upon me if I but win Jesus Christ.

* [If Paul was imprisoned twice at Rome (as is almost certain), he could easily have fulfilled this hope of seeing again both the Philippians and Philemon. In the interval between his first and his second captivity. See Commentary on Philemon (LANG's Series), pp. 6, 23.—H.]

STARKE:—If God will make His children known, even His greatest enemies must lend their aid. Let God rule, and follow His leading.—Short but beautiful confession: Christ is our life in creation, in redemption, in regeneration, in the resurrection.

RIGER:—For those in communion with God, in enjoyment of the life of Christ, dying is not the end; the soul's life from that point is before it, not behind (see ver. 21).

SCHLEIERMACHER:—The distressed and suffering man, be the cause of his suffering and distress what it may, attracts the earnest and anxious attention of men to himself more than all the royalty in the world. The way in which he bears his cross, the way in which he accepts his need and distress in his heavenly calling, excite the sympathy of men. If now we are all cross-bearers of our Lord, and if no one here below escapes from sorrows, then there is opened to us here at once a way in which we all, each according to his ability, may contribute to the advancement of the gospel, by bearing the troubles and adversities which the Lord sends, with patience and resignation to His will, with hope and trust in His imperishable work, with confidence and joyfulness of heart in His all-sufficient wisdom, in order that men may be thereby impelled to acknowledge and praise our heavenly Father.—Boldness on the one hand and faint-heartedness on the other, have, as it were, a diffusive and contagious power among men.—The troubles of this life will result in our highest good if we love God.—Above all things this is meet: 1) that we recognize the rough ways in which the Lord leads us as His ways, and acquiesce with our whole heart in His guidance; 2) that at the same time we look more to the internal than to the external; 3) the apostle adds, that it will turn to his salvation through the prayer of the church and through the supply of the spirit of Jesus Christ, which comes to him from the church.—This is the true happiness of the Christian, to which we should all aspire, that the longing for the greater glory which is reserved for us, shall never become so strong as to check or weaken our usefulness in the calling to which God has appointed us here on the earth.—If now we see the vineyard of the Lord so divided that to each one a task therein has been assigned, what else can we say in view of its present condition but that the vineyard is far from being wholly cultivated?—We must say then that all Christians, in whom the fear of death has been destroyed by a living and blessed fellowship with the Redeemer who has taken away the power of death, are able to withstand more firmly the assaults of earthly evil, and that their love for the perishable things of the world and enjoyment in them constantly diminish. The more this actually takes place, the more does there arise in them, even here upon earth, a higher love, a love for the Redeemer and His heavenly kingdom, in the strength of which they can regard themselves as servants of the Lord, as laborers in His vineyard, whose constantly renewed wish is, to bring forth fruit for Him unto whom all fruit belongs, as a reward for His sorrows and as a glorification of His victory.

HEUBNER:—Man often comes for the first time to know his strength when he is in misfortune.—When a friend of the truth is bound, ten others arise in his place.—The very best deeds may be done from impure motives; even Christ may be preached from ambition.—Spiritual envy and pride creep in even among preachers of the gospel, and incite them to a false and envious emulation.—When the friends of the truth are imprisoned, we ought to undertake their task, and to make good their places, that the good work may suffer no hindrance. The kindest service which can be rendered to noble martyrs in bonds, is to interest one's self in their cause, not in their person. The work is of more importance than the instrument.—The Christian commits himself wholly to God, and ought with reference to life and death to be absolutely resigned to His will. If he hopes in any respect to be useful to others, then he remains here even gladly.—WHITEFIELD once asked TENNANT, a preacher who was his friend, whether the thought that he might soon be called home, gave him joy. TENNANT replied: "I have no desire about it; my death does not concern me, my duty is to live as long as I can, as well as I can, and to serve my Master as faithfully as I can, until He calls me away. If I had sent my servant to plough, and should afterwards find him asleep, and he should say to me: 'Alas, the sun is so hot, let me go to the house!' might I not say to him, 'thou sluggard!'"

PASSAVANT:—In steadfastness of faith the man of God holds fast joy in the faith. How little inclined we are by nature to leave this world for another better world in order to be with God, every candid mind willingly confesses to itself, and this fact holds up before us the clear mirror of our natural life, and shows us how far estranged we are from God, from His love, and the blessed life which is in Him.

NITZSCH:—How gloriously do desire for death and love of life unite in the Christian's mind! 1) The Christian shows by his faith that in death he loses nothing of that in and for which he here lives, but gains it. 2) Though it is better for him to be with Christ, yet it seems more necessary to remain in the flesh and bring forth fruit. 3) Whatever contradiction remains in his desires, he leaves God to settle, and will not choose or decide for himself.

[REV. J. TRAPP:—Two things make a good Christian, good actions and good aims. Though a good aim doth not make a bad action good, as we see in Uzzah, yet a bad aim makes a good action bad, as in these preachers (see ver. 15).—St. Paul stood, as it were, on tiptoes (ἀποκαρδοκία), to see which way he might best glorify God, by life or death (ver. 20)—Far, far the better (πολλὴ μᾶλλον κρίσις, ver. 23), a transcendent expression, like Paul's καὶ ὑπερβολὴν εἰς ὑπερβολήν, 2 Cor. iv. 17.—H.]

[ROBERT HALL:—Paul was so intent upon the advancement of truth, that he overlooked the malignity of the intention in the success of the cause. It is thus, my brethren, that religion lifts us above self-love and party-strife, and leads us to rejoice in every opening prospect of prosperity, and of good to others, in all public events and in every denomination (see ver. 15).—We see that with all his attainments the apostle was not lifted above them when he says, “by your prayers” (ver. 19). How much have we need to say, “Brethren, pray for us.” The prayer of the obscurest Christian may procure and infuse among us the Spirit of God beyond what we could wish ourselves; for with Him all distinctions are lost but piety and necessity.—“To be with Christ,” was the apostle’s view of the heavenly world (ver. 23). He knew that Jesus Christ had promised that where He was there also His servants should be (John xvii. 24). He values the friendship of Christ above all the world,—to be found in His image and to be with Him, he can conceive of nothing higher.—If your attachment to this world be great, it must be cured by giving yourselves up more entirely to your Lord and Master.—H.]

SECTION III.

The Lord’s Example and Pattern for the Observance of the Church.

CHAPTER I. 27—II. 18.

(1) A true Christian deportment the condition of the Apostle’s joy in the Church (i. 27–30).

Characteristics of a Christian walk (vers. 27, 28 a); and the incentives to such a walk (vers. 28 b, 30).

27 Only let your conversation [deportment] be as it becometh the gospel of Christ: that whether I come and see you or (else) be absent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the 28 gospel; and in nothing terrified by your adversaries, which is¹ to them an evident 29 token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God. For unto you it is [was] given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer 30 for his sake [in his behalf]; having the same conflict which ye saw² in me and now hear to be in me.

¹ Ver. 28.—[The received text has μέν before ἔστιν, interpolated to respond to δέ in the next clause; and probably for a similar reason ὅμων was changed to ἡμῖν (MEYER, ALFORD, LIGHTFOOT). ELLICOTT would retain ἡμῖν.—H.]

² Ver. 30.—[The T. R. has ἴδω after a few copies, but the correct word is undoubtedly εἶδω. The itacism, or similar pronunciation, of the first syllable (an error of the ear in dictation) led to the interchange.—H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 27. Only let your deportment be as it becometh the gospel of Christ. Μόνον in this emphatic position marks the true Christian walk as the sole, indispensable condition of Paul’s joy, when he should come to them, as the connection with vers. 24–26 shows. (Gal. ii. 10; v. 13). BENGE: hoc unum curate, nil aliud. But this one requisition contains within itself manifold other requisitions. The verb here (πολιτεύεσθε) is taken from political life. The church at Philippi forms a part of the kingdom of God, of which they should prove themselves citizens. Paul uses the word elsewhere only in Acts xxiii. 1 (ποπολίτευμαι), in his speech before the Jewish Council, where in the presence of the civil rulers he feels himself to be but a member of the common body politic. Περιπατεῖν refers more to individual life; this verb to church-life, corresponding to πάντες (vers. 4, 7, 8). The fundamental law of this kingdom is denoted by τοῦ εὐαγγελίου τοῦ Χριστοῦ, and the corresponding deportment by ἀξίως. (Col. i. 10: ἀξίως τοῦ κυρίου; Eph. iv. 1: ἀξίως περιπατῆσαι τῆς κλήσεως). —That (ὅνα) states the aim or object of his exhortation, agreeably to the context (ver. 26). —Whether I come and see you or be absent (εἴτε ἔλθων καὶ ἰδὼν ὑμᾶς, εἴτε ἄπων). He thus leaves it uncertain how it may be, but in accordance with his hopeful desire, puts the supposition of his coming first. In both cases he presupposes his release, which might indeed lead him not to Philippi, but elsewhere.—I may hear (ἀκούσω), includes both cases, i. e. either from their own mouth, or from others (MEYER). BENGE: audiam et cognoscam. The object is: your affairs (τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν), and this as more fully explained: that ye stand fast in one spirit (ὅτι στήκετε ἐν ἐνὶ πνεύματι), which is the subject of Paul’s great anxiety. Comp. οἰδᾶ σε τίς εἰ, Luke iv. 34; xix. 3; Mark i. 24. See WINER'S Gramm. p. 626. HÖLEMANN incorrectly joins iva with σῆκετε, as if it were ἀκούσας, and ὅτι simply repeated iva. The construction would be confused, harsh (hiulca, CALVIN terms it), and the participles would be nominative absolute. The verb (iv. 1; 1 Cor. xvi. 13; Gal. v. 1; 1 Thess. iii. 8; 2 Thess. ii. 15) means to keep one's ground in battle. What is meant evidently is that the Philippians should cherish a spirit of unity among themselves, as in 1 Cor. iv. 21; xii. 13; 1 Pet. iii. 4. It is presupposed that this harmony, which is to be an object of such earnest endeavor, is a gift of the Holy Spirit (Eph. iv. 3, 4), but the Holy Spirit is not directly intended (VAN HENGEL).—With one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel (μετὰ ψυχῇ συναθροῦντες τῇ πίστει τοῦ εὐαγγελίου). This explains more fully σῆκετε ἐν ἐνὶ πνεύματι. Here we evidently have to do with a struggle in which the main object is unity, and hence μετὰ ψυχῇ stands with emphasis at the beginning. The πνεῦμα which is in the ψυχῇ, is that part of our nature which is the sphere (ἐν) of the unity. The dative ψυχῇ is the instrumental dative. The substantive ψυχῇ denotes that part of our being which is connected above with πνεῦμα and below with σάρξ, and constitutes the centre of man's peculiar personality.—individuality. Hence, μετὰ ψυχῇ presents their outward manifestation.—Comp. ii. 2; Acts iv. 32. (DELTZSCH, Psychologie, p. 199 ff.). Repellent peculiarities may exist even where there is an agreement in principle. BENGE: est interdictum inter sanctos naturalis aliqua antipathia. The dative τῇ πίστει, for the faith, presents the object of the struggle, which the genitive τοῦ εὐαγγελίου renders more precise, and so guards it from any arbitrary misconception of friends or foes. The preposition in συναθροῦντες refers to this co-operation of the Philippians with Paul (Col. ii. 1; 1 Tim. vi. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 7). Comp. vers. 7, 30; iv. 3, where μοι indicates what is here sufficiently plain from the connection. It is incorrect to limit σύν only to the unity of the Philippians among themselves (WIESINGER), which μετὰ ψυχῇ after ἐν ἐνὶ πνεύματι has already pointed out, or to exclude this reference (MEYER), or to make σύν govern πίστει (GROTIUS). Τῇ πίστει is not an instrumental dative (CALVIN, et al.), nor should μετὰ ψυχῇ be connected with σῆκετε (CHRYSOSTOM, LUTHER).

Ver. 28. And in nothing terrified (μηὲν πτυρόμενοι ἐν μηδενί). Καὶ adds another concomitant of σῆκετε. The verb (properly used of horses in the race) means to turn about, to start, spring aside. Comp. ver. 2; 2 Cor. vi. 3.—By your adversaries (ὑπὸ τῶν ἀντικειμένων) gives the cause of this agitation or panic. We are to understand this of their personal enemies (comp. ver. 30), unchristian opposers of the gospel, especially among the Jews, but also among the heathen (ver. 30, etc.; Acts xvi. 11 sq.; xvii. 5 sq.).—The Apostle proceeds to enforce his exhortation by appropriate motives, vers. 28 b-30.—Which to them is an evident token of perdition (ἥτις ἐστὶν αὐτοῖς ἐνδείξις ἀπωλείας). The argumentative ἥτις = since it is (Eph. iii. 13), in sense points back to the thought that the church does not allow itself to be terrified, but grammatically connects itself by a familiar attraction with ἐνδείξις (1 Tim. iii. 15). See WINER'S Gramm., p. 627. The emphatic position of ἐστὶν shows that even if they (οἱ ἀντικείμενοι) do not perceive it, or in their excitement do not acknowledge it, yet the fact that the church is unterrified is an evidence (comp. Rom. iii. 25; 2 Cor. viii. 24) of their destruction, of their exclusion from the blessed kingdom of God (1 Cor. i. 18). Comp. 2 Thess. i. 5-10.—But to you of salvation (ὑμῖν δὲ σωτηρίας). Comp. Rom. viii. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 12. For the reading see on the text. That which should awaken the fears of others with regard to their final destiny, even if it does not, is to believers a pledge of salvation.—And that of God. Καὶ τοῦτο refers equally to both clauses; for the disquietude of the adversaries before the bar of conscience, and the calmness of believers, alike come from God (ἀπὸ θεοῦ). Punishment and consolation are both from Him! To limit τοῦτο in the second member (CALVIN, et al.), to understand it of humility (HÖLEMANN), or to connect it with what follows (RILLIET), is incorrect.

Ver. 29. For unto you it was given (ὅτι ὑμῖν ἐχαρίσθη) confirms the statement in ver. 28, the last words of which (ἀπὸ θεοῦ) led the Apostle to adopt the passive form here. It is just you who are struggling and suffering together, to whom this grace [or undeserved favor] has been granted by God. Hence ὑμῖν has the emphatic position. BENGE emphasizes the verb (gratie munus signum salutis), but without reason, while MEYER limits the confirmation to τοῦτο ἀπὸ θεοῦ.—In the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer in his behalf (τὸ ἐπὲρ Χριστοῦ, οὐ μόνον τὸ εἰς αὐτὸν πιστεῦν, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ ἐπὲρ αὐτοῦ πάσχειν). This clause forms the subject of ἐχαρίσθη. At first τὸ ἐπὲρ Χριστοῦ πάσχειν was the thought in Paul's mind (which expresses positively what is stated negatively in μηὲν πτυρόμενοι); but the condition under which the suffering leads to salvation (σωτηρία) occurs to the writer's mind, and he interpolates the clause οὐ μόνον . . . πιστεῦν in the middle of the sentence, but afterwards resumes his first thought in τὸ ἐπὲρ αὐτοῦ. The faith which works such steadfast endurance of suffering clearly proves that both are from God. Τὸ ἐπὲρ Χριστοῦ is not = what concerns Christ (BEZA, et al.).

Ver. 30. Having the same conflict (τὸν αὐτὸν ἀγῶνα ἔχοντες) presents the characteristic of this suffering, the participle agreeing with the subject understood with πάσχειν, as in Eph. iv. 2; iii. 17, 18; and Col. iii. 10. See WINER'S Gramm., p. 572. It should not be connected with σῆκετε (BENGE), or be referred back to ὑμῖν for its subject (MEYER).—Τὸν αὐτὸν is explained by what follows: Which ye saw in me and now hear to be in me (ὧν εἶδετε ἐν ἐμοὶ καὶ νῦν ἀκούετε ἐν ἐμοὶ). He refers in the first verb to his sojourn at Philippi (Acts xvi. 12-16 sq.), and in νῦν ἀκούετε to the information contained in the present letter (which would be read before them) and to that furnished by the report of Epaphroditus (ii. 28). Ἐν ἐμοί, in me, in both instances refers to a conflict which Paul suffers, to persecutions directed against himself. The Philippians also endured the same; and it is the kind of conflict which is the same in each case. The likeness does not consist merely in the similar ground of the conflict, that is in the faith for which they suffer (MEYER). The second ἐν ἑαυτοῖς is not = de me (Vulg., ERASMUS, et al.), nor is allusion made here to false teachers (HEINRICH).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. A right deportment of the Christian is the one thing which the Apostle demands of each member of the church. It is only this one thing, because this embraces all that belongs to the special circumstances, positions, and relations of life; just this alone, because it is the deportment of a citizen of the kingdom of God, including the relations of each one with every other, and finds its rule in the fundamental law of the people of God, the Gospel of Christ, to which it must correspond (ver. 27).

2. Four points here deserve especial attention. (a) The calling of the Christian is that of a warrior who retreats not; (b) It requires him to hold together and to agree together with the church; (c) It requires him to keep ever in view the object of the contest, his faith; and (d) It secures to him, in all outward afflictions, true soul-peace. In the first respect, it is not something to be won, but is a prize which having been won, the Christian is to defend; not salvation to be gained, but a possession to be kept. In the second respect, it is unity with the Apostle and with each member of the church, in the direction and impulse of the Spirit, in opposition to unchristian opponents. But the individual peculiarities of temperament, education, etc., are not to be made an occasion for separation. In the third respect, it is the holding fast of the faith which is according to the gospel; and in the fourth respect, it is the keeping watch over the soul in order that by looking to the example of the Apostle and of the Lord Himself, we may be kept from fear and despair by reason of the adversaries.

3. The intrepidity of the Christian amid the enmities of unchristian opponents, is as certainly an evidence to him of fellowship with God, as it is for them a proof that they should and may learn therein their exposure to final destruction (ver. 28).

4. He who believes in Christ must regard it as a grace of God that he is permitted to suffer for Him (ver. 29).

HOMILETIC AND PRACTICAL.

Compare the Doctrinal and Ethical remarks.

STARKE:—Brief epitome of the whole of Christianity: faith, love, patience.

RIEGER:—Although we must suffer and struggle together for the gospel, yet we often become thereby more completely linked together. Since the disposition to yield to fear is planted so deeply in our nature, it becomes a part of the renewal of our souls into the image of God, to obtain again a steadfast courage to adhere to the right.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—Fearlessness with respect to all adversaries of the kingdom of God and all their efforts against it, must be peculiar to the Christian; for it has no other basis or other measure in him than his faith in the Redeemer and his love for Him and for His holy cause.

HEUBNER:—To believe in Christ is to make common cause with Him, hence also to suffer with Him.

PASSAVANT:—Whenever Christians fall out with one another, it happens for the most part because they are unwilling to surrender their own self-will to the control of the one Spirit of the Lord, or to merge their individuality in His sovereignty.

[ROBERT HALL:—"Nothing terrified by your adversaries" (ver. 28). Having Jesus Christ present with the Father, as an advocate, what was there to terrify them? They knew that He was at the head of all—principalities and powers, thrones and dominions, being made subject to Him. That Christian, my brethren, who views Jesus Christ as the Lord of men, of angels, and of glory, how firm and undaunted may he look around him, and consider kings and princes but as common dust; for they must submit themselves to His authority or perish. See Ps. ii. 10-12.—H.]

(2) Christ's Example on the Way through Humiliation to Exaltation (ii. 1-11).

After earnestly and eloquently entreating them to stand together in harmony (1-4), he holds up to view the person of the Redeemer (5, 6), His state of Humiliation (7, 8), and

His state of exaltation (9-11).

- 1 If there be therefore any consolation [exhortation] in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any¹ bowels and mercies [compassion],
- 2 fulfil ye [make full] my joy, that ye be like-minded [mind the same thing], having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind [with one soul minding the one
- 3 thing]. Let nothing be done through strife or vain glory; but in lowliness of
- 4 mind let each esteem other [others] better than [superior to] themselves. Look not every man² on his own things, but every man also on the things of others.
- 5, 6 Let this mind³ be in you which was also in Christ Jesus; who, being in the form

7 of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: but made himself of no reputation [emptied or divested himself], and took upon him the form of a servant, 8 and was made in the likeness of men. And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. 9 Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a [the^e] name which is 10 above every name; that at [in] the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things [beings] in heaven, and things [beings] in earth, and things [beings] under 11 the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

⁴ Ver. 9.—τὸ ὄνομα in \aleph A B C; the article is omitted in D E F G, et al.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. If there be therefore any exhortation in Christ (εἰ τινος οὖν παράκλησις ἐν Χριστῷ). Ὀὖν goes back to the preceding thought (i. 27-30). He now exhorts them to be united in the present conflict, in which they as well as himself are engaged, that the joy which he has felt on account of their harmony may receive no check. Εἰ presents what is actual as hypothetical for the sake of the conclusion, as in Eph. iii. 2, 4, 21; Col. i. 23; ii. 20; iii. 1. We are to supply ἔστι, but not also ἐν ἡμῖν (MEYER). Ἦ is to be taken for granted that such exhortation (παράκλησις), which by ἐν Χριστῷ (i. 26) is defined as based upon Christ, as having its sphere or element in Him, is found richly in the Apostle; but he adopts this mode of expression in his humility. Comp. Rom. xv. 30. [The A. V. renders παράκλησις consolation, but that sense destroys the difference between this clause and the next. The meaning here is: If those who are in Christ may address to each other exhortations and entreaties with a right to expect that they will not be unavailing, then fulfil, etc. We may carry forward the idea of ἐν Χριστῷ to the other clause.—H.]—If any comfort of love (εἴτε παραμύθιον ἀγάπης). According to 1 Thess. ii. 11: ὡς πατήρ τέκνα ἑαυτοῦ παρακαλοῦντες ἡμᾶς καὶ παραμυθούμενοι; and 1 Cor. xiv. 3: παράκλησιν καὶ παραμυθίαν, this ἀπᾶς λεγόμενον must denote consolation of love, friendly address, or encouragement which springs from love, as described by the genitive. We are to refer the above without doubt to the Apostle. [The Apostle would say: If it be a characteristic of true love that it is ever ready to comfort or encourage those for whom it is cherished, then comply with my request and thus manifest your love to me.—H.]—If any fellowship of spirit [or the Spirit] (εἰ τις κοινωνία πνεύματος). The article being omitted, we cannot compare this expression with 2 Cor. xiii. 13: κοινωνία τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος, and explain it as fellowship with the Holy Spirit (BENGEL, MEYER); but the κοινωνία, which was described in i. 5 with reference to its object or outward action, is described here in its inward sphere: fellowship of spirit among themselves, and with the Apostle, by virtue of which exhortation and entreaty readily find response and acceptance as addressed to each other. That this fellowship of spirit is a gift of the Holy Spirit, is only pre-supposed, not stated. [The absence of the article does not decide against the other view; for πνεῦμα as being of the nature of a proper name may have the article or omit it. See WINE's Gramm., p. 122. Most interpreters understand the Holy Spirit to be meant.—H.]—If any bowels and compassion (εἰ τινα σπλάγχνα καὶ οἰκτιρμοί). The first substantive (i. 8) denotes the seat, the source, of the second; the second being in the plural represents the individual proofs, the acts as repeated, manifold. See WINE's Gramm., p. 176; Col. iii. 12: σπλάγχνα οἰκτιρμῶν, lect. var. (οἰκτιρμῶν). Thus the fellowship or participation (κοινωνία) in the third clause appears in its action and effects. [The two nouns give intensity to the idea. The Apostle intimates in terms of the greatest delicacy that any reluctance to grant him the favor for which he so earnestly pleads, would have all the effect upon his feelings of unkindness and cruelty.—H.] The first two clauses we are to refer to Paul, the other two to the Philippians; the implied affirmation of the several conditions (εἰ τις . . . οἰκτιρμοί), as respects both Paul and those addressed, enforces the exhortation (πληρώσατε) which they severally introduce. It is incorrect to regard the first and third as objective, and the second and fourth as subjective motives (MEYER), or to refer all four to the Philippians only (MEYER, SCHENKEL). That we are to supply χαρά, from ver. 2, in each of the conditional clauses ('si quod (gaudium) consolatio amoris,' etc.), according to BENGEL, is inadmissible.

Ver. 2. Make full my joy (πληρώσατέ μου τὴν χαράν). The Apostle has joy already, and it only remains that this should be full and complete (comp. i. 9; 1 John i. 4; 2 John 12). The Philippians are to make it so by allowing his appeal to prevail with them (first two clauses), and by maintaining and exhibiting the virtues to which he exhorts them (last two).—He sums up the whole as it were in one word: That ye mind the same thing. Ἦνα represents the harmony of the Philippians (τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖτε), as sought by them in order [as one of its attendant aims] to fill up the measure of Paul's joy. According to iii. 15; iv. 2; Rom. xii. 16; xv. 5, mind and striving after the same object are meant.—This is more closely defined, first on its ethical side: Having the same love (τὴν αὐτὴν ἀγάπην ἔχοντες). As possessors and dispensers of that love which in its object, purity and strength, is essentially the same, they should be of one mind.—Secondly, the trait or conduct appearing on its intellectual side is: Being of one accord (A. V.), or like-minded, pondering the one thing (σύνψυχοι τὸ ἐν φρονούντες). With reference to the object had in view, the τὸ αὐτὸ represents it as a single thing, and the question they consider is, what one thing is necessary; and further, the personal unity which corresponds to this unity of aim, becomes prominent, as in i. 27: μὴ ψυχή. TITTMANN (Syn. I. p. 67) correctly observes: ισόψυχοι, est qui eodem modo est animatus (like-minded); σύνψυχοι autem, qui idem sentit, unanimis (harmonious); σύνψυχοι esse possunt, qui non sunt ισόψυχοι; sunt igitur σύνψυχοι οἱ τὸ αὐτὸ φρονούντες. Sed τὸ ἐν φρονεῖν est unum velle, in uno expetendo consentire. In this earnest exhortation the accumulation of terms and phrases cannot surprise us. It is incorrect to regard σύνψυχοι as independent, the subject of a separate predication (OECUMENIUS, et al.). To these two positive qualifications correspond the negative ones in ver. 3.

Ver. 3. Let nothing be done through strife or vain glory.—Μηδὲν κατ' ἐριθείαν forbids whatever is without or against τὴν αὐτὴν ἀγάπην, while μηδὲ κατὰ κενδοζησίαν forbids whatever violates τὸ ἐν φρονεῖν, μὴ ψυχή. On the first substantive see in i. 17; on the second, SUIDAS: ματαία τις περὶ ἐαντοῦ οἰσίσ (Gal. v. 26, κενδοζήσι); κατὰ denotes rule, motive (WINER's Gram., p. 401). Without question it is more simple to continue φρονούντες from the preceding verse (WINER, Gram., p. 587) than to supply ποιούντες (ERASMUS, LUTHER, et al.), or even to construe it with the following ἡγούμενοι (HÖLEMANN).—The positive (ver. 2 b) is opposed here to the negative (ver. 3 a).—But in lowliness of mind (or in humility) let each esteem others superior to themselves.—Ἀλλά marks strongly the opposition. The instrumental dative (τῇ ταπεινοφροσύνῃ) corresponds to κατὰ with the accusative. See WINER's Gram. p. 402, note 2. On the substantive see Eph. iv. 4; Col. ii. 18, 23; iii. 12. Ἀλλήλους ἡγούμενοι ὑπερέχοντας ἑαυτῶν teaches that humility fixes its eye on another's excellences, and judges him from this point of view. BENIGL: Jure et dotibus fieri id potest, non extreme tantum, sed per veram ταπεινοφροσύνην, cum quis per abnegationem oculis avertit a suis prerogativis et alterius dotes, quibus prior est, studiose contemplatur.

Ver. 4. Look not every one on his own things, but every one also on the things of others (μὴ τὰ ἑαυτῶν ἕκαστοι σκοποῦντες, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰ ἐτέρων ἕκαστοι).—The sentence presents a general principle. The unusual plural ἕκαστοι, which is emphatic in each number, but especially in the second, where it stands at the end, indicates that this should be true of every member of the church. Τὰ ἑαυτῶν, τὰ ἐτέρων, signify in general res, causa, as in ii. 21; 1 Cor. xiii. 5 (τὰ ἑαυτῶν); x. 24 (τὸ ἑαυτοῦ, τὸ τοῦ ἐτέρου), 33 (τὰ ἑμμεῶν, τὸ τῶν πολλῶν), τὰ being used, and not τὸ, in order to mark the multiplicity. It is also to be noticed that ἄλλος denotes aliū, nulla diversitatis nisi numeri ratione, ἑτέρος non tantum aliū, sed etiam diversum indicat (TITTMANN, Syn. I. p. 155 sq.). While in the above passages ζητεῖν is employed, we have here σκοποῦντες (iii. 17). Hence, according to the context, we are to think of the gifts and excellencies of others before our own, and of their advantage, interest, as well as our own. This distinction, however, comes out more clearly in view of what follows. Ἀλλὰ καὶ after μὴ limits or softens the antithesis. We are to think also of the things of others, hence not merely and exclusively of them. It is selfishness only that is forbidden. ["We are to look," says LIGHTFOOT, "beyond our own interest to that of others."—H.] See WINER's Gram. p. 498. It is incorrect to deny this distinction between ζητεῖν and σκοπεῖν so as either to find no reference to gifts and excellencies (MEYER), or to think exclusively of these (CALVIN).

Ver. 5. Let this mind be in you, or, according to the better text, have this mind in you (τοῦτο γὰρ φρονεῖτε ἐν ὑμῖν).—Paul confirms his exhortation to unity by showing what self-denying love and humility are, as illustrated in the example of Christ. Τοῦτο has as its correlative ὁ in the following clause, while ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ answers to ἐν ὑμῖν. Hence the meaning must be in animis vestris, but not intra vestrum cœtum (HÖLEMANN). [For the force of γὰρ see notes on the text.—H.]—Which was also in Christ Jesus (ὁ καὶ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ sc. ὁφρονήθη). Καί, also, i. e., as well as ἐν ὑμῖν.

Ver. 6. Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God.—Ὁς has for its antecedent Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, and points to His ante-mundane state, as vers. 7, 8, refer to His earthly existence, and vers. 9–11 refer to His subsequent glorified condition. The subject is the ego of the Lord, which is active in all the three modes of existence. It is the entire summary of the history of Jesus, including His ante-human state (MEYER). Hence neither the λόγος ἀσαρκος alone, nor the λόγος ἐσαρκος, is to be taken as the subject. The emphatic participial clause (ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων) connects itself with the principal clause (οὐχ ἄρπαγμόν ἡγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ), and the participle must be taken as imperfect, not as present (UMBREIT, Studien und Kritiken, 1828, p. 594). The finite verb ἡγήσατο, from its import, requires us to think of a resolution or decision to which what is stated in the participle stands related as concessive in accordance with the sense of the whole passage. (Comp. 2 Cor. viii. 9, ἐπτόχευσε πλοῖσις ὧν); hence neither causal (RHEINWALD et al.) nor merely temporal (MEYER). If now we regard strictly the connection and drift of the context, which is to bring before us Christ's example, as a testimony in behalf of that humble self-denial which promotes harmony, and against the ἐριθείαν and κενδοζησίαν which destroy it, the meaning of this difficult passage cannot be mistaken. The words in themselves are plain. Ὑπάρχων, stronger than ὢν, denotes Christ's pre-existence, ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ. According to Mark xvi. 12 (ἐφανερώθη ἐν ἑτέρᾳ μορφῇ), and in accordance with its use elsewhere, μορφή must be understood of the outward form, "species externa," and this as defined by θεοῦ, which must be understood as not of the person of God, the Father, but only of the Godhead,—is a divine morphe or form, that of a God. Comp. iii. 21; Rom. viii. 29: σύμμορφον. The μορφή θεοῦ here corresponds to μορφήν δούλου, ver. 7, as ἑπάρχων has its parallel in λαβὼν there. BENGE well observes: ipsa natura divina decorem habebat infinitum in se, etiam sine ulla creatura illum decorem intuentem. Comp. John v. 37: εἶδος αὐτοῦ (of God); xvii. 5: τῇ δόξῃ ἣ εἶχον παρά σοι; Col. i. 15: εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ; Hebr. i. 3: ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτήρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ. It is incorrect to regard it as equivalent to οὐσία, οὐσία (the Greeks, AUGUSTINE et al.), status (CALOV, et al.), and to hold that Jesus, when He was on earth, caused His δόξα to be recognized through the medium of His words and works (LUTHER, et al.), of His miracles (GROTIUS, et al.), and in the transfiguration (WETSTEIN). ["Though μορφή," says LIGHTFOOT, "is not the same as οὐσία or οὐσία, yet the possession of the μορφή involves participation in the οὐσία also; for μορφή implies not the external accidents, but the essential attributes. Similar to this, though not so decisive, are the expressions used elsewhere of the Divinity of the Son: εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ, 2 Cor. iv. 4; Col. i. 15; and χαρακτήρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως—τοῦ θεοῦ, Heb. i. 3. Similarly also is the term which St. John has adopted to express this truth—ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ." It may be added that the word is fitly chosen for the expression of the Apostle's idea. For though μορφή denotes properly the outline or shape of an object, and not directly the substance or nature of the object, it yet presupposes the existence of that nature or reality, of which it is the manifestation, just as the figure or shadow implies a body or substance which determines the figure or outline. Besides, to deny that Christ's μορφή or form as God, agreed with the reality, would oblige us to deny also in the next verse that His form or condition as a servant agreed with the reality, and this would destroy the force of the Apostle's reasoning. The condition in both cases presupposes the corresponding nature or reality, and is called μορφή precisely on account of that condition. The Apostle seems to have chosen this peculiar word because he would provide in his mode of speaking for the fact, that though the state or manifestation was changed, the nature or essence of the personality remained unchanged.—H.]—The expression οὐχ ἀρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο is more difficult. It denies a precedence of self, as is the case with those τὰ ἐαυτὸν σκοποῦντες (ver. 4). In its connection with ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων, and its position before ἐκένωσεν ἑαυτόν, it points to a decision in a negative form before the incarnation. Hence it is not the same as οὐχ ἤρπασε, which did not for a moment enter into the thoughts of Christ. Ἀρπαγμός may, like περραμὸς, βαπτισμὸς, signify the act of robbery; and it would properly denote this according to the rules of derivation (WINER'S Gram. p. 93); but usage allows it to be taken as res rapta or rapienda (BRUECKNER against MEYER); just as χρησμοί may be non vaticinatio sed vaticinium, χρησμοτισμός et negotiatio et id quod hac perpetratur, so here also ἀρπαγμός=ἀρπαγή (THOLUCK: Pfingstprogramm, 1847, pp. 17-19). Whether the meaning is res rapta or ra- pienda, the context must decide. Here now ἀρπαγμὸν is predicate in its relation to τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ as the object (WINER'S Gram. p. 323). On this construction καὶ ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν βιάζεται βασταὶ ἀρπάζουσιν αὐτήν in Matt. xi. 12 is very instructive. Ἀρπάζειν is not a heroic exproliare, but a violent appropriating to one's self, of which the object is τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ. This is therefore not "spolium," "præda," but "res rapienda." The emphasis falls here on εἶναι; ἰσα (not ἰσα—see WINER'S Gram. p. 177) is an adverbializing accusative (BENGEL), but different from ἰσως, since it denotes several relations of likeness, and from ἰσος, since it does not point to a likeness of person, as John v. 18 (ἴσον ἑαυτὸν ποιεῖν τῷ θεῷ), but to the equality of Christ's condition with that of God's. What is meant by this expression appears from vers. 10, 11: it is the κυριότης of the Lord, His worship in the church, in heaven, and upon earth. Hence the difference between ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων and τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ is that the former denotes the Lord's mode of existence, as a divine existence for Himself apart from the world and before it, the dignity of the Son, founded upon His eternal origin or generation from the Father, but the latter His existence as the King of His people in the realm of the Father, at His right hand. It is entirely like Eph. i. 20-23; John v. 22, 23; John xx. 28; Matt. xxviii. 18-20. Accordingly it must signify "rapiendum non duxit." For the former (μορφή θεοῦ) was His from eternity, while the latter (τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ) He had not as yet obtained. He was already enjoying the former before He had received the latter. It is not correct to regard the object of ἀρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο as identical with what is stated concessively in the participial clause (LUTHER, MEYER, et al.), or ἀρπαγμὸν as equivalent to "præda, res rapta" (AMBROSIIUS, et al.), "spolia" (ERASMUS, RHEINWALD, et al.), "holding tenaciously" (HÜLEMANN), "concealing" (MATTHIES), "a triumphant display" (LUTHER, et al.), nor are we to understand by εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ "plenitudinem et altitudinem dei" (BENGEL), "vitam vite dei æqualem" (VAN HENGEL), or "identity with the Father" (RILLIET). It is entirely fanciful to scent Gnostic allusions in ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ, ἰσα θεῷ εἶναι, ἀρπαγμός, as also in ἐαυτὸν ἐκένωσε and ἐν ομοίωσιν, σχήματι εἰρηθεῖς (ver. 7), and in ἐπουρανίῳ, ἐπιγίῳ, κατὰ χθονίῳ (ver. 10), (BAUR) as BRUECKNER shows (Ep. ad Phil. Paulo auctori vindicata, p. 15 ff.) in his exposé of the difference between the doctrine of the Gnostics and the present passage, and of the contradiction between BAUR's earlier and his later representation of this doctrine, and also ERNESTI (Studien und Kritiken, 1848, pp. 858-924; 1851, pp. 595-630), with admirable acuteness and learning. Yet the view advanced as a conjecture by UMBREIT (Studien und Kritiken, 1828, p. 595) and earnestly maintained by ERNESTI, that this passage is to be explained out of Gen. ii. 3, is unnecessary and untenable.

[The view of τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ (adopted above by DR. BRAUNE) as—"the κυριότης, or worship of Christ in the church, in heaven, and on earth" (vers. 10, 11) which He did not claim for Himself in His pre-existent state, makes the self-denial of Christ negative merely, not positive, as the Apostle's use of the example would seem to require. Moreover, if this equality with God which Christ forbore to arrogate to Himself before the incarnation be the same as the sovereignty which God conferred on Him after His humiliation and sufferings and death, as a reward for such self-devotement (see ver. 9 and Heb. xii. 2), we cannot regard such an equality as, properly speaking, subject to acceptance or rejection till the antecedent historical condition has been fulfilled.—We subjoin a summary of the views of some of the later writers in our own language on this important passage. The meaning which Bishop ELLICOTT prefers is: "He did not deem His equality to God a prize to be seized, but emptied Himself, etc.; in other words, He did not insist on His own eternal prerogatives, but, on the contrary, humbled Himself to the condition and sufferings of mortal man." See his Commentary on Philippians (in loc.) for the grounds of this interpretation.—Prof. LIGHTFOOT presents the philological details at some length. Instead of ἀρπαγμός, "the more usual form of the word is ἀρπαγμα, which properly signifies simply 'a piece of plunder,' but especially with such verbs as ἡγεῖσθαι, ποιεῖσθαι, νομίζειν, etc., is employed like ἔρμαιον, ἐτήρημα, to denote a highly-prized possession, an unexpected gain." He adduces examples of this usage from some of the later Greek writers. "It appears then from these writers that ἀρπαγμα ἡγεῖσθαι frequently signifies nothing more than 'to clutch greedily,' 'prize highly,' 'to set store by,' the idea of plunder or robbery having passed out of sight. The form ἀρπαγμός, however, presents a greater difficulty; for neither analogy nor usage is decisive as to its meaning: (1) The termination -μός indeed denotes primarily the process, so that ἀρπαγμός would be 'an act of plundering,' but as a matter of fact substantives in -μός are frequently used to describe a concrete thing, e. g. θεσμός, χρησμός, φραγμός, etc. (2) And again the particular word ἀρπαγμός occurs so rarely that usage cannot be considered decisive. Under these circumstances we may, in choosing between the two senses of ἀρπαγμός, fairly assign to it here the one which best suits the context. The meaning adopted above satisfies this condition: 'Though He pre-existed in the form of God, yet He did not look upon equality with God as a prize which must not slip from His grasp; but He emptied Himself, divested Himself, taking upon Him the form of a slave.' The idea is the same as in 2 Cor. viii. 9, δι' ἣν ὑμεῖς ἐπώχλευσεν πλούσιος ὢν. The other rendering (adopted by the A. V.), 'thought it not robbery to be equal with God,' disconnects this clause from its context.*—ALFORD translates: 'who being' (originally) 'in the form of God regarded not as self-enrichment His equality with God.' He observes (1) that ἀρπαγμός holds the emphatic place in the sentence; (2) that this fact casts τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ into the shade as secondary and as referring to the state indicated by ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων above; and (3) that ἀρπαγμός strictly means, as here given, the act of seizing or snatching—not from another, but for one's self. Dr. WORDSWORTH paraphrases the thought thus: "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, who subsisting from eternity in the form of God, did not think His own equality with God (τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ) was a spoil which He had usurped wrongfully, and of which He might justly be divested by another, or which on principles of justice He was Himself obliged to give up to another," etc. The following is Professor EADIE's paraphrase of the meaning: "The Apostle affirms that Jesus, in His pre-incarnate state, was 'in the form of God;' and adds, that He thought it not a seizure, or a thing to be snatched at, to be on a parity with God, but emptied Himself. Now, it seems to us very plain that the parity referred to is not parity in the abstract, or in anything not found in the paragraph, but parity in possession of this form of God. He was in the form of God, and did not think it a thing to be eagerly laid hold of to be equal with God, having or exhibiting this form. The apostle adds, ἀλλ' ἐαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν, but emptied Himself, and the clause is in broad and decided contrast with ἀρπαγμὸν οὐκ ἡγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἰσα τῷ θεῷ. That is to say, the one clause describes the result of the other. It was because He did not think it a seizure to be equal with God, that He emptied Himself. He did not look simply to His own things—the glories of the Godhead; but He looked to the things of others, and therefore descended to humanity and death. His heart was not so set upon this glory, that he would not appear at any time without it. There was something which he coveted more—something which He felt to be truly a ἀρπαγμός, and that was the redemption of a fallen world by His self-abasement and death. From His possession of this "mind," and in indescribable generosity He looked at the things of others, and descended with His splendor eclipsed—appeared not as a God in glory, but clothed in flesh; not in royal robes, but in the dress of a village youth; not as Deity in fire, but a man in tears; not in a palace, but in a manger. . . . And in this way He gave the church an example of that self-abnegation and kindness which the apostle has been inculcating, and which the Lord's career is adduced to illustrate and confirm" (Commentary on the Greek Text of the Epistle to the Philippians, pp. 108, 9).—For a list of monographs on this difficult text the reader may see MEYER'S "Briefe an die Philipper," etc., p. 63 (1859), and WIESINGER'S Commentary on Philippians (Eng. trans.), p. 61.—H.]

Ver. 7. But emptied or stripped himself, and took upon him the form of a servant (ἀλλ' ἐαυτὸν ἐκένωσε μορφῇ δοῦλου λαβὼν). The ἀλλὰ introduces the antithesis (not tamen, nilominus, quin potius). The first member corresponds to the second in ver. 6, and the second here to the first there; and at the same time unfolds further the antithesis to οὐκ ἀρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο. In opposition to the not thinking of an act stands something done: in opposition to the unwillingness to rob another stands a giving up on His part; and in opposition to the thing which He does not even wish to arrogate to Himself stands His own person which He surrenders. This last contrast appears in ἐαυτόν, which precedes with emphasis, in opposition to ἐαυτῷ τι, and hence not Himself in opposition to another (MEYER, et al.), as the relations in the case and the context show; since the equality with God (τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ) was not to be seized from men or angels, nor could God be deprived of it, but He, the Son, by His own might and will could seize upon it, although it would not be withheld from Him by the Father.—'Εκένωσε=κενὸν ἐποίησεν, exinavit, divested Himself, i. e., of that which He had, ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων, hence of the form of God, of the divine mode of existence. Since He has emptied Himself of this, as the word properly means, the μορφή is not something merely external, and since He has given up only the ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων, it cannot be an evacuare of the person, as if that now had in it no longer anything divine—no δόξα which remained to Him (John i. 14; Col. ii. 9); hence the nearer limitation by μορφήν δούλου λαβών, which is itself more closely defined. The antithesis is still μορφή θεοῦ, and δούλου is chosen, because according to the context (ἰσα θεῷ ver. 6, comp. vers. 10, 11) the κυριότης belongs to the θεότης. It is the becoming μιν, or the incarnation that is meant, as the sequel declares, and since λαβών (which is contemporaneous with ἐκένωσε as in Eph. i. 9, 13) must be taken as a modal limitation of the verb (ἐκένωσε), this emptying of Himself (κένωσις) is the Lord's incarnation. It is incorrect to deny here the becoming man, the act of incarnation, and to find only His position as a servant indicated (SCHENKEL), for in this case μορφήν δούλου λαβών must follow ἐν σχήματι εἰρηθείς ὡς ἄνθρωπος, and could not stand at the beginning; Observe too, that the δούλου is without the article, and hence it does not mean the servant of God, in the sense of the Messiah. The following also are incorrect interpretations: libenter duxit vitam inopem (GROTIUS), miseram sortem, qualis esse servorum solet (HÖLEMANN), semel ipse depressit (VAN HENGEL), veluti deposuit (CALOV), non magis ea usus est (CLERICUS), since the subject of discourse here is not anything within the human life of Christ, the laying aside of the δόξα, or abstaining from the full use of it.—And was made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man (ἐν ὁμοιωματι ἀνθρώπων γενόμενος καὶ σχήματι εἰρηθείς ὡς ἄνθρωπος). These two clauses plainly belong together. They serve more closely to define μορφήν δούλου λαβών. BENIGL: forma dicit aliquid absolutum, similitudo relationem ad alia ejusdem conditionis, habitus refertur ad aspectum et sensum. Δούλος is more exactly defined by ἀνθρώπων, ἄνθρωπος; ἐν ὁμοιωματι, ὡς, correspond to μορφήν and indicate the difference between the Lord in the form of a servant, as the son of man, and men. He is not indeed purus putus homo, but the incarnate Son of God. Γενόμενος denotes a becoming, the human individual development, and preserves the λαβών from being mistaken as a merely outward assumption. Hence ὁμοίωμα is to be understood of the inner and outer, the spiritual and bodily life, and ἐν points this out as the sphere of His development, and the dative σχήματι as the respect in which, or rule according to which. He is found as man. WINER'S Gram., p. 215. By σχῆμα (vultus, vestitus, victus, gestus, sermones et actiones). BENIGL, is denoted the outward manifestation which is indicated by εἰρηθείς (not equivalent to ὡν), was recognized by all who came into contact with Him. Comp. 1 John i. 1-3. On ὡς ἄνθρωπος THEODORET observes: ἡ γὰρ ἀναληφθεῖσα φύσις ἀληθῶς τοῦτο ἦν, αὐτὸς δὲ τοῦτο οὐκ ἦν, τοῦτο δὲ περίεκειτο. BENIGL: Vulgaris, ac si nil esset præterea, nec inter homines quidem excelleret; nil sibi sumit eximium. It is incorrect to regard ὁμοίωμα and σχῆμα as indistinguishable synonyms (HEINRICHS, et al.), or the latter as dignitas (GROTIUS), dress (ELSNER), γενόμενος as natus (RILLIET), ἀνθρώπων as a designation of the debile et abjectum (HÖLEMANN), of the infimæ et contemptæ sortis (WOLF), or of the first human pair, because He like them was peccati experts (GROTIUS).

Ver. 8. He humbled himself (ἐταπείνωσεν ἑαυτόν). The humiliation described by ἐκένωσε, which took place in His incarnation, because He thereby passed over from the divine into the human mode of existence, is now particularly noted. Here observe the asyndeton, the verb being also connected with ἀλλὰ, while the position of the verb before the pronoun renders it emphatic. The general description (ἐκένωσε) gives place to the particular one (ἐταπείνωσεν). Hence there is no climax here (MEYER), nor does the latter exceed the former (SCHENKEL), nor does it refer to any humiliation below the dignity of man (HÖLEMANN).—It is more closely defined by the following: And became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Hence it is inadmissible to find in the preceding participial clause (ver. 7) the nearer limitation of ἐταπείνωσεν (WIESINGER), since this cannot be separated from the participial clauses belonging to ἐκένωσε, while ἐταπείνωσεν receives now its limitation. It is not without reference to a μαθεῖν ὑπακοήν, His learning obedience or subjection (Heb. v. 8), that γενόμενος precedes. It is not stated to whom He became ἐπίηκοος, since the design was to mark the μορφή δούλου, form of a servant, according to its nature. If it were more exactly defined the object would be God (ver. 9; Rom. v. 19), not men (GROTIUS). The extent to which this obedience was carried appears in μέχρι θανάτου, unto death (Acts xxii. 4; Heb. xii. 4; Matt. xxvi. 38). Hence it is not a temporal limitation (VAN HENGEL), nor is it to be joined with ἐταπείνωσεν (BENIGL, et al.). Θανάτου δὲ σταῖρου, a construction like σοφίαν—σοφίαν δὲ οὐ τοῦ αἰῶνος τοῦτον in 1 Cor. ii. 6 (WINER'S Gram., p. 443). Δὲ often brings forward something new, a more precise statement as opposed to something to be denied or rejected. It is opposed here to the idea of a natural or common death. Death by crucifixion was a punishment for slaves, criminals, outcasts, and hence increased the degradation. Τούτῳσι τοῦ ἐπικαταράτου, τοῦ τοῖς ἀνόμοις ἀφωρισμένου (THEOPHYLACT). See Gal. iii. 13.

Ver. 9. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him (διὸ καὶ ὁ θεὸς αὐτὸν ἐπερίψωκε). This was a consequence and result (διὸ) of the self-renunciation and the self-abasement of the Son. To this act is joined (καὶ) that of the Father. On the expression see Heb. xiii. 12; Rom. i. 24; Acts x. 29; on the thought Heb. ii. 9, 10; xii. 2. The language here involves an idea of merit on the part of Christ and of recompense on the part of God. The verb marks the antithesis to ἐταπείνωσε μέχρι θανάτου σταῖρου, and the preposition in the verb (ἐπερίψωκε) indicates that it is an exaltation corresponding to the ὑπεράνω πάντων in Eph. iv. 10. The reference is to the resurrection and ascension, the end of which was His sitting down at the right hand of God (Matt. xxviii. 18; Mark xvi. 19; Acts vii. 55, 56; Eph. i. 20, 21; Col. iii. 1; Heb. viii. 1). The view of GROTIUS is incorrect: eum multo sublimiorem fecit, quam antea fuit, for the Saviour was not sublimis on earth (vers. 7, 8), and did not become sublimior than He was before the creation of the world (ver. 6), and besides ἐπερ will not bear that signification. BENGE: Exinanitionis premium justissimum est exaltatio (Luke xxiv. 26; John x. 17); neque ea non potuit illam consequi (John x. 15); quæcunque Patris sunt, filii sunt; ea non potuere ita Patris esse, ut non essent filii (John xvii. 5); Christum Christus exinanivit Christum deus exaltavit (1 Peter v. 6) eumque facit pariter deo.—And given him the name which is above every name. Kaî introduces the explanation of the ὑπερίψασις, by which was obtained the ἐλvai ἰσα τω θεῷ (ver. 6) which Christ would not seize for Himself. Ἐχαρίσατο αὐτῷ, denotat, quam accepta deo fuerit exinanitionis (BENGEL). Τὸ ὄνομα τὸ ὑπὲρ πάντων ὀνομα (WINER'S Gram., p. 140) designates the well-known name which transcends every name, which according to the context is received and borne in heaven and on earth, since it is the nomen cum re (BENGEL), which is everywhere manifest and recognized, and includes the adoration of the person of Christ in its divine dignity. It is thus not mere dignitas (GROTIUS), or the particular name of Jesus (MICHAELIS), or κύριος (VAN HENGEL).

Ver. 10. That in the name of Jesus every knee should bow.—Ἰνα points out the purpose of this exaltation, which reaches its fulfilment, not by a single step, but gradually. See 1 Cor. xv. 25, 26; Rom. xiv. 11; Is. xlv. 23. Ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι stands emphatically at the beginning, and marks the ground and occasion of the πάντων γόνυ κάμψις. The bending of the knee presents "plastically" (MEYER) the act of adoration. Eph. iii. 14; Rom. xi. 4; and comp. ἐπικαλεῖσθαι τὸ ὄνομα κυρίου (Acts vii. 59; ix. 14, 21; xxiii. 16; 1 Cor. i. 2; Rom. x. 12, 13; 2 Tim. ii. 22). It is therefore not merely adhibito nomine Jesu (VAN HENGEL), since indeed Ps. lxxiii. 5: ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι σου ἄνω τὰς χεῖράς μου, is said of prayer to God, nor is it merely a circumlocution for ἐν Ἰησοῦ (ESTIUS), or equivalent to εἰς τὸ ὄνομα, the glorification of His dignity (HEINRICH), or quoties auditur nomen (ERASMUS).—Of beings in heaven, and beings in earth, and beings under the earth—comprises the entire realm of worshipping creatures. Τὸν ἐπουρανίαν are the angels (Eph. i. 20, 21; Heb. i. 4, 6), τῶν ἐπιγείων, men upon the earth, τῶν καταχθονίων, the dead in Hades. The following are incorrect classifications: οἱ δίκαιοι, οἱ ζῶντες, οἱ ἀμαρτωλοὶ (CHRYSOSTOM); the dead, the living, the embryos (STOLZ); homines sortis nobilioris, mediocris et infimæ (TELLER). The words must not be taken as neuter (BEZA), nor is there in καταχθονίαν a reference either to the demons (the Greeks, ERASMUS), which Eph. vi. 12 forbids, or to the souls in purgatory (CATHOLICS).

Ver. 11. And that every tongue should confess (καὶ πάντα γλῶσσαι ἐξομολογήσεται).—To the outward, inarticulate expression καὶ adds still another, the eloquent homage breaking forth from the heart and confessing itself to Him. What the bending of the knee indicates, the tongue expresses (WIESINGER). In πάντα the three categories (ver. 10) are included as in πάν γόνυ. To refer it therefore to πάντα τὰ ἔθνη (THEODORET) is erroneous, as also to take it pro omni idiomate (BEZA).—That Jesus Christ is Lord.—Ὅτι introduces the contents of the confession. Ἰησοῦς Χριστός is the subject, and κύριος the predicate, and precedes in accordance with the scope of the context: the kingship is to be pointed out of which the realm is unlimited (Eph. i. 23; iv. 10; 1 Cor. xv. 25, 28). It is not to be limited to rational creatures (HÖLEMANN), or to the Church (RHEINWALD, SCHENKEL).—To the glory of God the Father (εἰς δόξαν θεοῦ πατρὸς) belongs properly to the verb, not to the predicate κύριος (BENGEL), from which it is separated by the subject. It presents the end, purpose, of this adoring confession. It is therefore not the same as in gloria (Vulg.) or even, θεῷ (VAN HENGEL, who takes ὅτι as causal), as if ἐξομολογεῖν meant laudibus celebrare. [Ἐν θεῷ πατρὶ the first term denotes a relation which God sustains to all His creatures; the second denotes one, which is peculiar to those who believe on His Son (comp. Gal. i. 1). On the universality of this confession see the last paragraph under DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.—H.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The motives urged in teaching and exhortation are first objective, based upon Christ and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit; and secondly, subjective, as dependent on the character of individuals. Both of these concur in the case of him who teaches and exhorts, and of those dependent on the instructions and exhortations. The objective motives occupy the first place, and to these we should always appeal first of all. Among them stands in the foremost rank the example of Christ, which vers. 5–11 bring into view especially. Among the subjective motives are love and compassion, important beyond comparison with others, for they answer to the objective which come from God, who is love, and to the character of sin, which is an evil, an injury, against which we must be preserved. All other motives are, as it were, crutches, which, as adapted to a sickly self-love, must be finally thrown away, e. g., regard for the judgment of others, fear of punishment, hope of reward. For with human nature as it is, one would not willingly do right, if, without doing so, he could be happy; and he would rather do wrong, if no harm should come to him from it.

2. The Apostle appeals to various motives for the maintenance of unanimity in the Church. But the unanimity which he seeks is moral rather than intellectual. It is not uniformity, but only the possession of a common centre, around which each one moves in a common love, which, however, may exhibit different degrees of strength and purity in different individuals, just as the centripetal force is capable of manifold gradations.

3. Among the bonds of this concord is humility, which in its two-fold intellectual and moral sphere, recognizes clearly both its own gifts and those which others possess, and does not allow one to esteem others less than himself, but prompts him with a sense of his own unworthiness to regard them more highly, because their unworthiness does not concern him. It is characteristic of humility that it has its centre outside of itself, and includes the great whole of which it is a member within itself; while pride makes the individual himself the centre, and not only breaks loose from the whole, but stands opposed to it, and so becomes the source of all discord and enmity.

4. Party spirit and vain glory are excluded. The former misuses its neighbor, the latter its own possessions and those of the world; the former presses others down in order to raise itself; the latter draws others to itself in order to please them. The one exalts itself at the expense of others; and the other at the expense of its own real worth; party spirit often brings into action great talents and energy; self contents itself with the mere appearance. However sharply the former may spy out the weaknesses of others and the advantages of particular relations, it is yet sure to destroy itself; or it may be happy in the present moment, while blinded to the evils which follow in its train.

5. The example of Christ is here presented to the Church with a fullness and completeness such as is found nowhere else. The whole life, not merely the sufferings of Christ (1 Pet. ii. 21-25), enforces the doctrine, that we ought to deny self in humble love towards our neighbor, and only in such a way desire to share in his glory. If Christ existing in the form of God (ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων, ver. 6), not seeking the things of Himself (τὰ ἑαυτοῦ σκοποῦν), but also those of others (τὰ ἑτέρων, ver. 4), resolved not to seize for Himself the sovereignty of a God over His creatures (ver. 6), but in love (ἐν ἀγάπῃ, ver. 2) and lowliness of mind (ταπεινοφροσύνη), ennobled and exalted those of mankind, made through Him in His image, and emptied Himself (ἐκένωσεν ἑαυτὸν) by becoming a man (ver. 7), obedient in all things, even unto the death of the cross; and God has now exalted Him as the object of worship (vers. 9-11); then we also have no other way open to us to the glory with Him, except through humble self-denying love in fellowship and unity with the brethren.

6. [NEANDER:—That we rightly understand the use made of the example of Christ, as the model after which the Christian life is formed, we must first endeavor to bring the model itself clearly and distinctly before our minds. Before the eye of the Apostle stands the image of THE WHOLE CHRIST, the Son of God, appearing in the flesh, manifesting Himself in human nature. From the human manifestation he rises to the Eternal Word (as John expresses it), that Word which was, before the appearance of the Son of God in time—yes, before the worlds were made; in whom before all time God beheld and imaged Himself; as Paul in the Epistle to the Colossians calls Him, in this view, the image of the invisible, i. e., the incomprehensible God. Then, after this upward glance of his spiritual eye, he descends again into the depths of the human life, in which the Eternal Word appears as man. He expresses this in the language of immediate perception, beholding the divine and the human as one; not in the form of abstract truth, attained by a mental analysis of the direct object of thought. Thus he contemplates the entrance of the Son of God into the form of humanity as a self-abasement, a self-renunciation, for the salvation of those whose low estate He stooped to share. He whose state of being was divine, who was exalted above all the wants and limitations of the finite and earthly existence, did not eagerly claim this equality with God which He possessed; but, on the contrary, He concealed and disowned it in human abasement, and in the form of human dependence. And as the whole human life of Christ proceeded from such an act of self-renunciation and self-abasement, so did His whole earthly life correspond to this one act even to His death; the consciousness on the one hand of divine dignity which it was in His power to claim, and on the other the concealment, the renunciation of this, in every form of humiliation and dependence belonging to the earthly life of man. The crowning point appears in His death—the ignominious and agonizing death of the cross. Paul then proceeds to show what Christ attained by such self-renunciation, thus carried to the utmost limit, by such submissive obedience in the form of a servant; the reward which He received in return, the dignity which was conferred upon Him. Here, too, is presented the universal law, laid down by Christ Himself, that whose humbles himself, and in proportion as he humbles himself, shall be exalted.—II.]

7. Concerning the person of Christ, the passage before us states the following truths: (a) His ego, His essential entity, is an antemundane person, who had a divine mode of existence (ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων). He is thus to be conceived of as existing within the being of God, as πρὸς τὸν θεόν (John i. 1), yet not merely as a thought, a principle, but as a person, λόγος ἄσαρκος. (b) Before the world was, before any creature existed, there was still wanting to Him who is ἰσὺς θεῶς, the τὸ εἶναι ἰσὺς θεῶς, a kingdom, and a people over which He might rule as the Anointed One at the right hand of the majesty of the Father. (c) He gave up His μορφὴν θεοῦ, the form of God, not His ego, not the possession of the glory, the κτῆσις of the δόξα. He assumed a servant's form (μορφὴν δούλου), not sin, in becoming man. With the incarnation His humiliation began, in which He exhibited obedience even to the death of the cross, the shameful death of a slave. Within the human life also, which began with the incarnation, there were degrees of exaltation or self-divestment from Bethlehem to Golgotha. (d) He humbled not His nature, but only His personal existence, Himself, by the assumption of human nature and by His entrance into the life of men, so as to subject Himself to ignominy and death. He thus humbled Himself not through the obedience, but in the obedience which He rendered to the Father's will, without sin, even in the most extreme trials that befell Him. (e) Such merit was followed by exaltation, which consisted in this, that He now became as κύριος, the object of worship for the whole realm of created spirits unto the praise of God the Father. (f) Into this position of exaltation the Father has placed the loved and loving Son. (g) In the worship of Jesus Christ the glory of the Father is constantly to be kept in view, as is the case in the public prayers and collects of the Evangelical Churches of the Reformation.

8. Our passage teaches nothing concerning the relation of the divine and the human nature, and of their attributes, to each other, of the relation of the two natures to the personal unity, or of the κτῆσις, or possession of the divine δόξα, or glory, to the χρῆσις, or use, of the same. Here we have opened to the efforts of Christological inquiry a wide and important domain which was measured and is measured or limited only by the fundamental conditions or outposts of Christianity, such as the hypostatic union, and based upon this the real communion of natures, which includes both the divine δόξα, as opposed to Ebionitism, Pelagianism, Socinianism, Rationalism, and the human development against Docetism and Romanism, and so the immutability as well as the self-limitation of the absolute God.

9. History of the interpretation of the text and of its doctrinal application. (a) The ancient Church almost throughout, before and after the Council of Nicæa, taught that the λόγος ἀσάρκος did not retain the divine δόξα for Himself, for His own advantage, while yet He did not cease, as λόγος ἐνσάρκος, to be what He was. His incarnation was not a yielding up of His divinity, but an assumption of humanity, which was taken up into His divinity. Only AMBROSIAS, PELAGIUS, NOVIATIAN, maintained opposite views. (b) The middle ages honored the divine nature at the expense of the human. THOMAS AQUINAS admitted only an outward development, in age and wisdom, with reference to men to whom He daily gave new proofs of it. (c) The Reformation harmonizes in general in the true confession of faith, yet the Lutherans, upon the fundamental principle, finitum capax esse infiniti, which the Reformed (Calvinists) denied, extended further the doctrine of the two natures and conditions of Christ. Thus LUTHER, led by his doctrine on the Lord's Supper, concludes from the form which Christ possesses, exalted at the right hand of God (which is conceived of, not as a place of abode, but as a mode of existence), that the humanity was taken up into the divine glory, and that from the incarnation onwards the condition of humiliation appears more as a veiling, self-limitation, that of exaltation as a complete, visible revelation of the divine life. So in the Formula Concordiæ, VIII., which, by "its very indefiniteness allows room for further examination," concerning which see FRANK, Theologie der F. C., III., pp. 165 ff. The controversy of the theologians of Giessen and Tübingen, since 1607, did not concern itself about the κτῆσις, the possession of the divine glory, which was undisputed, but only about the χρῆσις, the use of it. The former, MENZER and FEUERBORN, with the F. C., maintained a κένωσιν χρήσεως, the latter, HAFFENREFFER, THUMMIUS, NICOLAI, only a κρίνιν χρήσεως, in respect to which the Decisio Saxonica, 1624, places itself on the side of the Giessen theologians, without reaching any very important result. (d) The modern development of Christology began with regarding the Son of God, the pre-existent God-man, as bring in the perfect man (GOSCHEL), then attempted to conceive of the same as becoming the God-man (ROTHE, DORNER). THOMASIUS (Christi Person und Werk, II., §§ 40, 43), following HORMANN (Schriftbeweis II.), went farther, since he supposed a self-abdication of the real attributes of the divine nature, amounting to a συνκοπή of the divine life of the Logos, or a sleep-like unconsciousness, and thus both impaired the unio personalis and assumed an exclusion of the Son from the Trinity during the earthly life of Christ. GESS (Die Lehre von der Person Christi), and GEORG LUDW. HAHN (Theologie des N. T. 1.) suppose a self-abnegation also of the immortal attributes, while SCHENKEL (Die Christ. Dogmatik, II.) does not proceed beyond the mere human nature, and falls into Socinianism. Others again revive Apollinarism. Comp. DORNER, Entwicklungsgeschichte der Lehre von der Person Christi, II., pp. 1203 ff.

9. The correct standpoint even for our time which, in the effort to conceive of the human development of the Redeemer, is in danger of lowering His divine personality, is shown by CHERNITZ: Reliqua vero, quæ vel queri vel disputari possunt, et in verbo non habent expressam patefactionem, cum magni hujus profunditatem in hac vita exhaurire et pervidere non possumus, ita me differre et rejicere ad magnam illam celestem, æternam et illustrem scholam, ubi gloriam Christi salvatoris et fratris nostri ad faciem sicut est videbimus. Nec propter ea, quæ explicare non possum, ab illis, quæ expresso verbo patefacta sunt, discedere me debere. Hæc responsio, si videbitur rudior, simplicior et puerilior, non pugnabo, sed scio veram, certam, firmam et omnium tutissimam esse. It is important to hold fast the ethical and practical sense of the passage, and to deny neither the constant unchangeableness of the divinity of the Son in itself (John i. 1, 18; iii. 13), nor His real, loving, self-denying, and self-abasing entrance into fellowship with sinful humanity in life and in death (John i. 14; xvii. 5).

10. [The final and universal acknowledgment of Christ's sovereignty (ver. 10) is affirmed also in Rom. xiv. 11. All the hosts of heaven and the myriads of the human race who still live, or have lived, or shall live, are to "bend the knee" before Him who bears the "name which is above every name," who, as the Apostle John has said, wears "the title written on His vesture and His thigh, 'King of kings and Lord of lords'" (Rev. xix. 16). But this language is to be understood in harmony with the teachings of other passages. "Even the enemies of Christ," says Dr. THOLUCK, "who reject the gospel, acknowledge the reality of His power, if they are unable to resist the decisions of His justice, i. e., if at the end of the world they are excluded from all part in the blessings of His Kingdom; while those who have repented and submitted to His claims are received to the joys and the rewards of heaven. Both classes in this case yield to Him the homage of their submission. But according to a just distinction which some of the older writers have made, that of the one is obedientia ex animo, i. e., a voluntary, hearty obedience; that of the other, obedientia cum tremore, a subjection reluctant, extorted by fear." Viewed in this light, the passage in our Epistle is parallel entirely to that in 2 Thess. i. 7-10. (Disputatio Christologica de loc. Paul Phil. II. 2 ff.—H.)]

Motives (ver. 1), aim (vers. 2-4), and method

(vers. 5-11) of a Christian teacher, a spiritual father.—We must ever start from what we have in order to get forward and upward. First, fulfil thine own duty, which should be to thee a pleasure, not a burden, and then lay hold of the good that is in others, be it ever so little, or merely supposed to be there; yet assume it, use it without complaint or mistrust.—Truth is one, simple, and yet so infinitely rich that there can be unanimity and yet no monotony, like the harmony in a choir of many voices. Most controversies in the church have moved and still move around the germ of the truth, around the fundamental doctrine, but do not touch exactly the thing itself. They have reference only to the human confirmation of the truth, its mediation through conceptions, or mode of apprehension, and affect not the Christian character of the individual, provided only he abides in love.—Not, how art thou esteemed by thy neighbor, but, how dost thou serve him, is the main point.—He is great who humbles himself in obedience, but disobedience dishonors and degrades; the former recognises the higher will, and looks forward to the glorious end; the latter is concerned only with itself, and does not get beyond self.—Self-seeking is a deadly plague to the soul.—The example of Jesus Christ instructs, directs, leads, makes the way of the cross a path of light; He went no other way, and the Christian also, His disciple, may not go a different one.

STARKE:—If we would make people religious we must not use the wheel and the sword in the church, or fight them with the iron Bible, or preach fables; but build our exhortation upon Christ, the fellowship of the Spirit, the fellowship of God, for such arguments pierce through bone and marrow.—Love of honor in a preacher is a baneful poison, a prolific source of dissension in the church of God.—Self-seeking destroys country and people, churches and schools, cities and houses.—Who has knees to bend, let him bend them! Christ is the One most worthy of glory, the One whom we can never fully honor.

[ROBERT HALL:—Christianity was never intended to destroy the different stations and gradations of life; but it is intended to destroy that arrogance and superciliousness with which rank and splendor are too often borne. As it teaches the poor humility and submission, so it teaches the rich humanity, gentleness, and compassion. In this respect it merges all distinctions (ver. 3).—H.].

RIEGER:—He who exalts himself above others, thinks that others also must accommodate themselves to him, acts as if they must regard his rights and their maintenance as of the first importance. With respect to the self-abasement of Christ, the language always was: He humbled Himself in order to show His obedient, willing spirit; but with reference to His exaltation, the language is: God has raised Him up, placed Him at His right hand, etc., in order to distinguish Him as the Author and Finisher of our faith, the pioneer in the way of faith by which we must now come to God.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—Unity of mind among all Christians can be nothing else than unity in the knowledge that Christ is the Redeemer of the world, and in the disposition to recognize Him as such, and to accept Him as Leader in the way of salvation. 1) In what respects especially the Redeemer is our example. 2) How can we imitate this example?

HEUBNER:—It is characteristic of the Christian that he does not think highly of himself, but is disposed to regard others as more important, more deserving. He acknowledges gladly their excellencies and gives way to them. Such humility towards men, unaffected, and yielding the pre-eminence which pride arrogates to itself, flows from humility towards God.

[NEANDER:—One's judgment of another (see ver. 3) is not within the control of his own will. How can he esteem his brother higher than himself, if this is not in accordance with the truth, if he cannot but perceive in himself excellencies which are wanting in the other, and defects in the other from which he himself is free. Is humility to be grounded upon falsehood? Most certainly not. But there is here presupposed, as resulting from the development of the Christian life, a pervading temper of heart, of which such a judgment of one's self in comparison with others is but the necessary and natural expression. The Christian's love will lead him first of all to discern what is good in another: to discover even in his blemishes his peculiar gifts, that in which he is really superior to himself; while on the other hand, through a self-scrutiny, sharpened by the Spirit which quickens him, he detects with rigorous exactness his own faults. And this self-rigor, united with love, will give leniency to his judgment of whatever may obscure the divine life in others.—H.].

PASSAVANT:—Strife and vain glory are pests in hearts, houses, families, congregations, cities, the state, the church.

As the Epistle for Palm Sunday (vers. 5-11).

RAUTENBERG:—The Mediator crowned with praise and honor on account of His sufferings and death. 1) By the world before God; 2) by God before the world.

ZEISS:—Royal image of the Christian who consecrates his life to the Lord; 1) Humility of heart is his costly adornment; 2) the blessing of love his joyful delight; 3) pleasing God his exalted aim; and 4) harvesting of the seed his heavenly reward.

Love and Testimony:—What a Christian shares with his Lord Jesus: 1) the cross; 2) the glory. Conditions of the church of Christ; 1) its servitude; 2) its glory. The palms which we strew in the path of the Lord Jesus: 1) That we believe in the Crucified One; 2) that we trust in the Exalted One. The five-fold hosanna with which we prepare the way of the Lord Jesus: hosanna (1) of humility, (2) of patience, (3) of faith, (4) of prayer, and (5) of hope.

PROBLE:—The Epistle on Palm Sunday an earnest reminder of the entrance into the passion week. It reminds us, 1) of the cross and death of Christ; 2) of His innocence and holiness; 3) of His divine dignity; 4) of His complete subjection to God's will; 5) of the triumphant end of His sufferings.—The traits of a true imitation of Christ: 1) Humility; 2) Self-denial; 3) Obedience unto death.

God helps believers in their endeavors to imitate Christ.

(II. 12-18.)

12 Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, 13 but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and 14 trembling. For it is God who worketh in you both to will and to do of (or for) 15 his good pleasure. Do all things without murmurings and disputings [doubtings].
 16 That ye may be [become]¹ blameless and harmless [pure] (the) sons [children] of 17 God, without rebuke,² in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation [generation], 18 among whom ye shine [appear] as lights [luminaries]³ in the world, holding forth the word of life; that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, neither labored in vain. Yea, and if [But, if also] I be offered upon [in] the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy [rejoice], and I rejoice with you all. For the same cause (also) do ye [also] joy [rejoice], and rejoice with me.

² Ibid. ἁμώματα, found in N A B C et al., is better supported than ἀμώματα, but as the more common form in the N. T. might more readily displace the latter, than the reverse.

³ [Ibid. The Greek for luminaries (φωστῆρες), says Lightfoot, is used almost exclusively of the heavenly bodies. It occurs again in the N. T. only in Rev. xxi. 11, where also it should be so rendered.—H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 12. Wherefore, ὥστε, refers to what precedes, as in iv. 1. See WINER's Gram. p. 301. Ὑπακούετε is correlative with γενόμενος ἡγήκοος, and τῶν ἐαυτῶν σωτηρίαν corresponds to vers. 9-11. The exhortation borrows its coloring indeed from vers. 8-11, but, like the example of Christ adduced as an illustration, it reaches back to the entire course of thought (vers. 1-11), and hence does not attach itself merely to ver. 11 (SCHENKEL), to the last thing discussed (vers. 6-11, MEYER) or to i. 27 ff. (DE WETTE).—My beloved (ἀγαπητοί μου) shows the Apostle's joy and deep interest in them (ver. 2).—As ye have always obeyed (καθὼς πάντοτε ὑπακούσατε) singles out the act on the part of the Philippians, upon which he now builds his hope that his exhortation will not be in vain. Mihi ad salutem vos hortanti, ipsique deo (BENGEL). The context requires this explanation.—Not as in my presence only. Μή belongs to the following imperative (κατεργάζεσθε); for if the negative belonged to ὑπακούσατε, with which Luther wrongly connects it, οὐ would have been used. Ως, according to its use in a participial clause, points out a possible idea of the Philippians, that such compliance with Paul's admonition must be necessary only in his presence. See WINER's Gram. p. 617. Hence it is not a term of comparison (HÖLEMANN).—But now much more in my absence (ἀλλὰ νῦν πολλῶ μᾶλλον ἐν τῇ ἀπουσίᾳ μου) urges the stronger necessity for self-exertion, because they are left to themselves, without the assistance of the Apostle who is now far distant. Quia ego vobis non adesse possum, ipsi vos curateo magis (BENGEL).—Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. Μετὰ φόβον καὶ τρόμον refers (as in Eph. vi. 5) to that tender conscientiousness, that fear in the presence of the omnipresent God, which feels that no effort or solicitude can be too great. It does not refer to a servant's relation (BENGEL: servi esse debetis, exemplo Christi, ver. 8), nor to spiritual pride (RILLIET), nor to resignation to God's will (MATTHIES). τῶν ἐαυτῶν σωτηρίαν marks the salvation as that of the Philippians themselves (ἐαυτῶν not being here used for ἀλλήλων, FLATT, et al.), who in this case ought to regard the things of themselves (τὰ ἐαυτῶν σκοπεῖν) as the glorious end of the κατεργάζεσθε. Ὁν ἐαυτῶν see WINER's Gram., p. 150 sq. Κατεργάζεσθαι: means to bring to pass (perficere usque ad metam, BENGEL), for which energetic perseverance is requisite. The mode of this is indicated by ὑπακούσατε, as also by the example of Christ (ver. 8).

Ver. 13. For it is God who worketh in you (θεὸς γὰρ ἐστὶν ὁ ἐνεργῶν ἐν ὑμῖν). The Apostle strengthens his exhortation here by reminding them that if they disregard it they will not merely suffer personal loss, (τῶν ἐαυτῶν σωτηρίαν), but strive against another, the Highest, whose work and working they would disturb and bring to naught. It confirms the entire exhortation, though it designates only the τῶν ἐαυτῶν σωτηρίαν specially as their aim and labor. Thus it is neither a ground of encouragement (CHRYSOSTOM, MEYER, et al.), nor an incentive to humility (CALVIN, SCHENKEL, et al.); for it is not designed to confirm exclusively either κατεργάζεσθε or μετὰ φόβον καὶ τρόμον. Notwithstanding God's activity, which is shown by ἐστὶν ὁ ἐνεργῶν to be constant, and by ἐν ὑμῖν to be exerted in the hearts of individuals, every one should be careful both as to what he does or omits to do. Of God it is not said that He effectually works (κατεργάζεται) to will and to do, since He does not indeed accomplish this result in all; but He is only said ἐνεργεῖν, because where it is effected, it is not without His assistance; which of course to be effective (κατεργάζεσθαι) requires obedience on their part (ὑπακούειν). HÖLEMANN wrongly explains ἐν ὑμῖν as intra cœlum vestrum [and others 'among you.'—H.]. What God works is especially—Both to will and to do, καὶ τὸ θέλειν καὶ τὸ ἐνεργεῖν. The first is the self-determination, the second the personal exertion: both take place in the heart of the believer. The first originates, the second carries out in the life; both are conditions of the κατεργάζεσθαι.—Of or for his good pleasure ὑπὲρ τῆς εὐδοκίας is a nearer limitation of ἐνεργεῖν. God's working has its ground within Himself (His εὐδοκία), and is not occasioned or controlled by anything out of Himself, and in man. The article defines the disposition as well known. Comp. Rom. xv. 8: ὑπὲρ ἀληθείας θεοῦ. See WISER's Gram. p. 383. [The preposition ὑπὲρ does not represent the εὐδοκία as the mere ratio of the action, or the mere norma according to which it is done, but as the interested cause of it; the commodum of the εὐδοκία was that which the action was designed to subserve (ELLCOTT).—H.] On εὐδοκία see i. 15; Eph. i. 5. The meaning of ὑπὲρ cannot be κατά, secundum, nor can the εὐδοκία of the Philippians be meant (ERASMUS, et al.)

Ver. 14. Do all things without murmurings and doubtings. Πάντα is limited only by the context: all which is to be done in reference to salvation, for which God gives the willing and the working. [The verb (ποιεῖτε) here comprehends in its full compass suffering as well as doing. The patience with which the Christian endures the trials to which God may call him illustrates his character not less decisively than the habit of active obedience.—H.] Ποιεῖτε marks only the act, the nature and mode of which are determined by the disposition of the doer (χωρὶς γογγυσμῶν καὶ διαλογισμῶν). The preposition denotes, like ἀπεν (1 Pet. iv. 9) a separation, but the difference between them is, that the former represents the subject, the latter the object as distant. The Philippians ought to be distant, separated, from murmurings and doubtings: ἀπεν would indicate that these ought to be far from the Philippians (Eph. ii. 12); and see TITTMANN Syn., 1, pp. 93-97. The distinction between the two substantives is, that the first (γογγυσμοί) belongs to the unwilling, weak, and still stubborn spirit, the second (διαλογισμοί) to the doubtful spirit, which does not see its way clearly. The former proceeds from the will, the latter from the intellect. SCHENKEL refers the first to the defiant, the second to the timid heart. BENGEI supposes the ἀμεμπτοι in ver. 15 to refer back to γογγυσμοί, and ἀκέραιοι to διαλογισμῶν. We are not to understand by the latter term disputation, controversy (WIESLER, ERASMUS, et al.), contrary to the usage of the New Testament. This word is not to be limited, as e. g. to God only (MEYER, et al.), to superiors (ESTIUS, et al.), or fellow Christians (CALVIN, WIESLER, et al.). [As γογγυσμός is the moral, so διαλογισμός is the intellectual rebellion against God (LICKTEFOOT).—H.]

Ver. 15. That ye may become blameless and pure. ἵνα marks the end, γένησθε the way, which is a becoming, a process of development. Ἀμεμπτοι, unblamable, those (according to the Greek form) in whom there is nothing to blame (1 Thess. iii. 13), represents the moral integrity as manifesting itself outwardly; ἀκέραιοι (from κεράννυμι), unmixed (Rom. xvi. 19; Matt. x. 16), presents 'the same according to its inner character' (MEYER). The first is that from which we can judge of the second, for it is the condition of it; the inward answers to the outward.—Children of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation [not nation as in the A. V.—H.] Τέκνα θεοῦ sums up both predicates, such are they as Christians: but in Christ (Eph. i. 5; Gal. iv. 5) they should become ἄνθρωποι (without μῶμος, Eph. i. 4; v. 27; Col. i. 22, in quo non est, quod reprehendatur, or ἀνόμωτα (from μωάομαι, 2 Pet. iii. 14, qui reprehendi non potest), and this in spite of and in their actual circumstances. Μέσση (here as a preposition, see WISER's Gram., p. 471) γενεῆς σκολιῆς καὶ διεστραμμένης. Comp. Acts ii. 40; 1 Pet. ii. 18; Matt. xvii. 17; Luke ix. 41. Γενεῆ is used of status alicujus hominibus. The first adjective describes the outward, dishonest, perverted demeanor; the second the inward, distorted character. Manifestly there is an allusion here to a passage in the important chapter which serves as a basis of prophecy (Deut. xxxii. 5): ἡμάρτησαν οὐκ αὐτῷ τέκνα μωμητᾶ, γενεὰ σκολιὰ καὶ διεστραμμένη.—Among whom ye shine as luminaries in the world. [The active (φαίνεσθε) means to shine (see John i. 5; 2 Pet. i. 19; Rev. i. 16); but the middle means to appear, as in Matt. xviii. 27; 1 Pet. iv. 18 and James iv. 14. The A. V. does not always observe the distinction.—H.] Ἐν οἷς belongs ad sensum to γενεῆς (WISER's Gram., p. 141). The verb, φαίνεσθε, not φαίνετε, describes their becoming visible, being recognized as God's children. Hence it is not lucetis (BENGEL), still less is it the imperative (PELAGIUS, ERASMUS, et al.). [Christians were not to be, but now actually were, as luminaries in a dark, heathen world (ELLCOTT).—H.] The apostle calls to their mind what they are, in order that they may show themselves to be such. But ὡς φωστῆρες introduces a new figure, to designate the immoral character of the world: Christians are the stars, illuminators, ἐν κόσμῳ, in the world, which in itself is as dark as night. Hence ἐν κόσμῳ is not to be joined with φαίνεσθε (DE WETTE), nor is φαίνονται to be supplied (RILLIET, et al.); neither is it equivalent to "in the heavens" (RHEINWALD), nor is it dat. commodi, "for the world" (STORR). [This form (φωστῆρες) occurs elsewhere in the N. T. only in Rev. xxi. 11, where it has the same sense.—H.]

Ver. 16. Holding forth the word of life, presents the mode of the φαίνεσθε. Λόγον ζωῆς receives illustration from the connection which exists between life and light (John i. 4: ἡ ζωὴ ἦν τὸ φῶς): life is light, Christ is the life (John vi. 48; xiv. 6) and the light (John viii. 62; ix. 5; xii. 46), and indeed the source of them; His followers are also light, but it is a derived light (Matt. v. 14); the essence of the gospel is light (Eph. v. 8; Col. i. 12), and the life is in the word, and as the thought breaks forth in the word, so also the light and the life. Accordingly ἐπέχοντες is used and not merely ἔχοντες. The Christian holds forth the word of life, living it, living out what is living within him. Hence τῷ λόγῳ προσέχοντες (THEODORET) is incorrect, for we have not the dative (Acts iii. 5); and so also is "holding fast" (LUTHER).—The aim and result is: That I may rejoice in [or, more literally, for a rejoicing to me against] the day of Christ (εἰς καύχημα ἐμοὶ εἰς ἡμέραν Χριστοῦ). Comp. i. 10, 26. The cause of his rejoicing then will be: That I have not run in vain, neither labored in vain (ὅτι οὐκ εἰς κενὸν ἔδραμον οὐδὲ εἰς κενὸν ἐκοπίασα). The first expression, which recalls the contests of the stadium or race, denotes his zeal and the wide reach of his activity (not confined to one place); the second (derived from κοπιᾷ, toil) indicates the labor and effort which his ministry involves. The modifying οὐκ εἰς κενὸν follows: in vain, i. e. without fruit or result (2 Cor. vi. 1; Gal. ii. 2; 1 Thess. iii. 5), which thus occasions the repetition, and does not merely arise from his feeling of joy in the consciousness that such is the result (MEYER).

Ver. 17. But if also I be offered. Ἀλλὰ introduces an antithesis which εἰ shows to be conditional. What this antithesis is, καὶ before σπένδομαι shows. ["My labors have been severe, unintermitted. But not content with this I am willing (if that is reserved for me) to suffer a martyr's death."—H.] The meaning of σπένδομαι is: I am poured out as a drink-offering, presented as a libation, as in 2 Tim. iv. 6. Comp. Numb. xxviii. 7; xv. 4 sq. [The present tense represents the act as in progress. "If I am being poured out," etc.—H.] The libation-wine, set apart from its common use, serving as an expression of joy (Ps. civ. 15; Eccles. x. 19), as an image of quickening grace (Prov. ix. 2; Isaiah lv. 1), as a sweet savor (2 Cor. ii. 15; Rom. xv. 16), serves to represent the Apostle (separated from them by his δεσμοί), as giving up his personal and official ego, his life and his desires, pouring out in a martyr's death his blood as a sweet savor. The Apostle's death by the sword is here alluded to, the present marking it as impending (i. 20). Καὶ connects this death by martyrdom with ἔδραμον and ἐκοπίασα, his sufferings with his labors; the latter have not been fruitless, and the former also shall not be so.—Hence the following is added: Upon (in) the sacrifice and service of your faith. Ἐπὶ points to the circumstances of the σπένδεσθαι; this takes place in τῇ θυσίᾳ καὶ λειτουργίᾳ. Both are united under one article, and are hence conceived of as a unity. The second is the priestly service (Luke i. 23; Heb. viii. 6), hence the first is the act of offering, not victima (WIESINGER). The offering itself is designated by the genitive: τῆς πιστεὺς ὑμῶν, with respect to which the Apostle exercises his priestly functions, presenting it to God, while he himself is the accompanying drink-offering, since his blood is poured forth. As the former results in his glory, so now this results in his joy. [The Hebrews, in offering their sacrifices, poured out often a libation or drink-offering at the same time. See Ex. xxix. 40; Numb. xxviii. 7. The costume of the thought in this passage is evidently derived from that practice. The faith of the Philippians, according to the Apostle's allusion, is viewed as a sacrifice which they have brought to the altar for the purpose of presenting it to God. The Apostle himself with reference to his agency in their salvation, officiates as the priest who offers this sacrifice for them. The act of presenting it is styled here a λειτουργία, i. e., as the word imports, a sacerdotal service, or ministry (see Luke

i. 23; Heb. viii. 6). Paul declares now, in the ardor of his affection for the Philippians, that if it be necessary in order that he may discharge his priestly office more perfectly, or that the sacrifice of their faith may be more acceptable unto God, that his blood should be shed as a libation for them, he is willing to die in their behalf. He has in view the possibility of his martyrdom, and the effect which he hopes may result from that event, in strengthening their faith and preparing them for heaven.—H.] RILLIET's rendering of σπένδομαι, I am sprinkled, is incorrect, for it is the present tense; ἐπὶ has not the sense of "to" (WIESINGER), or super (VAN HENGEL), since θυσία is not victima. There is no antithesis here to i. 25 (DE WETTE), of which no reader would readily think, for what intervenes (i. 26—ii. 1 sq.) makes that connection at too remote places, or to i. 25, as if he had hoped to live to see the perfection of his readers, but now supposes the opposite (MEYER, WIESINGER, et al.), or as if he had thought at first that he should live to see the coming of the Lord (VAN HENGEL) which is not here in question. It should not be joined with the following χαίρω (BENGEL).—I rejoice, and rejoice with you all, χαίρω καὶ συγχαίρω πᾶσιν ὑμῖν. THEOPHYLACT: οὐχ ὥς ὁ ἀποθανόντων λιποῦμαι, ἀλλὰ καὶ χαίρω ὅτι σπονδὴ γίνονται. Paul rejoices in the prospect of a martyr's death; but not for himself merely; he rejoices with the Church also, which will thus experience and acknowledge the blessing of martyrdom. MEYER, contrary to the usus loquendi of the New Testament (Luke i. 58; xv. 6, 9; 1 Cor. xii. 26; xiii. 6, where it means in each case to rejoice with others) takes συγχαίρω as congratulator together with the Vulg., BENGEL, et al. [This is also LIGHTFOOT's interpretation.—H.]

Ver. 18. For the same cause (τὸ δ' αὐτό, governed by the verb) presents the cause of the joy to which in conclusion he earnestly exhorts them from his example. [Instead of being grieved that they should be such gainers at his expense, he would have them share his joy in being permitted to yield up his life with such gain to himself and such benefit to them.—H.]—Do ye also rejoice, and rejoice with me, καὶ ὑμεῖς χαίrete καὶ συγχαίrete μοι. These are imperatives, not indicatives (ERASMUS). The following explanations are wrong: gratulamini mihi, libato (BENGEL); subauditor carā with τὸ δ' αὐτό (BEZA); τὸ δ' αὐτό=ὡσαύτως (RHEINWALD, RILLIET, WIESINGER, who cites Matt. xxvii. 44). BENGEL: martyrū pręstantia.

1. A great blessing rests upon fellowship with Christians, whether they be mature or not (ver. 12), for it tends to the development of Christian character and life; but not merely upon fellowship with those who are present to the senses: the spiritual man ought to make his influence reach to the absent also. The more he does this the better.

2. In connection with faith which comes from the preaching of the divine word (Rom. x. 17: ἡ πίστις ἐξ ἀκοῆς, ἡ δὲ ἀκοή διὰ ῥήματος θεοῦ), obedience is demanded (ὑπακοή, ver. 12: ὑπηκούσατε).

This gives keenness to the tender conscience, which dreads to disregard or to seem to cast contempt upon God and His gifts (μετὰ φόβον καὶ τῶμον). Quamvis enim gratis in uno Christo per fidem apprehenso servemur, tamen per viam justitiæ ad salutem contendere nos oportet, cum filii dei ejus spiritu ducantur (BEZA), hence they must follow, because in His strength they are able to do it. We belong to God through Christ, and we should, by obedience to Him and to His word, prove this relationship.

3. Our salvation is as much God's work as our own. The beginning of a new life in the soul is entirely an act of God, which the Holy Spirit effects in our spirit, but not in our consciousness; yet in such a manner that we become conscious of it as an act of God. We do not create ourselves men; God creates us (HARLESS, Ethics, p. 229). He works in us constantly the willing and the doing. But we can resist Him, withdraw ourselves from Him. He does not work irresistibly, determinatively. But because He works thus in us, we may not remain idle, we must be fearful lest we lose this work of grace, fearful on account of our weakness, and the dangers in and around us, and must cherish and follow this willing and working effected by God.

4. [NEANDER:—Paul always represents the salvation of man as something which can be accomplished only through the grace of God as the work of God in man. But he adds (ver. 13) a more exact designation of the temper of heart with which Christians should work out their salvation, viz., “with fear and trembling.” This would not be appropriate if he were speaking of what lay merely in the hand of man, in which case all would depend upon his own strength. It is because Paul is conscious of the weakness and insufficiency of all human strength, because he presupposes that man can do nothing without God, and must constantly watch over himself, lest through his own fault he lose the aid of divine grace, without which all human efforts are in vain; it is for this reason that he designates this temper of mind as one of fear and trembling, as the feeling of personal accountability and helplessness, of insecurity and instability in ourselves, by which we may be ever admonished to continual watchfulness, and to ever-renewed waiting upon God as the fountain of all our strength. Hence, as the ground of such an admonition, he appeals to this consciousness that we can of ourselves do nothing, that it is God who alone bestows upon us the power to will and to perform what is needful to our salvation; that all, indeed, depends upon his sovereign will. This feeling of dependence, the ground-tone of the Christian life, is ever to be maintained. It is this which must combat the presumption of a vain human self-reliance, which, finding itself deceived in the result, so easily gives place to dejection and despair. (See vers. 12, 13.—H.).]

5. The goal is reached by a gradual process (ver. 15: ἡρπασθε). Renovatio non est talis mutatio, quæ uno momento statim omnibus suis partibus perficiatur ac absolvatur, sed habet sua initia, suos progressus, quibus in magna infirmitate perficitur. (GERHARD, loc. xii. 9, § 126). Fiunt in conversione inchoationes similes conceptioni, non tamen solum concipi, sed et nasci opus est; nihil tamen horum fit sine gratuita dei misericordia (AUGUSTINE).

6. Φόβος καὶ τῶμος may not be omitted, for in the renovatio just as full a view is given of the magna potentia Dei as of the magna infirmitas hominis. But γογγυσμός καὶ διαλογισμός must be absent, for the first springs from self-confidence, contentment with one's self, the second from mistrust towards God and His gifts as the source of power; the first excites a sullen will towards God, the second turns the confused spirit away from God, and ends in despair.

7. Every Christian has a mission in the world, to let his light shine round about him, and to be anxious that the darkness of the world, though it is around him, shall on this very account not be and remain in him.

8. The word of God must, as a word of life, manifest itself actively in the personal traits of the Christian, that there may be an eloquent sermon without word of mouth, in the still, noiseless walk and character.

9. As death is no loss to the Christian, still less is the martyr's death, which is rather a ground and cause of thankful joy for the Church and for the martyr himself.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The work of thy salvation is (1) God's work wrought upon thee and in thee; (2) the work of the Church, within which it takes place; (3) thine own work, since thou consentest to it.—God does not give thee the flower and the fruit of salvation, but the seed, the sunshine and the rain. He does not give houses, nor yet beams and squared stones, but trees, and rocks, and limestone, and says: Now build thyself a house. Regard not God's work within thee as an anchor to hold thy bark firmly to the shore, but as a sail which shall carry it to its port.—Fear thy depression and faint-heartedness, but take courage at thy humility before God. Consider God's gifts, thy employment of them, the final reckoning before Him. Ever become more and more what thou really art, a light in the world.—Even in sorrow and the deepest pain, overlook not the reasons for joy.

STARKE:—Behold the character of righteous children, scholars, and hearers, who in their parents and teachers really see God, and therefore are obedient, as well in their absence as in their presence, since they have the everywhere-present God before their eyes and in their hearts. Our Christianity does not lead one to hide himself in deserts and convents, and thus to remain blameless, but in the midst of the perverted, degenerate world to guard himself from sin. Such knighthood will God have from us.—When the joy of the children of this world ceases, then the joy of the faithful first really begins; and the ability to rejoice in extreme sufferings, even in death itself, is a proof of the truth and excellence of the Christian religion.

RIEGER:—We ought never to forget the danger of being lost, to which we are exposed so long as we live in a body of sin and death, and amid the temptations of the world; and therefore we ought not to regard ourselves as beyond fear and trembling.—God does not compel and overpower us by His working, like a block. Man can do nothing without God, and God will do nothing without man and his awakened will.—As surely as God does nothing against His honor, so surely will He do nothing against our salvation.—Doubting is opposed to faith, murmuring, to love. Even now, at the departure of favored children of God, the grace which has been made known in them sweetens perceptibly all sorrow over their loss, and prevents any wish to bring them back again.

GERLACH:—The believing Christian is awakened and moved by God's power. It is mighty in him. But he ought also to give himself up to it without reservation, neither opposing God's will by murmuring, a disposition directly contrary to it, nor concealing his disobedience behind doubts, subtleties, and questions.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—We ought to fear and tremble for ourselves as soon as we perceive the thought of future blessedness becoming dim in our souls, or the longing for it becoming languid in our hearts.—Every one who has such fear of that which may bring upon us adversity, every one who through this fear denies the Redeemer before men, should consider that it was the will of our dying Redeemer that His followers should take His cross upon them as their own. But we can take it upon us only in the faithful and unwearied service of truth and goodness, and of all that we recognize as the will of God.

MENKEN:—The willing is of God and the ability to do is of God; but the using, the action, the life in conformity with such divinely awakened willing and divinely bestowed ability, is ours, is dependent upon us, upon our faithfulness.—He who could think that God indeed works in him the willing but not the performing, or that to-day he gives the willing, but the performing not until after days and years, or even not until the future life, would in that error utter a falsehood concerning God, and would deny Him.—No disposition of heart in which love and faith are wanting accords with the spirit of truth and holiness.—So also no work is good and pleasing to God by which love and faith are injured.—There is something lovely and benevolent about a man who performs every good deed as freely, as joyfully, as kindly, as if it had not been a duty at all, as if no law had enjoined it, no fear compelled it, as if, instead of proving difficult, it had cost no self-denial and no effort, as if it had sprung forth with delight and joy from his very nature, from the rich treasure of his goodness and his love. How ungracious and unlovely on the other hand is every word, and work, and endurance, in which we detect compulsion, secret reluctance, and vexation, an inward, restrained murmuring, that says to us plainly enough: all this would not be done, were it not compelled.—The worth and the good conduct of the child of God should not be the pitiable product of favorable circumstances, not that miserable, godless virtue which is ever dependent on outward circumstances, and changes as often as they change.—The Holy Scriptures contain not an empty, unpractical theory, not a rule for those who dwell in heaven, but instruction for us who live in the midst of the world, who are on the field of battle, and whose life, on account of our own inward character and relation to the world, can be nothing else but a struggle, and who can attain to freedom and peace only through manifold victories.—It was in general characteristic of the Apostle to be moved, awakened, strengthened and exalted by nothing so quickly, so deeply, so powerfully, in the depths of his heart, as by a glance forward to the day of Christ (ver. 16).

HEUBNER:—With real Christians there should be no need of any Mentor, of any higher power whose presence alone could compel them to obedience; they should do the right, no matter whether any one sees or not. With many, doing right is but an eye-service, and with such the law itself is at bottom only one more bugbear.—Christianity does not enjoin anxious scrupulousness and gloomy self-mortification, but it forbids bold assurance and defiant self-confidence. This thought—it is possible for thee to lose thy salvation—can never be fearful enough to us. We should tremble at the idea—it is possible for thee to be cast off from God.—Man must strive as though he could do all, as though all depended on himself. Joy and love in obedience characterize the Christian as a child of God, as a son in distinction from a slave.—Christians should stand in contrast with their age, should constitute the élite, and serve as models for others around them.—The fickle sparkle at times; the truly pious burn evenly on.—The service of sin consumes also—but it destroys the best part of the man.

PASSAVANT:—Fear and trembling, before the face of the thrice Holy One; before an unholy world, which ensnares us on every side with the allurements of sin, so that we become partakers of its sins; before ourselves, before this heart which, consciously or unconsciously, joins so readily with Satan and the world in lust and malice, which conceals within itself so many a lust, so many a lie, and so many a power of evil—a manifold tinder of destruction.

MEYER:—Only blessed! is the inscription over every pious Christian's door, as it is over the pastor's study, over font, altar, pulpit, grave. Strive that thou mayest be blessed.—(1) Your salvation your care; (2) your salvation God's work. The defiant heart has heard the admonition to penitence, "work out!"—the timid heart the assurance, "it is God!"

IV. SECTION THIRD.

The conduct of the companions and assistants of the Apostle.

(CHAPTER II. 19-30.)

Timothy and his approaching mission to them.

(CHAP. II. 19-24.)

19 But I trust [hope]¹ in the Lord Jesus to send Timothy shortly unto you, that I 20 also may be of good comfort, when I know your state. For I have no man like-21 minded, who will naturally [sincerely] care for your state. For all seek their own,
22 not the things which are Jesus Christ's. But ye know the proof of him, that as a 23 son [child] with the [a] father, he hath served with me in [for] the gospel. Him therefore I hope to send presently [immediately]² so soon as I shall see³ how it 24 will go with me. But I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 19. BUT I hope (ἐλπίζω δέ) in spite of the martyrdom, (σπεινέσθαι, ver. 17) which he apprehends. He regards a favorable result as possible, but only because he hopes in the Lord Jesus (ἐν κυρίῳ Ἰησοῦ) who is the ground of his hope (1 Cor. xv. 19), so that he is confident of being able to dispense with Timothy, and to send him shortly to them (Τιμόθεον ταχέως πέμψαι ὑμῖν). This also took place, since the second epistle was written to him after this. Ταχέως is limited by ver. 23. The simple dative ὑμῖν is stronger than πρὸς ὑμᾶς, not merely equivalent (VAN HENGEL), for the latter is only local, while the former marks his longing for the Philippians—their attachment to each other.—That I also may be of good comfort, gives the purpose (ἵνα) of the mission; καὶ ὡς, found only here, refers to the effect of the letter in allaying the anxiety of the church concerning Paul, who also needed the same alleviation with respect to them (εὐψυχῶ, also found only here), for the church is exposed to many dangers (i. 27-30; iii. 1-21; iv. 2).—When I know your state. Γνωὶς indicates definite knowledge, the object of which is τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν. He needs and expects to receive through Timothy good news as well as certain information. He ascribes special importance to Timothy's communications, for not only had Epaphroditus been a long time away from Philippi (vers. 25-30), but he wished also to learn the effect of this present letter, and Timothy understood him perfectly, and was aware of all that concerned and interested the Apostle.

Ver. 20. For I have no man like-minded, οὐδένα γὰρ ἔχω ἰσόψυχον. [The comparison here is between Timothy and other persons, not between him and Paul; since the object of the remark clearly is to state why the Apostle sends Timothy rather than any one else.—H.]. This last reason alone he makes prominent, and hence unfolds it still further.—Who will sincerely care for your state. Ὅστις describes the character of Timothy: such a one as that, etc., and ἰσόψυχος (found only in this place in the New Testament), referring through ἔχω to the Apostle, is more closely defined in its mode of action, entirely like οἶλος ἴσος τῇ ψυχῇ μου (Deut. xiii. 6). Γνησίως marks the uprightness and purity, the freedom from false, self-seeking arts, by which he will show his solicitude for them (τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν μεριμνήσει) when he comes. The sympathy with which he will enter into their relations and circumstances (τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν, not τὰ ὑμῶν, 2 Cor. xii. 14), your estate, your possessions. [The verb is future with reference to the concern for them which Timothy would manifest on his arrival among them.—H.].

Ver. 21. For all (οἱ πάντες γάρ) answers to οὐδένα. The article merely denotes a limitation. Those only are referred to who, from their situation being in the Apostle's immediate circle at the time, would be compared with the like-minded (ἰσόψυχος) Timothy.—Seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's (τὰ ἑαυτῶν ζητοῦσαν, οὐ τὰ Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ), hence do not act sincerely (γνησίως). Comp. ver. 4. We are not to think of the hardships of the journey to which they preferred their own comfort (the Greeks), or that οἱ πάντες is equivalent to "many," "the most" (GROTIUS, et al.), or that they are Philippensibus cogniti (VAN HENGEL), or that the word 'more' is to be understood with ζητεῖν, (ERASMUS), although self-seeking has its gradations. No reference is made to those designated in i. 15, 17. It would not have occurred to Paul to send any of them. Those spoken of in i. 14, might be of the number. Of those mentioned in Col. iv. 10-14; Philem. ver. 24, Demas probably is the only one who was with him. This view seems to be confirmed by the fact that the Apostle cannot send Timothy away immediately (vers. 19, 23).

Ver. 22. But ye know the proof of him (τὴν δὲ δοκιμὴν αὐτοῦ γινώσκετε). Timothy was indeed known to the Philippians, and had been with them (Acts xvi. 1, 13; xvii. 14); hence the verb is indicative, not imperative (Vulg., cognoscite). On δοκιμὴν, indoles spectata, see Rom. v. 4; 2 Cor. ii. 9; ix. 13.—The proof consists in this: That as a child with a father, he hath served with me, ὅτι ὡς πατρί τέκνον σὺν ἐμοὶ ἐδοξέμεν. Instead of saying simply ἐμοί, he proceeds with σὺν ἐμοί in a variatio structuræ (WINER'S Gram., pp. 422, 577), in order to indicate that he is speaking of a service shared with himself, which is more nearly defined by the additional clause: for the gospel (εἰς εὐαγγέλιον), its advancement, (comp. i. 5).

Ver. 23. [By μὲν here Paul opposes his sending of Timothy to his own coming as he hopes (δέ, next verse).—Οὖν, therefore, since the Apostle would be thus relieved (εὐψυχῶ, ver. 19), and Timothy (τοῦτον) had such qualifications for the service. Both grounds of the inference should be recognized.—H]. What follows here defines more closely the ταχέως in ver. 19. [The "shortly," "speedily" there, is relative with reference to the result of the crisis of which he now speaks as near at hand.—H].—Him therefore I hope to send immediately, (τοῦτον μὲν σὺν ἐλπίδι πέμψω). Τοῦτον sums up the characteristics mentioned in vers. 20, 22.—So soon as I shall see how it will go with me, (ὡς ἂν ἰδῶ τὰ περὶ ἐμῆς). For the form ἰδῶ instead of ἰδῆς, see WINER'S Gram. p. 45. It is like ἀπελπίζοντες in Luke vi. 35. The verb, according to its signification, points to the distance (prospicere), to see forward to the issue; it indicates his tender anxiety to send Timothy as soon as possible. Ὡς, as, in point of time, and with ἂν, as soon as ever his relations change, or there is a definite prospect of the issue, one or the other of them will come.—Ἐξαντῆς sc. ὥρας (Acts x. 33; xi. 11; xxi. 32; xxiii. 30), emphatic limitation of πέμψω. [He would send Timothy at once on being able to make him the bearer of good tidings. As LIGHTFOOT remarks ὡς ἂν . . . ἐξαντῆς is—at once when.—H.]

Ver. 24. But I trust in the Lord (πέποιθα δὲ ἐν κυρίῳ). Δέ answers to μὲν in ver. 23. Although he hopes he will be able to send Timothy, yet he has confidence in the Lord (ii. 19): That I also myself shall come shortly (ὅτι καὶ αὐτὸς ταχέως ἐλεύσομαι); thus not merely Timothy, but he himself will come to them. Comp. i. 25, 26; Philem. ver. 22. [The Apostle expects not only to be set at liberty as Timothy will be sent to inform them, but to be able to use his own liberty for the purpose of coming to them.—H.] Here also there is an alternative, a presentiment of death and a hope of freedom, a wavering between martyrdom and a restored, free activity.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Friends should maintain fellowship with each other even when they are far apart in body. This is essential to the true welfare of each.
2. Letters and messengers are the means of communication, but in each case truth is our ultimate reliance as in personal intercourse, and this is found in its full extent only where there is a deep interest in the cause of Christ, and where selfishness does not reign.
3. Greater than the sorrow for weak and false brethren should be the joy over one true friend.
4. Even the apostolic church and the apostles had to suffer from the selfishness which hindered their complete prosperity: perfection is not reached at the beginning but only at the end.
5. Hope and confidence are to be based only upon the Lord, and are justifiable even in time of trouble, even when our hopes are not realized in the form that we expected, when indeed the future is shaped for us in exact opposition to our ideas.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Where love for the brethren is founded on faith in the Lord—the basis of true fellowship—there will a lively hope in Him as the Ruler of the world manifest itself, giving confidence that the course of events shall result in the welfare of the church and of the individual. We see this illustrated in the case of Paul imprisoned at Rome, who, though of a melancholy, choleric temperament, was always hopeful. Candor in judging persons and things is as great as it is rare. It is based on perfect purity. Even the subtlest selfishness pales before it. A teacher in the church, a minister of the word of Christ, has especially to guard himself from selfishness, both in its most refined and its noblest forms.—Hope in the Lord, and hope all that thy heart desires, if it find pleasure in the Lord, but reckon not upon thy heart or thy hope.

STARKE:—Not our own, not our humors, not our desires, but what is Christ's will, the advancement of His kingdom, must we seek as paramount in ourselves and in others, if we would be saved.—Since there is so many 'a slip between the cup and the lip,' we ought to speak cautiously of future events, saying: I hope so, if God will, etc. See James iv. 13 ff.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—All special love of one person for another, so far as it is truly brotherly, must be purely Christian.

MENKEN:—Such a man as Paul, in his holy, heavenly disposition, in the quiet, true greatness of his character, in the earnestness, purity and majesty of his life, his willing and his working, could not have many equals.

HEUBNER:—True friendship is rare; for a friendship such as makes two hearts one, requires not merely a similarity of certain general principles in duty and religion, but a similarity of inclinations, sentiments, and of essential principles. No one has more false friends than Jesus. Thus how rare, even among Christ's servants, is an entirely pure, unselfish mind! The coarsely selfish serve their belly, Mammon; the more refined their honor, their system, their school.

2. The return of Epaphroditus to them.

(CHAP. II. 25-30.)

25 Yet I supposed it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother, and companion in labor, and fellow-soldier, but your messenger, and he that ministered to 26 my wants. For he longed [was longing] after you all, and was full of heaviness 27 because (that) ye had heard that he had been sick. For indeed he was sick nigh unto death: but God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me also, lest 28 I should have sorrow upon sorrow.¹ I sent him therefore the more carefully [speedily], that, when ye see him again, ye may rejoice, and that I may be the less 29 sorrowful. Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladness; and hold such 30 in reputation [honor]: because for the [sake of his]² work (of Christ) he was nigh unto death, not regarding³ [hazarding] his life, to supply your lack of service toward me.

¹ Ver. 27. Ἐνὶ λύπῃ in A B C D E F, et al.; ἐνὶ λύπῃ in K has but slight support.

² Ver. 30. The manuscripts give ἔργον alone, or in connection with κυρίου (K A), Χριστοῦ (B), or θεοῦ, also with the article. Probably all the additions are glosses. [For the absolute use of τὸ ἔργον see Acts xv. 38. "The authorities being very evenly divided, neutralize each other. All alike are insertions to explain τὸ ἔργον" (LIGHTFOOT). ELLICOTT is inclined to retain τοῦ Χριστοῦ.—H.]

³ Ver. 30. Παραβουλευσάμενος in N A B D E F G, et al.; παραβουλεύσάμενος in C K L, and some other manuscripts. The first lectio is the more difficult. See the exegesis. [MEYER, ELLICOTT, ALFORD, WORDSWORTH, LIGHTFOOT adopt παραβουλεύσάμενος.—H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 25. Yet I supposed it necessary—ἀναγκαῖον δὲ ἡγήσασθαι. Δέ points to the sending of Timothy and the visit of Paul, which may indeed be near at hand, but still are uncertain, more especially Paul's visit. Ver. 26 states the reason for his supposing it necessary to send him.—Epaphroditus (Ἐπαφρόδιτος) is not mentioned elsewhere, and is not identical with Epaphras, (Col. i. 7; iv. 12; Philem. ver. 23). [Epaphras had his circuit of labor in Phrygia or Asia Minor (Col. iv. 12), while Epaphroditus, as we see here, had his circuit in northern Greece or Macedonia. The names, however, are not decisive, as they may be different forms of the same name.—H.] The name signifies "lovely," "charming," and was not uncommon (Tac. Ann. XV. 55; Seut. Domit. § 14). He was no unimportant person to Paul and the Philippians. The Apostle, it will be noticed, commends him very highly.—My brother, and companion in labor, and fellow-soldier (τὸν ἀδελφὸν καὶ συνεργὸν καὶ συστρατιῶτην μου).—The pronoun belongs to all three nouns. The first designates him as the partner of Paul's faith, the second as his partner in office or labor, the third as sharer of his conflicts and dangers; a climax proceeding from a more general to a more definite relationship. On συστρατιῶτης, see Philem. ver. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 3-5. On συνεργός see iv. 3; Col. iv. 11; 1 Cor. iii. 9. On ἀδελφός without ἐν κυρίῳ (i. 14) see i. 12; iii. 1, 13; iv. 1, 8, 23; Col. i. 1; Eph. vi. 23.—But your messenger, and he that ministered to my wants.—Ὑμῶν as emphatic precedes (opposed by δέ τοι μου), and belongs to both substantives (ἀπόστολον καὶ λειτουργὸν τῆς χρείας μου). The first designates him as the deputy or messenger of the Philippians, as in 2 Cor. viii. 23. It cannot mean here an Apostle (Vulg., ERASMUS, et al.). The second designates him as the servant of the Philippians, and his errand is more fully defined by τῆς χρείας μου, so that we have it stated by whom and for what purpose he was appointed. The word is general in its meaning, as in Rom. xiii. 6, where rulers are called λειτουργοί, while in ver. 4 δάκονος is used. So also λειτουργία in 2 Cor. ix. 12, λειτουργεῖν, Rom. xv. 27, have a general signification.—To send to you (πέμψαι πρὸς ὑμᾶς, not ὑμῖν, as in ver. 19).—The verb does not signify remittere (GROTIUS: simplex pro composito). The idea of sending back yields entirely to the idea of sending away.

Ver. 26. For he was longing after you all.—Ἐπειδὴ introduces the reason of his mission (comp. 1 Cor. i. 21, 22; xiv. 16; xv. 21).—Ἐπιποθῶν ἦν πάντας ὑμᾶς marks his constant longing for the whole church and its individual members. An intimate acquaintance with the church and close relation to it are presupposed. Though the Apostle would gladly retain him, yet he is induced to send him to Philippi, lest this longing which had seized him after his sickness, should bring on a relapse in his weakened state. The imperfect is used with reference to the time of their receiving the letter, and of the arrival of Epaphroditus; for at the time of writing he is still in the state of mind described. [Whether he suffered this sickness at Rome, or on his journey from Philippi to Rome, is uncertain. Perhaps the latter view agrees best with the probable interpretation of ver. 30.—H.]—And was full of heaviness, because ye had heard that he had been sick.—Καὶ adds still another reason. Ἀδμονῶν (from ἀ privativum and δῆμος, 'foreign,' 'wretched,' like the German "elend," without country, homeless, in distress, as in Matth. xxvi. 37; Mark xiv. 33, the reason of which is: διότι ἠκούσατε ὅτι ἡσθένησεν. How the Philippiahs had heard this, and whence Epaphroditus had received his information, is not known, and is in no way indicated.

Ver. 27. For indeed he was sick—καὶ γὰρ ἡσθένησεν.—[The καὶ, says LIGHTFOOT, implies that the previous ἡσθένησεν understates the case. —H.] This addition confirms the report of his sickness which they had received, and at the same time supplements it: nigh unto death (παραπλήσιον θανάτῳ). This is an adverbial limitation, but neither elliptical, so that ἀφίκετο is to be supplied (DE WETTE), nor a solecism (VAN HENGEL).—But God had mercy on him (ἀλλ' ὁ θεὸς ἤλεησεν αὐτόν).—His recovery is, in the estimation of the Apostle, first of all an act of grace towards Epaphroditus.—By way of supplement he then adds: And not on him only, but on me also—οὐκ αὐτὸν δὲ μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐμέ.—Δε introduces something explanatory, as in ver. 8, and often. See WINER'S Gram. p. 443.—Lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow.—ἵνα introduces the purpose of the ἤλεησεν: μὴ λύπην ἐπὶ λύπῃν σχῶ. The λύπη which still remains is his bonds, his imprisonment, and consequent suffering (i. 12-26); the other, which has been removed, is the distress occasioned by his companion's sickness and apprehended death. Si ad vincula accessisset jactura amici (GROTIUS).—The view that one sorrow (λύπη) springs from his sickness, the other from his death, is incorrect (CHRYSOSTOM, ERASMUS, et al.).

Ver. 28. I sent him therefore the more speedily, or earnestly, i. e., with the greater despatch (σπουδαιότερος οὖν ἐπεμψα αὐτόν).—The οὖν refers to the recovery of Epaphroditus, and to his intense longing after Philippi, which are the reasons for his speedy departure. With the comparative must be supplied: "than I should have done, had you not been disturbed by bearing of his sickness" (WINER'S Gram. p. 243). Comp. i. 12.—The Apostle's purpose is: That, when ye see him again, ye may rejoice (ἵνα ἰδόντες αὐτόν πάλιν χαρήτε).—Paul wishes the Philippiahs to rejoice anew, since their anxiety on account of the illness of Epaphroditus was removed. Πάλιν belongs to χαρήτε, since as a rule it stands either before or immediately after the word to which it belongs. See GERSDORF, Beiträge, p. 491 sq. It should not be joined with ιδόντες, especially as he was not sent that the Philippiahs might see him again.—The joy of the Philippiahs will react upon the Apostle: And that I may be the less sorrowful (κατὰ ἄλγος ὀλίγος ὦ).—"There is a delicate blending here of his own interest and sympathy with that of the beloved Philippiahs" (MEYER); quum sciam, vos gaudere (BENGEL). While he is in bonds he cannot be ἄλγος, but yet he is less sorrowful (ὀλίγος), since the sorrow (λύπη) with regard to the anxiety and condition of the Philippiahs is removed.

Ver. 29. Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladness.—The προσδέχεσθε, emphatic by position, requires a reception of Epaphroditus (αὐτόν), which shall most fully correspond (οὖν) with Paul's purpose in sending him

(ver. 28, ἵνα—χαρήτε), and one which shall be worthy of a Christian church (ἐν κυρίῳ, and comp. ἐν κυρίῳ ἀξίως τῶν ἁγίων, Rom. xvi. 2); for it should be with all joy (μετὰ πάσης χαρᾶς), without any admixture of chagrin or discontent on account of the sickness of Epaphroditus, or of his coming too soon or too late.—And hold such in honor (καὶ τοιοῦτος ἐντίμος ἔχετε). THEOPHYLACT remarks very justly: ἵνα μὴ δόξῃ αὐτῷ μόνω χαρίζεσθαι, κοινὸς παραίει πάντας τοὺς τὴν αὐτὴν ἀρετὴν ἐπιδεικνυμένους τιμᾶν. Yet he has Epaphroditus in view as the individual of the class referred to (MEYER). Hence the suspicion that the Philippiahs were inclined to undervalue others (WESINGER, with reference to ii. 3) has no support here.

Ver. 30. Because for the sake of his work he was nigh unto death—goes back at once to the person intended. The reception and honor required for Epaphroditus, are based upon (ὅτι) his work (διὰ τὸ ἔργον); for this and nothing else brought upon him the severe illness (μέχρι θανάτου ἤγγισεν; and ver. 27, ἡσθένησεν παραπλήσιον θανάτῳ). Under τὸ ἔργον we are to understand, according to the context (ver. 25: ἵμῶν ἀπόστολον καὶ λειτουργὸν τῆς χρείας μου; and ver. 30: τὸ πρός με λειτουργίας), the commission assigned to him by the church as the bearer of their gifts to the Apostle, and his zeal in the performance of that service. Hence it is not his activity in teaching, opus a Christo ei demandatum (VAN HENGEL); or labor for the gospel (SCHENKEL); or the enmity of Nero (the Greek interpreters), both of which are opposed to the context, since ver. 25 designates Epaphroditus as Paul's συνεργός and συστρατιῶτης on account of his office and conduct in general, not especially in Rome, while the latter view contradicts also the history (Acts xxviii. 30, 31). Whether we are to limit his work to his sojourn at Rome (MEYER) may be doubted. Why may it not include his journey also, which certainly was an arduous one?—Hazarding, or staking his life (παραβουλευσάμενος τὴ ψυχὴν) states the way in which he came so near losing his life. This verb occurs as seldom elsewhere as the other reading (παραβουλευσάμενος); yet that (παραβουλευσέσθαι) has a less familiar sound than παραβουλεύεσθαι, and has also better witnesses, and a sense that offers itself less readily. Παραβουλεύεσθαι is παράβολον εἶναι, "to be a fool-hardy" or "reckless person," as περπερεύεσθαι is πέρπερον εἶναι, "to be a boaster, braggadocio" (1 Cor. xiii. 4). See WINER'S Gram. p. 93. Τῇ ψυχῇ is dative of the respect in which (WINER'S Gram. p. 215). It is his life, not money, property, time, which he put at hazard, or (to keep nearer to the word) squandered. We see in this prodigality the measure of his zeal. Whether the season of the year, his haste, means of travel by land and water, were concerned in the case, is not indicated, is simply unknown. Παραβουλευσάμενος would mean male consulens vitæ (LUTHER), since he regarded his life so lightly. TISCHENDORF, (ed. VII. maj. II. p. 473) compares CÆSAR (Bell. Gal.): adeo esse perterritos nonnullos, ut suæ vitæ duritiæ consulere cogantur, and the verbs παραφρονεῖν, παράλογίζεσθαι, and finds this rendering the more suitable, because there is then only temeritas, not guilt, in a holy work. Yet we are the less to assume the reproach of a censurable temeritas in παράβολένεισθαι, from the fact that the watchers by the sick* in the ancient church were named parabolani (from παράβλλεσθαι, whence παράβολος and then παράβολένεισθαι, are derived); yet certainly the name implied no reproach, but was meant solely to recognize their fearless courage. The conclusion states the object of the participial clause.—To supply your lack of service toward me. ἵνα introduces the motive for such exposure (παράβολένεισάμενος τῇ ψυχῇ) which is that he might fill up, (ἀναπληρώσῃ), etc. Parallel to this is 1 Cor. xvi. 17: ὅτι τοῦ ὑμῶν ἐστέρημα αὐτοὶ ἀνεπλήρωσαν. Comp. 2 Cor. xi. 9; Philem. 13; also Col. i. 24: ἀναναπληρῶ τὰ ὑστερήματα τῶν θλίψεων τοῦ Χριστοῦ. The verb denotes not merely filling, but filling usque ad oram, and being emphatic by position, gives prominence to the act. The object is τὸ ὑμῶν ἐστέρημα, which differs from τὸ ὑμῶν ἐστέρημα, by bringing to view the lack of personal ministrations as defined by the genitive (τῆς πρὸς μελετουργίας). The service (λειτουργία) according to the expression itself, and the context, is the pecuniary relief or supplies which the Philippians could not bring and present in person, but were obliged to remit through Epaphroditus. Luther: "in order that he may serve me in your stead." The apostle finely and delicately views the absence of the Philippians as a deficiency in that service, and bespeaks their grateful sympathy in the affliction of their delegate who had performed his mission with equal courage and skill (MEYER). [In designating the absence of the Philippians in the presentation of their gift as something which was wanting to make it complete, he expresses no censure, but shows merely his affection for those of whose personal intercourse he found it so painful to be deprived, (SCHENKEL).—H.] Hence it is incorrect to join ὑμῶν with λειτουργίας, to understand this last word in general of every service (RILLIET: les services, dont j'avais besoin) in disregard of the limitation furnished by the context, or even as res necessarie, and τὸ ὑμῶν ἐστέρημα as defectus qui subvenitis (HÖLEMANN.)

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The best men and Christians often show a union of opposite virtues; for example, Epaphroditus. The finest delicacy of soul, which if alone might seem excessive and effeminate, allies itself to a manly courage, which sets at naught life itself. The deepest love of the church does not exclude a most faithful attachment to its great Apostle, nor anxiety for the present moment forbid sympathy for a distant community. One may reverence and acknowledge superior men, and yet give all the glory to God alone; may be anxious for his own soul, and yet give himself to the welfare of the church, and the common service of its membership.

2. God looks not upon the individual merely in his sorrow. Every instance of God's help is an act of His compassion for the sake of others, as well as of the sufferer; because we are members together, and have joy whenever God causes any one member to rejoice.

3. [REV. J. TRAPP:—Epaphroditus was sick nigh unto death, and Paul distressed on that account. This should not have been if St. Paul could have cured him, as he did others. This shows that the Apostles cured the sick, and did miracles, not by their own power, or at their own pleasure, etc.—H.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

All that thou doest with respect to others regard as a duty which the Lord Himself demands of thee. By the faithful performance of duty, rightly apprehended, thou dost promote the welfare of those with whom God has placed thee.—Above all be a brother to thy neighbor, and thou wilt be his helper not in joys and labors alone, but also in suffering and victorious endurance. Observe how clear a vision true Christian love has in all our relations, even the most difficult, and how strong it is even in the most trying times. The thread which we are to grasp, to hold firm, never escapes its sight; nor does strength to do what is right, and what is salutary, and beautiful, and lovely at the same time, fail its arm. Whether God's hand smites thee or preserves thee, still feel the pity of the Father's heart which stretches out the arm and lifts the hand.

STARKE:—Neither nature nor grace produces stoics, unsusceptible men; but the susceptibility of friendship, which already exists between kinsmen and friends, is sanctified and perfected by grace.—Unbelief looks to nature and medicine as the only remedies in sickness; faith looks to the providence of God also, by virtue of which He comes to the aid of man's nature, as well as of medicine and care, with a special influence and blessing.—When believers look upon one another, they see also the inner, renewed nature, through the covering of the outer man; and because a tender love exists between them, the sight of each other refreshes, quickens them.

RIEGER:—We must not expect grace to lift us above all alternations of feeling into a state of entire tranquility.—It is a mistake to suppose that one must be equally well equipped at all times. Even in the holy soul of our blessed Saviour there were changes of feeling.

SCHLIERMACHER:—At the bottom of all love between individuals there must be love for the entire body to which they belong as living members; on the other hand, this love for the whole body is the consequence of affection for the individuals.

MENKEN:—One might think that this tenderness of feeling on the part of Epaphroditus went almost too far; on the contrary, we are to notice also here that one possessed of such extreme sensibility may yet be a strong man, and that a very tender heart may nevertheless be a very firm heart. It was not a trifling act for a Christian, one of a sect everywhere spoken against, everywhere hated and oppressed, which found no protection under Jewish or Gentile rule, to travel from Philippi to Rome in order to carry aid to a Christian teacher, an Apostle, yea, the hated and now imprisoned Paul, over whose approaching death his enemies were already rejoicing, and take his stand publicly before the world, by the side of this man, and say, "I am his friend."—They knew that by faith and prayer one can move heaven and earth, but they did not regard faith and prayer as amulets, or talismans, that are able to expel all darkness and distress from a Christian's life, and to raise him above all humble waiting on God's help, above all subjection of his own will to God's will.

* [The most natural supposition is that Epaphroditus brought upon himself this sickness, which was so nearly fatal, in consequence of some special exposure on the journey, or of the fatigue incident to travelling with such despatch, in his impatience to reach the Apostle. It does not comport so well with our ideas of Paul's character to ascribe it to his "anxious attendance on the Apostle at Rome" (ELLIOTT). Paul did not exact, hardly was willing even to accept, such self-denying services from others. For exemplifications of Paul's delicate regard for the safety, health and comfort of others, the reader may see Dr. Howson's Lectures on the Character of St. Paul, pp. 78-83 (London, 1864).—H.]

HEUBNER:—Life, especially the life of a faithful servant of Christ, possesses great value. For such a life we ought to pray; and it is an act of God's grace when it is preserved to the church.

PASSAVANT:—If one were separated ever so completely from all other men, still he is a warrior and combatant, since in his own heart are the worst enemies of his heavenly peace.

V. SECTION FOURTH.

Warning against Judaistic teachers and wicked deceivers.

CHAPTER III. 1—IV. 1.

1. The disposition of these teachers in contrast with that of the Apostle.

(CHAP. III. 1–16).

(1) The Apostle warns his readers against the disposition of these false teachers, especially their pride (2-7); points out plainly the opposition between righteousness which is of the law and that which is of faith (8-11); declares with humility that he is yet striving after perfection (12-14), and concludes by exhorting them to unity (15, 16).

1 Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. To write the same things to you, to 2 me indeed is not grievous, [irksome] but for you it is safe. Beware of [the] dogs, be-
3 ware of [the] evil workers, beware of the concision. For we are the circumci-
4 sion, who worship (God) in the Spirit [of God¹] and rejoice [glory] in Christ
5 Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh. Though I might [can] have 6 confidence (also) in the flesh. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he 7 might trust in the flesh, I more: circumcised² the eighth day, of the stock of Israel,
8 of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews; as touching the law, a Pha-9 risee: concerning zeal,³ persecuting the church; touching the righteousness which 10 is in the law, blameless. But what things were gain to me, those I [have] counted 11 loss for Christ. Yea, doubtless, and I count all things (but) loss for the ex-12 cellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the 13 loss of all things, and do count them (but) dung [refuse] that I may win 14 Christ, and be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the 15 law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of 16 God by [upon] faith; that I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, 17 and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable⁴ [being conformed]
18 unto his death: if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead.⁵
19 Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow
20 after, that I may apprehend [lay hold upon] that for which also I am apprehended 21 [was laid hold upon] of [by] Christ Jesus. Brethren, I count not myself to have 22 apprehended⁶ [to have laid hold upon] but (this) one thing: (I do,) forgetting 23 those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are be-24 fore, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Je-25 sus. Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded: and if in anything 26 ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you. Nevertheless, 27 whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule,⁷ let us mind the 28 same thing [in the same let us walk].

⁷ Ver. 16. Στοιχεῖν, for which συνοστοχεῖν also occurs, has after it καὶ τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, in \aleph C, but in some other copies has the words before it, while in others again the words appear only in part. No doubt ii. 2, and Gal. vi. 16, have led the copyists to change the text for the sake of uniformity.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Finally (τὸ λοιπὸν) as formula progre-dienti begins (BENGEL) as in iv. 8; Eph. vi. 10; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; 1 Thess. iv. 1; 2 Thess. iii. 1), a section usually near the end. Hence in the glow of feeling the Apostle always adds "my brethren" (ἀδελφοί μου or ἀδελφοί). It does not conclude what immediately precedes (SCHENKEL), nor does it so necessarily indicate the end, that ver. 2 follows as a digression (MEYER).—Rejoice in the Lord (χαίρετε ἐν κυρίῳ). This is of the first importance, and corresponds with the ground-tone of the letter (see Intro. §§ 1, 2, p. 4; and comp. iv. 4; ii. 17, 18, 28; i. 18, 25). Their joy should have its origin and element in Christ (Rom. xiv. 17; 1 Thess. i. 6). That the emphasis falls upon this expression is shown by the final exhortation (iv. 1) στήκετε ἐν κυρίῳ (iv. 2), which lies at the foundation of that given here, and appropriately follows the warning against the false teachers who would separate them from the Lord.—To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not irksome but for you it is safe (τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν ὑμῖν, ἐμοὶ μὲν οὐκ ὀκνηρὸν, ὑμῖν δὲ ἀσφαλές). We infer from ὀκνηρὸν (from ὀκνος 'sluggishness,' 'delay,' like ποντικός, qui alitis πόνους facit), which in Matt. xxv. 26; Rom. xii. 11, signifies 'slothful,' that an unpleasant task is meant, and that may consist in a formal repetition of his words. Ἀσφαλές (from σφάλω, labo, vacillare facio), properly "firm, secure," (Heb. vi. 19; Acts xxi. 34; xxii. 30; xxv. 26), or 'adapted to secure,' 'make safe,' presupposes warnings against imminent dangers. It is clear that Paul, 'who writes the same things' (τὰ αὐτὰ γράφει), only for the sake of the Philippians, would prefer not to be compelled to do so; it is, therefore, no feeling or confession of poverty of thought (BAUR). It is also evident that τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν does not refer to consolation, exhortation, which would not be to him burdensome (ὀκνηρὸν). Hence it is not the preceding exhortation to rejoice that is meant (BENGEL, WIESINGER, and others). Both adjectives lead us to think of the warning as directed against false teachers in Philippi. But in this letter Paul as yet has written nothing about these teachers, since those mentioned in i. 15, 17 sq. are in Rome and may be endured, whereas those here are of the most dangerous character. It is most natural to think of another letter of Paul's to Philippi, especially as POLYCARP says of Paul (Phil. iii.): ἀπὸν ὑμῖν ἔγραψεν ἐπιστολάς, εἰς ἃς ἔαν ἐγκύπτῃτε δυνήσεσθε οἰκοδομείσθαι. He also says in another passage (Phil. ii.), preserved only in a Latin translation: Ego autem nil tale sensi in vobis vel audivi, in quibus laboravit beatus Paulus, qui estis in principio epistolæ ejus, de vobis enim gloriatur in omnibus ecclesiis. The meaning of this is not: "Ye are in the beginning of his letter," but according to 2 Cor. iii. 1-3: "Ye are from the beginning, in the beginning, his letters, letters of recommendation." Why may not an epistle to the Philippians have been lost, as well as that to the Laodiceans (Col. iv. 16), and one to the Corinthians (BLEEK, Studien und Kritiken, 1830, p. 625; Winer's Realw.; p. 673)? The view that que præsens dixeram should be supplied (PELAGIUS, ERASMUS, and others) is untenable; for he does not say καὶ γράφειν, nor can we suppose, with HEINRICH and PAULUS, that from τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν to iv. 20, we have an esoteric letter to his more intimate friends, while the remainder is an exoteric letter to the church. This is an arbitrary notion, and does not help us at all to explain the language; "it is a manifest historical and psychological misconception," says MEYER, "if we only think of Paul's relations to the Philippians." [Paul had been at Philippi twice after his founding of the church there (Acts xx. 1, 2) where this city must have been among "those parts" mentioned in that passage, and again on his return to Macedonia after the three months in Greece, (vers. 3, 6); and on these occasions he must have given to the Philippian Christians much and varied oral instruction. The γράφειν as present will bear the emphasis—"to be writing as I now do"—and this could be opposed to the warnings which they had heard from his lips, when among them. The act of dictating and writing to them would thus be tacitly opposed to the easier task of merely speaking to them. He would submit cheerfully (οὐκ ὀκνηρὸν) to the trouble of repeating his instructions in every form, with the pen or the voice, if he could only by such or any other means secure them against the dangers to which they were exposed. So, among others, CALVIN and WIESINGER. Prof. LIGHTFOOT understands the expression as referring to the Apostle's reiterated warnings against dissension in this letter, and Bishop ELLICOTT of his exhortations, expressed or implied, to rejoice in the Lord.—H.] In χαίρετε ἐν κυρίῳ we see Paul's aim, in οὐκ ὀκνηρὸν his readiness, in ἀσφαλές the church's danger and want, and in τὰ αὐτὰ (not τὸ αὐτό) the variety or compass of his teachings.

Ver. 2. Beware of [the] dogs, beware of [the] evil-workers, beware of [the] concision. Βλέπετε, followed as here by a direct accusative, strictly means 'behold,' 'fix your eye upon;' and so in 1 Cor. x. 18; i. 26. See Wi-

NER's Gram., p. 223. The proper Greek for 'be-ware of' would require ἀπό with the genit. after βλέπετε (Mark viii. 15; xii. 38). The one sense here involves the other; videte et cavebitis (BENGEL). The threefold repetition marks the Apostle's earnestness and the importance of the warning (WINER's Gram., p. 609), while it corresponds gradatione retrograda (BENGEL) to the three clauses (ver. 3) which describe only a single class of teachers, and hence not three different kinds of false teachers (VAN HENGEL). The first substantive (τοῖς κίνας) was a term of reproach with heathen and Jews, and implies 'impudence, shamelessness' (in Matt. xv. 26, τοῖς κυναρίοις, less severe); among the Jews it (κίνας) implied also uncleanness (Matt. vii. 6; Rev. xxii. 15), and among the heathen that of ferocity and malevolence. It is most natural to retain here the biblical idea, viz., profane, impure, shameless, thereby indicating the moral character of the teachers in question. Hence it is not to be understood of mere shamelessness (CHRYSOSTOM), or this together with covetousness (GROTIUS), or ferocity or violence (RILLIET), and least of all a special class: homines a Christi professione ad Judaeorum superstitionem reversi, imitatores canum ad vomitum suum reduntium (VAN HENGEL). Τοῖς κακοῖς ἐργάταις designates their activity, not as πονηρόν, evil to others, but as evil in itself, unprofitable, injurious (comp. δόλιοι ἐργάται, 2 Cor. xi. 13). See the contrast in 2 Tim. ii. 15. VAN HENGEL is incorrect: qui se a Christo quidem non avertunt, sed superstitione illa divinam corruptum doctrinam. Τὴν κατατομὴν, paranomasia nam gloriosam appellationem περιτομῆς vindicat Christianis ver. 3, κατατέμνα de concisione vetita, Lev. xxi. 5; 1 Reg. xviii. 28; non sine indignatione loquitur (BENGEL). See WINER's Gram., p. 638. The language here states the result of their activity; with their circumcision they effect only an outward mutilation. This ironical and sarcastic paranomasia (found often in Paul as well as in LUTHER) marks only the quality, not the quantity (BACR), of the circumcision, and is to be taken passively in its concrete sense, i. e. the mutilated, not the mutilators. The reference is not to idolatry (BEZA, et al.), or to a separation of faith from the heart (LUTHER), a sundering of the church (CALVIN, et al.), and still less to a class of teachers: Judei, fiduciam suam in carnis circumsione potentes atque ita ad Christum venire nolentes, sed illum contemnentes et spernentes (VAN HENGEL). It is certain that they were Judaists, as in Galatia, and were active at Philippi, and though they had no success and no adherents at Philippi, yet were dangerous opponents of Paul's view of Christianity. The severity of the Apostle's language contrasts strongly with his joy and friendliness with reference to the Philippians, but was justified by the fact that a spiritual field so fair and hopeful was threatened and endangered by such disturbers. The condition itself of the church furnished a reason for his sharpness against them. The contrast in ver. 3 sheds further light on this point.

Ver. 3. For we are the circumcision (ἡμεῖς γὰρ ἔσμεν ἡ περιτομή). Causa, cur, ver. 2, aliis tam longe secludat (BENGEL). [Paul justifies here (γὰρ) his refusing to recognize the Judaists as the advocates of true circumcision. They are destitute of the marks of those who answer to that character. They substitute an outward form for the spirit of true worship, and rely upon their own works for acceptance, instead of the righteousness offered to them in the gospel; whereas the circumcision that God accepts is that of the heart and not of the letter (Rom. ii. 29), and is the seal or evidence of the justification which man obtains by faith and not by deeds of the law (Rom. iv. 11 sq.). Christians fulfilled both of these requisitions for obtaining the favor of God, and hence they also were entitled to be called the circumcision.—II.] Ἡμεῖς precedes with emphasis. The Apostle means himself and his beloved church, which was composed for the most part of Gentiles. Hence ἡ περιτομή is to be understood in the purely spiritual sense, that is, Christians who have received circumcision of the heart (Col. ii. 11; Rom. ii. 25-29). Comp. 1 Cor. vii. 19; Gal. iii. 28; v. 6; vi. 15.—These are further characterized: who worship in the Spirit of God (οἱ πνεύματι θεοῦ λατρεύοντες). The verb is used absolutely, as Heb. ix. 9; x. 2; Acts xxvi. 1; Luke ii. 31, of the worship of God which the instrumental dative defines more fully as spiritual, and the genit. θεοῦ refers to the Holy Spirit in opposition to the human spirit. It is contrasted with the σάρξ in its moral sense. Comp. John iv. 23, 24; Heb. ix. 14; Gal. iii. 3; Rom. xii. 1 (τὴν λογικὴν λατρείαν). Hence the dative does not designate the rule (VAN HENGEL). WINER's Gram., p. 216. Comp. 1 Cor. ix. 7.—And rejoice [glory] in Christ Jesus (καὶ καυχώμενοι ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ). For the form of expression see Rom. ii. 17; v. 11; 1 Cor. i. 31; iii. 21; 2 Cor. x. 17. They are here contrasted with the κακοὶ ἐργάται.—And have no confidence in the flesh (καὶ οὐκ ἐν σαρκὶ πεποιθότες) denotes their moral position as opposed to the κίνας, the impure, insolent, while that which precedes marks their religious sphere. Οὐκ implies a direct negative: qui non confisi sunt, whereas μή would have made it hypothetical (si non confisi sunt). See WINER's Gram., p. 485.

Ver. 4. Although I might have (more strictly am having = have) confidence also in the flesh. Καίπερ is restrictive here only in Paul, more frequently in the Epistle to the Hebrews (v. 8; vii. 8; xii. 17). 'Εγὼ singled out from ἡμεῖς, ver. 3 (the truly circumcised whether outwardly or not), places the Apostle, who is a Jew as the false teachers were (ver. 2), not one of the heathen as was the greater part of the Philippian Church, in contrast with these teachers, as having confidence in the flesh (ἐγὼ πεποιθῶν ἐν σαρκὶ) de jure, not de facto. His actual confidence is based not upon the flesh, upon outward advantages, but upon Christ (hence καὶ before ἐν σαρκὶ, i. e., also in it as well as Him), though not without his reasons for that other confidence and a right to it. Hence the participle does not denote the past (VAN HENGEL), nor is it to be resolved into 'could have' (SCHENKEL), nor is πεποιθῶν merely argumentum fiducia (BEZA, CALVIN, et al.). In σαρκὶ special reference is made to circumcision. [This rite is named because it was the watchword, as it were, of those who, in their system of salvation, exalted good works above the merits of Christ (see Gal.)—[H.]—If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I more, introduces a comparison between Paul's condition and that of the others. 'Εἰ τις ἄλλος is entirely general, leaving his readers to apply it to the Judaists. Δοκεῖ denotes the subjective, arbitrary judgment, as in Gal. vi. 3; 1 Cor. iii. 18; viii. 2. No appeal can be made to Gal. ii. 6, 9 (SCHENKEL), for there the meaning is 'to be found such by others, to have that repute.' Πειποιθέναί ἐν σαρκί denotes the actual πεποιθήσῃν εἶναι, contained in the perf. With ἐγὼ μᾶλλον we are to supply δοκῶ πεποιθέναί ἐν σαρκί; comp. 2 Cor. xi. 23.

Ver. 5. Now follow the specifications which justify this claim. His first advantage is: Circumcised the eighth day (περιτομῇ ὀκταήμερος). The dative (not nominative, as if the abstract were used for circumcised (BENGEL), which is true only in the collective sense) denotes the respect in which (Eph. ii. 3; τέκνα φύσει ὀρθῆς). WINER'S Gram., p. 215. The adjective designates Paul in contrast with proselytes, as a Jew by birth, who had been circumcised on the eighth day, according to the law (Gen. xvii. 12; Lev. xii. 3).—In census nunc venit splendor natalium (VAN HENGEL), the second advantage: Of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews (ἐκ γένους Ἰσραὴλ, φυλῆς Βενιαμίν, Ἑβραῖος ἐκ Ἑβραίων). These all belong together according to the sense and the construction, for the preposition is not repeated before φυλῆς. As SCHENKEL well remarks: The theocratic full-blood (Rom. xi. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 22) is contrasted with the Idumean half-blood. Comp. Eph. ii. 12. The tribe of Benjamin enjoyed and conferred a distinction, because unlike the Ephraimites it had remained faithful to the theocracy. Besides this his Jewish extraction (εὐγένεια) was also perfect: his mother also was a Jew, and not a foreigner. It is incorrect to understand this of Hebrew-speaking parents (the Greek interpreters), which the context does not support, or of a tota majus series ex Ebraeis (GROTIUS), which would be unnecessary if he sprang from the people of Israel, from the tribe of Benjamin.—The third advantage: As touching the law a Pharisee. Κατὰ denotes the reference, as τὰ κατ' ἐμέ (Eph. vi. 21). WINER'S Gram., p. 401. Comp. Acts xxii. 3; xxvi. 5. His religious position, his relation to the law, is marked as strict, rigorous; for the Pharisees observed it conscientiously and scrupulously. Νόμος is not = αἵρεσις, disciplina, θεσμοί (GROTIUS and others).

Ver. 6. The fourth advantage: Concerning zeal, persecuting the Church (κατὰ ζήλος διώκων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν) describes his moral conduct in the relations above mentioned. The participle is to be taken substantively as οἱ ζήλοῦντες in Matt. ii. 20. It is not equivalent to διώξας (GROTIUS). That which is the greatest sin of the Apostle's life, in his own estimation (1 Cor. xv. 8, 9; 1 Tim. i. 13-16), he reckons by a sort of irony in this controversy with the Judaizers, as a glory to himself.—The fifth advantage: Touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless (κατὰ δικαιοσύνην τὴν ἐν νόμῳ γενόμενος ἀμωμπος) presents the moral result. The righteousness referred to here (as the result of his conduct) is that which rests in the law, is based upon and determined by it; hence essentially that which is ἐκ νόμου (ver. 9), and not 'righteousness under or in the condition of law' (DE WETTE). In this respect he is 'blameless' (ἀμωμος) according to men's judgment (communis hominum existimatio, CALVIN). It does not fully embrace Paul's meaning to say: se nihil fecisse, quod morte aut verberibus castigandum esset (GROTIUS). Γενόμενος, put for emphasis before the adjective, signifies 'becoming, striving himself to be,' upon which, as the context teaches, he places value in the presence of God, but only when he opposes the carnal pride of these false teachers. To find here an obvious, though weak and lifeless imitation of 2 Cor. xi. 18-27, and to call this passage tame and without interest (BAUR), indicates a perverted taste (MEYER).

Ver. 7. But what things were gain to me, presents forcibly Paul's own position in contrast with (ἀλλά) that of these teachers. In πάντα, quaecunque, which is emphatic as the following ταῦτα shows, are included the preceding privileges and others of the same class.—These formerly ἦν μοι κέρδη, were actually gains, as the verb, emphatic by position, indicates. By μοι Paul means himself, as when he was Saul of Tarsus, and there is no need of weakening the sense by taking the pronoun (μοι) as the dative of judgment (ERASMUS, et al.). The plural κέρδη is used ob rerum varietatem, but there is no reason for supplying non vera luera, sed opinata (VAN HENGEL) which is no more implied in the plural than in μοι, since ἦν precedes.—These [have] I counted loss for Christ (ταῦτα ἡγήμαι διὰ τὸν Χριστὸν ζημίαν). The perfect, after the emphatic ταῦτα, denotes an actio praeiterita, quae per effectus suos durat, and implies the inward decision which has resulted in action. It does not refer to the act in itself, but to the act as a result of conscious freedom. Hence it is not abjēci, repudiari (VAN HENGEL), which ii. 3 does not confirm. Both the collocation and the signification of the words are to be observed. As to the order, we notice that διὰ τὸν Χριστὸν stands between ἡγήμαι and ζημίαν: Christ must first be known, then the ταῦτα are esteemed ζημία. With respect to the words we remark the following: (1) that with the accusative διὰ marks the reason (WINER'S Gram., p. 398); (2) that τὸν Χριστὸν denotes the well known, historical Christ, and (3) that ζημίαν calls to mind Acts xxvii. 10 (πολλὴς ζημίας ὁ μόνον τοῦ θορτοῦ καὶ τὸν πλοῖου, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸν ψυχῶν ἡμῶν), and ver. 21, where reference is made to what had been thrown into the sea. Hence it is jactura, after the figure of a merchant who throws his κέρδη overboard, as ζημίαν, in order to save his life. The various kinds of gain (κέρδη) are esteemed as one loss of life, so far as these (ταῦτα) separate and keep one away from Christ.

Ver. 8. Yea, doubtless, and I count all things loss. Ἀλλά contrasts the present (ἡγούμαι) with the perfect (ἡγήμαι). Mē rem praesentem confirmat, oñ conclusionem ex rebus ita comparatis conficit, (so also MEYER) and καὶ connects the present with the preceding perfect. WINER'S Gram., p. 442. [The stricter translation according to this view, is: 'But therefore also I count,' etc. The present (ἡγούμαι) reaffirms his former judgment: He has still the same view of the worthlessness of all reliance on outward forms and privileges.—[H]. The contrast does not lie in πάντα (RILLIET), for this only embraces the ἀντα in its widest scope.—The reason why he thus holds all things to be 'loss' (ζημίαν εἶναι) the subsequent clause unfolds: For the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord (διὰ τὸ ὑπερέχον τῆς γνώσεως Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ τοῦ κυρίου μου). The explanation which belongs to διὰ τὸν Χριστόν does not lie in the relation defined by the preposition (that being simply repeated), but in that with whom it effects the relation. The substantive participle (τὸ ὑπερέχον) designates in comparison with those gains (κέρδη) one of far surpassing value, which results from a knowledge (τῆς γνώσεως) of the Redeemer both in His Person (Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ) and in His relation to each individual (τοῦ κυρίου μου). CALVIN wrongly takes it ad exprimentam affectus vehementiam.—For whom I have suffered the loss of all things. [It is the aorist in Greek, 'suffered,' which refers to the definite epoch in Paul's life when he experienced the change in his views and relations which he here describes.—[H]. In οἱ δὲ he returns again to the person of Christ, on which, after all, everything depends, not on the subjective knowledge. Τὰ πάντα, where the article recalls πάντα just mentioned, is the limiting accusative after the passive ἐξήμιώθην, which states a result consequent on this altered view of his character and wants. Luther incorrectly renders it: 'I have counted loss;' and VAN HENGEL: cujus causa factum est, ut me illis privarem omnibus.—But the Apostle has not merely endured this passively, for he adds: And do count them refuse that I may win Christ. καὶ ἡγοῦμαι indicates his activity, conviction, knowledge, the ground of which is still for whom (οἱ δὲ). Σκίβαλα (from κνέειν) βαλεῖν marks the absolute worthlessness more strongly than ζημίαν εἶναι which concedes a relative value: ζημία, factura fit equo animo, σκίβαλα proprii abjiciuntur, posthac neque tactu, neque aspectu dignanda. (BENGEL). [Another derivation is that from σκῶρ, σκατός, 'dung,' 'filth,' which some good etymologists adopt, though the other is generally preferred.—[H]. The aim and purpose of such a judgment is ἵνα Χριστόν κερδήσω, that I may gain Christ, who replaces all losses.—The future does not exclude present possession, but yet implies a fuller appropriation, which the present does not satisfy. Χριστόν is stronger than simply Christi favorem (GROTIUS).

Ver. 9 attaches itself closely to that which precedes.—And may be found in him, καὶ εὑρεθῶ ἐν αὐτῷ. BENGEL well observes: qui omnia, ne se ipso quidem excepto, amittit, Christum lucrificat et in Christo lucrifit; Christus est alius et ille est Christi. Plus ultra loquitur, Paulus quasi adhuc non lucrificerit. It is incorrect to take the objective gaining of Christ (ἵνα κερδήσω) placed emphatically after the subjective, i. e., the being found (εὑρηθῶ) opposed to ἡγοῦμαι, as equivalent to sim, (GROTIUS) or to restrict it to judicium dei (BEZA). How he will be found is stated in what follows.—Not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law. Μὴ is used with ἔχων in the first place, because it belongs to a final clause, but also because it expresses a judgment concerning Paul: 'as one who does not have.' See WINER'S Gram., p. 482 sq. VAN HENGEL incorrectly joins it closely with εὑρεθῶ: ut deprehendar in ejus communione non meam qualicumque habere probitatem, while KUEHNWALD and others explain it as 'holding fast.' It is habens as a specific modal-limitation of εὑρεθῶ ἐν αὐτῷ.—Ἐμὴν δικαιοσύνην τὴν ἐκ νόμου describes the righteousness (δικαιοσύνην) under two aspects: first, ἐμὴν, emphatic by position, corresponding to τὴν ἰδίαν δικαιοσύνην (Rom. x. 3) 'his own,' 'self-acquired,' to which is opposed ἡ ἐκ θεοῦ or ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ (Rom. x. 3); secondly, τὴν ἐκ νόμου with reference to the medium, as in like manner δικαίος ἐκ πίστεως (Rom. iii. 26) and answering to τὴν διὰ πίστεως (comp. Rom. iii. 21, 22, 26; iv. 5; ix. 32; x. 3, 5, 6).—Hence he at once adds to the latter the opposite characteristic. But that which is through the faith of Christ, ἀλλὰ τὴν διὰ πίστεως Χριστοῦ. Here righteousness (i. e., of faith) is described as the causa apprehendens or means of securing the benefits of Christ's work.—But for the sake of completeness he now adds still under the antithetic ἀλλὰ: The righteousness which is of God upon faith (τὴν ἐκ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει). It is not a righteousness proceeding from the subject, but from God (causa efficiens), which rests on faith as its basis. The article τῇ renders the gen. objecti (Χριστοῦ or ἐκ Χριστοῦ), and the article τὴν before ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει unnecessary, because this limitation is immanent in the conception as the faith-righteousness. WINER'S Gram. p. 135. MEYER incorrectly connects this clause (τὴν ἐκ θεοῦ, etc.) with ἔχων, and SCHENKEL, with εὑρεθῶ ἐν αὐτῷ. So remote a connection is itself against both views. We reject also the following: In fide (Vulg.), per fidem (GROTIUS), propter fidem (DE WETTE), conditio hujus ipsius fidei posita (VAN HENGEL).

Ver. 10. That I may know him (τοῦ γνῶναι αὐτόν). This knowing of Christ is what the righteousness of faith proposes, without which such knowing is impossible, in the possession of which therefore he would be found, that he may be able to know Christ. In like manner in Rom. vi. 6, one clause with ἵνα is joined to another with τοῦ and the infinitive. Thus the process of the knowledge of Christ (ver. 8) is given. CALVIN, BENGEL, and others, join this clause incorrectly with ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει. The excellence of this knowledge lies first of all in its object, the person of the Lord, a practical, experimental acquaintance with Him. What follows αὐτόν is exegetical.—And the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings (καὶ τὴν δύναμιν τῆς ἀναστάσεως αὐτοῦ καὶ τὴν κοινωνίαν τῶν παθημάτων αὐτοῦ). The first denotes the vis et efficacia which the resurrection of Christ has upon those who know Him, which they experience when they embrace by faith the resurrection of the Lord; whereby God declared Him to be the author of justification and righteousness to all and every one who believes, (Rom. iv. 25; viii. 11; 1 Cor. xv. 17; 2 Cor. ii. 14; iv. 10, 11; Col. iii. 1, 2). Hence the new life, the striving for that which is above, the conversation in heaven (ver. 20), spring up in and with the righteousness of faith. Hence ἀνάστασις is not to be regarded as exortus (BENGEL); or δύναμις to be understood as the power which effects the resurrection (GROTIUS); nor is reference had to the certainty of our resurrection and exaltation (HÖLEMANN, et al.) The other expression, τὴν κοινωνίαν τῶν παθημάτων αὐτοῦ, indicates a participation in the sufferings of Christ, a συνπάσχειν (Rom. vii. 17. See Gal. ii. 20: Χριστῷ συνεσταύρωμαι; 2 Tim. ii. 11) a suffering for Christ's sake and in fellowship with Him. Thus suffering alone does not lead to glory as dying does not save or make us blessed. With Him! But as there is no resurrection without death, so also is there none without suffering (WIESINGER). Hence this thought, which logically should come first, takes the second place, emphatically intimating that the second is something not to be overlooked if one desires the first. The reference is not merely to a similar disposition in suffering (VAN HENGEL), or to an appropriation by faith of the merit of Christ, (CALOV), nor is it to be explained as if it were written τὴν δύναμιν τῆς κοινωνίας (HÖLEMANN). These two things, the power of the resurrection of Christ and the fellowship of His sufferings, are objects of the knowledge which only the righteous by faith possess. Hence such knowledge transcends all other advantages (ver. 8).—Being conformed unto his death, συμμορφούμενος τῷ θανάτῳ αὐτοῦ. The nominative with τοῦ γινώσκειν, without its relation to the subject being more closely defined is unusual. It would properly be the accusative of the subject, but is a constructio ad sensum, as if it had been ἵνα γινώσκω. Comp. John viii. 54; and for the opposite construction Acts xxvii. 10. WINER's Gram., p. 572; see on Eph. iv. 2. The present participle points to an incipient present accomplishment, which the verb shows to be outwardly similar to the death of Christ. Paul had been exposed in the cause of the gospel more immediately to a violent death, at the hands of the heathen in league with the Jews; he might at length die a martyr's death. It is not therefore to be carried forward beyond the nearer clause, to which it actually belongs, to one more remote, which has its own limitations; nor does it denote a condition yet to be attained, or an inward ethical relation of likeness to the death of the sinless Redeemer (SCHENKEL).

Ver. 11. If by any means or perchance, εἰ πως, si forte, denotes a hope which naturally connects itself with what has been said of the power of the resurrection of Christ, of fellowship with His sufferings, and of the Apostle's, own impending death by martyrdom. The problematical form of the expression shows his humility in view of the glory which is the object of this hope. We are not to suppose any hesitation, or doubt, but only the exclusion of moral certainty.—I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. Καταντήσω as in Acts xxvi. 7. Εἰς τὴν ἐξανάστασιν τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν is simply the resurrection of the righteous to blessedness. The first preposition in the substantive ἐξανάστασις, found only here, (the verb ἐξαναστήσαν in Mark xii. 19; Luke xx. 28; Acts xv. 5), points to the place whence the dead come forth (ἐκ τῆς γῆς). BENDEL hypercritically refers ἐξανάστασις to the resurrection of Christians, and ἀνάστασις to Christ's resurrection. Our passage gives no support to the distinction between a first and second resurrection. Comp. 1 Cor. xv. 23; 1 Thes. iv. 16. ["The general resurrection of the dead," says Prof. LIGHTFOOT, "whether good or bad, is ἡ ἀνάστασις τῶν νεκρῶν (e. g., 1 Cor. xv. 42); on the other hand, the resurrection of Christ and of those who rise with Christ, is generally [ἡ ἀνάστασις] ἐκ νεκρῶν (Luke xx. 35; Acts iv. 2; 1 Pet. i. 3); the former includes both the ἀνάστασις ζωῆς and the ἀνάστασις κρίσεως (John v. 29); the latter is confined to the ἀνάστασις ζωῆς."] To infer that the righteous only are to be raised at the last day would contradict the express declaration of Christ in John v. 26-29; and of Paul in Acts xxiv. 14, 16.—[H]. VAN HENGEL's view is singular: si forte perveniam ad tempus hujus eventi, hence: live to the time when the dead shall rise.

Ver. 15. Not that I have already attained [laid hold of] or am already [or have become] perfect. Οὐχ ὅτι guards against the error of supposing that Paul would say of himself ἤδη ἐλάβον ἢ ἤδη τετέλειμαι. The object of ἐλάβον is not named, hence is to be drawn from the context: τὸ γινώσκειν αὐτὸν (ver. 10), τὸ ὑπερέχον τῆς γνώσεως Χριστοῦ ἡμοῦ (ver. 8). Ἐλάβον naturally denotes complete, secure possession; as if he were entirely penetrated by such knowledge, and it had entirely penetrated him, as if it had accomplished in him its perfect moral effect. The explanatory τετέλειμαι defines the meaning. With this modest literal account of his experience we are not to connect the figurative βραβεῖον in ver. 14, which does not come forward till after the intervention of several other clauses (the Greek interpreters, BENDEL, MEYER, and others); and also not τὴν ἀνάστασιν (RHEINWALD). jus ad resurrectionem beatam (GROTIUS), καταντῆσαι (MATTHIES), all of which belong to the future, or Χριστὸν (THEODORET), moral perfection (HÖLEMANN). BENDEL well remarks: in summo fervore sobrietatem spiritualem non dimittit apostolus.—But I follow after if I may also apprehend [lay hold of] that (διότι καὶ εἰ καὶ καταλήβω). Διότι means (as in Rom. ix. 30; 1 Cor. xiv. 1; 1 Tim. vi. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 22) studiosi appeto, in contrast with (δέ) ἐλάβον, and having the same object. The εἰ shows the striving to be with humility. Καὶ points back to ἐλάβον; καταλάβω is stronger: cum quis plene potitur (BENDEL); laying hold firmly (MEYER). Comp. Rom. ix. 30; 1 Cor. ix. 27.—Because also I was apprehended [laid hold of]. The ground on which he hopes to lay hold of (εἴφ' ὅ), as in Rom. v. 12; 2 Cor. v. 4 (WINER's Gram., p. 394), hence equivalent to διότι. It is inappropriate to supply τοῦτο as the object of καταλάβω, for which, καὶ κατελήμθην ὑπὸ Χριστοῦ (RILLIET, WIESINGER, and others); for the Apostle's thought relates not so much to the reciprocal acts of 'laying hold,' and 'being laid hold of,' as to the effectual initiative which Christ has taken; and equally out of place is the idea of 'being laid hold of for Christian perfection.' The tone of the passage, which is not dialectic, reflective, speaks against such interpretations as: 'under the condition,' (MATTHIES), quo ut pervenire possim (GROTIUS). LU-

THEIR'S rendering is unphilological. 'After that,' and CALVIN'S quem ad modum. We are to recognize a suggestive and fine allusion in κατελήμψην to the manner of Paul's conversion (Acts ix. 3 ff.). [This reference appears to me doubtful.—H.]

Ver. 13. Brethren, ἀδελφοί. Familiariter salutetur (BENGEL). I count not myself to have laid hold of, ἐγὼ ἑμαυτὸν οὐ λογιζομαι κατελήφεναι. A repetition of ver. 12, which emphatically excludes himself (Acts xxvi. 9; John v. 30, 32; vii. 17; viii. 54). The perfect as distinguished from καταλαβείν, denotes the having laid hold and kept hold. He resolutely discards all certainty and self-conceit, not so much on account of his readers and of their conduct (ii. 2-4), as WIESINGER thinks, but for their sakes in view of false teachers among them, or who might appear among them.

Ver. 14 answers to ver. 12 b. But one thing, ἐν δὲ, introduces the antithesis of οὐ λογιζομαι; hence we are to supply ἀγων (LUTHER), or λογίζομαι κατελήφεναι brought forward; for what follows he maintains to be true of himself in opposition to what he has denied to be so. There is no ground for inserting ποιῶ (BENGEL, WINER'S Gram., p. 620, et al.); nor διώκω (VAN HENGEL). 'En refers to the whole following sentence, not merely to one member of it, viz., the two participial clauses (MEYER).—Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark, (τὰ μὲν ὀπίσω ἐπιλανθάνόμενος, τοῖς δὲ ἔμπροσθεν ἐπекτεινόμενος κατὰ σκοπὸν διώκω). The finite verb, as in ver. 12, is first of all defined more closely by two participles, which stand emphatically before it. The first clause is negative: 'forgetting that which lies behind;' the second is positive: 'reaching out to what lies before;' the first designates a purely spiritual act; the second describes a spiritual act by the posture of the body. 'Επекτεινόμενος indicates the bent-forward posture of one stretching himself out towards an object. BENGEL: Oculus manum, manus pedem prævertit et trahit. The concrete expressions (ἐλαβὼν, διώκω, καταλάβω, τὰ ὀπίσω, τὰ ἔμπροσθεν, ἐπекτεινόμενος, σκοπὸν) gradually pass over more and more into the figure of a runner who in view of the goal before him and in thinking of the prize, forgets the space that lies behind. At first these expressions are such as readily attach themselves to the figure—perhaps it already lay at the bottom of them—in the end they are borrowed directly from the figure, so that τὸ βραβεῖον naturally follows as a part of the description. Hence in τὰ ὀπίσω the reference is not to the advantages mentioned, vers. 5, 6 (PELAGIUS, et al.), for these as attributes of the flesh (σάρξ) must be given up before the race begins, nor is it to the labors of the apostleship (THEODORET), but to the past attainments of the Christian life (MEYER). Τὰ ἔμπροσθεν, according to the figure the space yet to be traversed, is the life: future experience, not the goal itself, which is pointed out by κατὰ σκοπὸν. The dative (τοῖς ἔμπροσθεν) shows upon what the gaze is fixed, while the preposition (κατὰ) indicates the direction, so that the goal is always thought of beyond the intermediate steps: it is thus = goalward (MEYER), versus metam (WINER'S Gram., p. 400).—For the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Εἰς τὸ βραβεῖον presents now the object towards which his thoughts and efforts are directed. See 1 Cor. ix. 27; comp. Col. iii. 15. How the genitive τῆς ἀνω κλήσεως τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ is to be understood, a due attention to the subject and the figure shows. By ἡ ἀνω κλήσις is meant the heavenly calling (Heb. iii. 1: κλήσις ἐπουράνιος) in opposition to τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς (Col. iii. 2), and as usual κλήσις denotes an action (Eph. i. 18; iv. 1, 4; Rom. xi. 29; 2 Tim. i. 9; 2 Thes. i. 11; 1 Cor. i. 26; vii. 20). If its nature and character are thus determined, so now is its author (τοῦ θεοῦ). Comp. 1 Thes. ii. 12. The medium is presented by ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ (WINER'S Gram., p. 135 sq. Comp. Col. i. 4.) To connect this clause with διώκω (CHRYSOBOSTOM, MEYER) is against both the sense and the construction. Accordingly τῆς κλήσεως is genitive of the subject, which holds forth τὸ βραβεῖον, but not the genitive of apposition (SCHENKEL). [On the games of the Greeks and Romans, from which the Apostle has drawn his illustration, see GAMES in Dr. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.—H].

Ver. 15. Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded. Ὅσοι οὖν τέλειοι begins the practical application as an inference (οὖν) from the preceding. Τέλειος is to be distinguished from τετελειωμένος: ille, cursui habilis, hic, brabeo proximus, jam jam accepturus (BENGEL). The first word designates a character or condition objectively determined without measuring its subjective development or degree; whereas the second determines the measure of that growth or progression. It designates like ἅγιος (Eph. i. 1) the Christian state of which the context treats, ver. 12 (τελείωσις), Heb. vii. 11. See 1 Cor. xiv. 20; Matth. v. 48; Col. iv. 12; Jam. i. 4; iii. 2; Heb. v. 14. 'As the ἅγιος εἶναι is the strongest obligation to ἀγισμός, so the τέλειον εἶναι presents the strongest incentive to strive after the τελειοῦσθαι' (WIESINGER). The nature or extent of the perfection (τέλειος) appears in vers. 9, 10. The question is one not of absolute, but only of relative perfection. Οὖν points back to the entire passage (1. 14), not merely to 12-14 (MEYER). By ὅσοι each individual is left to judge for himself whether he belongs to the τέλειοι or not. There is no reason for understanding the expression as ironical, and since he includes himself, as self-irony (SCHENKEL). Nor can the Apostle refer to intelligence only (GROTIUS, et al.), for the point under remark is the righteousness of faith. Hence, too, a comparison with immature believers or beginners in the Christian life, νήπιοι (1 Cor. ii. 6; iii. 1; xiv. 20; Heb. v. 13, 14) as MEYER supposes, is irrelevant. Τοῦτο ορνοῦμεν has reference to the moral disposition. BENGEL: hoc unum (ver. 14). Unlike the false teachers the church should be of the same mind as the Apostle. The reference is not to τὸ βραβεῖον (VAN HENGEL); the point in question is the true way of striving after the βραβεῖον.—And if in anything ye be otherwise minded, (καὶ εἰ τι ἑτέρως φρονεῖτε) supposes a case in which the members of the church differ among themselves in their views or spirit in regard to points which are incidental or formal, and not essential, (it is ἑτέρως, not ἕτερον, as if to distinguish between form and substance), but still not rightly, as surely might be the case according to i. 9-11. The context does not indicate in any way how this has taken place.—Those of whom Paul speaks are not νήπιτοι (alter ac perfecti, ΒΕΝΚΕΛ) nor those who have been led astray (GROTIUS); nor yet are the errors entirely indifferent (SCHENKEL), for ἀποκαλῖνφει authorizes a hope of correction or recovery; nor is it: si quid boni per aliam viam appetitis (VAN HENKEL).—God shall reveal also this unto you (καὶ τοῦτο ὁ θεὸς ἡμῖν ἀποκαλῖνφει is a confident hope, not a wish (LUTHER). Καὶ also points to other things that He has already revealed. The verb indicates an immediate disclosing to the human spirit by the Spirit of God, which next to the teaching (διδάσκων) of the church men need in order to understand ethical truth. See Eph. i. 17.

Ver. 16. Nevertheless, whereto we have already attained, let us walk in the same.

[For the rendering of this verse, see remarks on the text.—H]. Πλὴν (as in i. 14; and iv. 14) limits the hope by a conditio sine qua non, which is εἰς ὃ ἐφθάσαμεν τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν. The infinitive as in German: ‘nur—wandelnd’ is to be construed as an imperative (WINER’s Gram. p. 316), but not connected with ἀποκαλῖνφει (ECUMENIUS), or with what follows (RILLET). The verb, according to its derivation from στοιχος, row, order, (from στέχω, to ascend), signifies ‘to walk with and after one another,’ and is construed with the dative (Gal. v. 25, πνεύματι; vi. 16, τῷ κανόνι τούτῳ; Rom. iv. 12, τοῖς ἰχθεσιν). Hence the meaning of τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν is: ‘to walk together with each other according to or in the same.’ Τῷ αὐτῷ is more closely defined by εἰς ὃ ἐφθάσαμεν. This verb means to arrive at, to reach, hence has to do with an act completed at a definite time, which the tense marks as belonging to the past, while the act denoted by στοιχεῖν is continuous, reaching from the present into the future. The common rule by which they are to act is that which they have experienced or gained in the Christian life—the gospel, truth, Christ, God’s Spirit and life—and indeed in its entire range as the indefiniteness of the expression indicates. Thus there is no reference to the βελτίον, or any single thing, and the sense is: Should energy become even violence; mildness, softness; earnestness, stubbornness; reserve, exclusiveness; fidelity, narrowness; freedom, laxity; in any one point (all which is τὶ ἐξέρως φρονεῖν), only hold fast to the gospel, the Lord and His word, to the essential truth of the same, to that of which we have become partakers.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Christianity plants and nourishes essentially and chiefly joy, true joy, joy in the Lord, in His word and work, His life and gifts, His excellence and glory.

2. Irony and humor in sacred things (ver. 2: κατατομή—περιτομή) hold almost the same place that the imprecatory Psalms hold among the prophetic; the former invoke on the enemies of God and His kingdom what the latter predict. Irony and humor are an expression of the difference which exists between reality and truth, a difference sharply recognized and as sharply uttered, without mercy for the delinquent, but with a tender regard for those who are to be instructed. They occur especially in the style and thoughts of genial men distinguished for faith, at the same time full of deep earnestness as well as tender love, like Paul and Luther (whose Dreckel Drecketal, instead of Dekret Dekretal, MEYER compares here with Paul’s sarcastic paranomasia). They are to be distinguished from ridicule which only seeks to provoke laughter against one, and thus to achieve a petty triumph, and from derision and scorn which have their origin in contempt. It is not an allowed ridicule or scorn—allowed to an Apostle, even a duty, but in general to be condemned (SCHENKEL)—that is here employed. The greatness of the danger and of the interests at stake, the hot struggle at an endangered post, a true and lively sense of justice, the deepest sympathy with those for and around whom the contest is raging, and great spiritual keenness, sagacity, and depth of feeling, occasion the hard, telling, crushing expression (see ver. 3).

3. Two things are as important as they are difficult: to determine the extent of one’s advantages and gifts, and the worth and relation of the same. Birth and lineage, family, tribe and nationality on the one hand, and the moral character determined by them on the other; Paul reckons together as excellencies and gifts of the same kind, and holds them all in slight esteem compared with what he has in Christ. The morality of men belongs to the province of the natural life; it depends on birth, family, position, culture, time and circumstances, and gives reason, as does every favor for humble thankfulness, but not for proud boasting (vers. 3-5).

4. The righteousness of faith has its advantage over righteousness of the law in the author to whom it owes its origin, that is God Himself; in the medium through which it is wrought, faith which embraces and clings to the Mediator; and in the experiences which it works, and which reach into the eternal glory, that is, Christ’s life and sufferings, with whom the believer has sympathy (ver. 10).—The worthlessness of the righteousness of the law does not consist in this, that law and advantages, such as birth, family, nation, morality, are in themselves valueless, but in the fact that man of himself, the natural man, without Christ, in his perverseness, does not highly estimate them (ver. 7-9, and Rom. vii. 7-24).

5. Progress consists in advancing from the possession of faith to that of knowledge, which is not merely an intellectual thing, but an experience of the whole man, a transforming of impressions into views or judgments, and then onward through suffering with Christ to glorification with Him who perfects His servants even as He completed His own course. The first points out the material or means of progress, the second its form or sphere, while the end is the permeating of the entire man by the dead and again risen Lord (vers. 11-14).

6. The progress of the Christian to eternal glory has its origin in the fact, that he has been called from above by God in Christ, and has been laid hold of by Him; its continuance in the fact, that he holds firmly to Christ without contentedly looking back upon what has been already won, but with his face earnestly set towards the goal with the feeling that he has not yet reached it; and its end in the fact, that the exalted Lord receives him into His glory. It is thus an onward movement in one direction, without elation or depression, or a deviation to the right or left (vers. 13, 14). To him belongs the χαίρετε ἐν κυρίῳ who obeys the στέκετε ἐν κυρίῳ (iv. 1).

7. He who has the truth-loving heart will never want the helping guidance and revelation of the Spirit of truth; and as certainly will he have his waverings and his need of this help (vers. 15, 16).

8. [It seems appointed that much of the highest instruction should come to us (even in the Bible) through the sufferings and struggles of individual men. Perseverance in the Christian life, is, after all, the basis of St. Paul's character. "I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air; but I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection; lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway." "Not as though I had already attained, but I follow after. This one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." (Dr. Howson's Lectures on the Character of St. Paul, p. 212 f.)—H].

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Warn thy hearers constantly by holding up before them first of all what the Lord commands, and by leading them to observe what they have lost, and by whom they have been deprived of it. —Never glory in the gifts of the Lord, but only in the Lord of the gifts.—Do not leap over the valley of sorrows through which the way to the heights of glory passes.—Thou art never complete, never think thyself complete; what thou hast and art is ever less than what thou shouldst have and be.—Far-seeing, circumspect, self-inspecting, watch all waverings in thyself, that thou mayest not depart from the one way of salvation.

LUTHER:—Thoughtless, full, surfeited souls, if they have once heard a word of God's, act as if it were an old thing, and yawn for something new, as if they were able to do all that they have heard. This is a dangerous plague and wicked artifice of the devil, who thereby renders men confident, secure, over-curious, and ready for every error and schism; and they are guilty of the vice of slothfulness (ἀκηδία) in the service of God (ver. 1).—Flesh and blood say: Something new, else it becomes tiresome. Nay, says Christ, but think of me. The word of God rightly received into the heart, produces neither fullness nor satiety, but greater desire the longer it is known (ver. 1).

JEROME SCHURF:—Sic mutata et corruptam esse ecclesie doctrinam, quia concionatores existimant gloriosum esse, non repetere eadem, sed alia et nova afferre redeuntibus iisdem festis.

STARKE:—God has no respect of persons; before Him the slave has as much worth as the master, the peasant as the noble, the subject as the prince. We see this, indeed, in death, which is God's provost, who uses even justice, and punishes the master with the slave.—It is a humility which becomes those to whom God has lent many talents, and who have also increased them by usury, to act as if they knew it not, and so to give God all the glory.—To boast of one's race, lineage, rank, and external advantages, is a vain ostentation; but we may well praise those on account of their family and descent, who also possess the faith and virtues of their ancestors.—False prophets may perhaps be blameless in their outward walk; but without circumcision of the heart, it is only a coat of whitewash over an old, unsightly wall.—Righteousness of the law is good, but it does not merit blessedness, which is bestowed as a gift only through faith in Christ.—Whoever fancies that he has advanced so far in Christianity that he needs nothing more, may perhaps in God's school hardly sit upon the lowest form. Christians have ever to be learning, and cannot finish their education during their entire life (ver. 15).—In religious matters we ought not to depart a hair's breadth from the prophetic and apostolic doctrine; and thus many errors may be prevented.

RIEGER:—As with the two scales of a balance, when one rises the other falls; and what I add to one, diminishes the relative weight of the other; so as one adds to himself he takes away from the pre-eminence which the knowledge of Christ should have. What he concedes to Christ makes him willing to abase himself, to resign all confidence in his own works. Therefore the sharp expressions, 'to count as loss, as dung,' become in experience not too severe; for to reject the grace of Christ, to regard the great plan of God in sending His Son, as fruitless, were indeed far more terrible (ver. 8).

GERLACH:—The inner and outer life of the Christian upon earth, is a life of suffering in the sorrow which he feels for the sins of others, for his own, and for the distress of others, and for the oppression, conflicts, and even apparent defeats of the children of God. These sufferings are the sufferings of Christ Himself, not merely similar to His; He bears them with His members. His conflicts and their conflicts are the same; it is one cause for which, and one strength in which, they strive; it is one victory and one crown which He has won, and which He gives to them (ver. 10).—'What is behind' signifies in this figure not merely the world and sin, which we have forsaken, but also our own virtue, the actual progress which we have made, on which we are prone to dwell with self-complacency, and so to become unmindful of our great deficiencies and sins (ver. 14).—True Christian perfection, therefore, in this world, the token of a mature Christian, is that, certain of his election in Christ he yet does not regard himself perfect, but painfully perceives the wide space which still intervenes between the righteousness imputed to faith and the sanctification of his entire heart and life, and unceasingly strives to reach the goal.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—Are now the expression of the Apostle John, "Little children, love one another," as he explains it, and the expression of the apostle Paul, "Rejoice in the Lord," one and the same? And are both such that one can say of them with confidence, that they never weary the speaker, and that they always strengthen the hearer?

MENKEN:—The ever recurring exhortation of the apostle to rejoice in the Lord, was adapted to assure them that Christianity is something bright, cheerful, and joyful, to make them certain, confident in their knowledge and walk in opposition to those who imagine that one must mix a bitterness, narrowness, and legal servitude with the mildness, breadth and freedom of the new covenant and its gospel.—There is no one among us, however limited his powers may be, whose weakness and incapacity may not be changed into wisdom and knowledge; his timidity into firmness and fearlessness; his hardness and unloveliness into gentleness and amiability, through our Lord Jesus Christ, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. Hence the Christian religion is vastly different from human morality.—The choice of the best part is never repented of.—As in the life of the body the question is not, whether the man will breathe or not, whether he will make use of the light that is in the world to see or not; but as it is understood, that according to the laws of nature he must breathe, if he will live, and must open his eye to the light, if he will see; and as there is no way of supporting life outside of the atmosphere, and no medium for perceiving the world of matter, except the light; so is there no other way of becoming partakers of the divine light and life except Christ, and no room for the question whether man can do without Christ or not.—All men are under sin and death, and no one comes to the divine light and life, to his own source and end—to God, except through Christ.—The forgiveness of sins is not indeed deliverance from sin, but it is the sure pledge and earnest of future complete deliverance, and is necessary, and must form the beginning.

HEUBNER:—The preacher should not be ever thinking of something new, but of what is useful, edifying. The Sophists made it a charge against Socrates that he repeated the same things.—Lavater's principle of saying at least something in every sermon, which he was certain he had never said before, i. e., something that he had never before spoken either so plainly, or so urgently, or with such a particular application (though the kernel of the sermon must always be the same) is not at variance with that of the Reformers; for they also do not exclude variety in the contents, or diversity in the form of the sermon.—Spiritual sloth may creep over even the converted, so that the Bible becomes dull to them. Bunyan himself complained of this.—What a vast difference between blamelessness before God, and legal blamelessness before men! How can one deceive himself therein!—How many an ecclesiastic buries himself in his studies, while he might be sowing seed for eternity by oral instruction, visits, and the teaching of children. The more earnest in conversion and sanctification, the humbler is our state of mind, and clearer our knowledge of our imperfections, because we then first see and understand how lofty and distant is this goal of perfection, and how great is the work of sanctification. The Christian does not please himself with the conceit that he has already laid hold of, or attained it; this folly is far from him.—The influence of grace is mighty, but not irresistible.—The most advanced Christian thinks least of himself.—The Christian is not yet in quiet possession; he should not rest on his laurels.—The Christian knows that he is ever in arrears, and so long as there are debts still remaining, so long must he also work.—I look not back like Lot's wife towards the Sodom I have left, nor long like the Israelites after the flesh pots of Egypt. Both kinds of looking back are idle and ruinous, for they make us slothful, they lead to unfaithfulness.—Perfect Christians, in the proper sense of that language, are those who know the goal and the way thither, i. e., Christ, and have begun with earnestness to press towards it.—The hope of spiritual growth is conditioned on fidelity, conscientiousness, and adherence to known truth.

PASSAVANT:—Every one who will not deceive God or himself knows in his own heart out of what darkness the light broke forth with him, and out of what darkness old and new, it has long continued to break forth.—Paul forgets what is behind, viz., three things: 1) those objects of pride which he formerly regarded as gain and glory; 2) the sins of his past life in general, and especially the many and great sins which he had committed as a persecutor and blasphemer of the Church; and 3) his progress hitherto in the new divine way of life.

AHLFELD:—The genuine warrior of Christ may not stand still: 1) he knows that he has not yet obtained the prize; 2) in the pursuit of it he never becomes weary; 3) he journeys towards the city of God, having the same mind as his brother.

HARLESS:—Three great foes of Christian and social virtue; 1) the conceit of being perfect; 2) the weakness of looking back; 3) obstinacy and destructiveness of self-will.

LEHMANN:—True progress in the Christian life. 1) From what origin must it proceed? Laid hold of by Christ! 2) By what rule must it shape itself? I have not yet obtained! 3) What end must it seek? The prize of the heavenly calling (vers. 12-14).

[ROBERT HALL:—As every person either has, or expects to have some spring of joy or source of consolation, there is nothing which so much determines our character as that from which we expect this to rise. So if we wish to know ourselves we must examine where this spring or source lies.—We see from the Apostle's account of his experience, that it is very possible for a person to have great zeal for modes, and forms, and ceremonies, and yet be totally ignorant of the spirit of true religion. Real religion is one thing; an attachment to forms and ceremonies another. We may be very zealous for one particular creed, opinion, sect or denomination, and with the credit and conceit of our wisdom yet be very defective in the Christian spirit. This temper leads to malignity of feeling. There may be sufficient in such religion for us to hate one another, but not enough to cause us to love each other. Let us "worship God in spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus," and be taught to value the great truths and promises of the Gospel as all in all (vers. 1, 2, 6).—H].

(CHAPTER III. 17—IV. 1).

17 Brethren, be followers together of me [become imitators of me] and mark them 18 who walk so as ye have us for an ensample. For many walk, of whom I (have) 19 told you often, and [but] now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ; whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, and whose 20 glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things. 'For our conversation [citizen-
 21 ship] is in heaven; from whence also we look for the [a] Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall [will] change [transform] our vile body [the body of our humiliation], that it may be fashioned like² unto his glorious body [the body of his glory], according to the working whereby he is able even [also] to subdue all IV. 1 things unto himself.³ Therefore, my brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved.

³ Ibid. x A B et al. have αὐτῶ. A few copies read ἐαυτῶ [adopted in the received text.—11].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 17. Brethren, become imitators of me, συμμιμηταὶ μου γίνεσθε, ἀδελφοί. 1 Cor. iv. 16: μιμηταὶ μου γίνεσθε. They are to look to the Apostle, to follow him, with him to act on the principle of following the light which they have (τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν, ver. 16). This result is not achieved at once, but by degrees (hence γίνεσθε, 'become'). The συν refers to the Apostle's associates, as is evident from what immediately follows (THEOPHYLACT: συγκαλλᾷ αὐτοῖς τοῖς καλῶς περιπατοῦσιν). [The "associates" are those whom the Apostle would have the Philippians to imitate, together with himself (τίπον ἡμᾶς); and the import of συν more naturally is= 'as ye all a company of imitators' (ELLCOTT).—H]. Hence it is not: una cum Paulo (BENGE), omnes uno consensu et una mente (CALVIN), or superfluous (HEINRICH). Brethren, ἀδελφοί, indicates the fervor of the appeal.—And mark them who walk so, (καὶ σκοπεῖτε τοὺς οὕτως περιπατοῦντες) associates others with Paul, who are models for the church, since they walk as he does.—As ye have us for an ensample (καθὼς ἔχετε τίπον ἡμᾶς) embraces Paul and those who walk like him. 'Ἡμᾶς is thus neither Paul alone, especially as it stands after μου, while besides, we should have in that case ἔχουσιν, instead of ἔχετε, nor Paul and Timothy (SCHENKEL), nor Paul and all approved Christians (MATTHIES), nor ut ego meique socii (VAN HENGEL). The singular (τίπον) is found not only where one is spoken of (1 Tim. iv. 12; Tit. ii. 7), but also in regard to a plurality (1 Thes. i. 7; 2 Thes. iii. 9). In 1 Pet. v. 3 τῶποι occurs where several are meant. The singular here indicates that they all present the same image, belong to the same category. In καθὼς lies unquestionably an argumentative force= 'in the measure' (MEYER).

Ver. 18. The Apostle confirms his exhortation by two contrasts (vers. 18–21).—For many walk (πολλοὶ γὰρ περιπατοῦσιν), since there are many wicked persons who strive to lead others astray, consider us, not them. [They should heed his expostulations the more because there were so many (πολλοί) whom they could not safely imitate. "The persons here meant are not the Judaizing teachers, but the anti-Roman reactionists. This view is borne out by the parallel expression, Rom. xvi. 18: τῷ κυρίῳ ἡμῶν Χριστῷ οὐ δονθενουσιν ἀλλὰ τῇ ἐαυτῶν κοίλῃ, where the same persons seem to be intended; for they are described as creating divisions and offences (ver. 17), as holding plausible language (ver. 18), as professing to be wise beyond others (ver. 19), and yet not innocent in their wisdom: this last reproach being implied in the words θέλω δὲ ἡμᾶς σοφοὺς εἶναι εἰς τὸ ἀγαθόν, ἀκεραίους δὲ εἰς τὸ κακόν. They appear therefore to belong to the same party to which the passages vi. 1–23; xiv. 1–xv. 6, of that epistle are chiefly addressed. For the profession of "wisdom" in these faithless disciples of St. Paul, see 1 Cor. i. 17 sqq.; iv. 18 sqq.; viii. 1 sqq.; x. 15" (LIGHTFOOT). See the remarks on ver. 18.—H]. Περιπατεῖν is not neutral here as in 1 Pet. v. 8, circulantur (HEINRICH), 'go about' (MEYER). It could not stand absolutely after οὕτως περιπατοῦντες. Paul wishes to describe more closely the moral walk of those in question, but he is led away from the adverbial construction by the first relative clause, and proceeds in relative clauses to speak of the end, motive, and character of this walk. Hence neither κακῶς (OCUMEN.) nor longe aliter (GROTIUS). is to be supplied, nor is the concluding limitation (οἱ τὰ ἐπιγίγνα φρονούντες) to be joined with the verb to relieve the difficulty (CALVIN); nor are we to assume that since περιπατοῦσιν in itself needs no qualifying term, the sentence proceeds with en-ture correctness with the subjoined limitations of the subject (ΜΚΡΑ). Those, whose example the Philippians should shun (πολλοί) are according to the entire description members of the church, not false teachers, as in iii. 2; at the most they are those who, led astray by such teachers, have become in turn corrupters of others.—Of whom I told you often, but now tell you even weeping, (ὅς πολλὰκις ἔλεγον ὑμῖν, νῦν δὲ καὶ κλαίων λέγω.) [The imperf. shows the habit:—“was accustomed to speak of.” This is an instance of Paul’s repeating in his letter what he had said in person when he was among the Philippians. See the remarks on ver. 1. The Apostle in this passage, refers evidently to his former warnings, when he was at Philippi.—H]. To understand the remark of passages in the letter itself (iii. 2; i. 15), is untenable; for these here are different persons from those referred to in the passages mentioned. To πολλοί corresponds πολλὰκις. Why he now weeping repeats that which he had formerly said without tears, is well explained by CHRYSOSTOM, ὅτι ἐπέτενε τὸ κακόν. [The evil in the meantime had become more serious.—H]. He writes with deeper emotion, with streaming eyes.—That they are the enemies of the cross of Christ (τοὺς ἐχθρούς τῶν σταυροῦ τοῦ Χριστοῦ) we are to join with ὅς ἔλεγον. [O! this construction see WINKER’S Gram., p. 53].—H]. Paul thus designates those to whom the cross is an offence or foolishness; formerly they may have been Jews or heathen, but now they are Christians, who wish to know nothing of the “fellowship of Christ’s sufferings,” (κοινωνία τῶν παθημάτων Χριστοῦ, ver. 10), to whom the “sufferings of Christ” (παθήματα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, 2 Cor. i. 5) are offensive, who are not willing to suffer with Him, (συνπάσχειν, Rom. viii. 17), nor allow the world to be crucified to them and themselves to the world (Gal. vi. 14), nor crucify their flesh together with its lusts and desires (Gal. v. 24). The Apostle is speaking of immorality of life, ethical errors, while ver. 19 (ὡν ὁ θεὸς ἡ κοιλία) indicates an Epicurean, careless life (ἐν ἡσυχίᾳ ζῶντες καὶ τρυφῇ, CHRYSOSTOM). No reference is made to their doctrine of the cross (THEODORET); or even to theoretical errors, or intellectual misconceptions. The reference is not to those who are not Christians (RILLIET) or hostes evangelii (CALVIN).

Ver. 19. Whose end is destruction (ὡν τὸ τέλος ἀπώλεια) is first mentioned. Hoc ponitur ante alia, quo majore cum horrore hæc legantur; in fine videtur. Finis, ad quem ejusvis rationes tendunt, ostendit sane, que sit ejus conditio (BENGEL). Ἀπώλεια, the opposite of σωτηρία (i. 26) is passive. BENGEL incorrectly regards salvator as the equivalent term, and HEINRICH takes the meaning to be: their end is to destroy Christianity. The end is described by τὸ τέλος (2 Cor. xi. 12-15) as their own peculiar, appointed end.—Whose God is their belly, (ὡν ὁ θεὸς ἡ κοιλία). The belly is termed their God, as being their highest concern, the master whom they serve (Rom. xvi. 18). Κοιλία from κοῖλος, cavus, is venter (Matt. xv. 17; Mark vii. 19; Luke xv. 16) uterus (Luke i. 41, 44; ii. 21; John iii. 4; Matt. xix. 12), and also intima hominis (John vii. 38). It embraces here the organs of sensual desire and of gluttony, not excluding licentiousness, nor re-fering exclusively to it: so that this passage comprehends more than 1 Cor. xv. 32.—And whose glory is in their shame (καὶ ἡ δόξα ἐν τῇ αἰσχύνῃ αὐτῶν). Καὶ takes the place of ὡν. Ἡ δόξα signifies the honor and glory which belong peculiarly to them; that which they conceive to be glory, but which is actually and truly their shame, and will in the end prove to be such. BENGEL well remarks: Deus et gloria ponuntur ut parallela. Sic venter et pudor sunt affima. Id colunt isti, ejus ipsos maxime pudere debet et suo tempore pudebit misere. But there is no reference to circumcision, the genitals (BENGEL, et al.). It is not intimated that they have perverted Christian truth to palliate their moral laxity (WIESINGER).

—Who mind earthly things. The individualizing article αὐτῶν introduces the comprehensive characteristic: τὰ ἐπιγῆα φρονοῦντες. The nominative is the logical subject (MEYER), and it is not vocative (WINKER’S Gram., p. 183).

Ver. 20. For our citizenship is in heaven (ἡμῶν γὰρ τὸ πολίτευμα ἐν οὐρανοῖς ἐστίν). The confirmatory sentence (γάρ) points back like vers. 18, 19, to ver. 17, and states why the Philippians should look to Paul and to those who walk as he does (ἡμῶν as in ver. 17 ἡμῶς). [Their souls are mundane and grovelling. They have no fellowship with us; for we are citizens of a heavenly commonwealth. The emphatic position of ἡμῶν contrasts the false adherents of St. Paul with the true (LIGHTFOOT). On the state of the text see the notes.—H]. Πολίτευμα, found only here, in the N. T., denotes according to its termination and its derivation (from πολιτεῖν ἐσθαι i. 27) citizenship, commonwealth, the rank and rights of a citizen. Comp. πολιτείαν ταύτην ἐκτός σου, Acts xxii. 28. True Christians have nothing to do with an earthly possession and existence simply, but are citizens of the heavenly (ἐν οὐρανοῖς) Jerusalem (Gal. iv. 26; Rom. v. 2; viii. 24; 2 Thes. ii. 8; Heb. xii. 22, 23) even here. We are not to join ἐπάρχει with ἐν οὐρανοῖς, as if the citizenship did not exist here at all, but to regard ἐν οὐρανοῖς as descriptive of the character of the πολίτευμα rather than the place. Hence this sentence does not confirm the conclusion of ver. 19 (WINKER’S Gram. p. 453, MEYER, et al.); for it is not pertinent to say ‘for this very reason I warn you against them,’ since he does not warn but exhorts them. It does not confirm καθὼς ἔχετε τύπον ἡμῶς (WIESINGER), but συμμητρὰ μου γίνεσθε καὶ ἀκοῦτε τοὺς οὕτως περιπατοῦντες (ver. 17). Nor does it present the higher glory of the true Christian as the cause of his deep sorrow over the misconduct of the enemies of the cross (SCHENKEL), since καὶ κλαίων is too subordinate a remark. Again, πολίτευμα is not ἀναστροφή, walk. (LEATHER) nor does it refer to the Messiah’s kingdom which has not yet appeared (MEYER), for it exists already even upon earth, and only waits for its completion.—From whence also we look for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ. Ἐξ οὗ, an adverbial expression, equivalent to unde (Vulg., WINKER’S Gram., p. 141 sq.) refers to ἐν οὐρανοῖς, not to πολίτευμα (BENGEL) but is not equivalent to ex quo (ERASMUS), nor even to ἐκ ὧν (MATTHIES). Καὶ before σωτήρα indicates that He is looked for (ἀπεκδεχόμεθα, an awaiting, ad finem usque, perseveranter expectare, Rom. viii. 19, 23, 25; 1 Cor. i. 7; Gal. v. 5) not merely as κύριος in their πολίτευμα, in contrast with the θεός of the enemies of the cross, but also as a Saviour, in contrast with their 'destruction' (ἀπώλεια). Comp. Luke xviii. 7, 8; xxi. 28. Καί points neither to a relation corresponding to what has been said of their citizenship (MEYER), nor to 'conduct' (WIESINGER), which does not agree with ἀπεκδεχόμεθα.

Ver. 21. Who will transform the body of our humiliation (ὅς μετασχηματίσει τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν) explains how the Lord will manifest Himself as σωτήρ. The reference is to a future transformation which relates to the σχῆμα or fashion of the body (ii. 8; 2 Cor. xi. 13, 14; 1 Cor. iv. 6); and not to its identity. Hence Paul does not speak of the body alone as the object of the change (τὸ σῶμα) but adds the genitive of characterization (WINER'S Gram., p. 187 sq.), namely, τῆς ταπεινώσεως, as in Col. i. 22: σῶμα τῆς σαρκός; Rom. vi. 8; τῆς ἁμαρτίας; vii. 24; τοῦ θανάτου τούτου. CHRYSOSTOM well observes: πολλὰ πάσχει νῦν τὸ σῶμα, δεμνείται, μαστιγίζεται, μυρία πάσχει δεινά. But we must also include here the carnal, the sinful in man's nature; for it is that especially which makes up the ταπεινώσις ἡμῶν. Not merely the body, but we ourselves (note the ἡμῶν) suffer these things, which constitute this humiliation, that cleaves to the body. The object or result of the transformation is now stated.—That it may be fashioned like unto the body of his glory, σύνμορφον τῷ σώματι τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ. The breviloquence (or adj., instead of a sentence) is like 1 Thess. iii. 13; Matt. xii. 13. See WINER'S Gram., p. 624 sq. Out of this arose the variation noted in the critical remarks. The body is now no longer σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως, but has become σῶμα τῆς δόξης, and as that was ours (ἡμῶν) so this is his (αὐτοῦ). The body comes forth from our present humiliation, and becomes a participant in the glory of Him who has transformed it. This is to be effected by the change which makes it like, conformed to, the body of His glory; hence through a transformation into His image (Rom. viii. 29), which begins even here (2 Cor. iii. 18; μεταμορφοῦμεθα). [The body is that which exhibits His glory not merely because He has it in His glorified state, but because His glory in that state so pre-eminently appears in the spiritual body with which He is there clothed, and which stands forth as the type of the spiritual body into which every one of His true followers will be transformed.—H.] HÖLEMANN joins ἡμῶν with σῶμα, αὐτοῦ with σώματι. HAMMOND explains σῶμα as the church: LUTHER supposes only the weakness and frailty of the body to be meant, MEYER, the change which first begins at the time of Christ's second advent. All of these views are more or less faulty. He has the power necessary to produce such a transformation.—According to the working whereby he is able also to subdue all things unto himself. On κατὰ τὴν ἐνέργειαν, see Eph. i. 19, where τοῦ κράτους τῆς ἰσχύος αὐτοῦ is added, while here we have τοῦ δυνάσθαι αὐτὸν καὶ ὑποτάξει αὐτῷ τὰ πάντα. Since all things are and must be subject to Him, He can also (καὶ) transform the (body μετασχηματίζων); for the καὶ connects that verb with ὑποτάξει. It is an argumentum a maiori (ὑποτάξει αὐτῷ τὰ πάντα) ad minus (μετασχηματίζων). Comp. 1 Cor. xv. 25-28; 50-57. It is incorrect for HÖLEMANN to connect δύνασθαι and ὑποτάξει by καὶ, as if Paul would say that He is able to do all things and subject all things to Himself. [Τὰ πάντα is stronger with the article: not only this, but all the things together which require infinite power (comp. ver. 8).—H.]

CHAP. IV. Ver. 1. Therefore (ὥστε) introduces the conclusion, as in ii. 12. The section extends from iii. 1 to iv. 1, not merely from iii. 17 to iii. 21 (MEYER); for στήκετε ἐν κυρίῳ points back to χαίrete ἐν κυρίῳ. [So extended a reference of ὥστε is uncommon and not necessary here. In view of the glorious destiny which awaits those whose citizenship is above, they should persevere and not frustrate such a hope (vers. 20, 21). Comp. 1 Cor. xv. 58.—H.]—My brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, is an expression of his love and recognition of them. Ἀδελφοί μου indicates the relation of fellow-believers with respect to the personal fellowship, which not only renders the Philippians an object of special love (ἀγαπητοί), but also of earnest longing (καὶ ἐπιπόθητοι; comp. i. 8). [The Apostle's separation from them was so painful because his affection for them was so strong.—H.] Χαρά marks the personal, στέφανός μου the official relation: they are the joy of his heart and the honor of his office (SCHENKEL). The first expression refers to the present, the second reaches onward into the future. [The στέφανος among the Greeks was the emblem of victory, and not of regal power or dignity, which was denoted by διάδημα. On this distinction see SMITH'S Dictionary of the Bible, vol. i. p. 597 (Amer. ed.) Hence "his converts will be his wreath of victory;" for it will appear that he "did not run in vain," (ii. 26), and he will receive the successful athlete's reward. Comp. 1 Cor. ix. 25 (LIGHTFOOT).—H.]—So stand fast in the Lord (οὕτως στήκετε ἐν κυρίῳ); i. e., as I and those who walk with me stand (iii. 17) and as I have exhorted you (iii. 1 sq.) Comp. i. 27. BENDEL, incorrectly, ita, ut statis, state [which disagrees with ii. 17.—H.].—Beloved (ἀγαπητοί) thus repeated shows his ardent affection for them.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The instinct of imitation gives force to the power of example; and the Apostle here does not present merely his own apostolic character, but joins with himself those who walk with him.—Sympathy and community of feeling render specially effective an example which embodies ethical views and principles. Hence precisely in the section where the citizenship of Christians in heaven is brought forward, this appeal is specially appropriate. Manifest as may be the forms of life in individuals, they are yet features of one image; they harmonize with each other, are not discordant; the many reflect one type (τυπός). The power and frequency of evil example (1 Cor. xv. 33) make it the more necessary to regard the Apostle's exhortation.

2. Enmity to the cross of Christ, which takes offence at Christ's form as a sufferer, and His path of suffering wherein His followers ought to walk, has its ground not exclusively indeed, but to a great extent, in a sensual character, subject to the lust of the world, by which many are governed even in the church. From an occasional, easy, and subtle service of the senses it may come to be uninterrupted and overbearing. Gentleness towards the natural man is cruelty towards the spiritual. Forbearance towards sensual desire ends in the loss of eternal glory, and that which passes current under the forms of conventional propriety, is in truth often a shame and disgrace.

3. The stand-point in the Christian life which fixes the eye on the future, the familiarity with God which maintains a close connection with the church, militant on earth but triumphant in heaven, and does not suffer the child of God to forget his eternal inheritance, affords the surest protection against evil example, and gives to good example its strongest attractive power.

4. [NEANDER:—The earthly mind Paul would say (vers. 19-21) must be far from us, who are Christians; 'for our conversation,' (more correctly 'citizenship') is in heaven.] His meaning is, that Christians, as to their life, their walk, belong even now to heaven; in the whole direction of their life existing there already.—This he deduces from their relation to Christ, their fellowship with Him to whom they are inseparably united, so that where He is there are they also. While here, they are sustained by the consciousness that Christ now lives in heaven, manifested to believers, though hidden from the world. Thither is their gaze directed, as their longings rise towards a Saviour, who will come again from thence to make them wholly like Himself, to fashion them wholly after His own glorious pattern, to transform them wholly into the heavenly. Hence Paul says: "From whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change the body of our humiliation, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." There is not presented here a resurrection, as a restoration merely of the same earthly body in the same earthly form; but, on the contrary, a glorious transformation, proceeding from the divine, the all-subduing power of Christ; so that believers, free from all the defects of the earthly existence, released from all its barriers, may reflect the full image of the heavenly Christ in their whole glorified personality, in the soul pervaded by the divine life and its now perfectly assimilated glorified organ.—H.]

5. [CHR. WORDSWORTH:—Christ, at His own transfiguration, gave a pledge and glimpse of the future glorious transformation of the risen body, and thus prepared the apostles to suffer with Him on earth, in order that they may be glorified forever with Him, in body and soul, in heaven (N. T. Commentary, vol. ii. p. 357).—H.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

In lack of faith is found the cause of lack of joy.—There is no true renewal without humbly going to the cross of Christ. The bodies of many who profess to be renewed, are temples of the god of the belly and of his servants to whom Christ's cross is so entirely an offence, that they are even its enemies.—He who does not see the Easter sun rising behind the cross on Golgotha is no true Christian, does not cling fast to the good example of the apostles, and the faithful in the church, and becomes himself an evil example which may frighten away and even destroy others.

STARKE:—Not all who point out the way to heaven will themselves be received into it. Many helped to build the ark of Noah who did not enter it.—Thou rejoicest when thou canst lay off an old garment and put on a new one: why art thou troubled because thy body shall experience corruption? By this means it lays aside not only what is worthless but attains to a glorious transformation (ver. 21).

RIEGER:—Our house, home, city, and fatherland where we belong, the seeking and hoping for which govern all our thoughts, are not mere fancies to be grasped only by the imagination, but exist in heaven; God has prepared them there; and faith in His word affords us a complete representation of them.

GERLACH:—Every one who is not redeemed by Christ's cross from sin and from the present evil world, serves his flesh and minds earthly things, though his imagination take ever so exalted flights, though he be a philosopher, or a slave to grovelling lusts.—No Christian can find perfect rest until even the last trace of sin is overcome and destroyed: hence his life upon earth is a life of waiting and longing.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—If a man still values and seeks sensual good he is then an enemy of the cross of Christ. If he has earthly honor in view, and desires to distinguish himself before the world, he is then an enemy of the shame of Christ which accompanied His sufferings.—Eternal life is not to be thought of apart from a man's reconciliation with himself and with Christ, who has left peace as His most beautiful legacy to His followers.

HEUBNER:—They who will not recognize the crucified Redeemer as their only righteousness, who are proud of their legal virtue, are as much enemies of the cross of Christ as those who from a fleshly mind will not follow the crucified Redeemer, nor crucify their flesh together with its lusts and desires.—Pride and the lust of the world can make a man an enemy of the cross of Christ.—The holiest thing may become an offence to a corrupt heart, and excite violent opposition.—Even evil examples must be salutary to the Christian, because they deter him from evil: they present it to him in all its fearfulness and render him anxious for himself.—The man who opposes the cross of Christ, labors for his own ruin.—That which is honorable with God, the worldly man does not understand at all.—The present body disturbs the heavenly life; and hence this body is to be glorified. The future body will promote, facilitate the spiritual life. We are to attain to a complete likeness to Christ, even the body is to become like His; but as the condition of this the soul here must first resemble His soul. The power of Christ extends to the new creation of our bodies and of the world.—Though difficult, the Christian may guard himself against the destructive influence of evil examples. 1) He has no lack of good examples around him; 2) He sees the fearfulness of evil examples; 3) He has a heavenly calling.—There is a Christian use of bad examples as well as good.

PASSAVANT:—This is the three-fold divine working of the one Redeemer; He has redeemed His people from the curse of sin through His blood; He redeems them more and more by His Holy Spirit from the power of sin, and He will finally redeem them from all misery and all oppression in this evil, godless world, and bring them to His heavenly kingdom.

[NEANDER:—Each one is required to apply to his own life the measure of spiritual discernment bestowed upon him (ver. 16).—All progressive revelation of the Spirit, all new light of which man is made partaker, presupposes a faithful application of what has previously been given (ver. 15).—If each one were careful to put in practice with strict fidelity his own measure of Christian knowledge, without contending with others about matters wherein they differ from himself, how many schisms might have been avoided in the church, how many differences might for its interest have been overcome and adjusted!—H.]

VI. SECTION FIFTH.

Concluding exhortations designed to secure co-operation between the Philip-plans and the Apostle.

CHAPTER IV. 2-20.

(1). Exhortation to unity addressed to individuals.

CHAP. IV. 2, 3.

2 I beseech Euodias [Euodia]¹, and [I] beseech Syntyche, that they be of the same
3 mind in the Lord. (And) [Yea]² I entreat thee also, true yoke fellow, help those [these] women,³ who labored [strove] with me in the gospel, with Clement also, and with other⁴ [others] my fellow laborers, whose names are in the book of life.

² Ver. 2. [The common text has καί, but καί is undoubtedly the correct reading.—H.]

⁴ Ibid. [For this use of 'other' (=others) see the note on ii. 3. Instead of the appositional form it may be rendered: 'the rest of my co-laborers.'—H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 2. I beseech Euodia, and I beseech Syntyche, 'Εὐδοκίαν παρακαλῶ καὶ Συντύχην παρακαλῶ. From the general exhortation (ver. 1) the Apostle passes to one addressed to individuals. The relation of the persons being known to the readers, it was unnecessary to describe it. The repeated παρακαλῶ, I exhort (not so correctly beseech) indicates that each of them needed the admonition; they were both in fault. The repetition is not merely ad vehementiam affectus significandam (ERASMUS). The names, common also elsewhere, belong to women, as αἰναις (ver. 3) demands; but the persons are otherwise unknown. GROTIUS incorrectly regards both as men. HAMMOND regards only the second as a man, and BAUER both as parties. SCHWEGLER regards the first as the Jewish party, the second as the Gentile Christian party; but they did not labor with Paul (συνήθλησαν μοι). The Apostle exhorts:—That they be of the same mind in the Lord (τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν ἐν κυρίῳ). See ii. 2. On this agreement the Apostle lays special stress; it belongs to the στήκετε ἐν κυρίῳ. They must in some way have been alienated, but on what occasion, in what cause or manner, is not stated or hinted. Hence it cannot be said that, as the expression is borrowed from ii. 2, the motives for this estrangement must have corresponded to those mentioned in ii. 3 (WIESINGER, DE WETTE). With as little reason can it be said that they are deaconesses. [Those who hold that such an order existed in the primitive church generally think that these women belonged to it, and that their variance was the more unworthy on that account.—H.]

Ver. 3. Yea I entreat thee also, true yoke fellow. καί, very common as particula affirmantis, but as particula obsecrantis, only elsewhere in Rev. xxii. 20. It indicates the seriousness of the affair to the Apostle that he turns with his entreaties (ἐρωτῶ), to still another (καὶ σε) besides the women. It is not clear who it is that he invokes in γῆσι αἰζυγε. The substantive, in the N. T. found only here, is plain from its opposite, ἐπερὶ ζυγεῖν (2 Cor. vi. 14), as also from the use of ζυγός (figuratively: Matt. xi. 29, 30; Acts xv. 10; Gal. v. 1; literally, 1 Tim. vi. 1; Rev. vi. 5); hence partner, associate, and the relation of this person to Paul is described as very close, as that of one who draws at the same yoke with himself. It is a stricter connection than that of συνεργός. The epithet γῆσι describes the nature and character of this person (ii. 20) as genuine, pure, true. Hence it cannot appear strange that Paul did not address him by name: every one is supposed to know him. It is incorrect to regard αἰζυγε as a name (CHRYSOSTOM, MEYER, distinctly; WIESINGER with hesitation), as a designation of Epaphroditus (GROTIUS), or of Timothy (EUSTIUS), for these could not have been addressed as in Philippi; or arbitrarily of Silas (BENGEL), of the husband of one of two women (the Greek interpreters), or of Paul's wife (CLEMENS ALEX., ERASMUS, et al.) contrary to the history (1 Cor. vii. 8) and against the grammar (masculine form). [The noun may be masculine or feminine, but the adj. has properly three terminations, and must be masculine here. Other conjectures, on the supposition that an anonymous person is meant are, that it may have been Luke who appears to have been absent from Rome when the Epistle was written (see on i. 1) or Epaphroditus (LIGHTFOOT) at the side of Paul as he wrote, and whom he addressed (παρεκαλῶ) at the moment.—H.] LAURENT's view (Neutest. Studien, pp. 134-137) is worthy of notice. In reply to the assertion that the name Syzygus does not occur, he remarks that names are not objects of literature, but products of social or civil life, as for example, Onesimus, Tryphena, and Tryphosa (Rom. xvi. 12). He explains the passage thus: "Thou, who, a genuine Syzygus, hast already by thy birth (γῆσι) and thy name been called to be a yoke fellow and helper of all laborers in the vineyard of the Lord, lay hold now also of the work together with these two sisters, that they through thy aid may carry it forward with one spirit, not as heretofore, in discord! For Paul does not mean to blame them (as in ii. 20) but to praise them, and hence would not imply that he has only one γῆσι αἰζυγον in Philippi." Like Eὐδία (way of faith), Syntyche and Syzygus appear to him to have been names received after baptism, as in the case of others, whose names are more familiar to us. [The best view after all seems to be that of MEYER, LAURENT, and others, that Syzygus or Synzygus (συνζυγός) is a proper name, borne by one who had been associated with Paul in Christian labors, who was at Philippi when the Apostle wrote the letter, and was well known there as deserving the encomium which this appeal to him implies. Paul nowhere uses this word (αἰζυγός) of any one of his official associates, being used in fact nowhere else in the N. T.: it is found here in the midst of other proper names (vers. 2, 3); and the attributive γῆσι corresponds finely and significantly to the appellative sense of such a name. That such an alliteration is not foreign to Paul's manner, see Philem., vers. 10, 11. The name, it is true, does not appear anywhere else; but many other names also are found only in single instances, and certainly many names to us must have been in use among the ancients which have not been transmitted at all. Paul himself repeatedly mentions persons in his epistles who are named only once, and a catalogue of names might be made out from the Acts of the Apostles, of those whose whole history for us lies in a single passage. See MEYER's Brief an die Philipper on iv. 3.—H.]—Help these women (σὺν λαμβάνου αὐταῖς) presents the object of the request. The verb (Luke v. 1) signifies 'to take hold vigorously with,' 'to assist one,' i. e., here to re-establish harmony. It is not ut habeant, unde se suosque sustentent (GROTIUS), against the context.—Who strove with me in the gospel, states the motive for helping these women in the work of reconciliation. Hence he adds αἰτεῖς—ut que (see Eph. i. 23). Ἐν εὐαγγελίῳ marks the sphere, as in 1 Thes. iii. 2, in which they had labored with him (συνήρῳ λησάν μοι). The verb points back to the beginning of Christianity at Philippi, when the women embraced it (Acts xvi. 13), and had exerted themselves to advance it. They had contended at Paul's side for the gospel, and ought not now to strive against one another, against Christianity and against Paul; they are so useful and deserving in other respects, they should be right also in their relation to each other.—With Clement also, and with my other fellow-laborers (μετὰ καὶ Κλήμεντος καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν συνεργῶν μου), brings to view the fact that various persons at Philippi at that time were harmoniously engaged in behalf of the gospel, men, as Clement and others, as well as (καὶ-καὶ) women associated with them. Paul thus exalts the merits of Syntyche and Eudodia who labored in such company. Clement was a Philippiian; which is evident, but nothing further, not even that he was a teacher (MEYER). We have no right to suppose him to have been Clemens Romanus (Catholics), or Flavius Clemens, Domitian's patruelis (BAUR). He does not of course mention the λοιποὶ συνεργοί by name, because it is superfluous, as in the case of the γῆσι αἰζυγός. [The closer proximity and the nature of the thought connect μετὰ συνεργῶν μου with συνήρῳ λησάν, rather than with σὺν λαμβάνου αὐταῖς. The position and influence of the women as co-partners in Christian service with Paul and his associates rendered the spectacle and effects of such strife the more deplorable, and thus enforced the appeal (σὺν λαμβάνου) to strive the more earnestly to promote harmony between them.—H.] In his joy on their account he adds:—Whose names are in the book of life, ὧν ὀνόματα ἐν βιβλῷ ζωῆς. [We are to refer ὧν ζωῆς of τῶν λοιπῶν apart from CLEMENT, because the Apostle having named the latter would recognize the others though unnamed by him, as yet having their names written in heaven (MEYER, ELLICOTT and others). This expression does not of itself decide whether these other fellow-laborers were living or dead, but certainly it is altogether improbable that Clement was the only one of them who still remained.—H.] The figurative expression was suggested perhaps by iii. 20, for the registers of the citizens of Israel, out of which one's name was erased on his decease prepared the way for the expression כִּפֶּר חַיִּים (Exodus xxxii. 32; Isa. iv. 3; Ezek. xiii. 9; Ps. lxi. 29; Dan. xii. 1) which was adopted in the N. T. (Luke x. 20; Acts iii. 5; xiii. 8; xvii. 8; xx. 15) in order to mark the certainty of the eternal inheritance, the blessedness which is to be reached by faithful striving. [It is clear from the expression "blotting out of the book," (Rev. iii. 5) that the image suggested no idea of absolute predestination. For the use of the phrase in Rabbinical writers see Wetstein here (LIGHTFOOT).—H.] 'Eori is to be supplied, not the optative (BENGEL). It is the joyful certainty, not a wish that Paul has in mind here.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The servant of the word of God ought not only to exhort the whole church from the pulpit, but also with a special care for souls to warn individuals.

2. The pastor in his oversight of souls should not stand alone, but be aided by others properly qualified. The lay-element should be cultivated for the service of the church.

3. Goodness at the beginning does not protect one from a fall afterward, nor courageous striving for the gospel from ill-natured arrogance towards others, nor the vanquishing of outward foes from weak indulgence towards one's self.

4. The unity of the church as a body must extend into the narrowest circle of neighborhood and home.

5. He who will exhort, incite others, must generously recognize what is praiseworthy, and attach himself to the good which already exists.

6. Women are to be highly esteemed in the church for their services; but they should act with men (μετά), and not work independently.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—There are peace-disturbers enough, but not so many peace-makers. To the work then! and help check those who love contention, and thus make peace!—Even women are to help in extending the kingdom of God with their prayers, gifts, good counsel, etc., and to contend fearlessly for the gospel.

RIEGER:—A tried, approved mediator can often by the grace of God adjust many difficulties.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—Let us strive with all our powers to extend Christian fellowship, and yet not weaken it.

HEUBNER:—To have a genuine colleague is not a privilege granted to every one (ver. 3).

(2) General exhortation to Christian joy.

(CHAPTER IV. 4-7).

4, 5 Rejoice in the Lord always: (and)¹ again I [will] say, rejoice. Let your moderation [gentleness] be known to all men: The Lord is at hand. Be careful for nothing; but in everything, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your request [requests] be known unto [before] God. And the peace of God, which passeth [every] understanding, shall keep [guard] your hearts and [your] minds through [in] Christ Jesus.

¹ Ver. 4. [This 'and' in the A. V. answers to καί in the common text, which is, however, unwarranted. For the asyndeton which thus occurs, see WINER'S Gram., p. 537. See the notes below on ἐρῶ.—H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 4. Rejoice in the Lord always (χαίrete ἐν κυρίῳ πάντοτε) takes up in connection with ver. 3 (ὡν ὀνόματα ἐν βίβρω ζωῆς) the theme of the epistle. See iii. 1. A tone of special emphasis rests on "always" (πάντοτε): there lies the difficulty and the glory of rejoicing in the Lord.—Again I will say, rejoice (πάλιν ἐρῶ, χαίrete) repeats the command with emphasis.—BENGEL incorrectly joins πάντοτε with πάλιν.—[The verb (ἐρῶ) is future, not present, as in the A. V. This reiterated exhortation is the more remarkable when we recollect that Paul as he wrote or dictated the letter had his right arm chained to the arm of a Roman soldier, or at all events was a prisoner under the eye of a sentinel who never left him (see Acts xxviii. 20).—H.]

Ver. 5. Let your forbearance be known to all men, though without any external notation, connects itself logically with χαίrete, since joy has of itself a tendency to make us mild and gentle: gaudium in domino parit veram equitatem erga proximum, (BENGEL). Τὸ ἐπιεικὲς ὑμῶν is stronger than the substantive, ἐπιεικεία (2 Cor. x. 1; Acts xxiv. 4), and implies that this quality (τὸ ἐπιεικὲς) pervades the entire nature of the ὑμῶν. Comp. iii. 8; Rom. ii. 4; Heb. vi. 17. It signifies mildness, forbearance, (used with ἄμαχος, 1 Tim. iii. 3; Tit. iii. 2; between εἰρημική and εὐπειθής, Jas. iii. 17; with ἀγαθός, 1 Pet. ii. 18), hence not 'becoming conduct' (MATTHIES). It is to be known to all (γινωσθήτω πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις) without exception, to strangers, and so much the more to neighbors, because they have such occasion to see it manifested towards themselves and towards others. The context leads us to think more directly of the adjustment of difficulties, the removal of dissension (vers. 2, 3) for effecting which the gentleness which spares the delinquent is a great assistance. [The ἐπιεικὲς ἑαυτοῦ stands in contrast to the ἀκριβοδικαίος, as being satisfied with less than is one's due. ARIST. Eth. Nic., v. 10 (LIGHTFOOT).—II.]—The Lord is at hand (ὁ κύριος ἐγγύς) in whom they are to rejoice, hence Christ, under whose eye they are to walk and act, who will also judge them: iudex vobis propitius, vinlex in malis (BENGEL). This is a strong motive to the exercise of forbearance. We are not to refer κύριος to God (CALVIN), since πρὸς τὸν θεόν follows in ver. 6, and the subject here is not that of the providence of God, but the παρουσία or advent of Christ. MEYER incorrectly joins it with what follows. [This nearness of Christ admits of other explanations. It may mean that He is ever near to His people as their efficient supporter and helper, so that with such an arm to defend them they have nothing to fear from the power or malice of their enemies (comp. Matt. xiii. 11; 1 Pet. iv. 7); or, more probably, that He is always near to them in point of time, will soon come to relieve them of their cares and trials, and receive them to their appointed rewards and rest in heaven (John xiv. 3; Rom. xiii. 11, sq.). See note on i. 7. There is no necessary, certainly no exclusive, reference here to a definite expectation of the near advent of Christ, and the end of the world.*—II.]

Ver. 6. Be careful for nothing. (μὴδὲν μεριμνᾶτε) enjoins freedom from anxiety since gaudium in domino legitimam securitatem in suis rebus parit (BENGEL). Μὴδὲν, accusative of the object, excludes every subject of harassing care, whether fruitless labor or the events which precede the Lord's advent (ver. 5); hence not anxious solicitude merely is forbidden (GROTIUS).—But in every thing (ἀλλ' ἐν παντί) is the antithesis to μὴδὲν (comp. Eph. v. 24).—By prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be known unto God. (τῇ προσευχῇ καὶ τῇ δεήσει μετὰ εὐχαριστίας τὰ αἰτήματα ὑμῶν γνωρίζεσθω πρὸς τὸν θεόν) is the antithesis of μεριμνᾶτε. He who rejoices in the Lord has not to do with 'earthly things' (τὰ ἐπίγεια, iii. 19). Τὰ αἰτήματα ὑμῶν, are the contents or objects of the prayers, desideria vestra (Luke xxiii. 24; 1 John v. 15). The verb γνωρίζεσθω has a threefold limitation: 1) the way (τῇ προσευχῇ καὶ τῇ δεήσει) which the article points out as the appointed one, and its repetition as consisting of two parts or acts (on the difference see Eph. vi. 18); 2) the accompaniment: μετὰ εὐχαριστίας (comp. Eph. v. 4; Col. ii. 7; iv. 2), which should never be wanting in prayer and request; and 3) the direction (πρὸς τὸν θεόν) to whom the prayer should be directed. We are not to run to men with our complaints and lamentations. BENGEL well points out the connection of vers. 4-6: tristitiam et curam comitatur morositas.

Ver. 7. And the peace of God, which passeth every understanding. Καὶ adds now a promise. Joy in the Lord is accompanied by the peace of God, etc. The genitive marks the author (see Eph. i. 2; Col. iii. 15; and comp. WINER'S Gram., p. 186), and the participial clause the value of the peace which as the context shows must be understood as an inward state or peace of soul, in contrast with violence (ver. 5), anxiety (ver. 6) and in connection with joy (ver. 4). Hence 'the peace' (εἰρήνη) is not harmony with one another (MEYER), which does not accord with the following predicates, nor reconciliation with God (ERASMUS), which peace of soul presupposes, and on which it is founded. This peace of God is a possession defined as ἡ ὑπερέχουσα πάντα νοῦν, i. e., towering above (ii. 3; iii. 8; Eph. iii. 19) the reach of man's understanding, however strong it may be (πάντα νοῦν), (Eph. iv. 17). The comparison is between peace as the object of emotion and experience, and the understanding as the perceptive or rational faculty, and not between the incomprehensibility of this peace and the understanding (ERASMUS, res felicitior, quam ut humana mens queat percipere, and so MEYER et al.) [According to MEYER'S view (1859) the comparison lies in the efficacy of God's peace, on the one hand, and of man's reason or understanding on the other, to lift the soul above disquietude and the power of the world. So essentially LIGHTFOOT: 'Surpassing every device or counsel' of man, i. e., which is far better, which produces a higher satisfaction, than all punctilious self-assertion, all anxious forethought. ELLICOTT translates: 'which overpasseth every understanding,' i. e., 'which transcends every effort and attempt on the part of the understanding to grasp and realize it.' The similarity between the language here and Eph. iii. 20 speaks almost decisively for the latter and more obvious interpretation: 'Who is able to do exceedingly abundantly above all that we ask or think,' αὐτοῦμεθα ἢ νοοῦμεν.—II.] We are not to think at all here of the doubting or perplexed understanding (DE WETTE).—Shall keep your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus, characterizes the efficacy of the peace in question. The verb (φοιρήσεται) signifies to guard, while the tense marks the continuance of this protection; it is a promise, assurance, not a wish (VULG., custodiat, et al.) The object τὰς καρδίας ὑμῶν καὶ τὰ νοήματα ὑμῶν, is the inner personality, made emphatic and exhaustive by the repeated article and pronoun. BENGEL: cor sedes cogitationum. Comp. 2 Cor. iii. 14, 15. Thus the whole and its parts, the principal and derivative, in the individual's life, are preserved adversus omnes insultus et curas (BENGEL); or ὥστε μένειν καὶ μὴ ἐκπεσεῖν αὐτοῦ, τῆς πίστεως (CHRYSOSTOM). Comp. 1 Pet. i. 5. [The νοήματα reside in and issue from the καρδιά (comp. 2 Cor. iii. 14, 15); for in the Apostle's language καρδιά is the seat of thought as well as of feeling (LIGHTFOOT)—II.] This result is accomplished ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, and hence apart from Him it does not spring from any inherent efficacy in the peace itself. Without His aid it is not possible to abide with Him, to obtain or to keep His gifts.

*[NEANDER suggests still another, or at least a modified interpretation. The consciousness that 'the Lord is nigh,' furnishes a motive for the exercise of forbearance under provocation. His persecuted people walk in the sight of the Lord and dare not give way to passion in the near presence of Him, who endured every wrong with heavenly patience and long-suffering. This consciousness that the Lord is near will also restrain them from wishing to anticipate His justice, to take the work of retribution into their own hands.—II.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Joy in the Lord is the theme of this epistle, and the chief feature in the portrait of the Christian. On this frame of mind much depends: gentleness towards all men, in word and deed, since it causes many a provocation to pass unnoticed, or to be borne patiently; freedom from care and delight in prayer, for the Christian knows and frequents the way to God, and casts all his care upon Him who cares for him, being driven by care to prayer, and by prayer driving away care; inward peace, which God has wrought, and continues to strengthen in the soul.

2. Our consciousness of the nearness of the Lord, is strengthened by our very joy in the Lord, which is only perfected in the other world, so that we feel His coming to be a blessing, and desire it (ver. 5).

3. The prayer for what is lacking should never be separated from thanksgiving for what has been granted (ver. 6).

4. All that moves, disquiets thee, may and should become a subject of prayer, but the sort of prayer, manifold as may be the reason for it, is definite, and not every prayer avails.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—Two things trouble us: sin and affliction: on the other hand we find here a double incitement to rejoice in the Lord; Rejoice!—A Christian must be no towering tulip, but rather a humble violet, dispensing everywhere a sweet perfume.—Thou lion and tyrant in thy house! When an honorable man, a stranger approaches thee, thou ceasest perhaps to scold, and curse, and rage: why hast thou not as much reverence for the Lord who is near thee?—To care is God's part, but to labor and in prayer to commit the issue to Him, is ours.—To-day peace, to-morrow war! So it was formerly in the world, so it is now and so it will be to the end; but the peace of God is an eternal peace.

RIEGER:—Everything in the Lord's life, character, and experience is indeed a cause of joy to you. His condescension in His incarnation and birth, His walk in the world, His sufferings, cross, and death, His life and glory, His present concealment in God, His revelation from heaven ever near and nearer to us.—One may have the inward ground of joy in the Lord, though he has not the same susceptibility at one time as at another.—Yet joy in the Lord does not lead one to violent outbursts, or on the other hand to sit indolently, but to work, and it is this exercise which keeps it pure. A joyful follower of our Lord Jesus Christ, has to deal with different men, who in many ways have need of his forbearance.—Sometimes, indeed, even our reason performs good service against care, and promotes contentment of mind. But too often our reason is itself the fountain of many cares, or at least meets with cases where it is entirely helpless.—Out of the heart the life flows; if it is not protected it evaporates, and the senses bring in many a thing from the world, which has power to disturb our contentment.

GERLACH:—Let the Lord who in grace and judgment is ever near His people, care for all things. Address no prayer to Him, even out of the deepest distress, without thanksgiving; for even in the greatest misery you have more reason for thanksgiving and joy than for sorrow and complaint. Thus you can maintain joy in the Lord and gentleness towards men, at the same time.

[ROBERT HALL:—Seek repose by prayer. If your mind be overcharged or overwhelmed with trouble and anxiety, go into the presence of God. Spread your case before Him. Though He knows the desires of your hearts, yet He has declared He "will be sought after;" He will be "inquired of to do it for you." Go, therefore, into the presence of that God who will at once tranquillize your spirit, give you what you wish, or make you more happy without it and who will be your everlasting consolation, if you trust in Him. He will breathe peace into your soul, and command tranquillity in the midst of the greatest storms. How much are they to be pitied who never pray. The world is to them all gloom and disappointment; for there they see none of the kindness and protection of our heavenly Father. We do not wonder that the sorrow of the world worketh death, with the distresses, afflictions, and disappointments to which human nature is exposed (ver. 6).—H.]

SCHLEIERMACHER:—What then are the chief things in the holy joy of Christmas? 1) Joy in the entire Lord and Redeemer. 2) A common feeling of love and joy (a) in the consciousness of the kindness and favor of God, our heavenly Father, which have been manifested in Christ Jesus; (b) in the purity and serenity of Christian joy. 3) Joy not over this or that aspect of heart and life, but over universal inward development.

PASSAVANT:—This gentleness manifests itself at one time as equanimity and patience under all circumstances, among all men, and in manifold experiences; at another as integrity in business relations; as justice, forbearance, and goodness, in exercising power; as impartiality and mercy in judging; as noble yielding, joyful giving, and patient enduring and forgiving.—As the epistle for the fourth Sunday in Advent.

HEUBNER:—The true joy of the Christian in Advent. 1. Its nature. It springs from the past, the present, and the future coming of the Lord. 2. Its effects: gentleness, freedom from care, disposition to pray, peace. It is the best preparation for Christmas.

LÖHE:—The approach of the festival as typical of the second coming of Christ greets us with a four-fold trumpet-blast: 1) Joy in Christ; 2) gentleness and goodness; 3) prayer and thanksgiving; 4) a prolonged sweet tone of peace, which is higher than all reason.

AHLFELD:—Supplication and thanksgiving are better than care. 1. Care gnaws the marrow and pith out of God's gifts. 2. Rise above it and leave it to your Lord. 3. Live in prayer and thanksgiving. He will gladly help you.

Law and Testimony. It is necessary to call solemnly to mind the much forgotten second coming of the Lord. 1) It brings holy joy in every way; 2) it is a rampart and wall against all hate and harm; 3) it inspires care-conquering prayer; 4) it enfolds us in God's peace.

PRÖNER:—The Christian disposition of mind in the holy time of Advent. 1) Holy joy; 2) tender love of men; 3) firm trust in God; 4) divine peace.—Difference between the holy mind of Christians and the wanton mind of the world. 1) The sources: the former springs from believing, sanctified hearts; the latter from a fortunate gift of nature, or it is the fruit of the sinful flesh. 2) Expressions: the former in religious joys, in lawful earthly pleasures used with moderation, a gentle, loving spirit, with God before the eye and in the heart; the latter, in sensual joys and violent passions. 3) Duration: the former always, the latter now and then. 4) Effects: the former liberates from care and melancholy, and renders one inclined to and qualified for the good; the latter leads away from God into sin.—The Lord is near! The thought (1) sanctifies our joys; (2) dissipates our cares; (3) consecrates our prayers; (4) fills us with love and forbearance towards our neighbor.

[J. S. HOWSON:—The Apostle Paul illustrated his precepts by example. He was remarkable for his habit of combining thanksgiving with his prayers (see ver. 6).—I know of no more instructive study than to go over all the ground from Romans to Philemon, taking the structure of the Epistles as we find it, and noticing these streams of prayer and praise, sometimes as they appear separately, very frequently together. We have grand doxologies after the commencement of some great truth, or at the prospect of some glorious future, as in the letter to the Romans, (xi. 33); "O the depth of the riches; both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God!" or in the First to the Corinthians (ix. 57): "Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ!" The habit strikes us more forcibly when the reference is to something personal. Thus, at the mention of the long-delayed, but at last accomplished meeting with Titus (2 Cor. ii. 14): "Now thanks be to God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ!" Even in his statement of a fact, Paul uses a eucharistic form (Rom. vii. 25): "Who shall deliver me? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord." "Thanks be to God which put this into the heart of Titus." 2 Cor. viii. 16. "I thank God that I baptized none save Crispus and Gaius." 1 Cor. i. 14. "I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than you all." 1 Cor. xiv. 18. Even when he speaks of food, the name which he employs is: "That for which I give thanks." And what is said of thanksgiving may similarly be said of prayer. Thus, with the same kind of exuberant impulse, after a doctrinal statement: "For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that He would grant you to be strengthened with might by His Spirit in the inner man." Eph. iii. 14-16. So when he has been describing his projected journey: "Now the God of peace be with you." Rom. xv. 33. So when he has been giving advice to an individual: "Consider what I say; and the Lord give thee understanding in all things." 2 Tim. ii. 7. Evidently with St. Paul the law of Prayer is the law of Praise. Supplication and gratitude are almost always inter-linked together; or at least when one is present, the other is seldom far absent. "I will pray with the Spirit, and I will sing with the Spirit: I will pray with the understanding, and I will sing with the understanding." 1 Cor. xiv. 15. In the Christian life he clearly assumes that Thanksgiving will follow easily in the footsteps of Prayer, and that Prayer will be mindful to fill the place which has just been occupied by Thanksgiving. Two parallel sentences from the Ephesians may conclude this imperfect list of illustrations: "Giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." Eph. v. 20. "Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance." Eph. vi. 18. Different as St. Paul's Epistles are in most respects from the Psalms of David, they resemble them in this combination. The lesson derived from both, and in both cases alike enforced by the writer's example, is this: "Offer unto God thanksgiving; and call upon Him in the time of trouble; so will He hear thee, and thou shalt praise Him," (Ps. l. 14, 15). See Lectures on the Character of St. Paul, p. 150 (London, 1864).—II.]

(CHAPTER IV. 8, 9)

- 8 Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest [honorable] whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if 9 there be any praise, think on these things. Those [The] things which ye have both [also] learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me [these] do: and the God of peace shall be with you.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 8. Finally, τὸ λοιπόν, introduces the conclusion, but does not strictly resume iii. 1 again (MATTHIES). [This expression indicates an approach to the end, and as MEYER remarks, its recurrence here shows Paul's reluctance to say the last word of farewell.—H.] It is here added how and wherein the peace of God (ver. 7) is to manifest itself; and as ver. 7 states what God does, so this declares what remains for men to do. (DE WETTE). The address, brethren, ἀδελφοί, is prompted by the fervor of his feelings; and to this fervor is due also the six times repeated ὅσα. [The words which follow here may be said to be arranged in a descending scale. The first four describe the character of the actions themselves, the two former, ἀληθῆ, σεμνά, being absolute, the two latter δίκαια, ἀγνά, relative; the fifth and sixth προσφίλῃ, εὖφημα, point to the moral approbation which they conciliate; while the seventh and eighth ἀρετή, ἔπαινος, in which the form of expression is changed (εἰς for ὅσα), are thrown in as an after-thought that no motive may be omitted (LIGHTFOOT).—H.]—Whatsoever things are true, ὅσα ἐστὶν ἀληθῆ. The ὅσα indicates that all things, without exception, which the category embraces are meant; while ἐστὶν implies their actual existence in contrast with the arbitrary supposition of men. 'Αληθῆ is the morally true, in harmony with the objective rule of morality in the gospels. See Eph. iv. 21. It should neither be limited by in sermone (BENGEL) nor be taken as merely subjective in the sense of sincerity (ERASMUS).—Whatsoever things are honorable (ὅσα σεμνά), designates things of a worthy character corresponding to the essence of the ἀλήθεια (1 Tim. ii. 2; Tit. ii. 2). [They are such as men esteem, regard with respect, veneration.—H.]—Whatsoever things are just (ὅσα δίκαια) signifies the things which accord with the law, as in Eph. iv. 24, and should not be limited by erga alios (BENGEL).—Whatsoever things are pure (ὅσα ἀγνά) describes the same qualities or acts intrinsically (2 Cor. vi. 6; vii. 11; Jas. iii. 17; 1 Tim. v. 22; 1 John iii. 3; ἀγνῶς i. 17). It is not simply 'chaste' (GROTIUS).—Whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report (ὅσα προσφίλῃ, ὅσα εὖφημα) comprises again a two-fold relation; both words have reference to the estimation of men, the first however designating what is valuable and dear to the heart of man, (προσφίλῃ), the second (εὖφημα) what is praised, esteemed among men, in word and deed. The first should not be supplemented by τοῖς πιστοῖς καὶ τῷ θεῷ (CHRYSTOM), or restricted by τῷ θεῷ (THEODORET), or interpreted as benigna, quæ gratiosum faciunt hominem (GROTIUS). The second does not refer to quæ bonam famam conciliant (ERASMUS), or to sermōnes, qui aliis bene precantur (STORR), which is opposed to the context.—If there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, sums up the preceding; εἰ τις ἀρετὴ refers to the first two pairs, καὶ εἰ τις ἔπαινος to the last pair. The former, ἀρετὴ, used of God, 1 Pet. ii. 9; 2 Pet. i. 3, here and in 2 Pet. i. 5, of men, signifies moral rectitude in disposition and action; the latter (ἔπαινος) the moral judgment of men, hence not res laudabilis (CALVIN, et al.); virtue (ἀρετὴ) calls forth praise (ἐπαινον): this presupposes that.—Thus what is in a Christian sense moral, is described in manifold relations, and the Apostle now says of it:—Think on these things, ταῦτα λογίζεσθε, not the same as φρονεῖτε. The Philippians should choose these things as the subject of their meditation, have them ever in their thoughts.

Ver. 9. The train of thought leads us here to the province of action.—The things which ye have also learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me. The first καὶ points to the ἐστὶν with ὅσα. [Hence it does not signify both (A. V.), but also, i. e., it adds the Apostle's example and teaching to the claims of the virtues themselves. LIGHTFOOT makes the first καὶ responsive to the third, and so connects the verbs in pairs.—H.] Ἐμάθετε καὶ παρελάβετε, refer to instruction, the former indicating the act in this process, as that of the Philippians, the latter, as that of Paul. The second intimates that the first could not have taken place without the second. Ἠκούσατε καὶ εἶδετε refer to examples of which the Philippians had knowledge by report or from personal observation, and which καὶ joins with the instruction (ἐμάθετε). Ἐν ἡμῶι belongs to both verbs, for Paul is an example in word as well as act. Therefore καὶ-καὶ-καὶ is not "as well as," nor ἐμάθετε genus, and the others species (HÖLEMANN), nor does ἡκούσατε refer to preaching (CALVIN, et al.).—These do (ταῦτα πράσσετε) is parallel to ταῦτα λογίζεσθε; both together, thinking and doing, are what Paul enjoins.—And the God of peace shall be with you, καὶ ὁ θεὸς τῆς εἰρήνης ἔσται μεθ' ὑμῶν. The particle connects the result (= 'and so,') with the injunction. The promise points to ver. 7. He has the peace of God as his protection, who has the God of peace with him and in him.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Salvation with all its inward wealth and manifold relations, is a unit. It harmonizes with the standard (ἀληθῆ) immanent in it, wherein depends its dignity, its worth (σεμνά), agrees with the rule made objective in the law (δίκαια), so that it is unspotted (ἀγνά), has its echo in the creature (προσφίλῃ), and in the circles formed by it (εὖφημα).

2. Salvation is obtained through a saving union of doctrine and example.

3. He who rightfully claims salvation in word, has resting upon him still more the duty of bearing witness to it in his life.

[ANDREW FULLER:—"The God of peace shall be with you" (ver. 9). We cannot experience the peace of God, and joy in the Holy Ghost, unless we have the testimony of our own consciences that in simplicity and godly sincerity we have had our conversation in the world.—What is this peace? The Christian, the minister who enjoys a well-grounded persuasion that he possesses the favor of Jesus Christ, whose confidence is in Him who sits at the helm of the universe, who walks with God and has the testimony of a good conscience, possesses the peace of God.—H.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—Christians have no need of the teachings of pagan morality, for no virtue can be found, or anything else praiseworthy and glorious, which is not found in God's word.—Whoever will have the blessings of salvation, must submit to the divine plan of salvation.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—In regard to what is honorable, just, pure, lovely, and of good report, there is a true and a false standard, and for this reason the Apostle here places the true at the beginning, that when the following exhortations are presented this fact, which our experience so often discloses, may at once occur to the Christian, and he may be led to examine himself and see whether he also is everywhere seeking for the true.

HEUBNER:—The Christian should not be one, but many-sided; he should strive after all that is excellent.—The true type of Christian virtue rejects all falsehood.—KLOPSTOCK inserts ver. 8 in his ode to the Redeemer at the close of the Messiah.

[ROBERT HALL:—There are very different virtues. If we would be complete in our Christian profession, we must attend to all the virtues of it;—whatsoever things are true, honest, just, or lovely, as well as those sublimer things which more immediately respect God and Christ, and heaven and eternity. The beauty of the Christian character is not formed so much by the gigantic size of one virtue, as from the harmony and consistency of all. Never, then, let it appear which virtue has been most approved by you, but cultivate every virtue (ver. 8).—H.]

(4). The Apostle's thankfulness for the gifts of love which he has received from them.

(CHAPTER IV. 10-20).

His joy on account of such friendship (ver. 10); correction of a possible misunderstanding on their part (vers. 11-13); grateful recognition of their kindness (vers. 14-17); and assurance of the divine blessing (vers. 18-20).

10 But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly, that now at the last your care of me hath flourished again; wherein ye were also careful, but ye lacked [were lacking]
11 opportunity. Not that I speak in respect of want, for I have learned, in whatsoever
12 state I am (therewith) to be content. I know both [also]¹ how to be abased, and I know how to abound; every where [in everything], and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I
14 can do all things through Christ² [in him] who strengtheneth me. Notwithstanding 15 ye have well done that ye did communicate with [shared in] my affliction. Now, ye Philippians, [also] know (also) that in the beginning of the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning [for an account of] giving and receiving, but ye only. For even in Thessalonica ye sent once
17 and again unto³ my necessity. Not because [that] I desire a [the] gift: but I desire [the] fruit that (may) abounds to your account. But I have all, and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you,
19 an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God. But my God shall supply all your need according to his riches⁴ in glory by [in] Christ Jesus.
20 Now unto God and our Father be glory forever and ever. Amen.

³ Ver. 16. [Some good authorities omit εἰς after δέ, but it is undoubtedly genuine, having been overlooked in some copies in consequence of the successive similar endings.—H.]

⁴ Ver. 19. [The older rendering is ἡ πλοῦτος instead of τὸν πλοῦτον. The manuscripts (LACHMANN, TISCHENDORF) fluctuate in some other places between the neuter and the masculine.—H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 10. But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly. Paul commences by adding (δέ) something else which concerns himself personally (ἐχάρην). He limits this statement in two ways; first, by designating the element (ἐν κυρίῳ) and secondly, the degree (μεγάλως) of his joy, the latter word being at the end for the sake of emphasis.—That now at the last your care of me hath flourished again. Ὅτι introduces the reason of his joy: ἥδη ποτὲ ἀνεθάλετε. This form of the verb is not found elsewhere. See WINER'S Gram.

p. 87. The verb (from θάλλω to bloom, be luxuriant, or to cause to bloom) signifies to become green again, or to make green again. [The figure was not suggested by the season of the year when the gift was sent (BENGEL), but the thought in its freshness budded into poetry (EADIE).—H.] The Philippians are regarded in the figure as a tree or field, wherein the concealed life has shown itself anew in the bestowal of the gifts of love, which are, as it were, the new buds or shoots of spring. The figure does not admit of the transitive signification (GROTIUS, with an appeal to Ezek. xvii. 24), and the context, which presents the reason for his great joy, forbids our referring it to a return of prosperity (MEYER, SCHENKEL: to thrive, prosper in their circumstances); and also forbids (for it contains no reproach) our regarding either the emphatic ἡδη ποτέ as tandem aliquando (MEYER), though it may be so taken in Rom. i. 10 where it stands with the future, or ἀνεθάλτε as pre-supposing the readers to be deficient in sympathy, as it were withered, unproductive, ἀπομαρανθέντες ἐν τῇ ἐλεημοσύνῃ (ECUM. et al.) Under what circumstances the Apostle's welfare (τὸ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν) could not be a subject of the concern and care (ὀφρεῖν) of the church, is not stated, nor can it be conjectured. BENGEL, who however goes too far when he says videtur legatio a Philippensibus tempore verno constituta, a quo metaphora sumitur, observes very justly: τὸ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν dicitur ut τὰ παρ' ἡμῶν, ver. 18, and also regitur a ὀφρεῖν. Hence τὸ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ὀφρεῖν is not to be taken as the accusative of relation (WINER'S Gram., p. 317 sq.). In a word, a new life has sprung up in the church, which has led them to consider (ὀφρεῖν) how they can do something again for the Apostle (τὸ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν). If it could be suspected that any censure was intended here, what follows serves at once to remove that suspicion, for it excludes entirely all ground for such a thought.—Wherein ye were also careful, but ye were lacking opportunity. Ἐφ' ᾧ, which is always neuter with Paul, and indicates the basis of the ὀφρεῖτε (WINER'S Gram., p. 392 sq.), has τὸ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν for its antecedent, while ὀφροῦντε, which the prefixed καί associates with their failure to contribute to his support, declares, that notwithstanding such omission, they had been thoughtful in the matter, so that they could not have been ἀπομαρανθέντες ἐν ἐλεημοσύνῃ. It was not the disposition, but the outward circumstances that were at fault (ἡκαρῆσθε δέ). The omission of μέν after ὀφροῦντε, to which δέ corresponds, states the palliating antithesis with greater point and vivacity. DE WETTE incorrectly explains ὀφροῦν ἐπὶ as a thinking without doing, ὀφροῦν ὑπὲρ a thinking with doing. The action is not indicated by the preposition, but is expressed in ἀνεθάλτε. We are not to refer ᾧ to ἡμῶν for its antecedent, (CALVIN), nor to translate ἐφ' ᾧ although (LUTHER), or sicut (VULG.), or post id (GROTIUS). In what the unfavorableness of their condition consisted, is not stated or intimated. But Paul's joy on account of the change does not permit us to find it in the state of their resources, their temporal means, (MEYER, et al.), or in the want of an opportunity to transmit their gifts (ERASMUS). [The more precise translation of ἡκαρῆ- peisθε may be ye were not having a favorable time: which as already remarked leaves it uncertain in what respect it was unfavorable. Of the conjectures that of MEYER and others (see above) is as probable as any other. The want of something to send to the Apostle is less likely to have been the difficulty than the want of a suitable messenger. The commission as a fiduciary trust required honor and fidelity on the part of the agent, and was not to be entrusted to every one who might offer himself for the service. The journey too was a difficult one, involving perils by land and sea, and (as shown in all probability by the narrow escape of Epaphroditus himself) requiring courage and physical hardihood, which many would not possess though not deficient in other respects.—H.]

Ver. 11. Not that I speak in respect of want, (οὐχ ὅτι καθ' ὑστέρησιν λέγω) denies that the relief of any personal want was the cause of his joy, which is not of a nature to depend on external circumstances. On οὐχ ὅτι see iii. 12. WINER'S Gram., p. 597. On καθ' ὑστέρησιν, see WINER'S Gram., p. 402.—He now adds in confirmation:—For I have learned in whatever state I am to be content (ἐν ᾧ γὰρ ἑμαυθὸν ἐν οἷς εἰμι αὐτάρκης εἶναι). Comp. 2 Cor. ix. 8; 1 Tim. vi. 6; Heb. xiii. 5. Ἐφ' ᾧ is emphatic: with others it may be different. There is no reason for supplying in tot adversis, or divinitus with ἑμαυθὸν (BENGEL). Ἐν οἷς εἰμι means his condition at any time; and does not refer merely to his condition at that time, nor is ἐν οἷς to be taken as masculine (LUTHER, with uhom). [Prof. EADIE reminds us that the great divine, Dr. Isaac Barrow, has four sermons on this text. See under HOMILETICAL and PRACTICAL.—H.]

Ver. 12. I know also how to be abased or brought low, (οἶδα καὶ ταπεινωσθαι) begins the account of his resignation, contentment (αὐτάρκεια). The order of the contrasts (ταπεινωσθαι, περισσεύειν) appears to adjust itself to the condition of the Apostle at the time when he wrote the Epistle. The knowing (οἶδα) is a consequence of the learning (ἑμαυθὸν). On the facts see 2 Cor. iv. 8; vi. 9, 10. Καί adds to the general statement ἐν οἷς εἰμι, the more particular one.—And I know how to abound—οἶδα καὶ περισσεύειν. Here καί adds the opposite as having also been learned. Περисσεύειν harmonizes better with the context than would the more exact opposite of the preceding verb (ὑψοῦσθαι). PELAGIUS: ut nec abundantia extollar, nec frangor inopia. GROTIUS: in rebus exiguis patienter me gerere, rebus abundantibus cum modo uti. The signification excellere (ERASMUS) is untenable.—In every thing and in all things I have been instructed or initiated.—Ἐν παντί καὶ ἐν πᾶσι is to be explained by ἐν οἷς (ver. 11). Both then are neuter, embracing all states and every state. The first is not equivalent to ubique (Vulg.), nor is the second masculine (LUTHER: among all; BENGEL: respectu omnium hominum). The perfect of the verb (μεμήνημαι) denotes the continuance of the state described. There is manifestly here a climax: ἑμαυθὸν as pupil, οἶδα as companion, μεμήνημαι as master. Only a gradation, however, is indicated in the extent and exactness of the knowledge, but there is no reference to a divine revelation (ESTIUS, BENGEL). The verb is followed by the accusative or dative; hence ἐν παντὶ καὶ ἐν παντί only describes the condition, in which this knowledge manifests itself; what he has been taught is stated in the following infinitives, equivalent to accusatives after the verb.—Both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need (καὶ χορτάζεσθαι καὶ πεινᾶν, καὶ περισσεύειν καὶ ὑστερεῖσθαι).

Ver. 13. I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me.—Summing it all up, he says, πάντα ἰσχύω. [Πάντα is the 'quantitative' accusative after ἰσχύω (Gal. v. 6; James v. 16) defining the measure and extent of the action (ELICOTT).—H.] Again, climacteric from knowledge to ability (Gal. v. 6; James v. 16), and πάντα is entirely general, extending even beyond the categories just mentioned. VAN HENGEL incorrectly restricts it to omnia memorata. It sounds like boasting, hence in humility he adds: ἐν τῷ ἐνδυναμοῦντί με. In himself there resides no such knowledge and ability; it has been bestowed upon him, he has it only in and from the Lord who alone creates it. Comp. Eph. vi. 10; 2 Cor. xii. 9; Acts ix. 22; Rom. iv. 20; 1 Tim. i. 12; 2 Tim. ii. 1; iv. 17.

Ver. 14. Notwithstanding (better, nevertheless) ye have well done.—Ἰλὺν turns the attention from Paul to the Philippians and their gifts, which are now estimated positively. Cavet, ne fortiter loquendo contempsisse ipsarum beneficium videatur (CALVIN). [Notwithstanding (πλὴν) he did not need their bounty to relieve his wants, he is thankful for it, and commends their generosity.—H.]—Καλῶς ποιήσατε describes their contribution as a good deed, which the following more closely defines: That ye shared in my affliction—συγκοινωνήσαντές μου τῇ θλίψει. It was therefore a fellowship (ακοινωνεῖν) with the affliction (θλίψις), which last denotes his hard condition, not merely want; hence it was compassion, interest, but as the emphatic position of μου indicates, for the sake of the person, in devoted love. Composito verbo innuitur, etiam alios alio modo fuisse κοινωνήσαντες (BENGEL). Comp. ver. 16; 2 Cor. ix. 11. [This sympathy on the part of the Philippians with the suffering representative of Christ and His cause is the very trait of character which the Judge selects for eulogy at the last day. See Matth. xxv. 35 sq. (EADIE).—H.]

Ver. 15. Now, ye Philippians also know—οἰδατε δὲ καὶ ὑμεῖς, φιλιππηῖοι. The transition to the past is indicated by δέ; καί points to Paul, for they and he alike know what has been done by them. The insertion of the name of the church shows his deep emotion, and gives a marked emphasis, as 2 Cor. vi. 11. No contrast with other churches is implied (BENGEL).—That in the beginning of the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia.—Ὅτι introduces the object of their knowledge. Ἐν ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, a limitation of time which ὅτι ἐξῆλθον ἀπὸ Μακεδονίας, the first departure from Macedonia (Acts xvi. 11—xvii. 15), so defines, that it must be understood from the standpoint of the Philippians, since for them the existence of the gospel began when the Apostle preached in Macedonia. [The "beginning of the gospel" at Philippi implies that he visited the Philippians on some other and later occasion. This intimation tallies exactly with Acts xx. 2, 6, which states that Paul came to Philippi (since μέρη ἐκεῖνα in the former passage would include that city), both on his second journey from Macedonia to Greece, and on his return from Corinth to Asia Minor and Jerusalem.—H.] It is incorrect to regard ἐξῆλθον as used for the pluperfect (VAN HENGEL, WIESINGER, et al.), which is forbidden by ἐν ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, and besides ver. 16 does not refer merely to the gifts sent to Corinth.—No church communicated with me for an account of giving and receiving, but ye only, οὐδεμία μοι ἐκκλησία ἐκοινωνήσεν εἰς λόγον δόσεως καὶ λήψεως, εἰ μὴ ὑμεῖς μόνον. Only the words λόγον δόσεως καὶ λήψεως are difficult. The context, especially ver. 17, explains εἰς λόγον as meaning for account of; for the genitives, like the words debit and credit, receipts and expenses, point to the keeping of accounts as the source of the phraseology (CICERO, Lael. 16: ratio datorum et acceptorum). Hence BENGEL incorrectly takes the meaning to be quod attinet (limit), as if in other ways than with gifts of love, other churches had indeed communicated with him. Further, it is the present giving and receiving of Paul and the Philippians that are spoken of: he gives the gospel and receives their gifts, they bestow their gifts and take gifts from him, God's word. Hence it is not a giving of the Philippians and receiving of Paul in the matter of the gifts of love (GROTIUS, et al.), or a giving of Paul and receiving of the Philippians, in rebus spiritualibus (the Greeks, et al.), nor are we to think of gifts of money from Paul to the Philippians (RHEINWALD), or, least of all, that with Paul the page headed δόσις, with the Philippians that headed λήψις remained blanks (MEYER), for the two run into each other, and we are not to think merely of the temporal.

Ver. 16. For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity.—Ὅτι is quia (Vulg.), or nam (LUTHER), and confirms εἰ μὴ ὑμεῖς μόνον. It does not depend on οἰδατε, it is not 'that' (VAN HENGEL, et al.). Ἐν Θεσσαλονικῇ states that it was in Thessalonica that the gifts came to him, so that the designation of place can indeed be joined with ἐπέμψατε, but rather belongs with μοι (WISER'S Gram. p. 414), and the prefixed καί, with an allusion to ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, denotes the early period of this contribution, while καὶ ἀπ᾽ αὐτῆς (1 Thess. ii. 18) renders the repetition of their giving prominent with a hint at the rapid succession of the gifts. [The both once and twice is emphatic, i. e., not once only, but twice (DE WETTE, ELICOTT). The καί, also, connects other and later instances of their liberality with the gifts which he received so early and promptly at Thessalonica immediately after his departure from Macedonia. We read in 2 Cor. xi. 9 that while Paul was at Corinth, after having preached in Macedonia, where Philippi was situated, he received supplies from that province. The particular place from which he received them is not named in that passage, but as the Apostle declares here that no other church aided him in that way, we must conclude that the bounty which he acknowledges in the Epistle to the Corinthians is that which he tacitly accredits here to the Philippians.—H.]—Εἰς τὴν χρείαν designates the need of the Apostle, the article indicating that it was a present need, and also known to the Philippians.

Ver. 17. Not that I desire the gift (οὐχ ὅτι ἐπιζητῶ τὸ δῶμα) denotes that he was not concerned about the definite material present. The verb is simply quæro, the preposition denoting the direction, as in ἐπιποθῶ (i. 8). The present tense denotes 'the constant, characteristic tendency: that is not his case' (MEYER). Hence it is not studiose quæro (HÖLEMAN).—But I desire the fruit, ἀλλὰ ἐπιζητῶ τὸν καρπόν.—Emphatic repetition of the verb in the antithetical clause. ['I do not want the gift, I do want the fruit,' etc. (LIGHTFOOT).—II.] 'The fruit' suggests the idea of the gift, the present, as seed sown which will be followed by a harvest (Gal. vi. 18), and points to a manifold reward (MEYER). But there is no reference to the Christian life as first bringing forth the gift (RILLIET).—That abounds to your account, τὸ πλεονάζοντα εἰς λόγον ὑμῶν, describes the fruit as one that grows for the advantage of the Philippians: that what they have entered as δόσις is registered to them as λήψις; they may therefore receive from Paul, from other churches, from the Lord Jesus Christ and God Himself, what will prove a blessing to them for time and for eternity. On πλεονάζειν see Rom. v. 20; vi. 1; 2 Cor. iv. 15; 2 Thess. i. 3. To this εἰς λόγον ὑμῶν belongs, which is not equivalent to εἰς ὑμᾶς, ratione vestri (BEN-GEL), and not to ἐπιζητῶ (VAN HENGEL), nor is καρπός here equivalent to τόκος, interest (MICHAELIS), for the context gives no occasion to adopt this meaning, though λόγος is to be held as implying 'account.'

Ver. 18. But I have all, and abound. I am full.—Ἀπέχω δὲ πάντα is an expression of his complete content: he has all that (Matth. vi. 2; v. 16; Phil. 15) he needs or desires, so that he has nothing left to wish for. It is not "receipt" (ERASMUS), also not habeo autem omnia (Vulg.). With a climactic force καὶ περισσεύω is added: I have yet more than I need and wish, am even filled (πεπληρωμαι), have abundance around and within. Not outward abundance is meant, but complete inward satisfaction.—Having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you (δεξάμενος παρὰ Ἐπιφροδίτου τὰ παρ' ὑμῶν) points to the mode in which he had come into this state.—He describes their gift as: An odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God.—Ὁσμὴν εὐδοίας (comp. Eph. v. 2), θυσίαν δεκτὴν, εὐάρεστον τῷ θεῷ, represents the gift under the image of an offering. The dative belongs equally to both expressions. Comp. ii. 17; Rom. xii. 1; Heb. xiii. 16; 1 Pet. ii. 5. Every gift and act of love should be regarded as an offering made to God in thankfulness, and hence it is that they are acceptable, well pleasing to Him.

Ver. 19. But my God shall supply all your need (ὁ δὲ θεὸς μου πληρώσει πᾶσαν χρείαν ὑμῶν) attaches itself to τῷ θεῷ. God allows no offering to be made to Him in vain, especially when it is a gift to one whose God He is. Comp. i. 3. Paul's God will repay the Philippians for having so contributed to his aid that he could say πεπληρωμαι. Hence πληρώσει measures, as it were, the recompense to them by his πεπληρωμαι, and πᾶσαν χρείαν ὑμῶν responds to εἰς τὴν χρείαν μοι (ver. 16). The reference is not merely to bodily want (CHRYSOSTOM), or even to spiritual (PELAGIUS), but to bodily and spiritual combined, and the recompense also should not be restricted to the other world (MEYER).—The πληρώσει is now qualified.—According to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus.—The limitation is three-fold: (1) κατὰ τὸ πλοῦτος αὐτοῦ shows the relation of the recompense to the gift of the church; (2) ἐν δόξῃ states the kind of recompense: in a glorious way; (3) ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ presents the medium by which it is effected. It is incorrect to join ἐν δόξῃ with πλοῦτος (GROTIUS, et al.), since αὐτοῦ stands between, and with πλοῦτος we should have had the genitive δόξης (Eph. i. 14; iii. 16; Col. i. 27; Rom. ix. 23). [The adverbial sense of ἐν δόξῃ has hardly any parallel elsewhere. The constructio pignans affords a better meaning (LIGHTFOOT): in the state of glory where they would ultimately be, and partake of Christ's glory at the right hand of the Father; and it is in Him (ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ) as the sphere of their existence that they attain this exaltation and blessedness.—H.]

Ver. 20. Now unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever. Amen.—The doxology here forms a natural conclusion: τῷ δὲ θεῷ καὶ πατρὶ ὑμῶν recalls ὁ θεὸς μου (ver. 19), who is also the God of the Philippians, and not merely God, but also our Father. See on i. 2. With ἡ δόξα supply εἰη. See Eph. iii. 20, 21; Rom. xi. 36. The glory which He has shall also be acknowledged even εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, an expression equivalent in sense to εἰς πάντα αἰῶνας, Gal. i. 5; 1 Tim. i. 17; 2 Tim. iv. 18; Heb. xiii. 21; 1 Pet. iv. 11; v. 11.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Christian life, both of individuals and of churches, can no more be without its waverings, its ebb and flow in the stream of its activity, than nature can fail of its winter, spring, summer and autumn (ver. 10). This should be no cause of stumbling.

2. The manifestations of Christian activity are a cause of joy less on account of the material benefits they confer, than on account of the power of love and of life which they evince: and this is the reason why they are not to be lightly esteemed.

3. Both traits of character are important: dignity in circumstances of misfortune and trial, without weakness and without ill-humor; and nobility of soul in the midst of abundance, without pride or arrogance. The last of these, perhaps, is more difficult to acquire than the first.

4. Man can of himself do nothing in matters of morality, but in Christ, who strengthens him, he can do all things (John xv. 5).

5. There is a certain solidarity of earthly and heavenly interests, bodily and spiritual, like that which exists between the body and the soul. Romanism, in its proneness to a false ascetism, underrates the former. Socialism and Communism, which attach themselves only to this life, deny the latter. The lower or temporal interests should be subordinated to the higher or spiritual; they should be servants, not masters, under the control ever of a mind which maintains its ascendancy over the earthly and present. These higher interests cannot be replaced by the lower; they should not be displaced by them.

6. The gift of love is in form and product the true gift, and should be regarded as a sacrifice brought to God and well-pleasing to Him (ver. 18).

7. [AUGUSTINE:—I have learned from Thee, O Lord, to distinguish between the gift and the fruit. The gift is the thing itself, which is given by one who supplies what is needed, as money or raiment. But the fruit is the good and well-ordered will of the giver. It is a gift, to receive a prophet, and to give a cup of cold water; but it is fruit, to do those acts in the name of a prophet, and in the name of a disciple. The raven brought a gift to Elias when it brought him bread and flesh; but the widow fruit, because she fed him as a man of God (ver. 17).—H.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—What virtuous pagans have learned from nature, as in a shadow, that they should not allow themselves to be lifted up by fortune and abundance, nor let their courage sink in misfortune and want, is a knowledge which true Christians have by reason of their faith, in all truth, fulness, and purity.—Thou desirest to know nothing of Christ's power in overcoming sin, and ever excusest thy deeds as effects of human weakness: but if thou art a true Christian, and thus in Christ, thou art strong enough to conquer all things. If thou hast not this strength, then is Christ also not in thee.—God is a rich Proprietor, to whom thou lendest what thou dost give to the poor, and who will recompense thee a hundred-fold, if not in this world, yet certainly in eternal glory (ver. 19).

RIGER:—From that which one endures, something also should be learned. Nature is content with little, grace with even less. Most desires are first aroused by comparison with others.—So soon as I turn away from Christ, any thing can overthrow me. So soon as I am in Christ, I can withstand all things.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—The Apostle's boast: 1) what he boasts of himself; 2) how he gives Christ the glory.

HEUBNER:—In many a one the spiritual impulse seems at times dead, as the life in flowers and trees, but in favorable weather it breaks out again in buds, blossoms and fruits. Even the manifestation of that which is good is controlled by circumstances (ver. 10).

[ISAAC BARROW:—He who has the consciousness of fulfilling the condition, will secure the effect of that promise: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."—This is what supported the Apostles and kept them cheerful under all the heavy load of distresses which lay on them: "Our rejoicing is this: the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity—we have had our conversation in this world."—It is an evil conscience that giveth an edge to all other evils, and enableth them sorely to afflict us, which otherwise would but slightly touch us.—The contemplation of our future state is a medicine to work contentedness and to cure discontent. Considering heaven and its happiness, how low and mean, how unworthy of our care and affection, will these inferior things appear.—What is any loss, any disgrace, any cross in this world to me, who am a citizen of heaven, who bear a capacity and hope of the immense riches, the incorruptible glory, the perfect and endless joys of eternity? "For this cause," says Paul, "we faint not—while we look not on the things which are seen, but on the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." And he says again: "I reckon that the sufferings of the present life are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."—H.]

VII. CONCLUSION:

Salutation and Benediction (iv. 21-23).

CHAP. IV. 21-23.

21 Salute every saint in Christ Jesus. The brethren who are with me greet [salute] 22 you. All the saints salute you, chiefly [but especially] they that are of Cæsar's 23 household. The grace of our [the] Lord Jesus Christ be with you all [your spirit¹]. Amen.²

² Ibid.—Instead of μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ὑμῶν some manuscripts read μετὰ πνευμάτων ὑμῶν. [LACHMANN and TISCHENDORF adopt the former in their text. MEYER regards μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ὑμῶν as borrowed from Gal. vi. 18. The English Version translates the common μετὰ πάντων ὑμῶν, which is not well supported.—H.]

³ Ibid.—Ἀμήν is found in Ξ A D E K L. The subscription in Ξ is πρὸς φιλικήσους, and in B the same with ἐν ᾧ ἀπὸ Παύλου added, while K subjoins ὁ Ἐρατορίων.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 21. Salute every saint in Christ Jesus, ἀσπάζασθε πάντα ἅγιον ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. He desires to single out every member of the church as embraced in this greeting; and hence he uses the singular (πάντα), and does not write πάντας τοὺς ἁγίους. The nearer limitation, ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, belongs to the verb (Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12: ἐν ἁγίῳ φιλήματι). It is to be a Christian salutation; ἅγιος does not need any limitation (VAN HENGEL, et al.), as Eph. i. 1 shows. — The brethren who are with me salute you, adds salutations ἀσπάζονται ἡμεῖς (ἐνταῦθα) entrusted to him by others, οἱ σὺν ἐμοὶ ἀδελφοί, qui mihi vineto ministrant, qui me visitant, qui mecum hic in evangelio laborant (ESTIUS); hence the smaller circle (i. 14), which, however, we are not to divide into travelling companions (as Luke, Titus and others) and those who lived in the place (as Clemens, Euodia, et al.) (VAN HENGEL).

Ver. 22. All the saints salute you (ἀσπάζονται ἡμεῖς πάντες οἱ ἅγιοι), all Christians in Rome who did not happen to stand in personal or official relations with himself. — But especially, μάλιστα δέ, marks a greeting delivered to him with great earnestness. — They that are of Cæsar's household, οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας. Since οἰκία most naturally means house, then palace, the imperial servants are probably meant. Neither the context nor the history gives us reason to understand the word in the sense of family, as in 1 Cor. xvi. 15, and to suppose the members of the imperial family, the relatives of the Emperor, to be referred to (BAUR, VAN HENGEL). Still less appropriate is it to suppose the Prætorians to be meant (MATTHIES), as in i. 13. The expressions 'palace' and 'prætorium' do not admit of being interchanged. It is not correct to think of Cæsarea and the βασιλεῖον τοῦ Ἡρώδου on account of Καίσαρος (BÖTTGER, et al.). Who they were and why they sent an especial salutation is not stated. [NEANDER conjectures that possibly they may have been natives of Philippi, or have known some of the Philippian Christians who had been at Rome. Perhaps we are not to seek so far for an explanation. The Apostle's 'especially' (μάλιστα), which so emphasizes the greeting of 'those of Cæsar's household,' may represent the tone of hearty earnestness with which they spoke up, as he was writing or dictating the letter, and asked them to send their kiss of love (ἀσπασμός) to these Philippians of whom they had heard so much from the Apostle. For this the parties need not have had any personal knowledge of each other. As servants in the palace (especially if Paul was quartered in that neighborhood) they may have been brought into relations of special intimacy with Paul.*—H.]

Ver. 23. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.—Ἡ χάρις τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ὑμῶν. Ἀμήν.—Entirely like Gal. vi. 18; Rom. xvi. 24; 1 Thess. v. 28; 2 Thess. iii. 18; 2 Cor. xiii. 13. [This remark must be understood of a similarity in the import and not the form of the salutations.—H.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Salutations are tokens of personal interest and living fellowship which should not be lightly esteemed.

2. It is important that the grace of the Lord be in us, not merely that we be surrounded by it.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—The Apostolic salutations teach that the Christian religion does not make men unfriendly and stubborn, but courteous and friendly. —A Christian salutation is a benediction, and not merely a custom: the fashionable world uses instead its empty compliments.—O Rome! Rome! how greatly hast thou changed! Formerly thou hadst true saints even in the household of a pagan and tyrannical emperor; but now hast thou false saints, especially in and around the so-called chair of Peter and at the court of his supposed successor.

GERLACH:—Thus among the slaves of the emperor Nero there existed a believing and loving community of Christians who felt a special interest in foreign churches. Perhaps it is on account of this noteworthy circumstance that Paul brings them forward so prominently.†

HEUBNER:—Christianity had forced its way into the very presence of the emperor, had found entrance among the servants of the court. Whether Seneca was among them or not is unknown. Christianity finds its way every where, and the worst places are not closed to grace.

NITZSCH:—The salutations of the saints which the Apostle delivered in such numbers and so earnestly rest—1) on faith and a confession of the one true church of the Lord; 2) they are an expression of the feeling of our communion, of our higher, heavenly relationship in the family of God; 3) they furnish significant proofs of Christian love.

EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE COLOSSIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLE.

1. SYNOPSIS.*

I. ADDRESS AND SALUTATION (I. 1, 2).

II. PART FIRST: MENTION OF THE GROUND OF CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP AND WARNING AGAINST APOSTASY (I. 3.—II. 23).

1. Thanks to God for the faith and love of his readers from the beginning (i. 3—8). Paul prayerfully gives thanks for the faith of the Colossians in Christ and their love to the brethren, which rests upon Christian hope (vers. 3—5a), and in joy at the preaching of the gospel, which they had forthwith embraced (vers. 5b—6), as brought to them by Epaphras, who had told the Apostle of it (vers. 7, 8).

2. Earnest supplication for the progress of the church in true knowledge, especially of the Being and Work of Christ (i. 9—23). The immediate object of the supplication is fuller knowledge of the Divine Will (ver. 9), in order to upright Christian walk in gratitude (vers. 10—12) for the Redemption in Christ (vers. 13, 14), whose Person is then set forth as to His inmost Being (ver. 15), His efficiency in creation (ver. 16) and Providence (ver. 17) and as Head of the Church (ver. 18), in order to mark how heaven and earth were embraced in the Redemptive Work of Him (vers. 19—20), in whom they also have now a part (vers. 21—23).

3. Joy of the Apostle in his sufferings and labors (i. 14—29). Paul rejoices that the sufferings of Christ are becoming ever more complete through his own (ver. 24), and sketches his ministerial relation in furtherance of Christ's cause (vers. 15—20).

4. Anxiety of the Apostle lest they be led away through false wisdom (ii. 1—15). After a free expression of his concern about the spiritual health of the church (vers. 1—3), he briefly sketches the situation (vers. 4, 5), then exhorts to faithfulness in walk (vers. 6, 7), warns against apostasy (ver. 8) and praises the glory of Christ and His Work (vers. 9—15).

5. Two special warnings (ii. 16—23): against carnal legal service (vers. 16—17), against superstitious angel-worship (vers. 18, 19), with a comprehensive conclusion (vers. 20—23).

* [The following is a popular summary :

I. The doctrinal part : I.—II. 3 (corresponding with Eph. I.—III).

II. The warning : II. 4.—23 (with no parallel in Eph.).

III. The practical part : III. IV. (corresponding with Eph. IV.—VI).—R.]

III. PART SECOND: EXHORTATION TO TRUE VITAL SANCTIFICATION (III. 1.—IV. 6).

1. The foundation and prospect of a genuine Christian sentiment and walk (iii. 1-4). Fellowship with the exalted Redeemer points to "things above" (vers. 1-3) and has an elevating prospect (ver. 4).

2. General Exhortations (iii. 5-17): a) negatively, to put off the carnal nature (iii. 5-11), first and fundamentally, as respects the lusts and possessions of earth (vers. 5-7), then in social relations with one another (vers. 8-11); b) positively, to practice Christian affection toward each other, and to glorify Christ in word and work (iii. 12-17). The social virtues of the new man are set forth (vers. 12-14), their tone given (ver. 15) and helps described (vers. 16, 17).

3. Special Exhortations (iii. 18-iv. 1);

a) to wives (ver. 18) and husbands (ver. 19);

b) to children (ver. 20) and fathers (ver. 21);

2. The FUNDAMENTAL THOUGHT, as BÄHR justly remarks, is: "Christ the Head of all things." Upon this Paul places himself in open antagonism to error (ii. 6-23), as well as to deduce clearly and definitely thence the lines, both of his doctrine—quietly arranged without expressed antithesis (i. 9-23)—and of his directions respecting Christian walk (iii. 1.—iv. 1). The Epistle to the Ephesians on the other hand sets Him forth as "the Head of the Body." In both Christ is the centre, with this modification only, that in this Epistle the Christliness [Christlichkeit] is more prominent than the churchliness [Kirchlichkeit], the life of the church more than its nature.

§ 2. CHARACTER AND SIGNIFICANCE OF THE EPISTLE.

1. What is said of the Epistle to the Ephesians (Introd. § 2, 1) is applicable here with this difference: there the overflowing fulness of the thought struggles with the expression, here in parallel passages we find a briefer, acuter, indeed a more clear and mature encasing of the thought.* The independence of the author is quite unmistakable. We find evidence of it in the pithy brevity which controls both thought and language, while it is not less apparent in the ἅπας λεγόμενος,† which are either altogether without analogy (ii. 8: συναγωγῆς; ii. 18: καταβραβεύειν), or remind us of parallel passages only that we may recognize his gift of language as ii. 4: πιθανολογία (2 Cor. ii. 4); i. 23: μετακινεῖν (2 Cor. xv. 58); iii. 1: σπλάγχνα οἰκτιροῦν (Phil. ii. 1); compare also the order in iii. 11: Ἐλλήν καὶ Ἰουδαίος, which is altogether exceptional.

2. References more or less definite to the situation of the Apostle (i. 24-29; ii. 1; iv. 3, 10, 18), and to his relation to the Colossian Church (i. 4, 9; ii. 1), to its origin (i. 7, 8), its full membership (iii. 18; iv. 1) and simple organization (iv. 17), its external relation to neighboring Churches (iv. 13), to friendly and sympathizing persons (iv. 9-14), as well as to its internal condition as respected Christian life (i. 4-6, 8, 9; ii. 6, 7) and threatened danger from false teachers (ii. 8-23), afford a firm basis for a clear sketch of the situation. (See § 4.)

3. In contrast with the Universalism of the Epistle to the Ephesians, there prevails in our Epistle a Monism: the Person of Christ, and again and again the Person of Christ, and this exclusively. Hence instead of "the Word of God" (i. 25; Rom. ix. 6; 1 Cor. xiv. 36; 2 Cor. ii. 17; iv. 2), or "of the Lord" (1 Thess. i. 18), "of truth" (i. 5), "of wisdom," "of knowledge" (1 Cor. xii. 8), "of the Cross" (1 Cor. i. 18), "of reconciliation" (2 Cor. v. 19), we find here alone (iii. 16) "the Word of Christ." The Epistle is thoroughly Christological; Christ's Person is the Lord of Eternity, ruling heaven and earth, the visible and invisible (i. 14-16, 19; ii. 9), who by entering into our race and the history of humanity (i. 18), has reconciled all things and all classes to God (i. 20, 21), has so spanned all centuries of development, that out of Him and before Him even the highest mental culture and noblest morality are but rudiments, elements of the world which pass away (ii. 8); in Him are given Peace (i. 20), Life (i. 18; ii. 13; iii. 1-3), Salvation and Bliss (i. 22; iii. 4), likewise all virtue (iii. 5-14) in all the moral relations of life (iii. 18; iv. 1), and this is done by the ethical method of faith (i. 23; ii. 13), in obedience to His word (iii. 16), in vital fellowship with Him (ii. 11-15; iii. 1-4), and in prayer (iv. 2), so that Christ for us becomes Christ in us (ii. 13-15; iii. 3, 4).

4. The judgments respecting this Epistle confirm the preceding statements, as well as mark its significance. This is in part the same as that of the Epistle to the Ephesians (Intro., § 3), so far as they coincide, but consists peculiarly in this, that Christianity is here set forth as the full bloom of true wisdom and the norm on which all false wisdom is put to shame, and at the foundation is placed the connection of the most profound truth with the simplest Christian walk.—CALVIN calls it on account of the first chapter: an incomparable storehouse; COCCETUS: brevis epistola, sed nucleum evangelii continens et opposita omnibus postea subingressis completis.—BÄHR: "vivacity and strength, depth and fulness of thought, often struggling with the words, great natural talents, which however are pervaded, illuminated and exalted by the Spirit of God. But a pithy, compact brevity appears as especially characteristic in this Epistle. It breathes the spirit of tenderest love and joy in all sorrows and afflictions. Although bowed down by external circumstances, which made it impossible for him to go into all the world, bearing the name of Jesus unto all the Gentiles, the inward joyousness and elevation of the great Apostle to the Gentiles increased but the more."—BÖHMER (Isagog., p. 160) passes this judgment on our Epistle: viva, pressa, solida, nervis plena, mascula.—STEIGER finds this Epistle fresher, the connection with the news just received not effaced, and sees in the Epistle to the Ephesians only echoes from this.—EVEN DE WETTE uses the "rich brevity" of the Colossian Epistle to condemn that to the Ephesians as a "verbose expansion" of it.—SCHENKEL remarks that the structure of words and sentences throughout is original.—The opposing, dissenting judgments are partly in regard to details, partly based upon pre-conceived views (see § 3) rather than upon the Epistle itself, and hence cannot be deemed of any weight.—[ALFORD, comparing it with that to the Ephesians, calls it: "his caution, his argument, his protest; so to speak, his working-day toil, his direct pastoral labor." Hence we have here "system defined, language elaborated, antithesis and logical power." WORDSWORTH, in making the same comparison, says: "The Apostle is both a builder and a soldier. He builds up the truth in one Epistle, and he wars against error in the other. He has his sword girded at his side in the Epistle to the Church of Colosse.—Almighty God, in His Wisdom and love, controlled and overruled these evils for endless good to the Colossian Church, and to the Church Universal of every age and country, by the ministry of St. Paul in the present Epistle." DAVIES even suggests, that these errors, as reported to him, gave a stimulus to his thoughts, and made him "aware of depths in the gospel of Christ and of aspects of the Person of Christ which he had not so clearly apprehended before." Certainly these twin Epistles are the most profound of all the Pauline Epistles. This not less so than the other, for here Christ's Person is more prominent, there Christ's Body.—R.]

§ 3. THE AUTHOR OF THE EPISTLE.

1. The Epistle itself specifies the Apostle Paul as its author, both in the address (i. 1) and in the text (i. 24), as in Eph. iii. 1 (comp. Intro., § 4), and in the conclusion (iv. 18). It refers to the sufferings he had to endure as an Apostle (i. 29), and especially from the Jews as the Apostle to the Gentiles (iv. 11), to his imprisonment (iv. 3, 10, 18), refers particularly to the same circle of companions, as Philem. 24, men who are known otherwise as his friends, such as Timothy

(i. 1), Epaphras (i. 7, 8; iv. 12, 13), Tychicus (iv. 7-9), Onesimus (iv. 9), Luke (iv. 14), as well as to two others, Mark (iv. 10) and Demas (iv. 14), one of whom had been the cause of serious blame and decided contention, indeed of separation from his companion Barnabas (Acts xiii. 13; xv. 37-40), while the other afterwards forsook him (2 Tim. iv. 10). Finally the Epistle sets forth the fundamental features of the same errors, which are combatted by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Ephesians and the Pastoral Epistles, and yet in such a way that the points of agreement and diversity are readily perceived (§ 4, 5).—Accordingly the Epistle, both in form and contents, bears the stamp of Pauline origin.

2. The testimony of the early Church, as in the case of the Epistle to the Ephesians (Introd., § 4, 2) is in favor of the Pauline authorship. The occurrence of πρωτόκοκος πάσης κτίσεως (i. 15) in the writings of JUSTIN, who suffered martyrdom A. D. 163, and of THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Antioch, who died A. D. 181, may be of more importance for the history of doctrine, than for historical criticism upon this Epistle, yet the fact must be noted in connection with the testimony of the Canon of MURATORI (Eph. Introd., § 4, 2), which was drawn up about A. D. 160, a catalogue of what was generally received. This cites our Epistle as Pauline. IRENEUS († 202), who quotes iv. 14, CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS († 220), TERTULLIAN († 220), ORIGEN († 254) cite it as Pauline; EUSEBIUS reckons it among the ὁμολογούμενα. It is even found in the Canon of MARCION, and the Gnostics did not question its genuineness. BÄHR is right in saying: "It could not occur to any considerate person to doubt its genuineness or make a critical plaything of it." [ALFORD: "That this Epistle is a genuine work of St. Paul, was never doubted in ancient times: nor did any modern critic question the fact, until SCHRADER (der Apostel Paulus, V. 175 sq.) in his commentary pronounced some passages suspicious, and led the way in which BAUR and MEYERHOFF followed."—R.]

3. MEYERHOFF (der Brief an die Kolosser mit vornehmlicher Berücksichtigung der drei Pastoralbriefe kritisch geprüft. 1838) accepts the Epistle to the Ephesians as genuine, to contest the genuineness of that to the Colossians, while BAUR (Paulus, 1845, pp. 417-457) rejects both as an unpauline pair. The charge that the language is unpauline fails in view of the "original many-sidedness" (SCHENKEL) of the Apostle; the charge of poverty in thought and quotation from the Epistle to the Ephesians, as well as that of controversy against Cerinthus, are met by correct and discriminating exegesis of the passages in question. If BAUR finds in the false teachers at Colosse, according to this Epistle, later post-apostolic Ebionites, and in its doctrinal drift, as in that of the Gospel of John, a Gnostic tendency, so that it is to be regarded only as a pseudo-apostolic movement of Gnosticism against Ebionitism, it may be replied, that the doctrine respecting Christ as the centre of the entire spiritual world, and the idea of the πλήρωμα are not sufficient to prove the presence of unpauline Gnosticism, since we find here, only that more fully developed and advanced Christology, the foundation of which was already laid in Rom. i. 3, 4; viii. 34; 2 Cor. iv. 4; nor is the opposition to the necessity of circumcision to salvation, and to exaggerated asceticism, evidence of post-pauline origin, since the former had already been opposed in Gal. ii. 3, 4, and the latter in Rom. xiv. 1, 2. The thought that in the death of Christ all diversities and antitheses are abrogated, must not be taken in the sense of a mere external Universalism, separated from the Pauline anthropology and restricted to a coalition of Gentiles and Jews. It is not foreign to the Apostle, but occurs also in Gal. iii. 27, 28; vi. 14, 15, where there is also a reference to baptism as symbolizing death. It would be difficult to receive or justify the opinion, that in the mention of Mark and Luke (iv. 10, 14), there was a purpose of recommending their Gospels and giving prominence to their harmony with each other and with Paul. The open antagonism of the Epistle to the Judaizing tendency directly contradicts the assertion that its main design was to mediate between Jewish and Gentile Christians. Whatever may be peculiar and special in this as compared with other Pauline Epistles, affords no just ground for denying that it is a product of the same author, especially of this vivacious and spirited Apostle.—EWALD (Sendschreiben des Apostel Paulus, p. 466 sq.) finds the plan, thoughts and argument Pauline, but takes exception to such words as ἰελοθρησκεία, ἀντανάκληρώς, to the infrequent use of inferences and causal particles, also to the reference of the reconciling work and death of Christ to angels (i. 20), and hence is of the opinion, that after a preliminary conference about the contents, the composition of the Epistle was left to Timothy as co-author, Paul, however, dictating the words towards the conclusion and adding his autographic salutation. But according to i. 23, 25; ii. 1, 5, this view is inadmissible, and, notwithstanding 2 Cor. i. 1; Phil. i. 1; Philem. 1; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1, inapplicable to those Epistles also. It will appear from the exegetical remarks that peculiarities of language are not unapauline, because not occurring in antecedent Pauline Epistles.—MEYER, with a reference to ERASMUS (non est cujusvis hominis Paulinum pectus effingere; tonat, fulgurat, meras flammās loquitur Paulus), aptly remarks: "The forging of such an Epistle as ours would be more wonderful than its genuineness." [For a detailed answer to Meyerhoff's objections, see EADIE, Liter. III., though, as he concludes, "the attacks on this Epistle are of no formidable nature." ELLICOTT forcibly remarks: "To class such an Epistle, so marked not only by distinctive peculiarities of style, but by the nerve, force, and originality of its argument, with the vague productions of later Gnosticism, is to bewray such a complete want of critical perception that we can scarcely wonder that such views have been both very generally and very summarily rejected." See DAVIDSON, Introd., Vol. II., p. 427 sq.—R.]

§ 4. THE CHURCH AND ITS CIRCUMSTANCES.

1. Topographical Remarks. COLOSSE, in the vicinity of Laodicea and Hierapolis, was the locality of the Church addressed in this Epistle. This is evident from ii. 1; iv. 13, 16. The opinion of Erasmus and others, that Rhodes is meant, the inhabitants of which are termed Κολοσσαῖς, on account of the Colossus, is singular enough [and were there any evidence to support it, the variation in the title of the Epistle (see below) would overthrow it.—R.]

COLOSSE is situated in the southwestern part of Asia Minor, in Greater Phrygia (Phrygia pacatiana), on the river Lycus, near the spot where it disappears in a chasm, out of which it soon emerges again to empty itself into the Meander. At the distance of half a day's journey were several populous cities. The most prominent among these, especially in the time of the Romans and in Church History, was Laodicea; STRABO (1st century, A. D.) counts it among the μέγιστα πόλεις. HERODOTUS calls Colosse: πόλις μεγάλη εὐδαίμων καὶ μεγάλη, but STRABO includes it among the smaller towns (πολίσιματα), which lay near Laodicea (THEODORET: μητρόπολις αὐτῆς (Colosse) καὶ γείτων ἡ Λαοδικεία); though PLINY counts it among the celeberrimis oppidis, yet he names it only among the oppidis. OROSIUS, who describes the earthquake of the time of Nero in the year 66, mentions Laodicea and Hierapolis first and Colosse last, among the cities affected by it; whether because the smallest, or the least injured by it, is doubtful (tres urbes—terra motu conciderunt). TACITUS misstates the date of the earthquake (60), but expressly mentions Laodicea only, as soon recovering itself without the help of the State or foreign aid, and flourishing anew. THEOPHYLACT († after the middle of the 11th century) calls it Χῳναί; it is now named Chonas. [ALFORD: "For a minute and interesting description of the remains and neighborhood, see SMITH'S Dictionary of Anc. Geography, sub voce. From what is there said it would appear that Chonæ is in reality about three miles south from the ruins of the city." See also PAULY, Realencycl., Vol. II., p. 518; STEIGER, Einleitung, p. 1–33; EADIE, Col. p. x., and CONYBEARE and HOWSON, St. Paul, Vol. II., p. 383, note, and p. 390, note. The authors last named refer to a legend respecting the opening of the chasm, mentioned above, by the archangel Michael during an inundation from the Lycus, and the church built in his honor, as a curious illustration of the tendency to "angel-worship" rebuked by the Apostle, ii. 18.—R.]

Whether the name should be written: Κολοσσαί or Κολασσαί is doubtful. Codex Sinaiticus [N.] gives the former in the title* and i. 2 (Κολοσσαεῖς), but in the headings of the pages and the subscription Κολασσαεῖς. The former is found upon coins and in classical authors, and seems to be the correct form, the latter appears to be the vulgar form, afterwards the more common one. [All modern editors apparently adopt this explanation of the variation. LACHMANN, TISCHENDORF, ELLICOTT give a throughout; ALFORD and WORDSWORTH follow the varied spelling of N. and B.—R.]

2. Missionary History. Paul came to Phrygia in his second missionary journey (Acts xvi. 6: "throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia"), also in his third missionary journey (Acts

xviii. 23: "over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples"), visiting the churches which he had founded in his second journey. Hence there is a possibility, or even probability, that Paul had been in the valley of the Meander and Lycus at Laodicea and Colosse, but nothing more, especially as Phrygia had many divisions: Pisidian Phrygia, mountainous Phrygia, the districts of Amorium, Eumenia, Synnada, and the region about and beyond Laodicea to Apamea and yet further. On the contrary our Epistle, in i. 23, where mention must have been made of the fact, if Paul had ever been in Colosse, says nothing of it, but rather expresses (ii. 1), and in several other places (i. 3-7; ii. 5), pre-supposes that Paul had not been there and that the Church had not been founded by him. This takes away all weight from that possibility or probability, which SCHULZ, WIGGERS and others, following THEODORER, have accepted as fact. For the acquaintance with Philemon, Epaphras and other individuals can readily be accounted for; this acquaintance might easily have been formed at Ephesus and other points, in consequence of the extended movement produced by the gospel, or during business journeys made to these points, with which Colosse was connected by commercial ties. [Dr. LARDNER is the principal English supporter of the view that Paul was the founder of the Church; his argument is given in full and answered by EADIE and ALFORD. WORDSWORTH also adopts this view. See his Introduction to the Colossians. BARNES deems it "in the highest degree probable." But it seemed attended with more difficulties than the other view, which is now held by most biblical students. See DAVIDSON, Introd., Vol. II., p. 396 sq.; ALFORD, III. Proleg. p. 35 sq.; also EXEG. NOTES on ii. 1.—R.]

3. Local affairs. a) Epaphras, a Colossian (iv. 12: "one of you"), who had probably been won to the gospel by Paul during his two years' residence in Ephesus, which was connected in various ways with the important city of Laodicea, had proclaimed the gospel and founded churches in Colosse, Laodicea and Hierapolis (i. 7; iv. 12, 13). He is certainly no unimportant personage; Paul describes him as his helper (i. 7), refers to his correct teaching (i. 4, 7; ii. 6), to his indefatigable, energetic zeal (iv. 12), which had impelled him not merely to prayer to God (iv. 12) on behalf of the Church, but also to go to the Apostle at Rome and share his imprisonment (i. 8; Phil. 23), and which made him shun no labor for the neighboring churches in Laodicea and Hierapolis also (iv. 13).

b) The Church was composed mainly of Gentile Christians (ii. 13), for which reason Paul the Apostle to the Gentiles regarded it also as his Church and labored for it (i. 27; ii. 1, 2. Comp. Rom. xv. 20; 2 Cor. x. 15, 16). He had already made or caused to be made to them certain written or oral communications now unknown to us, "touching" Mark (iv. 10). Although allusions to the Mosaic law are not entirely wanting (ii. 10, 13, 14, 16, 21), there is neither quotation, nor proof, nor even a reminiscence from the Old Testament.—Paul praises the Church, which (ii. 16) stands better than the Galatians (Gal. iv. 10), for their Christian deportment (i. 2, 4, 6; ii. 5); his relations with them were altogether undisturbed (i. 8, 25; iv. 7-9, 10); but they needed admonition (i. 9-12; ii. 2, 20; iii. 1-4; iv. 12). False teachers, whom the Church yet in its first love opposed, threatened to ruin it. We cannot, however, infer from iii. 16 that worship had degenerated into lip-service (THEOPHYLACT), nor from iii. 13, that there was variance in heart (SCHENKEL).—The Apostle wrote only "to the saints at Colosse" (i. 2), not "to the Church" (1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Cor. i. 1; Gal. i. 2; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1), nor does he add, as in Phil. i. 1, "with the bishops and deacons," but through the Church exhorts a certain Archipus. Ecclesiastical relations seem to be as yet in an incipient state. According to i. 5, 9; ii. 6, the Church had been formed not long before, probably toward the close of Paul's stay in Ephesus, some time before A. D. 60, about four or five years before the Epistle was written; had it been formed earlier, Paul would certainly have visited it from Ephesus.

4. Ethnography and Religious history give us data respecting the kind of false teachers at Colosse and the consequent danger. The Phrygians, an ancient people, were highly gifted, and surrounded by a corresponding grandeur of nature. They were skilful not only in agriculture and trade, in the manufacture and dyeing of woollen stuffs, but also in arts and sciences, especially in music and the art of healing. Besides the mother-tongue, the language of the Greeks and other neighboring nations were in use among them. They had their grammarians and rhetoricians. Resembling their neighbors, the Ionians, in susceptible, impressible, mo- position, they readily adopted the various elements of culture. The worship of nature, of the great mother, Gaia, of the tower-crowned Cybele, and of Bacchus, was domesticated among them. Here Hellenic Philosophy, which proceeded from the earliest school, the Ionic, and sought the fundamental principle of all things in nature, first in the path of Materialism, then of Idealism, oscillating between Dualism and Pantheism, hostile not to religion, but to Polytheism, came in contact with the Oriental Philosophy. Here the syncretism of that period of transition from the old to the new, Christian age, found ample nourishment. Besides under Antiochus the Great two thousand Jewish families had been transplanted into Phrygia and Lydia. There was in addition a tendency to serious and sombre fanaticism, and to reliance on physical, especially telluric and sidereal influences. [As a further indication of their tendencies, EADIE notes the fact that "the reveries of Montanus originated there about the middle of the second century, and spread rapidly and extensively. The leading features of Montanism were a claim to ecstatic inspiration, the gift of prophecy, the adoption of a transcendental code of morality, and the exercise of an austere discipline. Its votaries were often named Kataphrygians, from the region of their popularity."—R.]

5. With these data we may now learn from the Epistle itself, what was the heresy of the false teachers at Colosse. The polemics of our Epistle point: First, to perverted and perverting doctrine within the Church (ii. 19: "not holding the Head"), as the admonition also is not respecting apostasy from the Church, but disturbance of the growth in Christ, of the progress in Christian knowledge and Christian life (i. 23; ii. 6). Secondly, these false teachers have a Judaistic tendency, they would cling to Jewish laws of food and feasts and seasons (ii. 16), they recommend circumcision (ii. 11) and teach Jewish separatism. Thirdly, an asceticism is required, severe and astringent indeed, but Fourthly, resting upon a Dualistic view, since it identifies matter with evil, regarding it as eternal, and seeks not sanctification of the life and character by ethical means, but subjugation, mortification of the flesh by physical or chemical or dietetic methods (ii. 23; iii. 6). Fifthly, with this is connected the idea that angels as immaterial beings are objects of adoration (ii. 18), and an Ebionite view of Christ appears, which mistakes and denies His relation to God the Father, to the spiritual world and to creation at large (i. 15, 16, 19; ii. 9), and mistakes and degrades the significance of the objective fact of the crucifixion, that makes peace and reconciliation (i. 20, 22; ii. 14). Sixthly, the heresy appeared in the form of a speculation, adapted to the spirit of the age, with the pretensions of a system, which would profoundly, acutely and triumphantly present the entire truth (i. 8, 18).

Accordingly we are not to regard them as Jews, either with Pharisaical tendencies (EICHORN) or with a syncretic leaning to Christianity after the manner of the Chaldean Magi or Alexandrian Neo-Platonists (HUG, SCHNECKENBURGER), or as Essenes (CHEMNITZ, FLATT, THIERSCH and others). Nor can we regard them as heathen philosophers in general (TERTULLIAN), or in particular as Epicureans (CLEMENS ALEX.), Pythagoreans (GROTIUS), Platonists or Stoics (HEUMANN); nor yet as Gnostics who represented a definite system. Nor was Cerinthus intended (MEYERHOFF), nor Ebionite Gnosticism (BAUR), and Cabbalism (HERDER, OSIANDER) as little. The errors were rather incipient, occasioned by the thoughts, with which the atmosphere of both the age and the people was charged. This much is true: that in Simon Magus we have a personage, in whom the attempt had been made at a systematic combination of Christianity with the Oriental theosophy (PRESENSE: Die ersten drei Jahrhunderte, 2, pp. 128–136); he is the first heretic and Cerinthus the next. But in our Epistle, as in those to the Ephesians, to Timothy and Titus, all is still in flow; here and in the Epistle to the Ephesians as yet within the Church, in the pastoral Epistles without it, and afterwards more widely, sharply and solidly developed. [EADIE: The winged seeds were floating in the atmosphere, and falling into a soil adapted to them, and waiting as if to receive them; in course of years they produced an ample harvest.—R.] Comp. MANGOLD: Die Irrlehrer der Pastoralbriefe, 1856. [See DAVIDSON, Introd., Vol. II., pp. 407–424, and EADIE, Introd. to Col. Comp. DAVIES' Essay on the traces of foreign elements in the doctrine of this and cotemporaneous Pauline Epistles. The same author says: "a meeting of the Persic or Zoroastrian religion with Judaism was sufficient to account for all the dangerous teaching referred to in the Epistle to the Colossians—traces of such a meeting are to be found in the Jewish literature antecedent to the time of Christ." As he indicates that this is the germ of subsequent Gnosticism, he uses it to oppose those who claim a post-apostolic date for this Epistle, on the ground of its opposition to Gnosticism. Whatever may have been the origin of these theosophic tendencies, Phrygia was the region where Judaism and Orientalism would most readily combine in errors such as are opposed by the Apostle.—R.]

§ 5. TIME AND PLACE OF COMPOSITION.

Compare § 2, 1 and INTROD. to Eph. § 6.

[Braune there claims priority for the Epistle to the Ephesians. Undoubtedly both were written about the same time. Which was first is almost entirely a matter of conjecture. Yet the probabilities, as set forth in the Introd. to the Ephesians, outweigh those drawn from "the nature of the contents of this Epistle" by ALFORD, ELLICOTT and DAVIDSON. "The more directly systematic and doctrinal" Epistle might precede quite as readily, as "the more directly individualizing and polemical" one.—R.]

EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE COLOSSIANS.*

I. ADDRESS AND SALUTATION.

CHAPTER I. 1, 2.

1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ [Christ Jesus]¹ by the will of God, and Timotheus our [ό, the] brother, To the saints and faithful [or believing] brethren in Christ which [who] are at Colosse:² [.] Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.³

* TITLE: Ἐπὶς Κολοσσαείς, N. and others: Ἐπὶς Κολασσαείς, A. B. K. and others. [The latter is adopted here by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth. Alford incorrectly cites K. in support of the latter reading, both in his apparatus criticus and Proleg. p. 34, Vol. III.—R.] Comp. Intro. § 4. 1.

² Ver. 2.—Κολοσσαείς is to be retained on the authority of N. B. D. F. L. (Alford, Wordsworth): Κολασσ. Lachmann, Tischendorf, Ellicott. The order of the E. V. is not that of the original: "To the saints in Colosse and believing brethren in Christ."—R.]

³ Ver. 2.—Καὶ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, wanting in no other Pauline salutation, occurring in precisely the same form (except in the pastoral Epistles), is sustained by N. A. C. E. G. and others, but omitted by other important authorities and critics (Tischendorf). The original absence of the phrase is less explicable than the subsequent omission in some MSS. [Rejected by Meyer, Alford, Wordsworth, Ellicott.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1. 2a. ADDRESS. Paul, an Apostle of Christ Jesus by the will of God.—See Eph. i. 1. To this church, not founded by himself and to its false teachers, he thus defines his official position as the Apostle called immediately by the ascended Son of God: hence "Christ Jesus."

And Timotheus the brother.—On this see VAN OESTERZEE (LANGE'S Commentary) 1 Timothy. The same phrase is added, Philem. 1. and 2 Cor. i. 1; in 1 Cor. i. 1: "and Sosthenes the brother"; Phil. i. 1: "Paul and Timotheus, servants of Jesus Christ"; 1 Thess. i. 1 and 2 Thess. i. 1: "Paul and Silvanus and Timotheus"; Gal. i. 1, 2: "Paul an Apostle—and all the brethren that are with me." Since "my" is not added as in Rom. xvi. 21, "Timotheus my workfellow," this last passage compels us to understand the word ἀδελφός in the simple sense of "Christian brother," with no more special relation to Paul, than that of one Christian to another (as ver. 2, ἀδελφοί). The Apostle writes, not merely in virtue of his peculiar authority as an Apostle, but together with tried associates; he includes with himself his helpers and friends. To him the Christian brother is a friend and assistant, with whom he has consulted and now acts respecting the case of this church, without resigning or impairing his independence (i. 24; ii. 1; iv. 7). Timothy is not on this account the writer of the Epistle, which Paul dictates to him (STEIGER), else according to Rom. xvi. 22, Tertius should have been named in the address, Rom. i. 1; and must each of the Epistles to the Thessalonians have been dictated to two persons? or the Epistle to the Galatians to the whole circle of Paul's companions? for Gal. vi. 11 is the usual autograph salutation. See SCHMOLLER in loco (LANGE'S Commentary, Gal.) and LAURENT: Neutestamentliche Studien, p. 4 sq. Nor can Timothy be regarded as the dispatcher of the Epistle (SCHENKEL), and certainly ὁ ἀδελφός does not mean "fellow Apostle" (CHRYSOSTOM: οὐκοῦν καὶ αὐτὸς ἀπόστολος). [So THEOPHYLACT. WORDSWORTH, supporting the view that Paul was the founder of the Colossian church, says: "In the case of all the other Epistles, where Timothy is thus introduced, it is certain that he had been with St. Paul at the places, and was well known to the churches to which those Epistles were sent." "If Timothy had not been at Colosse, it is hardly probable that, being still a young man, he would have been associated with the Apostle in this address to the Colossian church." "This opinion is also confirmed by the words ὁ ἀδελφός, the brother, signifying that he was well known to them as such, and was their own brother as well as St. Paul's.

Timothy is introduced as 'Timothy the brother' in the Epistle to Philemon, who lived at Colosse." EADIE:—"So well known was he as 'the brother,' doing the Apostle's work, carrying his messages, bringing correspondence to him, endeared to him in so many ways, and representing him in his absence, that the church of Colosse could not wonder at his name being associated with that of Paul."—R.]

Ver. 2. To the saints in Colosse.—See Eph. i. 1. [See BEVERIDGE, Vol. VI. Sermon II., p. 401, where he answers the question, "What is it to be a saint?"—R.]—And faithful brethren in Christ.—After defining their relation toward God, the relation of the members of the church to each other is noted in the word "brethren." This is one, mediated and maintained by Christ, while the adjective πιστοῖς describes its internal, true and vital character. At all events "in Christ" must be joined with "brethren" or better with "saints," ἀγίοις, here used as a substantive, and hence having the local attribute joined to it; it must not be joined to πιστοῖς, which is not = faithful (STEIGER). [The E. V. might be amended—to read "believing" instead of "faithful," but the ordinary reader would then be more likely to regard "in Christ" as connected with it rather than with "brethren" or "saints." Alford joins ἐν Χριστῷ to ἀδελφοῖς and suggests, to account for the omission of the article before ἐν Χ. that the idea ἀδελφός-ἐν Χριστῷ was familiar.—R.] A comparison with Eph. i. 1, 2, shows, amid all the similarity, the unmistakable original independence.

Ver. 2b. The Greeting. Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.—Comp. Eph. i. 2. [The final phrase, hitherto rejected by most modern editors, has found a new and important support from Cod. Sinaiticus. While the reason given in the critical note for retaining it should have due weight, the testimony of CHRYSOSTOM and THEOPHYLACT must not be disregarded: "Yet in this place he does not insert the name of Christ."—THEOPHYLACT adds: "Although it is his usual way to insert it." The reason he subjoins: "Lest the Apostle should revolt them at the outset, and turn their minds from his forthcoming argument." EADIE properly terms "silly;"—especially since, as WORDSWORTH, referring to Chrysostom, remarks: "It is observable that in the beginning of this Epistle—addressed to a church where the name of Jesus Christ was disparaged by many, and written in order to vindicate His Dignity—the Apostle repeats the word Christ four times"—not including this instance, where both adopt the briefer reading.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

All Christians are brethren. In addition to the remarks on Eph. i. 1, 2, one thing must here be noted; the fact that Paul, the Apostle of Christ Jesus, describes with the same name of brother, Timothy, whom he places beside himself, and the Colossian Christians to whom he writes with apostolic authority. From this we infer:

1. The Church founded by Jesus Christ is presented to our view as a "family of God," in which all the members are children of God and brethren to each other.

2. Compared with the difference from God, all differences between the members so far disappear that all are simply brethren.

3. Even in the organism of the church those members, distinguished immediately and by special authority, do not pass out of this fraternal relation; that most important office of the church, the apostolate, is but an accident of the brotherhood; the Christian position is the basis of position in the Church and surpasses it.

4. On fraternal fellowship and love depend all relations of life, all the gradations of that fundamental form which God has established in the earthly human community; each should feel that he is incorporated in the family.

5. True fraternity is not the result of natural family feeling, nor of any form of human community, but the product of God's Spirit in Christ.

6. But the brotherly love, which embraces all united in the faith, does not in the New Testament mode of life make the special personal relation of friendship stand out more sharply; the disciple of Christ has none other as friend than the disciple of Christ, but has all, who are such, without distinction as friends. Yet as soon as the church is enlarged numerically, there must naturally appear, within the great circle, personal affinities, and chosen companionship. Notwithstanding what is remarked above, biblical justification of these is not wanting, since the Lord Himself chose three of the Twelve to be nearest to Himself, and of these but one leaned on the bosom of Jesus. So Paul, among many whom he loved, had no one so "like-minded" as Timothy (Phil. ii. 20), and in the beginning of the apostolic history we see Peter and John more closely united together than to the others (PALMER: Moral, p. 400 sq.).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

If we can pray "Our Father," we are and we have brethren. "Father" bids us know and feel and conduct ourselves as children, "our" as brethren.

STARKE:—First, we must be certain of the will of God, then we must follow it cheerfully, whether the world look sweet or sour.—We must not think that we alone can do all, so that nothing goes right but what we alone do. Each must be of such a mind, as to bear a helper beside him.—Whoever fears the Lord from childhood and diligently uses God's Word, like Timothy may soon become a man in Christ, though in years still a youth.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—The Scriptures know nothing of those who were especially saints, pre-eminent above others, but all who through Christ are brought back into living fellowship with God, are saints.

[PASSAVANT:—It is not: believers on Christ, but in Christ; the Apostle views Christians as through faith firmly founded in Christ, vitally and deeply rooted in His heavenly Being, members of His body, flesh of His flesh, and spirit of His Spirit, life from His life.—On the greeting. Notice everywhere in the writings of the New Testament and especially in the Epistles of Paul, this thorough, unsearchable and indissoluble union of the Father and the Son; from eternity one Being, one Life, one Work of one Eternal Power and Love—and in this Eternal Blessed unity of the Father and the Son was from the beginning decreed and provided and bestowed all that should become to us the peace of eternity; the grace coming unto us.—RIEGER:—Fellowship with God through faith makes saints, fellowship with one another makes brethren in Christ.—HENRY:—He thought himself engaged to do his utmost, as an Apostle, because he was made so by the will of God.—As all good ministers, so all good Christians are brethren one to another—toward God they must be saints, and in both faithful.—SCHENKEL:—Why Christians are called saints: 1) how humbling, 2) how exalting this designation.—R. [Christians are brethren, whatever difference of age or opinion (Paul and Timothy), in spite of distance and degrees of knowledge and piety (Paul and the Colossians); because all are “brethren in Christ.”—R.]

II. FIRST PART.

Mention of the ground of Christian fellowship and warning against apostasy.

CHAPTER I. 3—II. 23.

1. Thanks to God for the faith and love of his readers from the beginning.

(CHAPTER I. 3-8).

3 We give thanks to God and [omit and]¹ the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying
4 always [always, when praying] for you,² Since we heard of your faith in Christ
5 Jesus, and of the love which ye have³ to all the saints, For [on account of] the hope
6 which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth
7 of the gospel; Which is come unto you [lit.: is present unto you], as it is in all the 8 world; and⁴ bringeth forth fruit [is bringing forth fruit and increasing],⁵ as it doth
[it is] also in [among] you, since the day ye heard of it [it], and knew the grace of 9 God in truth: As ye also [Even as ye]⁶ learned of Epaphras our dear fellow servant, 10 who is for you⁷ a faithful minister of Christ; Who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit.

⁷ Ver. 7.—Υπὲρ ὑμῶν, C. E. F. K. L. and N. corrected and in nearly all versions. The otherwise well supported ἡμῶν, N. A. B., is an error of the transcriber, accounted for by the prevalence of the first person. [Tischendorf, Ellicott, Wordsworth. Alford, quoting Ambrosiaster (4th century, vice apostoli), reads ἡμῶν, following Lachmann.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The immediate object of thanksgiving (vers. 3-5).
Ver. 3. We give thanks.—As a rule the Apostle begins with thanksgiving; this is precisely as in 1 Thess. i. 2; but in 1 Cor. i. 4, though the address reads: “Paul—and Sosthenes,” we find εὐχαριστῶ (so also Phil i. 1-3). The plural is not then conditioned by the mention of Timothy in the address (MEYER, SCHENKEL), yet it is not—εὐχαριστῶ (BAHR). Plural and singular forms are not used arbitrarily by the Apostle; the choice depended upon the predominance of the Apostle's individual feeling, or of the common sentiment of those participating: and this certainly includes not merely him or those named in the address, but the church in the house or place where the Apostle was. [ELICOTT says: “we, i. e., I and Timothy,” but intimates that the context always fully accounts for the selection of singular or plural. So EADIE, ALFORD. CONYBEARE contends for the singular meaning of the plural throughout all the Epistles—which is inadmissible.—R.]

To God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.—See Eph. i. 3.—Praying always for you defines more particularly "we give thanks;" the participle marks the thanksgiving as part of the prayer, and the adverb renders it prominent, that the former was never wanting in the latter. "Always" is not to be joined with the participle "praying" (GREEK FATHERS, BENOEL, LUTHER, etc.) [ALFORD, ELLICOTT, E. V. The majority of modern commentators join it with the verb,—EADIE renders: "We bless God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ always, when praying for you."—R.] Still less is "for you" to be joined with "we give thanks" (BAEHR). The latter cannot be decided by Rom. i. 8; 1 Cor. i. 4; 1 Thess. i. 2, while the former opinion is confirmed by Eph. i. 16. On the difference between πρὶ and ἐν, see Eph. v. 2; vi. 18.

Ver. 4. The occasion of thanksgiving.—Since we heard, ἀκούσαντες.—This second participle (aorist) sets forth what had preceded the thanksgiving, while the first one (present) appends what had accompanied it. See WINER'S Gram. p. 323.* The plural here marks the fact as publicly known, not merely made known to the Apostle and his friends.

Of your faith in Christ Jesus, and the love which ye have to all the saints.—"Your faith in Christ Jesus" is the first ground of this thanksgiving; your faith, resting on Christ, moving itself in Him; the phrase "in Christ Jesus" limits "faith" as Eph. i. 15, not ἐμῶν (DE WETTE). The preposition does not affect the meaning of "faith," so that it becomes "believing constancy" (LUTHER), but it only denotes that the object is to be regarded, not as the end of effort (εἰς), but as the element and ground. [ELLICOTT: "In Him as the sphere or substratum of the πίστις, that in which the faith centres itself. The omission of the article gives a more complete unity to the conception, 'Christ-centred faith.'" ALFORD: "the immediate element of their faith, not its distinctive character, is the point brought out."—R.] On the remainder of the clause, "and of the love which ye have to all the saints," see Eph. i. 15.—[The reading: ἣν ἔχετε carries "more affectionate commendation" (ALFORD) than the simple article of the Rec. It draws attention to the love and points to its persistence (ELLICOTT).—R.]

Ver. 5: describes this love more closely.—On account of the hope which is laid up for you in heaven.—[Joined to "love."—R.] Since οὗτα τὴν ἐλπίδα is joined grammatically to ἣν ἔχετε, Paul has not written ἀγάπην τὴν as in the parallel passage, Eph. i. 15, but subjoined the relative clause. "The hope" is characterized by the clause "which is laid up for you in heaven," as objective, like the ἐλπίς βλέπομένη (Rom. viii. 24), "that which is hoped for," which is preserved, set aside (ἀπό), in deposito reconditum (LÖSNER), as a securely placed treasure (CHRYSOSTOM: τὸ ἀσφαλές ἔδειξεν; BENOEL: sine periculo), or rather as a reward and prize according to 2 Tim. iv. 8; 1 Pet. i. 4; Matt. xix. 21; comp. Heb. ix. 27; vi. 18. On "in heaven," see Eph. i. 10. Accordingly this hope gives a motive for the love in its activity as well as its extent; it does not depend upon the present, on temporal life and possessions, nor on the men, the brethren whom it reaches. It is certain of the eternal, heavenly, divine possessions and salvation, and has in these enough. "Hope" is not therefore the third with "faith" and "love" (STEIGER and others), nor does it furnish a motive for faith (BAEHR and others); least of all for the thanksgiving (BENGEL: "from the hope is manifest how great the ground of thanksgiving for the gift of faith and love"). [So EADIE, BARNES. The E. V.—"for the hope" seems obscure. Both "on account of" (EADIE, ALFORD), and "because of" (ELLICOTT), leave the reader uncertain as to the connection, which is the main difficulty here.—R.]

Whereof ye heard before, ἣν προηκούσατε.—In the ἀπὸς λεγόμενον: προακούειν, according to the context the πρὸ refers to the object, "the hope laid up" which is future and concealed. MEYER is therefore incorrect: before you had this hope; HEINRICHs: alio doctore (Epaphra) ante me; BÖHMER, HUTH, before the Epistle was written; SCHENKEL: before he had received tidings of their faith. The interpretation (GROTIUS): prima rudimenta accepitis, as if προακούειν described the first instruction of catechumens, is unwarranted. [BRAUNE seems to follow DE WETTE and OLSHAUSEN in their view of the force of "before," "before the fulfilment of the hope," but as EADIE well remarks "such an exegesis is a species of truism." ELLICOTT: "not before any definite epoch, but merely at some undefined period in the past," "formerly."—EADIE gives the sense of "already," as intimating that this hope had been made prominent in preaching, and they of course heard of this in hearing the gospel; a view to be preferred as giving more point to the passage and fully accordant with the context.—R.] To "laid up in heaven" corresponds what is joined to "heard before," viz:

In the word of the truth of the gospel—through which the "hearing before" has its guarantee. This expression is another briefer and independent setting forth of Eph. i. 13, "after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation." The hearing before of the hope is mediated by the preaching (ἐν τῷ λόγῳ) of the truth (τῆς ἀληθείας), which is the substance of the λόγος, but is taken out of nothing other than the gospel (τοῦ εὐαγγελίου), to which the truth belongs. It is not proper to follow the parallel passage, which is grammatically different, and take "of the gospel" as a genitive of apposition to "in the word of truth" (STEIGER), or to "the truth" (BAEHR), [ELLICOTT: "a defining genitive, allied to the genitive possessivus (genitive continentis), which specifies, and so to say, localizes the general notion of the governing substantive: 'the truth which was preached in and was announced in the gospel'."—R.] Nor is "the word of the truth"—sermo verax (ERASMUS), or "the preaching of truth" (HUTHER, BLEEK), nor "of the truth of the gospel"—genuine gospel (STORR), nor is λόγος defined as to its substance by ἀληθείας as absolute truth, as to its form by εὐαγγέλιον as "proclamation of salvation" (SCHENKEL).

The deeper cause of thanksgiving (vers. 6-8).

Ver. 6. Which has come unto you—lit., is present unto you This is spoken of the gospel

* [The original references are to the 6th German edition; altered throughout to the 7th German ed., 1867.—R.]

παρὼν notes its being present (1 Cor. v. 3; 2 Cor. xiii. 10); with πρὸς ὑμᾶς, 2 Cor. xi. 8; Gal. iv. 18, 20, here εἰς ὑμᾶς. In the passages quoted the Apostle stands before them, turned towards them; here he speaks of the gospel, that penetrates into them; he describes the steady, constant and finally entire penetration of the gospel, which is not forced through with one blow. [The preposition conveys the idea of its having reached them, the participle implies its abiding there (ELLICOTT).—R.] The added clause: as it is in all the world, renders prominent the simple fact of the presence of the gospel in the world. The preposition ἐν marks the distinction between its presence in the world, and in Colosse, where it has already wrought what it should and would. "In all the world" indicates the whole world as the field, in which the gospel is found and which it will permeate. It is not confined to one part, had already begun its efficacy in the most diverse places, among Jews and Gentiles. Hence it is no synecdoche, "meaning the most noted parts of the world, as Rom. i. 8; x. 18" (GROTIUS), nor only the Roman Empire, nor popular hyperbole (MEYER). [ALFORD: "No hyperbole, but the pragmatic repetition of the Lord's parting command.—R.]

And is bringing forth fruit and increasing.—[ALFORD, omitting καί, calls the paragraph broken and unbalanced.—R.] It is not merely in all the world, but efficient there also. We have here the usual transition from the participial construction to that of the finite verb (WINER'S Gram., p. 505 sq.); the participle with εἶναι indicates continuance and duration (WINER'S Gram., p. 326 sq.). [So in English, hence the literal rendering: "is bringing forth fruit and increasing" is preferable.—R.] THEODORET: καρποφορίαν τὸν εὐαγγελίου κέκληκε τὴν ἐπαινομένην πολιτείαν, αἰσθάνει δὲ τὸν πιστευόντων τὸ πλήθος. The figure is borrowed from a tree which both bears fruit and grows (Matt. vii. 17; xiii. 32; Luke xiii. 19). The former word refers to the faith, the love, the Christian virtues, which the gospel produces in the internal and external life, the latter to the extension and the multiplication of its adherents (Acts vi. 7; xii. 24; xix. 20). [The former the intensive, the latter the extensive progress of the gospel. ELLICOTT.—R.]—As it is also among you, introduces Colosse as a part of the field, in which the gospel is and is working ("in all the world"), and furnishes a proof that the gospel is, and how it is, "in all the world." Hence ἐν ὑμῖν is "among you," not "in you" (LUTHER). "Bringing forth fruit and increasing" must be supplied. ["It doth," supplied in E. V., is to be changed to "it is," to correspond with the participial form of the verb in the former clause.—R.]

Since the day ye heard it, and knew the grace of God in truth.—[BRAUNE, following DE WETTE, supplies no object after "heard," making "the grace of God" the object of both verbs. MEYER, STEIGER, EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, supply: "the gospel," which is to be preferred. E. V. "of it," is unsatisfactory; they must have heard the gospel, as well as heard of it, before it would bring forth fruit among them.—R.] On the construction ἀφ' ἧς ἡμέρας, see WINER'S Gram., p. 130. The first proclamation of the gospel was followed by the acceptance of it, and from that time forth the Christian life and character of the Church developed internally and externally in constant progress. The object is "the grace of God," the substance of the evangelical preaching (ver. 5), the marrow of the gospel over against the law. "In truth" is an adverbial qualification of the verbs "heard" and "knew." The gospel is proclaimed *vere et sincere absque fūco, sive ἐν ἀπᾷτῃ καὶ λόγους εἰκαίους (GREEK FATHERS), and is accepted non simulate, sed vere. It implies a contrast to the false teachers and is not = ἀληθῶς, "truly," nor to be joined with "grace" (STORR and others), nor = in the gospel (GROTIUS) [BARNES.—R.]. Nor is it to be joined only to "knew" (MEYER and others), nor to "heard" alone (BAEHR and others). [ALFORD: "in its truth, and with true knowledge." So EADIE: "the words ἐν ἀληθείᾳ describe the teaching of Epaphras, or represent that genuine form, in which, by his preaching, the grace of God had been exhibited at Colosse." This makes it qualify the verb "knew," and at the same time define "the grace of God" by presenting the element, in which the gospel was proclaimed.—R.]

Ver. 7. Even as ye learned of Epaphras.—Καθὼς refers to "in truth" [ALFORD: "in which truth"—R.], and describes the manner in which they had learned from Epaphras. The verb, the object of which must be "the grace of God," marks the intermediate step between "hearing" and "knowing" and describes the earnest, constant effort of the Colossians, to which the activity of Epaphras corresponds.—Epaphras a Colossian or Phrygian (iv. 12: "one of you"), with Paul in his imprisonment (Philem. 23: "my fellow prisoner"), is not identical with Epaphroditus, the Macedonian, a preacher of Philippi † (Phil. ii. 25; iv. 18), as GROTIUS arbitrarily assumes; here indicated as the founder of the Church in Colosse, but otherwise entirely unknown to us. Even should we accept the reading καὶ before ἐμάθετε, we could not, with WIGGERS, ‡ treat it as though it were καὶ ἀπὸ Ἐπαφρά (as in Rom. v. 7; Eph. iv. 4), in order thus to maintain that there had been a proclamation of the gospel in Colosse before that of Epaphras. Still less does the καθὼς resume the preceding καθὼς ἐν παντὶ τῷ κόσμῳ, as though Epaphras had only told that the gospel was every where proclaimed (THEODORET). The preposition ἀπὸ indicates that the Colossians had gladly met Epaphras and heard him speak. The words which follow are a confirmation of the preaching of Epaphras: our dear fellow servant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ.—"Our dear fellow servant" describes him in his position toward Christ (δοῦλος) [no thought of his imprisonment with Paul (CONYBEARE)—R.], and toward Paul with his helpers (σὺν ἡμῶν), and in his relation to them (ἀγαπητός), as an excellent minister, who, entirely dependent on the Lord, and independent of men, labored as a colleague with the Apostle and his fellow laborers, especially for the Church at Colosse (ἰπὲρ ὑμῶν), from the beginning, with proper fidelity (ὅς ἐστιν πιστός) in the service of Christ (διδάκονος Χριστοῦ). [The reading of the Rec., ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, "for you," "on your behalf," is not only better supported, but avoids the repetition of the other reading, while it is as strong a commendation of Epaphras to the Colossians, to say that he had been a faithful minister of Christ for them, as to say that he had been faithful vice apostoli.—R.]

Ver. 8. Who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit.—The declaration is made prominent. Epaphras has not only seen in Colosse, but spoken in Rome to Paul in a detailed, perspicuous way, as a witness respecting "your love in the Spirit." The love was "not carnal, but spiritual" (ΕΚΜΕΝΤΙ), "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. v. 22: Rom. xv. 30); Spirit is of course the Holy Spirit (as Rom. xiv. 17). Hence it is not the spirit of man, the inner man, nor a "love which depends on an internal sentiment and disposition, a love sincere and earnest" (A LAPIDE, BÖHM and others), and since the context must decide what is the object of the love, it is to be regarded as "love of the brethren" (ver. 4), including love to the Apostle, but not this latter exclusively (ΒΛΕΠΕ, BLEEK and others); the following "we also" at least cannot decide this to be the meaning, since the Apostle does not pray merely in reciprocity. It is improper to join ἐν πνεύματι with δηλώσας (WAHL), as though Epaphras had narrated it through inspiration, or to explain it, per spiritum sanctum (GROTIUS). [EADIE properly expounds "love" as denoting the Christian grace of love, hence "in the Spirit." ALFORD: "the chief gift of the Spirit," "thus in the elemental region of the Spirit;" ELLICOTT: "genuine and operative only in the sphere of His blessed influence."—R.]

It is unmistakably the object of Paul in this honoring description, to establish as firmly as possible in every direction the authority of Epaphras; his doctrine is right, his relations to the Apostle hearty and intimate, his interest for the Colossians active and pure, undisturbed from the first. He seems to have been suspected by the false teachers. Paul gives prominence to these facts, in order to shame the errorists, to warn and guard the Church against them; for their sake and that of the cause, he enters particularly upon the efficiency and conduct of Epaphras. ESTIUS: "Lest they might suffer themselves to be led away from the doctrine which they had learned from him by new teachers."

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Faith and Love are the chief points, in judging of the condition of the Christian Church. Faith must not only be directed to (εἰς) Christ, but be a life in (ἐν) Christ; it is the foundation and source of love, by which it worketh [Gal. v. 6.—R.]. This love must be "in the Spirit" (ver. 8), that it may be pure, and extend "to all the saints" (ver. 4), that it may be large-hearted, not limited by sensuous, arbitrary and selfish sympathies. Living, active faith in Christ alone leads to such purity and extent of love, because the believer has first of all love to God, the Father of Jesus Christ (and through Him his Father), and from a faith on the love of God in Christ, which enjoys the love of the Father and Son, he gains a love to all, in whom the same faith is active, who have become and still are the objects of the same mercy, altogether irrespective of the stage of results accomplished, however manifold the degrees of its strength may be. It overleaps party lines and difference of creeds, and prays in truth: Our Father, which art in heaven. In "Father" lies the doctrine of faith, in "our" the ethics of love, in "which art in heaven," the impulse and motive of hope.

2. The activity of this love, growing out of faith, which embraces all Christians as brethren, as children of the Father, has its mainspring in the hope of salvation, secure for us in heaven. This is Christian eudemonism, which indeed has in view the salvation of our own souls, the perfection and blessedness of our own personality, yet not selfishly, but seeks and knows in fellowship with all believers; nor yet externally, sensualistically, like a Turk or heathen German, but internally, in the spirit of the mind; nor yet here, but in heaven, not in time, but in eternity, hence not as a materialist or atheist burning for good fortune and earthly pleasure; and finally not in our own strength, as it has been attempted "in godless virtue," but as a gift of the gracious God through Christ.

3. Faith grows from the preached word of gospel truth. Since faith as to its essence is God's word become living in the heart of man, since it grows out of this word as from a seed, its establishment and growth depends altogether upon the preaching of this word of God (λόγος, ver. 5), which alone contains the truth indispensably necessary for the soul, presenting the grace of God, which is the marrow of the gospel (ver. 5: τῆς ἀληθείας τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, ver. 6: τὴν χάριν τοῦ θεοῦ). This and not the preaching (SCHENKEL) is the vital principle of Christianity, which penetrates ever more deeply into the believers, producing in them and in the life of the church the fruits of virtues, both active and passive, ever extending more widely, ever permeating more thoroughly every one and all things (ver. 6). ["To keep the figure of the Apostle, it was like a tree, whose fruit, falling to the earth, germinated, so that there sprang up a youthful and healthy forest on all sides of it" (EADIE).—R.] Preaching is only the principal means, to which we must hold fast in simplicity and freedom from all perversion, deterioration or obscurity.

4. The teachers or preachers of the gospel must labor as belonging to Christ, as entirely dependent on Him (ver. 7: δοῦλος) yet attached to Him (διδάκωνος); they are not servants of the church (SCHENKEL), but only of Christ: servants, but for the church (ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν), in doctrine (vers. 6, 7), in supplication to God (ver. 3), and in the varied intercourse with men, among whom they would advance their cause. They should never forget that they do not stand alone and for themselves, but in fellowship (ver. 7: συνδουλός), that as colleagues they should esteem and love each other, that one should rejoice without envy in the other, as Paul in Epaphras, who meekly flies to him, and should fraternally suffer with each other, as Epaphras with Paul. [HENRY:—"Thus he puts an honor on an inferior minister, and teaches us not to be selfish, or think all that honor lost which goes beside ourselves. We learn in his example not to think it a disparagement to us, to water what others have planted, or build on the foundation others have laid."—"Observe Christ is our proper master and we His ministers. He does not say your minister, but the minister of Christ for you. It is by Christ's authority, but for the people's service."—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Even where we must fear and blame and warn, an opportunity for thanksgiving is not wanting.—In the general prayer for Sunday service belongs the petition for love toward all men; however easy towards some, it is just as difficult towards all.—Do not suffer a preacher, colleague or friend to be misunderstood and falsely judged, for speaking well of him belongs to obedience to the Ninth Commandment; neither break out blindly against him, that misunderstands the neighbor whose cause you would advance.—Rejoice when you see the word of God efficacious, and learn to wait patiently, as a husbandman for the fruits.

STARKE:—He who does not believe on Jesus Christ, does not believe on God at all; so though the Jews and Turks think they believe on God, yet they in no wise do; for they do not believe on Jesus, on whom we must believe before we can assure ourselves of grace and salvation from God.—[Always to pray, and always to give thanks are the Christian's needful duties.—If teaching and learning are of the right sort, then God's word hath good speed.—Not all loving is praiseworthy; love in the Spirit is commended.—R.]

RIEGER:—In the eyes of the world the character of a philanthropist, embracing all in his love, will indeed bring us more honor and glory than love to the saints; for this implies a distinction which the world does not willingly admit. The world has a love to which a Jew or Turk is more acceptable than a saint.—If we consider only the yet feeble beginnings of faith, the still prevailing temptations, we may doubt whether we have cause to rejoice and thank God. But by looking out to the mark of hope, which is set before us, the grace to us becomes very great.—It is certainly unspeakable how much the world, now so unbelieving and unthankful, does yet enjoy of the fruits of the gospel; how many arts and sciences, milder customs and laws would not exist, had not the gospel made the first advance in that direction.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—Faith, since it is active, becomes not only love to Christ, but also love to all, who belong to Christ.—We see how readily we allow ourselves to be led into all manner of divisions and limitations of love, which have less ground than then existed in the difference between Jewish and Gentile Christians. It is better to study such a love to all saints, and not one that extends to the few who exactly and specially agree with us, however great enjoyment there may be in it.—[The gospel is a germ, made fruitful by God, which cannot be received, without its making an impression on the spirit.—R.]

PASSAVANT:—There is generally an unspeakably beneficent, tender feeling in giving thanks from the heart for a benefit.—Thanksgiving will be the bliss of eternity. The beginning, the first steps thereto must be made on the porch, else we shall have no voice nor place, no life above in the holy choirs.—It may often be long: days, years, decades may pass as we hear and know the gospel, before we obtain a living knowledge of the grace of God, that permeates our heart and mind and life.—"There are men," says Pascal, "who admire external greatness alone, as if there were no mental greatness; others can only admire mental greatness, as though there were not one infinitely higher, to be found in wisdom."

[LISCO:—The Apostolic thanksgiving and the praise therein contained has no other purpose than encouragement, 1) to continued steadfastness; 2) to further advance in all good.—HENRY:—Ver. 3. In our thanksgiving we must have an eye to God as God (He is the object of thanksgiving as well as prayer), and as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, in whom and through whom all good comes to us.—Vers. 4, 5. Faith, hope, and love, are the three principal graces in the Christian life, and proper matter of our prayer and thanksgiving.—We must love all the saints, bear an extensive kindness and good-will to good men, notwithstanding lesser points of difference and many real weaknesses.—Ver. 6. All who hear the word of the gospel, ought to bring forth the fruit of the gospel.—Wherever the gospel comes, it will bring forth fruit to the honor and glory of God. We mistake, if we think to monopolize the comforts and benefits of the gospel to ourselves.—Ver. 8. Faithful ministers are glad to be able to speak well of their people.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 5. "For the hope." Every blessing which the gospel makes known has futurity in its eye,—and the Christian life, in the meantime, is one as much of expectation as of positive enjoyment.—Ver. 6. The gospel bore choice and noble clusters of fruit. It is not a ceremonial to be gazed at, or a congeries of opinions to be discussed. It is essentially a practical system, for its ethics are involved in its creed and worship.—The gospel was ecumenical, but the error which menaced them was only provincial in its sphere.—Ver. 8. Love is to be regarded as the crown and consequence of all the other graces. The Spirit of Him who is Love takes possession of the believing bosom, and exerts upon it His own assimilating power. A Christian community may be congratulated upon its love.—R.]

[SCHENKEL:—The true Christian idiosyncrasy of a church: 1) Its ground—faith in Christ; 2) its fruit—love to the saints; 3) its power—hope of the heavenly treasure of eternal life.—The gospel of Jesus Christ, the tree of life for humanity: 1) The fruit, which it brings; 2) the extension, which it gains.—The power of the gospel. 1) It consists in the word of the grace of God. 2) It is conditioned by a faithful proclamation and simple apprehension of it.—R.]

2. Earnest supplication for the progress of the Church in true knowledge, especially of the Being and Work of Christ.

9 For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you, and to desire¹ that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom

11 and increasing in [by]³ the knowledge of God; Strengthened with all might [strength]⁴ according to his glorious power [the power of his glory],⁵ unto all patience and longsuffering with joyfulness [joy];⁶ Giving thanks unto the Father, which [who] hath made us meet, to be partakers [for the portion, εἰς τὴν μερίδα]⁸ of the inheritance of the saints in light: Who hath delivered us from [out of] the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son [the Son of his love];⁹ In whom we have redemption through his blood [omit through his blood],¹⁰ even the forgiveness of sins: Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of [before] every creature: For [Because] by [in] him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in [on] earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created
17 by him, and for him: And he is¹¹ before all things, and by [ἐν, in] him all things consist [subsist]. And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the firstborn¹² from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell [Because in

And you, that were sometimes alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works
22 [lit.: as to your understanding in wicked works], yet now hath he reconciled,¹⁴ In the body of his flesh through [his] death,¹⁵ to present you holy and unblamable and un-
23 reprovable in his sight: If [If at least, εἴ γε] ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature¹⁶ which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister.¹⁷

⁹ Ver. 13.—"Son of his love," preferred by all modern commentators, avoiding the hendiadys of the E. V.—R.]

¹⁴ Ver. 21.—B. and others have ἀποκατηλλάγητε. The reading ἀποκατηλλάξεν, N. A. C. and others, seems to be an emendation on account of the construction. [The preponderance of authority is on the other side. Lachmann adopts the reading of B, but Rec., E. V., Tischendorf, Alford, Ellcott, Wordsworth follow the mass of MSS. See EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

15 Ver. 22.—Ἄνθρωπ after θανάτου, N. A., is properly omitted in B. [Τοῦ θανάτου is—"his death" here.—R.]

17 Ver. 23.—Instead of διακονος, the reading of N. B. [ἡ A.] is κηνυῖ καὶ ἀποστολος, yet διακονος is added in the margin of N.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The immediate object of supplication: full knowledge of the Divine will. (ver. 9).—Ver. 9. For this cause refers to the entire paragraph, vers. 3-8. What the Apostle had heard of the Colossians moved him to the petition. This is required by the contents of the petition and by the accords: "since the day we heard" (ver. 9), to which the object must be supplied from above ("your faith in Christ Jesus and love to all the saints"); ver. 6, "since the day ye heard" and ver. 4, "since we heard:" and also "do not cease to pray for you" (ver. 9), and ver. 3, "praying also for you." After his thanks to God, Paul now gives the purport of his prayer. Certainly ver. 9 is not connected with ver. 8 alone, where the love of the Colossians to himself is spoken of: because he had heard this, he now prays for them (BLEEK); as though Paul, like the Pharisees, prayed only for those who loved him.

We also, as in "we give thanks" (ver. 3), is Paul and those with him, hence not Timothy merely (MEYER, SCHENKEL), nor is he excluded (BAHR). Καὶ, "also," refers chiefly to Ephraim, who represents and labors for the Colossians (vers. 7-8), and then to the Colossians also, who were won to the gospel (ver. 6) and have love to the brethren (vers. 4, 8). It does not therefore indicate merely the reciprocity of intercourse between the Colossians and Paul (SCHENKEL, MEYER). [It has here its slightly contrastive force (ELLCOTT), and marks the change of subject; "we on our part" (ALFORD).—R.] It is not to be separated from ἡμεῖς and joined to διὰ τοῦτο (DE WETTE), nor by any means to προσευχόμενοι (BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS).

[Since the day we heard.—ELLCOTT: "incidental definition of the time with reference to ἀκούσαντες, ver. 4. EADIE: "The receipt of the intelligence produced immediate results and led to prayer. The effect was instant—and it was not spent with a single impulse." The prayer was continuous also.—R.]

Do not cease to pray for you, and to desire.—On οὐ παύμεθα with the participles, see Eph. i. 16. [ELLCOTT: "an exactly similar affectionate hyperbole."—R.] The first verb denotes the wish (2 Cor. xiii. 9; 3 Jno. 2; Acts xxvii. 29), addressed to any one, then in general a prayer expressing a wish; the second, the supplication, entreaty, the medium with its reflection; sibi expetere, the pressing hearty petition from a sense of fellowship. [It seems a better distinction to regard the first as general, the second as special, "the one prayer in its ordinary aspect, the other direct request." Καὶ "brings into prominence a special after a general" (ALFORD). The comma of the E. V. answers the same purpose here.—R.]

That ye might be filled.—(BENGE: "He made mention of his supplications generally ver.

3; he now expresses what he supplicates." Ἰνα indicates the aim of the petition, the purpose of the petitioner, hence not simply its purport (against HARLESS, Eph. 17). [On ἵνα after verbs of praying, see ALFORD, 1 Cor. xiv. 13. "The purport and purpose become compounded in the expression." ELLCOTT: "Ἰνα has here its secondary telic force, the subject of the prayer is blended with the purpose of making it."—R.] 11 ληρωθῇτε pre-supposes the imperfect state of those prayed for, and from its position at the beginning renders prominent the importance of progress to fullness. It occurs in this Epistle alone five times, here; ver. 25; ii. 10; iv. 12, 17; in Ephesians (i. 23; iii. 19; iv. 10; v. 18), and in Philippians (i. 11; ii. 2; iv. 18, 19), each four times.

With the knowledge of his will.—Τῇ ἐπίγνωσιν is an accusative of reference, like Phil. i. 11; so σκηνωτοῦ τῆν τέχνην (Acts xviii. 3). [ELLCOTT: "accusative of the remoter, the quantitative object in which the action of the verb has its realization." "The genitive marks the absolute material out of which the fullness was realized, the accusative as it were, the domain of which the fullness was evinced."—R.] See WINER'S Gram. p. 216. Further it is not τῇ ἐπίγνωσει, since they were not to be filled with the knowledge, but their knowledge should be full, perfect. The word itself describes the knowledge which grasps and penetrates the object (MEYER), as ver. 10; ii. 3; iii. 10. [WORDSWORTH: "ἐπίγνωσις, full knowledge is more than γνώσις, it is a gift and grace of the Holy Spirit. This word occurs oftener in this Epistle than in any other of St. Paul. He may perhaps have used it as a contrast to the false γνώσις or gnosticism of the false teachers, who were beguiling the Colossians with the speciousness of their vain philosophy. They in their theories promise γνώσις, but the Apostle gave ἐπίγνωσις by his ministry." DE WETTE suggests, the former is a mere impractical and theoretical, the latter full and living knowledge.—R.] "Of his will," since it concerns the purpose of the prayer, is God's will, and, according to the context (ver. 10), the will of God respecting the walk and conversation of the Christian in the world. Hence not the redemptive decree, as Eph. i. 9 (STEIGER and others), not the will of God which operates on us and is efficient in us, but the will of God to be obeyed by us, hence not the will of the majority (SCHENKEL). [The immediate context "in all wisdom," is against this limitation of "His will." The result of full knowledge was to be worthy walk, but the knowledge was not therefore to be limited to His will respecting walk. As a fact Christian walk is based on a far wider knowledge.—R.]

Paul now sets forth the mode in which this "being filled" was to be consummated: In all spiritual wisdom and understanding.—Hence this is not to be joined with "walk" (ver. 10), which is otherwise defined (THEODORET and others). See Eph. i. 8: "in all wisdom and prudence." Σύνεσις is not identical with φρόνησις (Sirach. i. 4; σύνεσις φρονήσεως); the latter refers more to the God-given organ, the former more to the activity of man in using it; the latter more to the original gift, the former obtained rather by exercise. [The former is perhaps seen more in practically embracing a truth, the latter more in bringing the mind to bear upon it (ELLCOTT).—R.] The adjective "spiritual" belongs to both substantives. It indicates that the "being filled" cannot be effected by any purely natural development of human mental life from its own power. The wisdom is not "fleshly" (2 Cor. i. 12; 1 Cor. i. 26), nor is the understanding of this character; yet neither are of themselves spiritual," they become so only through the Holy Ghost. [EADIE and ALFORD join πνευματικῇ to συνέσει alone, but it seems better with ELLCOTT to join both adjectives to both substantives. On σοφία and σύνεσις, the general and particular, ELLCOTT remarks: "both appear to have a practical reference; the former is, however, a general term; the latter its more special result and application."—R.]

The aim of the petition: Christian walk. Vers. 10-12. They were not to rest with "knowledge of His will," but advance.

Ver. 10. That ye might walk.—The infinitive, περιπατήσαι, depending on πληρωθῆτε is exegetical (WINER's Gram. pp. 298, 301); it is not necessary to supply εἰς or ὥστε. The closer definition follows.—Worthy of the Lord refers to Christ [as always apparently in St. Paul's Epistles (ELLCOTT).—R.], the model of the Christian. Neither 1 Thess. ii. 12, "worthy of God," nor Eph. iv. 1, "followers of God," will justify us in understanding it otherwise.—Unto all pleasing describes the manner of the worthy walk, giving prominence to the purpose (εἰς). Ἀρέσκεια, only here, in a good sense, describes in classical authors the conduct of the ἀρεσκος, the obsequious, i. e., obsequiousness. The context requires that it be understood as "pleasing Christ" not God, in spite of Matt. v. 48 (SCHENKEL). Since Christ can be pleased in everything, "all" is added.

This is confirmed by the following characteristic of the Christian walk: Being fruitful in every work.—[BRAUNE reads, "being fruitful and increasing in every good work," a collocation in conformity with his view of the text and his exegesis. The order of the E. V. seems to preserve the symmetry and present the meaning better.—R.] On the nominatives καρποφοροῦντες καὶ αὐξ., instead of the more exact accusatives, to agree with ὑμᾶς implied after περιπατήσαι, see Eph. iv. 1, 3. Here it is readily explained, yet not by joining the participles to πληρωθῆτε (BENGEL); the two participles are united as in ver. 6; first bearing fruit, then growing more, as in a tree, in order to greater fruitfulness. The sphere of both is denoted by "in." The prepositional phrase, standing first for emphasis, is not to be joined with "pleasing" (OEBMANN, STEIGER and others), but with the verbs [or according to the view of ALFORD, ELLCOTT and others, with the verb "being fruitful"—undoubtedly to be preferred if the instrumental dative is retained. See below.—R.] By "good works" we are to understand, works required by the will of God, growing out of faith, demanded, not merely by law, but by relations, circumstances, by the inward impulse of the conscience and the Holy Ghost.

[And increasing by the knowledge of God.] The advance is made into, up to the knowledge of God. This indeed depends upon their being "filled with the knowledge of His will" (ver. 9). Their being fruitful and increasing in every good work aids thereto. Hence LUTHER is incorrect; and be fruitful in every good work and increase in the knowledge of God. [The order of the E. V. is the same.—R.] Advance is made from knowledge to knowledge in the Christian walk, wherein the spirit of God guides into all truth (Jno. xvi. 13; xiv. 26). Εἰς is neither = κατά (BÖHMNER nor = ἐν (BEZA), nor = the dative which HUTHNER and others read. [The close union of the two participles above and the preceding exegetical note are based on the less supported reading: εἰς τὴν ἐπίγνωσιν. The better reading is τῇ ἐπιγνώσει (instrumental dative). This is to be joined with αὐξανόμενοι, "increasing by the knowledge of God." As the main reason for retaining the reading of the fewer MSS. is that it is more difficult, ALFORD remarks, supporting τῇ ἐπιγνώσει: "this is by far the most difficult of the three readings, the meaning of ἐν and εἰς being very obvious, the former pointing out the element, the latter the proposed measure of the increase. And hence, probably, the variations. It is the knowledge of God which is the real instrument of enlargement, in soul and life, of the believer—not a γνώσις which φύσιον, but an ἐπίγνωσις which αὐξάνει." So OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, HUTHNER, EADIE, ELLCOTT.—R.]

Ver. 11 gives a second definition of the walk, almost exactly like the first in its construction.—Strengthened with all strength, ἐν πάσῃ δυνάμει δυνατούμενοι. The verb, which occurs only here, marks those walking worthy of the Lord as energized in activity, not in one direction, but in all: in will, affection and perception, in understanding, in home and calling, in all external relations. [BRAUNE seems to regard ἐν as indicating the element, and δύναμις as subjective (so ALFORD). It seems more natural and accordant with the phrase immediately following, to take ἐν as instrumental and δύναμις as objective, i. e., strength from God. So MEYER, EADIE, ELLCOTT (THEODORER is quoted by the latter), and E. V.; in either case "all" implies that the energy extends to every department.—R.] The paranomasia, as well as the construction like that of the previous clause, forbid the separation of the prepositional phrase from the verb, to join it with what precedes.

According to the power of His glory, κατὰ τὸ κράτος τῆς δόξης.—Power is requisite, the Christian does not have it in himself; the measure of it is not inconsiderable, it increases. God alone gives it in proportion to the Power which He has, in comparison with whose glory, majesty, grace and mercy, we are and have nothing. His glory ever reveals itself more and more to him who walks worthy of the Lord. The motive and measure of our strength is in the might of the majesty of God, whom we know ever better. Hence δόξα and ἰσχὺς (Eph. i. 19; vi. 10, "according to the power of his might") are not to be considered as parallels and the former limited here to the Ruler's dignity (STEIGER), nor is the phrase—"glorious power" (LUTHER, BAHR, [E. V.], and others), as though it were ἐνδοξον κράτος.

Unto all patience and long-suffering with joy.—Through growing strength progress is made in directions the most various (πάσαν, all) "unto patience" (ὑπομονήν) which is not merely suffering (ὑπέχει, Jude. 7. only) i. e., sustinere. ὑπομένειν means the mind in suffering; ὑπομονή denotes this constancy and patience of the mind. Hence we find, not the patience of God, but "the God of patience" spoken of (Rom. xv. 5), it is not God, who demands, but who dispenses "patience" (TITTMANN, Syn., I. p. 194). "Patience" is opposed to displeasure without power to help or change; "long-suffering," to displeasure with power to punish, to avenge, to alter and avert. CHRYSOSTOM: "one is long-suffering towards those whom it is possible to requite, but patient towards those whom he is unable to requite." In the former case the objects are usually men, in the latter, circumstances. It is incorrect to make "patience" refer to the extent, and "long suffering" to the continuance of the feeling (SCHENKEL), or to contrast timidity with the former and irritability with the latter (HUTHER), or to ignore the distinction (MEYER, BLEEK). [ELLCOTT renders εἰς, "to insure, to lead you into," marking the final destination; EADIE: "in order to." See his notes in loco, on the distinction between "patience" and "long suffering."—R.] That which is characteristically Christian in both is: "with joy," which is impossible in such a case without the power of God. In "patience and long-suffering" the Christian is glad, and certain of the victory of his cause, of his reward with God both in his own heart and in heaven. It must not then be joined with "giving thanks" (ver. 12), as is done by the Greek fathers, ESTIUS, HUTHER, MEYER, SCHENKEL, BLEEK. [And also by TISCHENDORF, LACHMANN, ELLICOTT, on the ground of the parallelism in the structure of the clauses.—R.] "With joy" would be entirely superfluous in that connection; the parallelism is not compulsory, and besides it is not "in joy," indicating the element, but "with (μετά)," which shows that it is only an accompaniment with "patience." [AS DE WETTE says: by such a connection "we lose the essential idea of joyful endurance—and the beautiful train of thought, that joyfulness in suffering expresses itself in thankfulness to God" (ALFORD).—R.]

The third definition follows (vers. 12-14).—Ver. 12.—Giving thanks to the Father who hath made us meet.—Even in sorrow, let there be thanksgiving; let not Him be forgotten who giveth gifts and is the Father. It is incorrect, to take the participle, not as coordinate with "being fruitful," "increasing," "strengthened," but as connected with "do not cease," ver. 9 (Greek fathers, CALVIN, BENGEL); or to supply "of our Lord Jesus Christ" (ver. 3) after "Father" (MEYER) [ALFORD, ELLICOTT.—

R.], instead of regarding Him, in accordance with the context, as our Father, who however is and proves Himself such in Christ: qui idoneus fecit, fueramus enim inidonei, 2 Cor. iii. 6 (BENGEL). "Us" includes the Apostle and his companions and his readers, who are Christians.—For what has He made us meet?—For the portion of the inheritance of the saints in light.—"For" (εἰς as above) marks the aim the "making meet," which (as aorist) shows that it is already, even though incipiently, attained. Τὴν μερίδα describes the "portion," share, which falls to one personally (Luke x. 42; xii. 43), and "the inheritance" (τὸν κληθρὸν) describes the whole of which the Christian is partaker, as given sorte non pretio (BENGEL), as undeserved. The expression is borrowed from the Old Testament (Ps. xvi. 5, "the portion of my inheritance, μερίς τῆς κληρονομίας"); as the chosen people obtained Canaan (ἡ γῆ τῆς κληρονομίας) through the grace of God, and each Israelite his part in the distribution of the land, so the Christian obtains his portion in and of the kingdom of heaven. "The saints" then describes the possessors of the heritage. The position of ἐν φωτὶ forbids our connecting it with ἰκανώσαντι, "making meet" (Greek fathers, STEIGER, MEYER), which besides is accomplished in another way than "in light;" or with "inheritance" (BEZA, HUTHER, BLEEK), or with "portion" (BENGEL). It is a closer description of the sphere in which "the saints," the Christians, (ver. 2) are found in their walk (ver. 10), in order to mark the extent of the benefit conferred upon them through the "making meet," which is the occasion of the thanksgiving. Comp. Eph. v. 8, 9, 11; iv. 18. According to the context the result is the principal point here, not the means, which are introduced afterwards, but without any exposition of "in light" or any reference to it. Hence it is incorrect, to contrast with Christians as the "saints in light" other saints in darkness, under the law in the Old Testament, which is contrary to the usus loquendi and to Pauline views (GROTIUS: thus is shown the distinction of the law and the gospel), or to refer it to future glory (SCHENKEL: ἐν τῇ δόξῃ). [This last view is the popular one; "light is taken to mean "heaven," and the passage interpreted as a thanksgiving for what God has done to prepare us for an inheritance in heaven, or inheritance with the saints in heaven. Obviously this is forbidden by the context. EADIE, who joins it with "inheritance" as descriptive of it, ALFORD, who connects it with the whole phrase "portion - - saints," and ELLICOTT, who indicates a preference for joining it with "inheritance of the saints," all avoid this mistake. The saints are now "in light," and the inheritance is "in light." "In light" as the sphere of their walk, the saints enjoy their "inheritance" which is "begun here and the meetness conferred in gradual sanctification, but completed hereafter."—R.]

God's act and gift, as the foundation and beginning of the Christian walk, more accurately defined (vers. 13, 14).

Ver. 13. Who hath delivered us out of the power of darkness.—"Who" refers back to "Father." His act is first, "hath delivered us," i. e., has drawn, snatched us out of danger (see Passow, Lex.). CHRYSOSTOM: "He does not say delivered, but snatched (ῥῆψατο), showing our and their great misery and captivity." ZANCHIUS: "This is more than; he has liberated. For those are liberated, who are willing and desirous and deserving of being made free; those who are seized are often unwilling, as Lot from Sodom; he magnifies both the grace and the power of God." "Out of the power of darkness" denotes the power under the dominion of which Christians were before Redemption. The first substantive describes the organized power, the second its character, as Eph. ii. 2: "the power of the air;" vi. 12: "powers of this darkness." [ALFORD: "power i. e., in the territorial sense; darkness—not to be understood of a person but of the character of the region." ELLICOTT: "evil and sin viewed objectively." DAVIES refers here to the dualism of the Zend-avesta.—R.] Necessarily opposed to this is "the power of His glory" (ver. 11), and as a consequence "the saints" are "in light." Here we find a justification of the exposition given above.

And translated us into the kingdom of the Son of his love.—But He did not stop with this "deliverance" (καί); He has "translated" (μετέστησεν) us. The word denotes a local change, hence a change of relation, determining the conduct and walk. "Into the kingdom" is in contrast with "out of the power," and "the Son of His love" with "darkness." "The Son of His love," which recalls both in phrase and connection Eph. i. 6, occurs only here, and sets forth the Son with the greatest emphasis as the Object of His love, upon whom His entire love flows, and through Him therefore upon us. The Son is not conceived of here as "out of" the love, born out of its substance (AUGUSTINE), [i. e., "Love considered more as an essence than an attribute."—R.]; nor is it—His beloved Son (Matt. iii. 17; xvii. 25; xii. 18). [Nor "His dear Son" (E. V.).—R.] Not only is the "power" His, but the "kingdom" also, the Messianic kingdom of heaven, which is already actually present here, but not completed in the Christian Church, and therefore not identical with it. This is not then to be understood of the church (BAEHN, HUTHER and others). ["The term has a reference neither purely metaphorical (the church), nor ethical and inward, nor yet ideal and prophetic (MEYER), but —semi-local and descriptive —nor is this wholly future" (ELLICOTT).—R.]

Ver. 14 gives the modus translationis (THOMAS AQUINAS): In whom we have redemption, even the forgiveness of sins.—Like Eph. i. 7, except that "through his blood" is omitted here [retained in Rec. and E. V.—R.], the means of redemption not being made prominent; and that ἀμαρτιῶν is deeper and more internal than παρπτωμάτων. Paul's freedom and independence are unmistakable. [The exact force is: "In whom we are having the redemption" (ELLICOTT).—R.] Such a possession is the result of the act of God which changes our relation to Him [through the Redeemer whom the Apostle then describes.—R.]

The exalted relation of the Mediator to God and the world.—Vers. 15–17. BENDEL: "He describes the glory and eminence of Christ above the highest angels; and scatters those germs from which he afterwards confutes the worshippers of angels. This so full knowledge of Christ is comprehended only by those who are experienced in the mystery of redemption."

Ver. 15. Who is.—"Is," not "was" or "became;" hence we have here defined, not what He became at His appearing in the flesh, but what He is, and is personally (τοῦ νοῦ—ός). [Undoubtedly the subject of the whole passage is "the Son of God's love" (ver. 13); and this subject must be taken in its widest and most complex relations, whether as Creator or Redeemer, the immediate context defining the precise nature of the reference (ELLICOTT). MEYER very justly remarks: "It must be noted that Paul is viewing Christ according to His present Being, i. e., according to His present and permanent status of exaltation, and hence he expresses not what Christ was, but what He is." Yet it cannot be denied that while this is true, there must be a distinction made in referring the various predicates to the subject, for even MEYER in objecting to this says: "The only correct reference is to His whole Person, which in the theanthropic status of his present heavenly Being is continuously what His Divine nature (considered in itself) was before the Incarnation, so that by virtue of the identity of His Divine Nature, we can attribute the same predicates to the Exalted One as to the Logos." He thus himself implies a distinction, which he will not permit in Paul's language. In claiming as we do with the Fathers generally, BENDEL, ELLICOTT, BLEEK, WORDSWORTH and many others, that the immediate reference throughout this verse is to the λόγος ἄσαρκος (against MELANCHTHON, BARNES, EADIE, and ALFORD, who refer it to the λόγος ἐνσαρκος), we by no means deny that all which is here predicated is, now and forever, true of the Son of God's love, but guard against a false interpretation of the predicates themselves. Admitting that such a distinction can be made, we find a reason for the above reference in the fact that ver. 16, which gives a reason for the statements of this verse, must be referred to the Logos, or to the whole Person of Christ, "by virtue of the identity of His Divine Nature." The grammatical connection with ver. 14, which refers to the λόγος ἐνσαρκος is not so close. The subject then in this verse is the Son of God's love, as He was before the incarnation, and as He still "is."—R.]

The image of the invisible God, εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ ἀόρατου (2 Cor. iv. 4). The first thing is His relation to God, immanent and permanent. Εἰκὼν is not in itself something visible (PHILO: θεοῦ λόγον εἰκόνα λέγει θεοῦ). Comp. Gen. i. 26, 27. God's image in man is not that which is perceptible by the sense, only thus cognizable. Compare the expression with μορφή θεοῦ, ἰσα θεῷ (Phil. ii. 6), and ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ (Heb. i. 3). It denotes likeness to and equality with the invisible God (Jno. i. 18; 1 Tim. vi. 18), who cannot be perceived absolutely without a Mediator and a revelation, hence is invisible to angels and the redeemed (Heb. xii. 14). The context here differs entirely from Jno. i. 14. Here we must think of the Exalted One, transported from our sight, who yet already existed before the creation. Thus the "Son of His love" is further described (THEOPHYLACT: μόνος—καὶ ἀπαράλλακτος εἰκόν). The revelation, the making known, the rendering visible of the Father is put in the second place. It is not to be viewed as the chief point here, nor as the sole ground of this expression (Jno. xiv. 9), as CALVIN, SCHENKEL and others prefer; nor is it to be entirely denied (BAHR, HUTH). [It is worthy of note that here, as in all the terms used in the Scriptures to express His relation to the Father, there seems to be an implication of revelation (λόγος, ἀπαύγασμα χαρακτήρ, μορφή, and even in πρωτότοκος π. κτ.) On this relation, immanent and permanent, the actual revelation in the Person of Jesus Christ, indeed the context implies, in all other ways, seems to rest. Still we must be careful not to limit the meaning to this actual revelation as EADIE, BARNES and others do, for as BRAUNE remarks:—R.] it is a sad dilution to interpret: God has as it were made Himself visible in Him (DE WETTE), in Christ it is manifest that God is wise, powerful, good and the like (GROTIUS).

The first-born before every creature, πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως.—[So ELLICOTT. BRAUNE's exegesis is better set forth by: the first begotten before every creature.—R.] This second predicate defines His relation to the created world. Πρωτότοκος distinguishes Him as the Son from the creation (κτίσις); it is = πρωτόγονος, "first begotten" (PHILO), but not = πρωτόκτιστος, πρωτόπλαστος (among the Alexandrians, ORIGEN). It is joined with the first predicate, closely uniting with God and distinguishing from the creation. (THEODORET: "not as having creation for a sister, but as begotten before all creation." CHRYSOSTOM: "not significant of glory and honor, but only of time.") It is synonymous with ἀρχή (ver. 18; Rev. iii. 4). The genitive κτίσεως depends on πρώτος as πρώτος μου, Jno. i. 15, 30 (WIKER's Gram. p. 229). [So MEYER. It must be here remarked that WIKER does not expressly sanction this view of this passage. It would not perhaps be strictly correct to say that the genitive is governed by πρώτος in composition, although the Greek syntax favors such government in composition. BENGE even governs this genitive by the πρό found in πρώτος. ELLICOTT's view is a safe one: "genitive of the point of view, rendered more intelligible by the latent comparative force involved in πρώτος," though even this is but a circumlocutory statement of its dependence on πρώτος. As the word is Alexandrian, the syntax has been supported by Hebrew usage, though the broad use of the Greek genitive scarcely requires this.—R.]

Since πάσης denotes every kind of creature, angels and men, Christ existed before all. He does not begin the series of a category, as "first begotten of the dead" (Rev. i. 15), "among many brethren" (Rom. viii. 29), but He is antecedent, conditioning the creation. [It is doubtful, whether it is better to take πάσης κτίσεως, collectively: "the whole creation," or individually: "every creature," the context favors the former, so ALFORD; the polemic aim of the Apostle, the latter, so ELLICOTT.—BRAUNE makes this predicate refer exclusively to priority in time. On this ELLICOTT speaks of "His deigning by the mouth of His Apostle to institute a temporal comparison between His own generation from eternity and their creation in time," but he admits "the possibility of "a secondary and inferential reference to priority in dignity." ALFORD seems to include both views; "not only first-born of His mother in the world, but first-begotten of His Father before the worlds—He holds the rank, as compared with every created thing, of first-born in dignity." To the view which makes the latter thought the chief one, as held by WHITBY, BARNES, EADIE ("the acting President of the Universe and therefore the first-born of every creature"), it may be objected; 1. that it confuses the aspects in which this verse refers to the Son of God's love, see above; 2. it gives to πρωτότοκος a secondary and figurative meaning, where a more literal one seems more appropriate; 3. it ignores, or at least throws too far into the back-ground, the relation to the Father which is not only expressed in πρωτότοκος, but given further prominence by the close connection with the preceding clause; hence those who adopt it consistently refer that predicate also mainly to the revelation of the Father in Christ, rather than to the relation of the Son to the Father. Yet it must be admitted that there is an inferential reference to priority in dignity, a consequence of the priority in time of the Begotten to every creature: not only so, but as BRAUNE well remarks: He is antecedent, conditioning the creation—for the context, giving a reason (ὅτι) for this verse, goes on to set forth in detail His relation to the creation. So that while His priority in time shows His independence of creation, creation is not independent of Him, as He is here described. In this His relation to the Invisible God is to be found the ground or condition of the whole creation. The 16th verse asserts that He is the causa conditionalis, this one seems to intimate that in virtue of His relation immanent and permanent to the Father, as the Image and Only Begotten, He holds the relation to the creation subsequently defined. So WORDSWORTH quotes Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch: "when God desired to create the world, He begat the world as προφορικόν, πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως." While He is thus placed out of the category of the created, He is the more intimately linked with "every creature."—R.]

Therefore the view of the Arians that He is the first creature is incorrect, as also that of the Socinians, GROTIUS and others, who refer κτίσεως to the new moral creation, in which case καινή would not be wanting (2 Cor. v. 17). To make of the two predicates but one and join πρωτότοκος as an adjective to εἰκόν (SCHLEIERMACHER, Stud. und Krit. 1832, p. 497) is not only harsh, but grammatically inadmissible. To read πρωτότοκος, "first bringer forth" (ISIDORE of Pelusium, ERASMUS and others), is not allowable, since this is applied only to the female sex, and πρώτος in that case would be irrelevant.

Ver. 16. Because in him were all things created.—This verse justifies the explanation given above. Ὅτι adds the reason that ante omnem creaturam genitum esse filium, non creatum, before every creature the Son was begotten, not created: "in Him were all things created." The emphasis is placed upon "in Him." The verb requires us to understand the fact of creation as here spoken of; the historical act, as the aorist denotes. Acts x. 6 has ἐκτίσας τὸν οὐρανὸν κ. τ. λ., while xiv. 7, reads: τῷ ποιῆσαντι τὸν οὐρανόν. The same interchange occurs Gen. vi. 7; Deut. iv. 22, Sirach xv. 14; xxiv. 9 [LXX]. SCHLEIERMACHER should not therefore affirm that κτίσεν is not used in Hellenistic Greek of the original creation, but means to give order, arrangement. This creation is ἐν αὐτῷ, not ἐπ' αὐτόν, which would indicate the first cause. This is not the Son, but the Father, as the thought in the word is efficient in the Son, out from whom the creation is accomplished; but there is no thought of emanation, hence ἐξ αὐτοῦ is not used. It is here indicated that the accomplishment of the creation rests in Him, its immediate instrumental cause is to be sought in Him, but not the last, principalis. Ἐν αὐτῷ is not to be referred to the κόσμος νοητός, the idea omnium rerum, which was in Him (SCHLEIERMACHER and others), nor is it = δι' αὐτοῦ (ÜSTERI); nor does ἐκτίσθη refer to the new moral creation, which reference is not supported by Eph. iv. 23, where the context is entirely different. [Ἐν αὐτῷ here denotes, not the causa instrumentalis nor causa exemplaris, but causa conditionalis, as the conditional element pre-existent and all-including. ALFORD, ELLICOTT. —R.] Τὰ πάντα is the existing all, the totality of things [the universe, ALFORD. —R.], πάντα would be all that actually is (WINER's Gram. p. 105). A specification as regards place follows: in heaven and that are on earth, τὰ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς καὶ τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. —Thus Paul writes instead of οἱ οὐρανοὶ ὁ οὐρανὸς καὶ ἡ γῆ, not excluding these however, because to him all depends upon this, that nothing was created without Him; He stands in such a relation to the whole creation that He was before it and it exists first through Him. There is no reason for understanding by this, habitatores qui reconciliantur (WETTSTEIN), or only living creatures (BAHR) or rational creatures. On τοῖς οὐρανοῖς see Eph. i. 10. We cannot conclude from the precedence of οἱ οὐρανοὶ that emphasis is placed upon the creation of angels (THEOPHYLACT), nor from the omission of "under the earth," that God has not created for the lower world (Unterwelt); the context gives no warrant for this.—Visible and invisible.—This is added to describe the nature of what was created. There is no reason for referring both exclusively either to earthly (SCHLEIERMACHER), or to heavenly things (THEODORET); nor are the former alone visible, and the latter invisible, since among the visible we must reckon sun, moon and stars, and among the invisible human souls. The Apostle places the highest, "things in heaven," first, but here the more important follows, because he intends to give a specification of the angels. It must be borne in mind that τὰ πάντα is described. Hence "invisible" does not refer merely to the heavenly world of spirits (MEYER), though this is the main reference (BLEEK).—Whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers, εἴτε θρόνοι, εἴτε κυριότητες, εἴτε ἀρχαὶ, εἴτε ἐξουσίαι. Εἴτε, thus repeated, specifies the world of angels, to which we arrive through "invisible;" at the same time it indicates an uncertainly respecting the classes of angels, or that nothing essential depends upon this classification. In Eph. i. 21, we find ἀρχή, ἐξουσία, δύναμις, κυριότης; δύναμις is not found here, nor θρόνος there. This latter word occurs here only in the New Testament, but is applied by the Rabbins, by Dionysius the Areopagite and testamentum Levi, to the angels in the seventh or highest heaven. These classes may be regarded as different orders, joined in pairs; θρόνος, the highest, κυριότητες, the lowest, ἀρχαὶ and ἐξουσίαι, the intermediate. [ELLICOTT, comparing Eph. i. 21, "where the order seems descensive," says, "we may possibly infer that the θρόνοι are the highest order, etc., if indeed all such distinctions are not to be deemed precarious and presumptuous. It may have been suggested by some known theosophic speculations of the Colossians, but more probably was an incidental revelation, which the term ἀόρατα evoked." PEARSON thus gives the intent of the passage and the force of εἴτε: "Lest in that invisible world, among the many degrees of the celestial hierarchy, any order might seem excepted from an essential dependence upon Him, he nameth those which are of greatest eminence, and in them comprehendeth the rest." —R.] SCHLEIERMACHER most incorrectly applies ἀόρατα to earthly empires, civil orders and legal conditions (MELANCTHON similarly), and understands here magisterial offices and other functions of persons in power.

All things were created by him and for him, τὰ πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ καὶ εἰς αὐτόν ἐκτίσται. [Literally, all things have been created through Him and to Him. —R.] Solemn recapitulation (MEYER). The perfect, setting the past in relation to the present, is chosen instead of the aorist, noting the factum, because we have here a dogmatic consideration of the completed and now existing creation (WINER's Gram. p. 255). Hence also we have not merely δι' αὐτοῦ (instrumental), but εἰς αὐτόν, indicating Him as the τέλος of creation. BENGE: ἐν denotat prius quiddam quam mox διὰ et εἰς. Notatur initium, progressus, finis. Comp. Rom. xi. 36; 1 Cor. viii. 6, where εἰς αὐτόν refers to God, as here to Christ, to whom the κυριότης τῶν πάντων is committed (Matt. xxviii. 18; Phil. ii. 9; 1 Cor. xv. 27), who is the delegated Regent of the world (MEYER). Εἰς denotes not simply for Him, but also to Him, in Him (WINER's Gram. p. 390). That He is Lord over all is but one side therefore; the other is, that to Him the whole is directed, and thus is developed, exalted, glorified. To His exalted dignity is joined the glorifying of what is created, the participation of the creatures in His glory and blessedness. [ELLICOTT: ἐν αὐτῷ, causa conditionalis; δι' αὐτοῦ, causa medians; εἰς αὐτόν, causa finalis or finis ultimus. ALFORD: "He is the end of creation, containing the reason in Himself, why creation is at all and why it is as it is." —R.]

Ver. 17 accordingly adds: And he is before all things. —Αὐτός and ἔστι are emphatic from their position. ["He Himself is" or "exists." —R.] Both the permanence of the existence of Christ and His pre-existence are affirmed. The usus loquendi requires only, that it be understood of time, the context, of the whole; compare Jno. viii. 58. The Vulgate is incorrect: ante omnes, and Luther, vor Allen, [i. e., before all beings.—

R.] So also the Socinians, SCHLEIERMACHER and others, who limit the meaning to superior rank, which is indeed sufficiently implied in such an assertion of priority.—And in him all things subsist.—[The E. V. here as in ver. 15, unfortunately renders ἐν, “by.”—R.] The verb is used of things held together, as milk, which runs. So 2 Pet. iii. 5; γῆ ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ δι’ ὕδατος συνεστάσα τῷ τοῦ θεοῦ λόγῳ. Without Christ all things would fall asunder. The perfect, following ἐστι, has the force of the present—put together and now subsisting. The reference is to organic permanence, the continuance of the composition of the things of the world “in Him,” because He holds together what He has created. [ELLCOTT: “the causal sphere of their continuing existence, —not exactly identical with ἐν αὐτῷ above. Christ was the conditional element of their creation, the causal element of their persistence.”—R.] It does not refer to a consolidation of earthly relations (SCHLEIERMACHER), nor to the acknowledgment and rule of the Lord in the new world (BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS).

The relation of the Mediator to the Church. Vers. 18-20.

Ver. 18. And he is the head of the body, the church.—“And He,” αὐτός, [is emphatic, possibly involving an antithesis to some errors of the Colossian Church (ALFORD, ELLCOTT). The subject is “the Son of God’s love,” the passage requiring a reference to the λόγος ἐνσάρκος, the now glorified Christ.—R.] “Is”: in form this is a resumption of ver. 17, connected closely with that verse, but in matter it refers back to the starting-point, ver. 14, so that, just as in vers. 15, 16, the corresponding relative clause (ὅς ἐστιν) follows, together with its proof (ὅτι). The parallel of thought—Christ, the Son of God, is before and over the world, as He is Head of the Church—is echoed in the chain of parallel clauses. On “the Head of the Body, the Church,” see Eph. i. 22, 23. The second genitive is unquestionably appositional (WINER’S Gram., p. 494, and Eph. iv. 9). In the parallel passage: “Head over all things,” etc.—the relation of Christ to the world is defined by “over all things.” On the Church as an organism, a Body, see Eph. iv. 12; v. 23, 30; that the world might not be considered this Body, “the Church” is added. It does not refer to the family of God in heaven and on earth (RÖSSELT); this is too spiritualistic, is contrary to biblical realism and usus loquendi.

Who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead, ὅς ἐστι ἀρχή, πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν.—“First-born,” πρωτότοκος, here is somewhat different from ver. 15,—in the more exact sense of one beginning a series. Hence ἐκ can be omitted, as in Rev. i. 5. The preposition marks the fact, conceived of as in Eph. v. 14: “arise from (ἐκ) the dead;” as ἀπὸ τῶν νεκρῶν also occurs, to denote the separation of the living from the dead. The reference is not to those merely who have died within the church (SCHENKEL); for when the dead revived in the Old Testament times, they were not “first-born from the dead,” since they died again; it is otherwise in the case of Christ. [ELLCOTT distinguishes this passage from Rev. i. 5, where the preposition is omitted: “first-born not only of, but out of the dead”—He left their realm and came again as with a new begetting and new birth into life.”—R.] It is pre-supposed, but not stated either in the text or context: “because He restores life to others” (CALVIN. THEODORET: “the phrase hints also at the resurrection of us all”). [EADIE retaining his view of πρωτότοκος, as referring to priority in dignity, remarks: “as He rose from the midst of the dead, He became their chief,—came out from among them as their representative. His people rise in virtue of His power. He is not only the pledge, He is also the pattern.” This is undoubtedly true, but only implied here.—R.] By “first-born,” which was not chosen without a reference to ver. 15, ἀρχή, a word of wide signification, is here more closely defined as “the Beginning,” while the personality is at the same time thus emphasized as the principal thing. Comp. Jno. xi. 25. So Gen. xlix. 3: “Reuben my first-born” (ἀρχὴ τέκνον μου—πρωτότοκος μου, Deut. xxi. 17). It is therefore—“the first-fruits of them that slept” (ἀρχὴ τῶν κοιμημένων, 1 Cor. xv. 20), “first that should rise from the dead” (πρῶτος ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν, Acts xxvi. 23); hence to be taken as referring to time, with a secondary reference, however, to a power efficient in a succeeding series (Rev. iii. 14; xxii. 13): in which it differs from ἀπαρχή. Hence it is neither principium (BAHR, STEIGER, HUTH), nor Regent of the world (FLATT), nor author of the Church (BAUMGARTEN CRUSIUS), nor “beginning of the second and new creation” (CALVIN). Nor is “of the resurrection” to be supplied (DE WETTE), since the Apostle had far more in view than “the dead,” nor “of the church” (SCHENKEL), since there is nothing to indicate this; nor is “first-born” an adjective joined to “beginning” (SCHLEIERMACHER). [While ἀρχή has here a primary temporal reference, and is further defined as a Personality by πρωτότοκος, there is an argumentative force in the relative “who” involving a secondary reference to “the church” which immediately precedes. So ELLCOTT, EADIE, who insists upon this too exclusively, however. ALFORD: “He is the ‘beginning,’ in that in Him is begun and conditioned the church.” WORDSWORTH suggests the two-fold sense of ἀρχή; 1. principium, beginning. 2. principalitas, dominion, rule. In the first sense, Christ is the source of life to the church: in the second, the Principality of all things, therefore even in His manhood superior to the angelic principalities and powers (against the false teachers).—R.]

That in all things he might have the pre-eminence.—[“In order that (ἵνα) in all things he (αὐτός, emphatic, might become (γένηται) pre-eminent.”—R.] ἵνα denotes the purpose of God working herein; it is not—ὥστε (ESTIUS, BAHR). What He is, is the basis for something else, which is accomplished in the purpose—which becomes (γένηται); hence such permanent relations are here concerned, as took shape historically, and are adapted for definite ends, to be realized in time (STEIGER). In that He is the Risen One, it is the design of God, that He becomes ἐν πᾶσιν αὐτὸς πρωτεύων, He, emphatically, and none other, sine locum tenentibus, sine vicario (BENGLER), and “in all,” on all sides, in wisdom, holiness, might, death-overcoming power, dominion and glory, as respects the world as well as the church. The First, for ever and for every one. The verb πρωτεύω occurs only here in the New Testament and denotes strongly, "to have the first rank." [ALFORD: "The word is a transitional one, from priority in time to priority in dignity, and shows incontestably that the two ideas have been before the Apostle's mind throughout," though, as ELLICOTT suggests, this being a result, the same meaning does not necessarily belong to πρωτότοκος.—R.] 'Εν πᾶσιν must be neuter, as Tit. ii. 9, 10; 1 Tim. iii. 11; iv. 15; 2 Tim. ii. 7; iv. 5; Hebrews xiii. 4, 18, = παντί (1 Cor. i. 5; 2 Cor. iv. 8, etc.). Did it refer to νεκρῶν, it must have the article. Hence inter omnes (BEZA and others) is incorrect.

Ver. 19. Because in him God was pleased that the whole fulness should dwell.—As in ver. 16, ὅτι introduces the ground of the last clause, and thus mediately of the whole preceding verse. It is not therefore a proof of the relative clause exclusively (STEIGER), nor is this to be excluded (MEYER). 'Εν αὐτῷ εὐδόκησεν πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα κατοικῆσαι may be simply rendered; the finite verb εὐδόκησεν leads to a will, a personal author as final cause, over against a becoming of necessity; on this account Θεός is the self-evident subject, hence not specially indicated; ἐν αὐτῷ is to be joined with κατοικῆσαι, it is placed first emphatically, and denotes the same as in the foregoing; πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα is the accusative subject of the infinitive, and according to the context, without the necessity of supplying anything, the whole fulness of Him, who had formed the decree (Eph. iii. 19: "all the fulness of God;," Col. ii. 9: "of the God-head"). [With this rendering, the E. V. agrees, but supplies Father instead of God, marking, it is true, an obvious antithesis between Christ (the subject hitherto), and the new one. But the impersonal form of the verb is not strictly correct. ELLICOTT renders: "the whole fulness of God was pleased to dwell," making πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα the subject of the finite verb. The question is only a grammatical one, as the dogmatical result is the same in either case. See ELLICOTT in loco.—R.] On πλήρωμα, compare Eph. i. 10; on κατοικῆσαι, Eph. iii. 17; on εὐδόκησεν, Eph. i. 5. To regard πλήρωμα as the fulness of the Gentiles and totality of Israel (SCHLEIERMACHER), is as unfounded, as to understand it, from the terminology of Valentin, of the complex of Æons (BAUR). HOFMANN also is in error, in understanding it as the fulness of that which is, making Christ the subject of εὐδόκησεν; too artificial. [WORDSWORTH, after giving two interpretations: 1. that God the Son was pleased; 2. that God was pleased, with a preference for (1), adds "on the whole, we may perhaps affirm, that the Apostle designedly placed εὐδόκησεν here without any limitation of a nominative expressed, in order to bring out the truth more fully that the εὐδοκία is to be ascribed to the Father in the Son, and to the Son in the Father, and that there is perfect unity in will and operation in both."—R.]

Ver. 20. And by him to reconcile all things unto himself.—Locus hic torquet interpretes et vicissim ab illis torquetur (DAVENANT). The force of καί is clear: "this indwelling (ver. 19) is the foundation of the reconciliation" (BENGEL). Δι' αὐτοῦ, i. e., Christ, is placed emphatically first, denoting the known mediation. The main difficulty is found in ἀποκαταλλάξαι εἰς αὐτόν. The verb occurs only here, ver. 21 and Eph. ii. 16; here with εἰς αὐτόν, in the last passage with τῷ θεῷ. Καταλάσσειν, Rom. v. 10; 2 Cor. v. 18, 19: τῷ θεῷ, ἐαυτῷ; 1 Cor. vii. 11: τῷ ἀνδρὶ. The meaning is: to reconcile, strengthened by ἀπό. So that the one reconciled is freed, removed from something; open, consensual, outspoken enmity is not meant, rather concealed unconscious estrangement and separation of one or two parts (HOFMANN): but it is found only in him who is reconciled, not in him who reconciles. See on Eph. ii. 16. With MEYER we hold as follows: sin began among the angels, and came, was brought from the angelic world to the race of men (Jno. viii. 44; 2 Cor. xi. 3; Eph. i. 10); thereby the whole creation was disturbed in its harmony, "was made subject to vanity," in "the bondage of corruption," and suffered according to the saying: delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi (comp. Rom. viii. 19–22). In Christ the act of reconciliation is accomplished, and this reconciliation is to unfold itself in all directions unto the palingenesis (Matt. xix. 28; 2 Pet. iii. 15), to the coming (Parusie) of Christ (1 Cor. xv. 24, 28). The aorist infinitive denotes the historical fact; εἰς αὐτόν instead of the usual dative ἐαυτῷ marks the direction, and consequently the gradually accomplished development. We meet here the comprehensive and classical idea of reconciliation, which is considerably modified with respect to the universe, as well as to the human race and the angelic world, as is afterwards indicated. It is therefore incorrect to identify ἀποκαταλλάξαι with ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι, Eph. i. 10 (MELANCPHON, GROTIUS, BAHR and others), or in accordance with this view, to apply εἰς αὐτόν to Christ (LUTHER and others) and not to God, as the context requires. [E. V., "to Himself," correctly applies it.—R.] Nor is τὰ πάντα to be limited to intelligent beings, or to men only (A-LAPIDE and others) or to universam ecclesiam (BEZA); nor does the verb mean; "the removal of reciprocal enmity" (STOLZ, SCHLEIERMACHER and others). [ELLICOTT, while objecting to any dilution of "reconcile," or limitation of τὰ πάντα, cautions against the irreverence of far-reaching speculations on the reconciliation of the finite and infinite. "It does say that the eternal and incarnate Son is the 'causa medians' by which the absolute totality of created things shall be restored into its primal harmony with its Creator—more than this it does not say, and where God is silent it is not for man to speak." EADIE: "The one Reconciler is the head of these vast dominions, and in Him meet and merge the discordant elements which sin had introduced. The humanity of Jesus bringing all creatures around it, unites them to God in a bond which never before existed—a bond which has its origin in the mystery of redemption. Thus all things in heaven and earth feel the effect of man's renovation." The view of Braune, that this will find its full development at the coming of Christ, is not in opposition to the above view. See EADIE and ALFORD, also DE WETTE.—R.]

and grammatically agrees with the latent subject of εὐδόκησεν, God. The verb, only here, like the substantive εἰρηνοποιός (Matt. v. 9) is clear in its meaning. The aorist participle indicates the modality of "reconcile," as Eph. i. 19. Both acts are contemporaneous, conceived of as one, this does not ante-date the other [as E. V. implies—R.]. "Through the blood" marks the act as one of royal judgment and priestly sacrifice (Rom. iii. 25: Heb. iv. 14, 18, 20; 1 Pet. i. 19); while "of His cross" marks the shedding of blood as a consequence of the punishment to which He devoted Himself, in humblest obedience (Phil. ii. 18), in innocence for our sake, in holiness to make us holy. Both denote the definite, historical act, over against all spiritualistic conceptions, as well as Christ's suffering and death over against our moral or ascetic works. In order to preclude any materialistic or magical views of the blood of Christ, Paul reaffirms; by him, thus making prominent the Person of Him, who had shed His blood, and thereby made peace with God. ["I say" added in E. V. conveys the meaning.—R.]—Besides this repetition, designed to guard against false views, there is added, in explanation of the object, which has been and shall be reconciled, made partaker of the peace: Whether there be things on earth, or things in heaven (comp. ver. 16).—Here "earth" stands first, because he has been just speaking of the act on earth, by which the reconciliation begins. It is not easy to determine how the reconciliation of angels may be conceived of, since it cannot be applied to wicked ones, who remain unreconciled and are condemned, and the good need no reconciliation, only sustaining power. This difficulty leads us to refrain from any explanation, which would be at best a mere surmise. [See above on τὰ πάντα, which is specified here. ELLICOTT remarks: "How the reconciliation of Christ affects the spiritual world—whether by the annihilation of 'posse peccare,' or by the infusion of a more perfect knowledge, or (less probably) some restorative application to the fallen spiritual world—we know not, and we dare not speculate." WORDSWORTH specifies a fourfold reconciliation, 1. Between God and man. 2. Between angels and man. 3. Between Jew and Gentile. 4. Between man and the inferior creatures. Under the last particular he refers to the attempt of false teachers to mar this work of universal reconciliation, by forbidding the free use of the creatures, chap. ii. 20, 21. This is open to the objection stated below.—R.] The disjunctive force of ἢτε forbids the idea of reconciliation of the two parts with each other (ERASMUS), nor do "things on earth," "things in heaven," favor the view, that Jews and Gentiles had become hostile to each other on account of heavenly and earthly things, matters of Divine worship and principles related thereto, but should now be reconciled (SCHLEIERMACHER). Nor does this refer to the reconciliation of the Jews and Gentiles to each other and with the world of spirits, nor to the final conversion and blessedness of the demons (ORIGEN), nor to a tendency at least thereto (OLSHAUSEN).

Application. Vers. 21-23.

Ver. 21. And you.—Καὶ ὑμεῖς, as Eph. ii. 1, to begin a new sentence. There is an anacoluthon in the construction, since the reading is ἀποκατηλλάγητε, not ἀποκαταλλάξαι. See critical note¹⁴. [The additional note gives the authorities for the reading Braune rejects. So great is the preponderance in its favor, that the translator feels bound to differ from the author here. The anacoluthon is not so strong with this reading; ὑμῶς is the object of the verb, though νυνὶ δὲ intervenes.—R.] There is no reason for joining "and you," with its immediate attributive, to the preceding sentence (LACHMANN and others). [The better punctuation is that of E. V. and most modern editors, beginning a new sentence or paragraph here.—R.] Καὶ is not merely a copulative particle (and); but is = "even," "precisely," as the following characteristic requires: that were sometime alienated and enemies, ποτὲ ὄντας ἀπηλλοτριωμένους καὶ ἐχθρούς.—With ποτὲ he refers to their past condition, and with emphasis, as its position indicates, in praise and thanksgiving, the participle is imperfect. On "alienated," see Eph. ii. 12. Neither "from the commonwealth of Israel," from that passage, nor "from the life of God," from Eph. iv. 18, is to be supplied (BAEHR); the context clearly suggests "from God." But more than alienation is mentioned, they had passed into enmity of which the former is the germ; ἐχθροίς is therefore active, enemy against God (Rom. viii. 7). It is incorrect to consider it as passive, inimicus deo (Rom. v. 10, STEIGER), since it is enmity, not on the part of God, but of men, which is extirpated, out of which they are delivered in the reconciliation.—As to your understanding in wicked works, τῇ διανοίᾳ ἐν τοῖς ἔργοις τοῖς πονηροῖς.—Their enmity is thus described. The article refers to a known previous disposition and mode of conduct. The simple dative is one of reference; "in" marks the sphere in which the alienation and enmity manifested itself. Both belong to "alienated" as well as "enemies." On διάνοια, see Eph. ii. 3; iv. 18; 1 Jno. v. 20. [ELLICOTT: "the higher intellectual nature especially as shown in its practical relations." "Understanding." "mind" (as distinguished from heart in E. V.) is the correct rendering, though Braune, referring it to the state rather than to the faculty itself, has Gesinnung, disposition.—R.] This manifests itself actively; in it the "wicked works" have their ground and soil. [The form τ. ἐργ. τοῖς πον. emphasizes the character of the works.—R.] The phrase includes all works which are done contrary to God's command, or if formally in accordance with the law, yet from carnal appetites and propensities. It is incorrect to govern τῇ διανοίᾳ by ἐχθροίς (ERASMUS: "enemies to reason") or to consider it as the ground: through their disposition (MEYER), through their reason (LUTHER), since the cause of the enmity cannot be found in this organ or in this disposition, which is a product as respects the enmity. Nor does ἐν ἔργοις depend on διάνοια (BEZA, BAEHR).—Yet now hath he reconciled, νυνὶ δὲ ἀποκατάλλαξεν.—[Braune, reading ἀποκατηλλάγητε renders: "now you are reconciled."—R.] Νυνὶ marks the present which begins with the reconciliation, when the readers have become partakers of it; δέ marks the resumption of the thought uninterrupted by the parenthesis [describing their previous condition—R.], like the Latin inquam. "Reconciled" is an act through Christ, (ver. 20) not of Christ (Greek fathers, CALVIN, CALOV., others). Compare 2 Cor. v. 19. [The subject throughout is God.—R.]

Ver. 22. "In the body of his flesh through death.—This sets forth in twofold manner the way or the means of reconciliation. First: "In the body of his flesh." This describes the earthly, sensible, historical appearance of Christ. Sirach xvi. 23: ἀνθρώπος πόρνος ἐν σάρματι τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ, where σαρκὸς refers to the sensual lusting. Here the reference is to the Redeemer and Reconciler, who had taken upon Him our flesh and blood and appeared in the life and history of our race; ἐν is to be taken locally. [ALFORD: "The situation or element of the reconciliation." ELLICOTT: "the substratum of the action is pointed to by ἐν."—R.] It is entirely foreign to the context to suppose "of his flesh" is in contrast with the body "of the church," as ver. 20 (BENGEL). The antithesis is less doctetic false teachers according to ii. 23 (STEIGER), or the glorified body of the Risen One, 1 Cor. xv. 44 (SCHENKEL), or exaggerated doctrine of angels (MEYER) than this, that the work of Redemption was far too easily separated from the person of Christ and His historical, human nature in the form of a servant. The expression is evidently anti-spiritualistic. Secondly: "through death," [the means, instrumental cause.—R.] renders prominent the exit from this natural life, in short, the suffering and death referred to in ver. 20; the entrance into this life through birth must have corresponded with such an exit. Hence it is not strange that Paul speaks often of the latter, but never of the former ex professo.

To present you holy and unblameable and unprovable in his sight.—The end to be attained. "To present you" depends on the verb "reconciled." What has occurred to the Christian in this reconciliation is something to be preserved, unfolded, perfected. The God who effects reconciliation, effects more, as Eph. v. 27. The subject is not the subject of the passive ἀποκατάλλῃ, but of the active [i. e., of the verb ἀποκατάλλαι, as most read—R.]; the accusative ὑμᾶς is the object not the subject of the infinitive (MEYER, SCHENKEL). Certainly the immediate result of the reconciliation, the righteousness imputed for the sake of Christ, is not meant (HUTNER and others). The three adjectives ἀγίους καὶ ἀμώμους καὶ ἀνεγκλήτους mark the continued effect of the reconciliation, viz., moral purity in three directions. As "holy," ἅγιοι, they are consecrated to God, live to God, die to the world, have conducted and shown themselves as such; as "unblameable," ἀμωμοί, they are free from the faults and stains of sin; as unprovable, ἀνεκλήτοι, they are not accused by their neighbors. BENGEL is not incorrect in his: erga deum, respectu vestri, respectu proximi. [ALFORD and ELLICOTT follow MEYER in referring the first to the positive, the latter two to the negative side of holiness. DAVENANT deems it the aggregation of three similar ideas. On the whole BRAUNE's view, which is that of EADIE, is much preferable.—R.] "In his sight," κατενώπιον αὐτοῦ, refers undoubtedly to the Judgment, hence according to the context we may apply it to Christ. Comp. 2 Cor. v. 10. [ALFORD seems most correct; referring it to the day of Christ's appearing; but before His i. e., God's presence. ELLICOTT doubts the former reference, but renders: "before Him, God not Christ." The passage undoubtedly refers to justitia inhærens, as the necessary result of the reconciliation which gave to the believer justitia imputata. So CALVIN, but, as HOOKER judiciously remarks, "whenever we have any of these (actual, inherent or imputed holiness) we have all—they go together."—R.]

Ver. 23. If at least ye continue in the faith.—God's act for and upon them is not carried out to a blessed consummation without subjective advance and personal activity. Eiye marks a condition, about which there is no doubt. [ALFORD: "assuming that."—R.] It is the mildest, most delicate method of calling attention to the necessity of faith (BLEEK), and seems to belong to "present," rather than to depend on the finite verb, ver. 21 (BENGEL). See on Eph. iii. 2; iv. 21. Ἐπιμένετε τῇ πίστει is construed, as Rom. vi. 1; xi. 22, 23; 1 Tim. iv. 16. [Stronger than μένετε, implying with the dative, rest at a place, perseverance to and rest in the end, "persist" (ALFORD, ELLICOTT).—R.] The article marks the faith as definite; an indefinite one, after their own pleasure, does not suffice.—Grounded and settled and not moved away from the hope of the gospel.—["Grounded and settled and not being moved away" is the literal construction. The E. V. seems to make "moved away" co-ordinate with "continue."—R.] The modality of the persistence is thus denoted: 1. Τεθεμελιωμένοι (see on Eph. iii. 18), whose antithesis is χωρὶς θεμελίου (Luke vi. 49: "without a foundation"), refers to an objectively given foundation, placed upon which they still stand. This is a reference to Christ, to God's grace in Him, not to the hope (MEYER). 2. Ἐδρᾶτοι dicunt internum robur, quod fideles ipsi habent; quemadmodum ædificum primo quidem fundamento recte solideque inniti, deinde vero sua etiam mole probe coherere et firmiter consistere debet (BENGEL), 1 Cor. xv. 58. [These two denote the positive side of the modality of their persistence; then the negative follows.—R.] 3. Μὴ μετακινούμενοι ἀπὸ τῆς ἐλπίδος εὐαγγελίου marks, through the present participle passive, what is very possible, likely to enter every moment from without and within; circumstances, purposes and suggestions, as well as lusts and selfish thought and desire can easily move, so that they are moved away from the hope of the gospel, held up before them as an aim (not a point of support—SCHENKEL), and both sure and glorious as belonging to the gospel (see on Eph. i. 18). [ALFORD makes the hope subjective, but grounded on the objective, and the genitive possessive. ELLICOTT says: "the hope arising from, evoked by the Gospel."—sub-jjective, therefore: "τοῦ εὐαγγ. is the genitive of the origin or the originating agent"—which is preferable. EADIE thus discriminates between the three expressions: "the first epithet alludes to the cause, the second to its effect, the third depicts a general result,—as the use of μή seems to indicate." Μή is usual and proper, however, in such a sentence as this—see WINER's Gram. p. 443.—R.] Merá refers to the inward change in being moved, ἀπό to removal from the given object, thereby effected.—Which ye have heard, denotes a fact which takes away all excuse, they know it, it has been told them. [ELLCOTT objects to “have” in the E. V. without reason, as the inexcusableness rests upon the fact that it has already been heard, thus best expressed.—R.]—It has been made efficient for them, and not for them alone: And which was preached to every creature which is under heaven, in the whole world. The command of Christ, Mark xvi. 15: “preach the gospel to every creature” has begun to be carried out. “Preached to every creature” is not hyperbolical (MEYER), nor is κρίσις to be limited to the Gentiles. [ALFORD incorrectly renders: “in the whole creation.” EADIE and ELLICOTT call this hyperbole, though agreeing with Braune's next remark.—R.] The Apostle prophetically sees as accomplished what has as yet only begun, and marks the universality of Christianity. Sane undique vulgatum evangelium Christi, ne quid cogitant Colossenses de mutanda fide, quæ jam ab omnibus esset recepta (ERASMUS). [On the phrase, “which is under heaven,” ELLICOTT remarks, that it characterizes the κρίσις as ἐπίγειος, including, however, thereby, all mankind.—R.]

Whereof I Paul am made a minister.—See on Eph. iii. 1. [MEYER makes here “three considerations” enforcing their “not being moved away”—It would be, 1) inexcusable for themselves, because they had heard the gospel; 2) inconsistent with the universality of the gospel “preached to every creature;” 3) contrary to the personal relation of the Apostle to the gospel, “whereof I Paul,” etc.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Christian knowledge. The progress of Paul's thanksgiving for the faith and love of the Church to supplication for their advance in true knowledge derives its motive from the end in view, viz., Christian walk. Herein is implied: First: the basis of Christian knowledge is the Christian morality of the perceiving subject, in its fundamental traits and principles, in faith and love. Here it begins, and hence advance is made to and in the former. The subject of knowledge must also be correctly situated on account of the object of knowledge, and the organ of knowledge in the knowing subject must, at the same time, be first acted upon, that it may enjoy healthy activity and the reward of sound knowledge. Yet is faith itself an immediate knowing, and love, a desire which directly grasps the objects of faith, so that what makes an impression in faith, can be intelligently conceived. Second: the object of Christian knowledge is the will of God, in the unity of that will in creation, law and redemption, hence in the visible and invisible, in the temporal and eternal, in the moral and intelligent world, both what was designed in creation and redemption, and what was commanded in word as precept. Third: the effect of Christian knowledge is essentially a re-action upon the Christian walk, and thus they reciprocally further each other. Fourth: the way to Christian knowledge is essentially a life of practical morality. Fifth: its course is like that of the Christian life, a gradual advance, moving and developing itself in various experiences, temptations and circumstances.

2. The Christian walk has its ground in the fact of redemption, which has been decreed and ordained by God the Father, mediated and accomplished through the Son; its beginning, in the appropriation of this fact of objective redemption and subjective acceptance; its standard, in the example of our Lord Jesus Christ; its motive, in pleasing this Lord; its activity, in good works, according to the various relations of life in which we are placed; its modality in this, that what is done, is done from inward constraint and not from calculation; its development, in this, that it perceives more clearly each moment the will of God, grasps it more securely, retains it more firmly, proves it more widely; its genuineness, in the joy with which it bears and forbears, and controls itself with ever increasing strength; its tone, in gratitude for what God had done to and in and for One, and its aim in the eternal heritage in heaven, of which an earnest is given within us.

3. The Apostle's conception of God. God, who is the beginning and end for the Christian, is conceived of, not as absolute substance, but as an absolute Person, in substance a Spirit, in character Love; here especially in the latter aspect. He has His will, and His εὐδοκίαν (ver. 19) wills itself as the good, wills it with energy and almightiness, and accomplishes His will in general and particular alike. In this recession (Zurücktreten) of the absolute substance behind the freedom of the absolute Subject, the right of Pantheism and Emanatism is taken away, in the recession (Forttreten) of His almighty and saving Love, that of Deism and Naturalism. The personality of the Living One, and the Life of the Absolute Person are the cardinal points of the Christian's belief in God. Against Indifference “the whole fulness” of God (ver. 19) speaks. By this is meant the fulness of Love and Holiness, of Wisdom and Power, of Grace and Majesty and Blessedness, which bursts forth in the works of Creation, Redemption, Sanctification and Glorification, but which neither is nor can be exhausted in the world; although immanent in the world, He far transcends it. Only in the Son of His Love is “the whole fulness” to be seen and found. Hence there is a reference to a Triune relation, since such fulness of God, the Living One, did not first come in flow with the creation, but moved already in Him, who is before and above all creatures.—The self-existence of God the Father, who is ἀρχὴ πάντων τῶν ὄντων, is indicated; on Him the Son Himself depends and His activity in the works of Creation and Redemption.

4. The Person of Christ is more accurately described in a threefold relation:

a) His relation to God is set forth in the phrases: ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀγάπης αὐτοῦ, “the Son of His Love,” (ver. 13); εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ ἀόρατον, “the image of the invisible God,” (ver. 15). The first expression marks Him as the object of the Father's love, which has in Him, nothing that can grieve it, holy as it is, or that it must first subdue; thus His Holiness, Sinlessness are implied, on account of which it is He, in whom the forgiveness of sin is obtained. The other phrase leads into the substance of the glory of God, manifesting itself first and most of all in Him, and denotes also His Divine Personality; He is indeed the Image of a Personality, so that he must both have existence and be a Person, especially as "all the fulness" of God is said to dwell in the Son of Man. It may be conceded to HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis, I. 153-158), BEISCHLAG (Christologie des N. T., 228-233), SCHENKEL and others, that the historical Christ must be made the subject for the most part (ver. 13). [See EXEG. NOTES on ver. 15.—R.] But what gives to this One His position in history and His Dignity, lies above this history in his super-terrestrial position and intrinsically Divine Dignity. Indeed the historical events pre-suppose the relation of the Son to the Father, His Divinity, and do not first constitute Him the Son, or God the Father, or Him a Person, who did not exist before, or was not yet a Person nor the Son of God.

b) His relation to the world is described by πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, "first-born of every creature" (ver. 15), and further explained by the confirmatory clause (ver. 16), "in him were all things created"—"by him and to him" (ἐκτισται), and sharply defined in ver. 17: "He is before all things and in him all things subsist." In the given connexion there is first, a temporal definition (πρὸ πάντων), so that here His pre-existence is decidedly and expressly asserted, in agreement with Jno. xvii. 5: "πρὸ τοῦ τὸν κόσμον εἶναι, "before the world was;" i. 1: ἐν ἀρχῇ, "in the beginning;" Eph. i. 4: "before the foundation of the world." Second: Prominence is given to the Personality, denoted both by πρωτότοκος and the creation of God "in," "by" and "to Him," as in Jno. i. 1: πρὸς τὸν θεόν; viii. 58: ἐγὼ εἰμί. So that the Apostle here treats of a pre-existent Person, not merely of a pre-existent principle, or of a historical Person, as though the pre-existent principle first became personal in Jesus at the Incarnation, or the personality had previously been only ideal. Compare THOMASIVS, Christi Person und Werk, pp. 60-66. Thirdly: His Creatorship excludes any creatureship in Him, and the identity of the Creator and Redeemer is so affirmed, that He who became man is placed more under the idea "God" than the idea "man." On this account Theodoret aptly says, "not as having creation for a sister, but as begotten before all creation." Fourthly: Our text defines Him, not as Him, ὅς ὃν all things were created, and yet as active in the creation: δι' αὐτοῦ; He is not simply an archetype of the creation for the Creator. Fifthly: He is emphatically indicated as the foundation and centre of the world and its history, its stability, and development. [CHRYSOSTOM interprets this passage and Eph. ii. 22: "as teaching that Christ is the Living Centre, to which all things in creation converge, the Divine Keystone in the arch of the Universe, on which the whole fabric leans; but he warns his readers against supposing that Christ Himself is consubstantial with the creatures whom He made and upholds" (WORDSWORTH).—R.]

c) His relation to the Church is described by

"Head of the body, the Church;" "beginning;" "first-born from the dead." On the first expression, see on Eph. i. 22. It is the organizing power, dwelling in Him, through which the Church has come into being. The other expression refers to the victory over death, as the fact upon which the secure status of the Church rests; as indeed Paul appears especially as a witness of the resurrection, wherever as Apostle he founds churches. All views which will not recognize and appreciate the Person of Christ as the centre of His work and His Church, as Divine in origin and nature, as eternal, pre-terrestrial and super-terrestrial, efficient both in Creation and Redemption, degenerate into a false speculation against which this Epistle to the Colossians contends. The question is not raised here, not even a hint given, how we are to conceive of Divinity and humanity united in One; nothing is said upon this point; hence Nestorian error does not lie so near, as SCHENKEL thinks, but rather Arian or Sabellian or Gnostic or another spiritual error, which volatilizes the eternal reality of the Person of Christ, or a dualistic one, which overshadows and crowds out the act of the Redeeming Subject by asceticism or legality, the so-called virtue of the subject to be redeemed.

5. The Work of Christ, with respect to God, from whom the world has apostatized through sin, is described as an ἀποκαταλλάξαι τὰ πάντα, "reconciling all things;" with respect to the state into which the world has fallen through sin, as ἡ ἀπολύτρωσις, "the redemption," and as to its beginning and principle, as ἡ ἁέσις τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, "the forgiveness of sins." First of all, the ultimate cause of Reconciliation and Redemption is God the Father (ver. 13: ὁς ἐρρίσαστο, ver. 19: εὐδόκησεν—ἀποκαταλλάξαι), as in creation. The Mediation of these belongs, as in the creation, to the Son of God, as Theanthropos in His historical Personality (ver. 20: by Him—and that "through the blood of His Cross," ver. 22: "in the body of His flesh through death"); His Person has central importance, His suffering and death is the climax. He entered into the fellowship of humanity, which is the object of Divine wrath, endured in this fellowship the wrath of God resting upon it, gave Himself as a Sacrifice, holy and innocent, proved in His self-denying obedience, in His office as Saviour, that just as His Son in whom He was well pleased became man, so it was the man in whom He was well pleased,—so that the Father for the sake of this One could turn His complacency upon the whole race which through Him dies to sin, and turns to God in grateful love.

The work of Redemption, as to its Object, relates to the totality of the creatures, although it begins in the human race; as to its Purpose, it tends to a restitution of the creation, or to a bringing back of the creation to the path which it has forsaken, toward its proper consummation. The former marks the extent of the corruption of sin. Man is a prey to the "power of darkness," which forms the antithesis to the kingdom of Love, so that darkness, which is opposed to Love, is to be conceived of, rather, as moral, than intellectual. Will, as well as knowledge, religiousness and morality, social and political relations, are effected and corrupted, and this can not only be affirmed of heathen (ver. 21: ἡνῶς), but is applicable to Jews (ver. 13: ἡνῶς). In the presence of this Redemption in Christ the advantages of Israel over the Gentiles disappear. The purpose of Redemption is directed, chiefly, to the internal sanctification of men, to the forgiveness of sin, extirpation of it and its consequences, to justification before God in the judgment within the conscience, and in the future at the last day (ver. 21). But it extends in ever wider circles, in order to permeate the whole creation, and bring all creatures and all relations to happiness and blessedness with Him into eternity. [To avoid any misconception, see EXEG. NOTES on ver. 20.—R.] Hence no dualistic view finds any justification here, in fact, dualism is anti-christian. The overcoming of the antagonisms, which are easily recognized, is thus set forth as a possibility and an indispensable task, and this is accomplished by ethical means, from the reconciliation of the world to the transformation of the world. [HENRY: Christ is the Mediator of reconciliation, who promises peace, as well as pardon, and brings into a state of friendship and favor at present, and will bring all holy creatures, angels as well as men, into one glorious and blessed society at last.—R.]

6. The Church in which the Redemption, objective in Christ, and accomplished by Him, is, and will be subjectively appropriated, is presented in our text in a two-fold aspect:

a) as respects its region—the militant and triumphant church, referred to in the expression, (ver. 18); ἀρχή, πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν;

b) as respects its inner life: cælus vocatorum et fidelium, referred to in the expression (ver. 12): ἅγιοι ἐν φωτί, "saints in light." The organism of the church is indicated by the expression (ver. 18): "Head of the body, the church." Its extent is denoted by the former reference, its vitality by the latter, and its mission is to further, subjectively, the purpose of the work of Christ. It is by no means indifferent how one stands in the church and holds to her; but it is just as little without important influence, whether or that one belongs to her, as it is indifferent in what nation or family one is incorporated.

7. The morality of the individual within the church of Christ is defined as objectively caused (ἅγιος, "holy"), subjectively internal (ἁμωμος, "unblamable"), and constantly referred to God (ἀνευκλήτως κατενώπιον αὐτοῦ, "unreprovable in his sight"); and on that account conditioned by faith, which must prove itself in a two-fold manner, in its life and its substance, as right and correct, as genuine and true, as fides qua and as fides quæ creditur; it is indeed the word of God become alive in the Christian. This, at the same time, explains, why and that faith must be stable and independent of time and human opinions; it depends upon permanence.

8. The Word of God, which should be heard and proclaimed, requires living persons who have been filled and moved by it, whom it has first served, to serve it in turn. Here we find a direction for the establishment of public worship, in which the exposition and proclamation of the Word should not be wanting, as well as for the labors of Bible Societies, that should circulate

God's Word, not merely in black and white, as copies from the press, like booksellers, and book binders, but in accordance with the organism and mission of the Church, in connexion with the efforts of Home and Foreign Missions.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

There is an order in prayer. Luther sets it forth in his explanation of the second Commandment [Luther's small catechism, the 2nd answer—on our Third Commandment.—R.]: "In all necessities call, pray, praise and give thanks." The call for help, the cry of distress, the entreaty, which necessity presses out, is the easiest, briefest, first, the prayer of an elementary pupil; the petition in perplexity for a need is an affair of the apprentice, who has learned first to pray for himself, and when further advanced, to offer supplications of unselfish love for others. The journeyman knows how to give thanks for gifts received, but the master praises the giver, not forgetting Him in His bounty. Whoever can and does do this, will not slight the easier part. Paul always goes from praise to thanksgiving, and from thanksgiving to supplication. He begins with the former, nor does he neglect the latter. Do you also? [The Apostle's order is that of mature Christian experience. But the other is that of the learner. It is also that of the Psalms. They usually begin with petition and end with praise. They were written in the times of preparation for Christ. How often Christians revert to David's method. The Old Testament still leads us to the New.—we pray first like the Psalmist, then like the Apostle.—R.]

Theory succeeds practice, as Philosophy follows Poetry. To live the truth is more than to know the truth. To perceive the truth is rather a matter of the sanctified will, than of the well-stored memory or the isolated intellect—Being filled with the knowledge of the truth, is to know both what is nearest and what is most remote. Reason is both a telescope, to look into distant eternal things, and a microscope to inspect and understand the things at hand, in house and heart, in life and business, but to adjust the glasses aright is not hers, it belongs to the will, it is not an intellectual, but a moral act. Christian living is not the product, but the producer of Christian thinking—The more you do, the more you become.—Only when bearing fruit, does the Christian grow.—Self-redemption is a falsity, and forgiveness of sins, without Christ, a lie. The folly of the sixteenth century, when people bought absolution with money, is laughed at, but why should we not also ridicule the blindness of the nineteenth century, when people forgive their own guilt and sin, and fancy they get absolution at a still cheaper rate. Those who credit Christ, no longer have a creditor in God; in this privilege unbelief has no share.—The Christian cannot divide or divorce God and Christ, God and the world, Creation and Redemption, Christ's Person and Work, this world and the next, faith and love, faith and God's word, faith and forgiveness, faith and bliss, religion and morality, church and Christianity, sin and corruption, grace and salvation, salvation and sanctification, though it is he who accurately distinguishes them.—The truth in Christ is the greatest paradox of life; the cross is a throne, death is life, weakness is strength, defeat is victory, gain is loss.—Christ, who satisfies all the needs of the human heart, begins with pardon, with grace that ends in blessedness with God. He blesses man in himself and goes on until He completes the whole creation—to the choirs of angels.—The Bible is the jewel of all the literature of the world; in the ring of the Bible the gospel is the diamond.—The news and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures come to us in personalities, and in him who understands them they become again personal.

STARKE:—You flatter yourself that you are a good Christian because you do nothing wicked! Is a tree good then, that does not bear thorns and thistles? If you are not diligent in good works, your Christianity is nothing, your imagination is vain, your hope is lost. We must grow in knowledge, grow in the power of God, grow in spiritual walk and in holiness. If a new-born child does not grow perceptibly, it is a bad sign. So it is with a Christian also.—To be patient in so many sufferings of this present time, and long-suffering amid so many adversities are excellent gifts of God. But those are far advanced, who endure evil not only with patience, but with joy also.—Eternal life is an inheritance, hence it can be trifled away with sin, but not earned with good works. For a little child, though it have done nothing as yet, comes to its inheritance as well as the larger ones, who have done much.—Sad condition of men through the fall of Adam! once monarchs over all creatures, they must now be subject to the devil and his empire.—[Believers also are first born, and enjoy the liberty of the First Born.—The dignity of believers surpasses that of angels, for they are united with the Son of God, who is higher than all angels.—R.]

RIEGER:—Darkness, ignorance, doubt, inability man traces to himself; vexation and impatience break out of this darkness. But the gospel first makes known that behind this there is concealed a rule and power of darkness, out of which a deliverance is required, deliverance accomplished by means of right and justice moreover.—It was not done by the Father's sending the Son into the world, as a great witness of His love, to tell much of His name, and thus lead us away from our hostile disposition toward God, or direct us to confidence in Him: but God laid our sins and those of the whole world on this our Mediator, accepted His obedience, His sufferings, His sacrifice and the shedding of His blood as a ransom-price for us.—There is no doubt the corruption in heathenism was greater than now, although we, who spring from Christian, perhaps specially sainted parents, are still wicked and born sinners; yet much is ameliorated in our hereditary disease, and the favorable opportunity for us to find God as Love, is much facilitated. But this must be regarded rather as an advantage of our age, and not one of our persons. Through neglect of this grace of our age, we may become again as bad and worse than a heathen.—[The praise of the blood of Christ reaches to our being presented holy and unprovable before God.—R.]

HEUBNER:—The heart of a Christian is a large heart. Paul had already entered into intimate fellowship with this Church although he had never seen it. What attracts the heart of one Christian to another? How easily true Christians at once understand each other!—The more fruitful our walk, the more does our knowledge of God grow. True knowledge can come only out of and with action. It is not only the knowledge that increases, but the power is enlarged, the capacity of enduring, holding out in conflict, as well as of cherishing kindly sentiments toward enemies—and of doing both with joy. We must live ourselves into Christianity.—Those who do not desire to become holy or to be "made meet," may be external adherents, but are not citizens of the kingdom of heaven.—Christ is before all with respect to time; He does not belong to the series of beings created in time. This "before" of priority naturally includes the "before" of preëminence.—Justification precedes, sanctification follows: the heart must first be stilled, then it can collect itself and prepare for sanctification. The latter is the end of the reconciliation. Why then will we ever invert this order? Because we would ascribe pardon to our merit, and not to the merit of Christ.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—A mind, that would fully apprehend the truth of the gospel, will soon mark a voice in itself, when something important and essential is omitted, while on the other hand, good sense will soon warn us, if we allow ourselves to be misled, so as to insert in the Scripture, through artifice, something which is not there.—Only when He has become to us the knowledge of the Divine will, is there a walk worthy of Him.—Expanded knowledge is itself a consequence of fruitfulness in good works.—The more plain the will of God becomes to us, the more we see what God has laid upon us to do; so much the more do we encounter opposition, the more difficult it becomes to instil the same view into others, and the more does this spiritual conduct of life enter into spheres which appear foreign to it.—Oh that we so investigated the Scriptures, that it tended to edification!—Paul makes sanctification dependent upon "being grounded" in faith, and upon not being "moved away" from the hope of the gospel, which is no other than that of the consummation of the kingdom of God in Christ.

PASSAVANT:—At the time of the council of Constance, three cardinals in their ride met a poor shepherd weeping on the beach. They asked him why he wept so. "Out of gratitude," he answered, pointing to a worm, "that God has made me a man and not a poor worm like that." What would have been the gratitude of the poor shepherd, had the cardinals revealed to him, that God could, besides, make him meet for the inheritance of the saints in light.—Darkness is a kingdom, and this kingdom has its principalities and powers, and their artifice and malice is great; their might is great and the abyss is deep.—Many a one may appear pure and refined in conduct and culture, whose conscience sleeps, whose heart deceives itself; it is a dream of rest and peace, a false dream of life: sin can scatter over the whole life of a sinner her poppy leaves.—There exists among highly cultivated minds, among educated people, an alienation from God, and in consequence an enmity, which seems to arise not so much from the ordinary sinful flesh, as from the temerity and pride of the thinking or subtilizing faculty in us, which indeed is also flesh. ["One can—and the inconsistency is not rare—worship Jesus Christ as God, and yet not have acknowledged Him as God formally and with the understanding; the heart makes Him God, the understanding makes Him man, still with most men the heart cannot cure the mind of its error, but is rather led astray itself." Quotation in Passavant.—R.] "To extend the law of Christ," says Theodorus, "they did not use carnal weapons. The power of convincing speech alone attested the power of these divine precepts. Every where exposed to the greatest dangers, they endured in all cities, through which they passed, the most shameful and cruel mal-treatment: scourge and rack, prisons, executions and martyrdoms of all kinds were daily their lot: yet though the executioner could kill the bearers of the divine message, they could not kill the message itself. It proved still mightier after their death: the gospel survived with equal vital power the efforts and the rage of Barbarians and Romans: out of the funeral pile where they would bury the memory of those fishermen and tent makers, it went forth yet more brilliantly and gloriously."

[HEXNY:—The Apostle heard that they were good, and he prayed that they might be better.—1. That they might be knowing, intelligent Christians. 2. That their conversation might be good. 3. That they might be strengthened. Vers. 12 sq. Here is the summary of the doctrine of the gospel concerning the great work of our redemption by Christ. It comes in here not as the matter of a sermon, but as the matter of a thanksgiving.—He does not discourse of the work of redemption in the natural order of it; for then he would speak of the purchase of it first, and afterwards of the application of it. But here he inverts the order; because in our sense and feeling of it, the application goes before the purchase. We first find the benefits of redemption in our own hearts, and then are led by those streams to the original and Fountain-head.—They who are not saints on earth, will never be saints in heaven. All who are designed for heaven hereafter, are prepared for heaven now. They who have the inheritance of sons, have the education of sons, and the disposition of sons.—This meekness for heaven is the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts; which is part of payment, and assures the full payment.—The greatest enemies to God, who have stood at the greatest distance and bidden Him defiance, may be reconciled, if it is not their own fault.—There was such a value in the blood of Christ, that on account of Christ's shedding it, God was willing to deal with men upon new terms, and bring them under a covenant of grace; and for His sake and in consideration of His death upon the cross, to pardon and accept to favor all who comply with them.—This gospel may be preached to every creature; for it excludes none who do not exclude themselves.—Paul was a great Apostle; but he looks upon it as the highest of his titles of honor, to be a minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ.—R.]

[BURKITT:—Ver. 10. Our fruitfulness should be an universal fruitfulness, an humble and self-denying fruitfulness, a proportionable fruitfulness, an abounding and abiding fruitfulness; this is to be fruitful in every good work.—Ver. 12. This meekness is a spiritual blessing, a transcendent favor, a discriminating favor, an everlasting favor; eternity will be too short to spend in the admiration of it; let such as are interested in it, now begin the work upon earth, of giving thanks to the Father for it.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 10. Superabundance of one kind of fruit is no compensation for the absence of another. "Every good work" is inculcated. Such fruitfulness is not exhaustive. The tree grows healthfully while its fertility is so great.—Ver. 11. That peculiar position which necessitates the exercise of "patience and long suffering" should not induce despondency, as if it were inevitable fate, to be sullenly submitted to, but rather should there be joy that this Divine power is communicated, and that the mind is upborne in triumph, and enabled to hope and wait in quiet expectation.—Ver. 12. None but the saints, as being "light in the Lord" can dwell in that light. They who enjoy it are made meet for social intercourse. Selfishness vanishes before universal love, the intense yearnings of a spiritual brotherhood are developed and perfected.—Ver. 13. The oneness of God has an earthly and a celestial phasis. It resembles a city divided by a river, but still under the same municipal administration and having one common franchise.—Ver. 14. Forgiveness is more closely connected with redemption than any other blessing; it comes at once from the cross to the believing soul.—Vers. 15-19. The sentences in which Paul describes the rank and prerogative of Christ are like a bursting torrent. How he exults in the precious theme, and how his soul swells into impassioned panegyric!—Had the Divine Being remained alone, His glory would have been unseen and His praises unsung. Christ fitted up these "all things" "for Himself," in order that He might exhibit His glory, while He diffused happiness through creatures of innumerable worlds, and enabled them to behold His mirrored brightness and to reflect it.—At every point of His existence, it may be said of Him, "He is." What faith in power and extent should not be reposed in such a Saviour-God!—In all things He has the pre-eminence. None like Christ is the decision of faith, none but Christ is the motto of love.—Every grace as it is needed, and when it is needed, in every variety of phasis and operation, is wrapt up in that fulness which dwells in Christ.—Ver. 20. Blood shed on earth creates feuds to be extinguished only by other blood; but the blood of Christ's violent and vicarious death brings peace, restores alliance between heaven and earth.—Ver. 21. Man does not win his way back to the Divine favor by either costly offering or profound penitence. God reunites him to Himself: has not only provided for such an alliance, but actually forms and cements it. The incarnation rightly understood, enhances the Redeemer's greatness.—Ver. 23. Thus a life of faith is one of hope. The loss of faith is the knell of hope.—Man is not acted on mechanically by the grace of God, but his whole spiritual nature is excited to earnest prayer and anxious effort. The confidence of success inspires them.—R.]

[BARNES: Vers. 9-11. It is a good time to pray for Christians when they are already prosperous, and are distinguished for zeal and love. We have then encouragement to do it.—Vers. 12-13. No words can express appropriately the goodness of God in thus making us heirs of light.—Vers. 15-18. In the affections of our hearts let the Saviour in all things have the pre-eminence. None should be loved by us as Christ is loved.—Ver. 19. In all our wants let us go to Christ, in whom all fulness dwells.—Ver. 20. What a glorious work is that of the gospel! It reconciles and harmonizes distant worlds.—R.]

[ROBERT HALL:—Ver. 19. In Jesus Christ "all fulness" dwells, for the supply of spiritual destitution. Fulness of knowledge: knowledge is the great distinction of the mind, and here is all spiritual knowledge. Christ is Himself the wisdom of God; to know HIM is to attain at once the highest knowledge. Fulness of holiness: holiness is the proper riches and beauty of the soul; and the subjects of Christ are created anew in holiness after His image. Fulness of consolation; the greatest comforts that ever visited the troubled heart of man are those which flow from Christ as their fountain. Fulness once more, as it respects the inheritance in reserve; of which the saints have at certain seasons a present sense and foretaste, though the light of eternity is required to display its real extent, to display the accessible fulness of the present Saviour.—R.]

AHLFELD: He who places the full Christian grace before his soul, will strive the more earnestly to possess it. 1) Wherein does it consist? 2) How may I gain what I still lack?—CARSTEN: Peace through His blood on the cross. 1) Between God and man, 2) Heaven and earth, 3) in each human breast—or 1) The world reconciled with God, 2) Heaven opened, 3) Conscience stilled.—LÖHE: A ladder that reaches from heaven to earth. 1) God the Father has set it through the Son of His Love; 2) the highest round, at first concealed, shines in the light of sanctification; 3) the second in that of justification; 4) the third in the bloody scene of Golgotha; and our Redemption.—KÖHLER: Thanksgiving for the benefit of Redemption; 1) end; 2) mode; 3) means; 4) Person of Redemption.

ZIMMERMAN: Strife of two kingdoms for the souls of sinners; 1) God the Father devised the struggle concerning us; 2) God the Son has won the victory and kingdom for us; 3) whoever abides in Him, has escaped the enemy.*

On the epistle for the 24th Sunday after Trinity [vers. 9-14. The Prot. Episcopal Book of Common Prayer, following that of the Church of England, uses vers. 3-12.—R.]—HEUBNER: The great change wrought in man by Christianity.

1) Its nature: a) new light, full of knowledge and wisdom; b) a new virtuous walk, worthy of God; c) the translation into a new kingdom; d) the eternal Redemption. 2) The consequences: a) what is the reason, if we have not yet experienced this change? b) what have we to do?—RAUTENBURG: The question respecting our growth in Christianity. 1) Can we—2) will we grow? 3) Have we grown?—Paul prays for the believers in Colosse: 1) that, 2) what, 3) where and when he prayed for them.—KAPFF: What is eternal blessedness? 1) Redemption for all evil; 2) blessed fellowship with God and all saints; 3) unspeakable joy and honor in the glory of the heavenly kingdom.—LORENZ: Darkness and light. 1) Man according to nature; 2) man according to grace.—FLOREY: Light, the believer's inheritance. 1) They have the light of truth; 2) they walk in the light of virtue; 3) they come into the light of blessedness.—BECK: How a share in the glorious power of God 1) makes us meet; 2) admonishes us to thanksgiving.

[BEVERIDGE: Ver. 12. The happiness of the saints in heaven. 1) What kind of persons they are, who are or shall be happy in the other world; they are saints. 2) The happiness they enjoy there; the inheritance in light. 3) They who desire to enjoy that happiness must be duly qualified for it; "made meet." 4) All who are so qualified must ascribe it wholly to God, and give Him thanks for it; "giving thanks," etc.—STEINHOFFER: The economy of the Triune God in the work of our blessedness. 1) What God has determined according to the counsel of His own good pleasure; 2) what in His Son from all eternity for our salvation; 3) what actually takes place in us to the praise and glory of His name.—The three glorious names of Jesus (Begotten before every creature, first-born from the dead, Head of the Body) should awaken us 1) to an humble joy, 2) a complete faith, 3) a tender love to Him.—LISCO: The actual union of God with the human nature in Christ the ground of the most intimate re-union of humanity with God through Christ.—SCHENKEL: A fruitful teacher's duty to pray unceasingly for his people.—The Christian should not rest until he has fully known the will of God, 1) in its highest designs and ends; 2) according to its manifold methods and means.—How Christian life and Christian thought reciprocally condition each other. 1) Without Christian thought the Christian life is not plain. 2) Without Christian life Christian thought is not correct.—The blessing of Redemption: 1) Wherein it consists (forgiveness of sins); 2) whereby it is obtained (through the blood of Christ).—Jesus Christ, the Risen One, the Head of the church: 1) Its Founder, 2) its Upholder, 3) its Ruler.—Jesus Christ, according to God's good pleasure, the Bearer of all fulness of humanity and of man. Consider then 1) His glory, 2) our poverty.—The threefold witness for the truth of the gospel: resting 1) on the antiquity, 2) the extent, 3) the power of the proclamation of the same.—R.]

* [These divisions are made to rhyme in German—a fashion in sermonizing that happily has not yet come into vogue in America: 1) Gott der Vater hat den Kampf um uns eronnen, 2) Gott der Sohn hat Sieg und Reich für uns gewonnen; 3) wer in Ihm bleibt, der ist dem Feind entronnen.—R.]

3. Joy of the Apostle in his suffering and labor.

(CHAPTER I. 24-29.)

24 Who [I]¹ now rejoice in my [the]² sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind [δυστηρήματα, deficiencies] of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's
 25 sake, which is the church; Whereof I³ am made [became]⁴ a minister according to the dispensation of God which is [was] given to me for you, to fulfil the word of 26 God; Even [To wit] the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations [the ages and from the generations],⁵ but now⁶ is made manifest to his saints:

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The joy in suffering. Ver. 24.—Now I rejoice in my sufferings for you.—"Now" marks the present, which is described by "in my sufferings for you;" precisely therein, surrounded, encompassed by sufferings "I rejoice." [EADIE: "'at the present time,' with the chain upon my wrist:—not, however, as if he had been sorrowful at a previous period."—R.] At other times he had his joy without bonds, in full freedom of activity for the gospel. The object of joy is not denoted by ἐν, but by ἐν with the dative, Matth. xviii. 13; Luke i. 14; Acts xv. 21; 1 Cor. xiii. 6; xvi. 17, or by διά, Jno. xi. 15; 1 Thess. iii. 9. Only in Luke x. 20; Phil. i. 18 is the object introduced by ἐν τοῖς. The object of his joy is that his sufferings had good fruit among the Gentiles. Comp. Phil. i. 12-20. It was in Rome that he had learned this; hence "now." The bitterness of sorrow cannot disturb his joy at the sweetness of the fruit. See Eph. iii. 1. Hence it is incorrect to consider νῦν a particle of transition (BAHR), or of consecution, or τὰ παθήματα as the object of the joy (GROTIUS, HUTNER and others). Nor is ὕνεκ—"instead of" (STEIGER), or "on account of" (uegen, STOLZ), or to be joined with χαίρω. The reference is neither to the occasion of the sufferings of the Apostle to the Gentiles, nor to his example, but to the fact, that his sufferings are for the good of the Church, as indicated by what follows. [EADIE agrees with STOLZ: "on account of." He was imprisoned because of his preaching to the Gentiles. This is true, but ALFORD's view agrees better with the text, context and Braune. "The preposition cannot here imply substitution—but strictly in commodum vestri, that you may be confirmed in the faith by—not my example merely—the glorification of Christ in my sufferings." So WINER: zum Vortheil, Gram. p. 358.—R.]

And fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ.—["And am filling up fully the lacking measures of the sufferings of Christ," ELLCOTT—R.] Kai leads us forward from the subjective feeling to the objective state of the case (MEYER), but not from the particular (ὑμῶν) to the whole (LUECKE); nor is it—kai γάρ (BAHR), nor yet—sed (BENGL). By τὰ δυστηρήματα (Phil. ii. 30; 1 Thess. iii. 10; 1 Cor. xvi. 17; 2 Cor. viii. 13, 14; ix. 12; xi. 9); we are to understand arrears, which must be cancelled ["deficiencies," ALFORD—R.]; where such are found is indicated by τῶν θλίψεων τοῦ Χριστοῦ. As in 2 Cor. i. 5 ("the sufferings of Christ") the meaning here is, sufferings which Christ endured.* The Apostle, whom Christ had asked, when he persecuted the Church (Acts ix. 14), "why persecutest thou me?" and who in the Epistle to the Ephesians (i. 22; v. 33; iv. 12) calls Him the Head of the Church, and this His body, could speak thus without fear of being misunderstood. What befalls His own, the Master accepts as done to Himself (Matt. x. 40-42; xxv. 31-46). Hate and persecution He had announced to them beforehand (Jno. xv. 18-21; xvi. 1-4). What the servants suffer is aimed at the Master. He takes it to Himself. All enemies of the Church are His enemies also, who shall be put under His feet (1 Cor. xv. 25). See WINER'S Gram. p. 178. MELANCHTHON: non quod ad meritum, quod plenissimum est solius Christi, sed quod ad militie societatem attinet. Here the Apostle treats of historical matters, phenomena and facts, behind which we must ever hold fast to a real, though invisible connexion of the Head with His Church—(here just as in Phil. iii. 10; Rom. viii. 17; 2 Cor. iv. 10 sq.; 2 Tim. ii. 11; 1 Pet. iv. 13)—with respect to the historical development, the course of the Kingdom through the world. There is nothing whatever to indicate atonement with God [i. e., by means of these sufferings of Christ, the "deficiencies" of which Paul was filling up; this interpretation made this "a proof text for the doctrine of indulgences" among the medieval Romanists—it is doubtless thus understood still among them.—R.] As little as τὰ ὑστερήματα describes any lack or insufficiency of afflictions in themselves, so little stress can be laid upon the choice of the specially significant expression (θλίψεις) instead of the more general παθήματα (2 Cor. i. 5). It is incorrect to understand τοῦ Χριστοῦ as meaning: similar to the sufferings of Christ (HUTHER and others), or for the sake of Christ (BÖHMER and others), or borne auctore et auspice Christo (LÜCKE), or the Church directly. On ἀνταπαληρῶ, placed first on the main idea, BENGE makes the excellent remark: fixa est mensura passionum, quas tota exantillare debet ecclesia; quo plus igitur Paulus exhausit, eo minus et ipsi et posthac et ceteris relinquatur; hoc fuit communio sanctorum. While ἀνταλληροῦν occurs more frequently in the New Testament, ἀνταπαληροῦν is found here only, and is rare any where. The preposition ἀντί, according to the context, refers to a filling up in view of arrears, and marks the extent and weight of the Apostle's sufferings. It cannot be regarded as referring to Christ (instead of Christ, or: as He for me, so I now suffer for Him [vicissim]), or to the Church; not even to the fact that he had formerly persecuted Christ and afflicted the Church; although he now as a sufferer completed the sufferings which come on the Church, while as a persecutor he had formerly brought such upon it. TITMANN (Syn. I. p. 230) and WINER (de verb. comp. III. p. 22) explain: alterius quod deficit loco et vice supplere; not indicated here. [EADIE gives the clearest statement of the various interpretations, and mentions those who uphold them. His own view, which agrees in the main with that of BRAUNE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT,—and of many of the best commentators from CHRYSOSTOM to our day, will appear from the following extracts: "The personal sufferings of Christ are over, but His sufferings in His people still continue. The Apostle in suffering for the sake of the Church, felt that he was filling up the measure of those afflictions. The double compound verb denotes to fill up in relation to; to fill up with something which meets the exigence, or is equivalent to the want. The Apostle filled up the sufferings of Christ not with some foreign agony that had no relation to the defect; but the process of supplement consisted of sufferings which met the deficiency, in quality and amount.—Filled up what was yet wanting in the Saviour's sympathetic sorrows." So Augustine on Psalm lxi.—See Doctrinal notes below.—R.] A further and fuller definition of ἀνταπαληρῶ is given in the next clause: In my flesh for his body's sake.—[In support of the above view, WORDSWORTH aptly remarks: "Hence the Apostle says, that I may fill up what is lacking of Christ's sufferings in His Body; not in the Head."—R.] The two phrases belong together; "flesh"—"body" denote the reciprocal relation; the former describes the person of the Apostle on the side which is affected by the sorrow (Gal. iv. 4; 2 Cor. iv. 11), the latter the organism to which benefit accrues from the sorrow endured, from the bearing of the sorrow; the individual sacrifice for the whole (MEYER) is the intent of these adverbial phrases. Comp. Eph. iii. 13. STEIGER incorrectly joins these phrases with "the afflictions of Christ as one idea: the verb requires closer definition rather than this. [So ELLICOTT: ἐν τῇ σαρκί μου defines the seat, and inferentially the mode of the "filling up,"—in exquisite contrast (MEYER) with the σῶμα, which defines the object of the action.—R.]—Which is the church, is simply an explanation (see Eph. i. 22), as ὑπὲρ τοῦ σώματος ὑμῶν is an explanation of ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν.

* [MEYER: "Τοῦ Χριστοῦ is a subjective genitive. Paul describes his own sufferings, according to the idea of 'the fellowship of the sufferings of Christ' (1 Pet. iv. 13; comp. Matt. xx. 22; Heb. xiii. 13), as 'the afflictions of Christ.' in case the Apostolic suffering was essentially of the same kind, which Christ had endured (the same cup, of which Christ had drunk, the same baptism, with which Christ had been baptized). The sum of these afflictions is conceived of as a definite measure, as is frequent in classical usage in similar figurative representation.—I rejoice in my sufferings, which I endure for you, and how great and glorious is that which I am engaged in accomplishing through these sufferings! the full completion of that which is lacking on my part in the fellowship of the sufferings of Christ." Very naturally his triumphant consciousness, this feeling of the greatness of the matter, led not only to the choice of the highly significant word ἀνταπαληρῶ, but to this description of the Apostle's own afflictions in the most honorable and sublime manner, as the 'afflictions of Christ,' since in their kind and character they are none other than those endured by Christ Himself.—R.]

The ministerial position of Paul. Vers. 25-27.

Ver. 25. Whereof I became a minister, ἧς ἔγενόμην ἐγὼ διάκονος.—See ver. 23. This vocation of suffering for the Church he must endure as its minister; as servant, not as master, as servant of the gospel and of the Church, qui evangelio servit, idem ecclesiae servit (GROTIUS). [EADIE: "of which Church;" ELLICOTT: "ἧς has a faintly explanatory force,—I fill up, etc.—the Church, being an appointed minister thereof'—in ver. 23 the διακονία referred to the εὐαγγέλιον, here to the Church by which the εὐαγγέλιον is preached"—R.] As servant, which he became: according to the dispensation of God which was given to me for you.—Katὰ τὴν οἰκονομίαν τοῦ θεοῦ [gemäss der Haushalterschaft (stewardship, ALFORD) Gottes.—R.] defines his ministry as that of an οἰκονομος, God as οἰκοδεσπότης, His (τοῦ θεοῦ) is the οἰκονομία entrusted to him, he and his office belong to God. It is therefore the office, not the management, dispensatio (Eph. i. 10; iii. 2). [ELLICOTT: "not the disposition of God, but the spiritual function, the office of an οἰκονομος."]—

The word is difficult to render accurately in English. "Dispensation" can remain, not from its fitness, but in lack of a better.—R.] Hence "which was given to me." A comparison of Rom. xv. 15 ("the grace that is given to me of God") with 1 Cor. iii. 10 ("the grace of God which is given unto me") enables us to perceive that the emphasis is laid upon this, that the office, which was given to him, was of God, not that God had given it to him. The expression regards the Church [Kirche] as the house of God in connexion with the view that the congregation [Gemeinde] is the body of Christ, as in Eph. i. 22 sq. and ii. 21 sq.).—The added phrase, εἰς ὑμᾶς ["for you," "towards you" (ALFORD)—R.], gives the reference, the direction of the office, which God had determined, and takes the readers as denoting, concretely and immediately, the heathen world to which they belonged.

To fulfil the word of God.—This is his allotted duty. The infinitive depends on δοθεῖσα v. [Infinitive of design.—R.] In the object the gospel is included, and thus the idea of a message, which should be carried in all directions. Hence "fulfil" implies the figure of a measure to be filled. BENGE: ad omnes perducere. Paulus ubique ad summa tendit. Comp. Rom. xv. 19. There indeed the locality is given; here it is indicated also by εἰς ὑμᾶς, which precedes. Hence it is not—to fulfilling the promises (BEZA), that was not the affair of the Apostle, nor—to proclaim fully in extent and contents (OLSHAUSEN), nor—to preach fully (LUTHER), nor—to complete, as if finish the teaching of Epaphras (FRITZSCHE), nor—to teach as רַבִּי (FLATT, BAEHR and others), nor yet—to realize (STEIGER),—to work out (DE WETTE),—to bring to full faith (CHRYSOSTOM, who connects εἰς ὑμᾶς here). [ALFORD seems to incline to the view of Chrysostom, but rejects the assumed connection: "to fulfil the duty of the stewardship, in doing all that this preaching of the word requires." ELLICOTT: "to give its fullest amplitude to, to fill up the measure of its fore-ordained universality, not perhaps without some allusion to the οἰκονομία, which could thus be fully discharged."] So MEYER and EADIE. See HOMIL. NOTES.—R.]

VER. 26 defines more closely the word of God as to its purport.—The mystery which hath been hid from the ages and the generations.—See Eph. iii. 9, 4: i. 9. The synonymous phrase (καὶ—γενεῶν), alone is new, and unique in the New Testament (yet see Eph. iii. 5, 21; Acts xv. 21). Beside the ages of the world, the generations of men living in them are brought into special prominence, and thus the concealment from the beginning of human history is marked. BENGE incorrectly refers αἰῶνες to angels, γενεαὶ to men. [ELLICOTT: "the mystery was the divine purpose of salvation in Christ. and more especially as the context seems to show 'de salvandis gentibus per gratiam evangelicam' (DAVENANT).—The Apostle does not say, πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων, from eternity. The expression is historical. The counsel was formed πρὸ τ. αἰ., but concealed ἀπο τ. αἰ." EADIE seems to be incorrect in limiting "mystery" here to the salvation of the Gentiles, though it has a special reference to this.—R.]

But now is made manifest to his saints.—The Greek liked the transition from a participle to a finite verb, of course with due regard to the structure of the thought, WINER's Gram. p. 505. [Here the transition gives prominence to the second member of the sentence, and sharpens the contrast.—R.] Eph. iii. 5 is parallel. Special emphasis rests upon νυνὶ δέ on account of the antithesis. In contrast with ἐγνωρίσθη, which refers to knowledge, and ἀπεκαλύφθη, which refers to special spiritual revelation, ἐφανερώθη is the most general and comprehensive expression, certainly not without a reference to the historical actualization, to the fact of evangelical preaching (2 Tim. i. 10). [MEYER observes that this manifestation took place in different ways, partly by revelation, partly by preaching and exposition, and partly by all combined. EADIE and ALFORD seem disposed to limit it to direct manifestation by Divine power, "at the glorification of Christ and the bestowal of the Spirit." But the whole context refers to Paul's ministry, hence the more extensive view, which includes preaching, is to be preferred.—R.] Thus "His saints" means all Christians, and must not be limited to the Apostles on account of the parallel passage (BAEHR, STRIGER, and others). Nor should "saints" be taken indefinitely (HUTNER), because the mystery of the reception of the Gentiles into the kingdom of God was not known by many Jewish Christians. The word is not ἐγνωρίσθη, "known;" these were only a minority at best, and their misconception was rather respecting the mode, the immediacy of the entrance of the Gentiles. [DAVENANT applies it to the elect, which though true enough, is not pertinent here, see below.—R.]

VER. 27. To whom God willed to make known, οἷς ἡθέλησεν ὁ θεὸς γνωρίσαι.—This relative clause marks the design of God. *ἡθέλησεν is not to be limited to free grace, as the Greeks and Reformed claim. [CHRYSOSTOM CALVIN, BEZA, DE WETTE—modern commentators, even EADIE, object to pressing such a meaning. ALFORD: a legitimate inference, but not an exposition.—R.] Simply—it was His will. His design in the "making manifest" was "to make known." Thus the view respecting the former verb is corroborated. The relative clause does not limit the force of ἀγιοι, to those who should know: οἷς is: as to whom, [quippe quibus (MEYER): as being persons "to whom," etc. "Seeing that to them it was God's will," etc. (ELLCOTT).—R.] The object of γνωρίσαι is: what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles.—"What is the riches" is quæ sui divitiæ not quales. On ὁ and τὸ πλοῦτος, see WINER'S Gram. p. 64. The Apostle is speaking of the wealth "of the glory of this mystery." Δόξα is the main idea, which must not be weakened: on it depends a "wealth," while it depends "on this mystery," and comes with the revelation of it. Hence it is incorrect to render: "glorious riches" (LUTHER) and gloriosi huius mysterii (BEZA). Δόξα is glory, not to be limited to "bliss" (MICHAELIS), "glorious results" (CHRYSOSTOM), nor yet to be extended to God's Being, His wisdom and grace (DE WETTE), the Divine self-revelation (SCHENKEL). CALVIN is excellent: "He teaches that these riches had appeared, particularly among the Gentiles; for what could be more deserving of admiration, than that the Gentiles, who for so many ages had been sunk in death, and whose condition might seem altogether desperate, should suddenly be received into the family of God, and receive the inheritance of salvation?" [On the meaning of δόξα, see ALFORD and ELLICOTT.—The former, following MEYER, makes it identical with δόξα below—the latter distinguishes it, more correctly. Both would not restrict it to either a subjective or objective meaning; it partakes of both.—R.] On this account "among the Gentiles," is to be joined with "is," which must be supplied, not to "this mystery." Among the Gentiles the riches of the glory of this mystery revealed in the gospel appeared in the sharpest contrast with the deepest shadows (OLSHAUSEN).

Two phrases in apposition make the sense clearer. First: which [or who] is Christ in you. [bei Euch, "among you—R."]—"Christ among the Gentiles, the greatest paradox in that age" (BENGEL). First "without Christ," "without God." "Children of wrath by nature" (Eph. ii. 12, 13) now He is among, in them (Eph. iii. 17). Ἐν ὑμῖν corresponds to ἐν ἑσέων, "Christ" to "the riches of the glory of this mystery," and ὅς marks this reference, though it conforms to the following name, not to τὸ πλοῦτος (WINER'S Gram. p. 157). [Hence the various readings do not affect the sense.—R.] The reference to "this mystery" (HUTNER) [ALFORD, ELLICOTT.—R.] is too restricted, and not well-founded in grammar or fact. By "Christ" we must understand not the knowledge of Christ (THEOPHYLACT), nor the doctrine of Christ (GROTIUS) nor yet "from Christ" (FLATT), but Himself, His Person. "You" means the Gentiles, not simply the Colossian readers, as in ver. 25.—Secondly: the hope of glory, in exegetical apposition with "Christ," in whom the Gentiles have the surety for the future fruition of the glory of salvation: in Him we have here as seed, what we shall have in Him there as harvest. Entirely like 1 Tim. i. 1, "Jesus Christ, our hope." ["Glory" here is future blessedness, above it has a more general reference, see EADIE, ELLICOTT.—R.] "Christ—your life," iii. 4, is similar. Jno. xi. 25. Comp. Eph. i. 18; ii. 12; Rom. viii. 24. BENGEL: Christus in nobis, per se letissimus; sed multo letius, respectu eorum, quæ revelabuntur.

Paul's labor. Vers. 28, 29. Whom we preach, ὃν ἡμεῖς καταγγέλλομεν.—The emphasis must be laid on ἡμεῖς, which might be wanting, did not the Apostle speak in opposition to false teachers. At the same time, he notes that he does not stand alone. It does not refer directly to Timothy (MEYER), nor to Epaphras; it is doubtful whether Paul thought of particular persons. Certainly BLEEK is mistaken in his view that he thought particularly of no other one than himself. [So CONYBEARE, who insists ever upon the singular force of ἡμεῖς.—R.] The singular which follows (ver. 29: κοινῶ) forbids such an opinion. ERASMUS incorrectly places the emphasis upon ὃν; "this one, not Moses or angels."

Warning every man and teaching every man.—This gives the modality of the καταγγεῖν. Both participles [νοουθετοῦντες and διδάσκοντες] are used, iii. 16, in another order. The first aims to affect the will, using what is already known, the other to foster knowledge, beginning indeed with what is known; it denotes the imparting of information, linked with what is known, or the extension and deepening of knowledge, and here indeed, in the second place after νοουθετοῦντες, on the basis of experiences and occurrences in the present and past, with a view to the future and eternity. Eph. vi. 4; Acts xxvi. 18; Rom. iii. 23–26. Both embrace repentance and faith—not the first participle the former, and the second, the latter (MEYER). [So ELLICOTT, and ALFORD, "but not too closely or exclusively."—R.] Nor is the first alone moral, and the second only didactic (SCHENKEL). BENGEL too is incorrect, νοουθετοῦνται, qui jam docti sunt, διδάσκονται, rudes. [For the other views, see EADIE, who, while regarding the first term as the more general, and the second as the more special,—agrees in the main with BRAUNE's view as given above.—R.] Both are more closely defined: in all wisdom, ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ.—See Eph. i. 8. There is no reason for joining it to διδάσκοντες alone, (DE WETTE, MEYER) [ALFORD, ELLICOTT and apparently EADIE.—R.], and the view is a perversion, which finds in it the object of the instruction (ESTIUS and others), "Wisdom of words" (1 Cor. i. 11; ii. 1–4) is excluded, but insight into the individuality of one to be taught and admonished, into his condition, and into the method by which it can be successfully done. [ALFORD: "the method of teaching." ELLICOTT: "in every form of wisdom—the characteristic element in which the teaching was always to be, and to which it was to be circumscribed." CHRYSOSTOM: μετὰ πάσης σοφίας. These views are correct, but should be extended to "warning" as well.—R.]

That we may present every man perfect in Christ.—ἵνα gives the end of the "preaching," mediated by the "warning" and "teaching." As in ver. 22, παρστήσωμεν, which is placed first for emphasis, is used with reference to the Judgment; so earnest a matter is it; it has not to do with men's judgment. The offering of a sacrifice is not found in the context. "Every man" is repeated for the third time: every individual the Apostle bore on his heart. BENGL: hoc loties positum maxime habet δεινότητα ac vim, et causam continet, cur etiam ad ignota scribat. As "perfect" each should there appear, and indeed, as the context and ver. 22 require, in his whole being, not simply in knowledge (CHRYSOSTOM [CALVIN] and others), or in justifying faith (OLSHAUSEN). Perfection is possible only "in Christ," who alone conditions and effects this, in life and nature. By this he excludes all those false methods of voluntary asceticism, to which the false teachers guided. [Such a reference is considered doubtful by ALFORD and ELLICOTT, "in Christ" being so frequently used by the Apostle.—R.]

Ver. 29. Whereunto I also labour.—"To which end."—R.] The proclamation of Christ is the Apostle's life-work (εἰς ὃ) and not simply a service, and also (καί) a painful labor (κοπιῶ). [Kai, also; besides preaching, etc.—I labor also. The relapse to the singular—"has an individualizing force, and carries on the reader from the general and common labors of preaching the gospel, to the struggles of the individual preacher" (ELLICOTT).—R.] This is strengthened by striving, ἀγωνιζόμενος.—By this he means both the internal conflicts of soul (iv. 12; ii. 1 sq.) in care, prayer, sympathy and earnestness for sanctification, and the external "fightings" (1 Tim. iv. 10; 1 Thess. ii. 2; Phil. i. 30). CHRYSOSTOM adds μετὰ πολλῆς σπουδῆς τοῦτόστιν μετὰ πολλῆς τῆς ἀγρυπνίας. MEYER [EADIE, ALFORD.—R.] incorrectly limit it to internal, GROTIUS, BAHR and others to external conflict.

According to his working, which worketh in me mightily.—"According to his working" (ἐνέργειαν αὐτοῦ) according to the context: Christ's denotes, that Paul is not led and limited to his own strength, but strives according to the measure of the energy of Christ, which too worketh mightily in him, Eph. iii. 20, Phil. iv. 13. Paulus per se non valeret, pro eo ac Christus in eo operatur, pellet (BENGL). It is both humility and certainty of victory. As little as αὐτοῦ should be considered as referring to God (CHRYSOSTOM and others), so little is the participle to be taken as passive (ESTIUS) and ἐν δυνάμει (comp. Rom. i. 4) to be referred to miracles (VATABLE). [ELLICOTT, quoting CALVIN, thinks there is no reason for excluding miracles summarily, though he admits such a reference would be only secondary. EADIE makes the phrase specify "the mode of operation." "The occurrence of the noun and a correlate verb intensifies the meaning"—Such a "working" would be "in power." "Its ample energies clothed him with a species of moral omnipotence."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The sufferings of the Church are the sufferings of Christ. The connexion of Christ, as Lord and Head, with the Church, His Body is so close, that the sufferings of the Church are the sufferings of Christ. "We know that the unity of the head and the members is such, that the name Christ sometimes comprehends the whole body" (CALVIN). "The head feels pain before the other members: thus experience teaches. For if you tread on a man's little toe, or hurt any other one of the most insignificant members, you notice it at once in his countenance. So Christ, our Head, takes the pains of us, His members, as if they were His own, and it burdens Him, as though it befell Himself, when any sorrow meets us" (LUTHER). [WORDSWORTH quotes Augustine on Ps. lxi., as follows: "Jesus Christ is one Man with His Body and His Head; the Saviour of the Body and the members of the Body are twain in one flesh; they are one in suffering, and when the iniquity of the world is past, they will be one in rest. Therefore the sufferings of Christ are not limited to Christ; nay, rather the sufferings of Christ are not except in Christ. For if you understand Christ to be both Head and Body, the sufferings of Christ are all in Christ. Hence the Apostle says 'Ut suppleam quod desunt pressurarum Christi in carne meæ.' Whosoever therefore thou art, if thou art a member of Christ, whatsoever thou sufferest, was lacking to the sufferings of Christ. Therefore that suffering of thine is added because it was lacking; thou art filling the measure, not making it flow over. Thou sufferest so much in thyself as was to be poured in the universal passion of Christ, who suffered in our Head, and who suffers in His members, that is, in us. The whole measure of suffering will not be filled up till the world comes to an end."—R.] Two opinions present themselves here in opposition at either extreme: That of MEYER, that persecutions are indeed directed against Christ, but He, the victorious Ruler in Glory, cannot be passively affected by them; and SCHENKEL's, that He, as Head of His Body, must even now share its feelings. The former view sunders them, and makes of Christ's sympathy a mere phrase; the latter so confounds them in one, that the sympathy of Christ is marred and soiled by the susceptibility of the militant Church, instead of this being alleviated, purified and exalted by that.

2. The atoning and the enduring sufferings of Christ. A distinction must be made between the sufferings of Christ, which atone for sin and extirpate its corruption, and those which endure sin and its evils. The former, which He vicariously and representatively bore for us, are not here spoken of. The Romanists (CAJETAN, BELLARMINE, and others) are in error, in referring this passage to these only, and then regarding Paul's sufferings as supplementary to those of Christ, and hence, as also atoning and substitutionary, founding upon this their dogma of a storehouse of superfluous good works and indulgences. According to Jno. xix. 30, "It is finished," Christ's propitiatory sufferings need no supplement and completion; neither do His sufferings remove merely the guilt of original sin, nor is atonement for sins after baptism to be sought through the saints; one needing redemption himself, cannot make atonement. [For authorities on both sides of this controversy, consult the notes of EADIE, ALFORD and WORDSWORTH.—R.] This passage does not speak of those redeeming sufferings, of the sufferings of Christ in the theological, doctrinal sense, but in the historical sense, of the sufferings of Christ in the world, of the sufferings of His Church from the world. These have a sum and extent not yet concluded, which are diminished in the onward progress to final victory, so that what the world, exhausting itself in its enmity, does to the members of Christ, turns out to the advantage of the Church, insofar as these members bear and forbear in the fellowship of their exalted Lord, the victor who sympathizes with triumphant sympathy. It is by just such suffering heroes in the Church, that she is helped out of manifold sorrow.

3. The Word of God is, as to its nature, revelation of a mystery, which would otherwise have been hidden from men, as to its tenor, testimony respecting Christ for all men. And this tenor is universal, directed to all men, is mediated by the proclamation of historical facts, begins within the man, and reaches beyond the germs and conflicts of time into perfection in eternity.

4. The ministry of the Word is an ordinance of God in and for the Church He has formed. It pre-supposes the revelation of Christ in the world, in the history of humanity, has to do with the proving of the same for each and every one by means of a proclamation, which takes hold of and advances the whole man, morally and intellectually, in will and knowledge. It should preserve, as its end, the internal sanctification and perfection unto the final Judgment, and is conditioned by the personal labors of the minister, as Christ's energy in him.

5. Special care for Souls is very important ["every man"—R]. It begins with Christ's special care.

HOMEILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The Christian has to be thankful for so many and so great things, which he cannot lose, that in the sorrows of time, with the prospect of eternity and bliss, he is not joyless, but should be constantly rejoicing.—The Christian may rejoice, where men rejoice, and can rejoice, where it is impossible for men. He can rejoice, when he has his child in his arms,—and over its bier also. It is a great mistake to suppose that a certain melancholy and restraint of lively emotion is joined with Christian faith and piety.—Christian joy is the echo of a higher joy, which drowns the tumult of earthly sorrow.—The springs of joy in Mount Zion and Calvary cause it to flow on without interruption, and inexhaustibly.—The Christian's sorrow can and will bring good to the whole body and cause of Christ: in this the world's enmity but wearies and exhausts itself, to make the Christian come forth ever brighter.—The minister of the Word labors with the Eternal on the Eternal, for eternity, more than the artist; but only when He who has contrived eternal Redemption, works upon him, and he does not resist Him.

STARKE:—Preachers are not lords of the faith, but servants of the church, who have to direct all their service to the edification of the church.—The gospel is indeed made known to all the world, but is known in its truth and power only by those, who let themselves be brought thereby to faith.—Christ is in His believers, and this is the greatest mystery.—If many a teacher did not inter-lard his discourses with uncertain stories, fables, figures and other things of human wisdom, they would sink deeper into the hearts of men.

RIEGER:—The joy of the Apostles amid their sufferings was a fruit of the sorrow of Jesus under His. In our sufferings there must often be revealed to us, amid fear and sorrow, the weakness of our flesh, but often also, amid great peace and conscious joy, the manifold power of God and His Spirit of glory. Both are wholesome. Let one force or affect nothing, but accept what and as God finds it necessary.—One must so serve the church, that the gospel be degraded in no respect; yet one must not, under the pretext of the gospel, lord it over the people, but be a helper of their joy.

GERLACH:—In a few significant words the Apostle here brings to our view the activity of a genuine preacher of the gospel; 1) he preaches the mystery of the grace of God in Christ; 2) he admonishes all sinners to repentance; 3) he instructs even the plainest, poorest, most ignorant men; 4) he seeks to guide all to perfection, will withhold the higher light and life from none, keep none in a lower grade, is never satisfied with himself, nor permits himself to be satisfied with the state of others; 5) is ever conscious that a life of labor, especially of conflict too, is allotted to him; and 6) in this life confides only in the power of God working in him mightily, which is promised him, and hence gives God the glory for all.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—He could compare his sufferings with the sufferings of Christ, because they too had their cause in the antagonism of men to the preaching, which Christ had begun, and because to him they also were a work of obedience. Now too there are more views of Redemption, more representations of the manner of the liberty of the Sons of God, and yet there is ever more to be revealed of this mystery.

HEUNER:—Suffering for atonement, Christ alone and fully bore; but suffering for our preservation and for the extension of the kingdom of Christ, every Christian must bear; since Christ has left a share to each.—The gospel sermon is a universal enlistment of souls for Christ. No man is too bad. Empty and hungry souls are led to Him, with Him to be satisfied and sanctified.

PASSAVANT:—"I do not fear the crowd of men, nor the angry outbreak of the world," wrote Matamoras, the Spanish martyr (November, 1862), from his prison in Granada; "as a Christian I have strength enough to lift myself above the raging torrent of earthly anger;—not through my own might, through my own powers, no, but through the strength our loving Father bestows upon me in Jesus; through Jesus, who is my Shield, an impenetrable shield, against which the whole world is weak."—Among the poor heathen of those times as of ours, could be seen only ignorance, hollow deceits, brilliant errors and lies; crying, devilish sins and proud vices raged among the refined Greeks and the proud men in all classes of the spoiled people. The light, or the uncertain, distorted ray of a former light, was limited to the narrow circle of nobler minds; the yet beautiful, rare fragments of the shattered truth remained a private possession of their pupils: the more lovely souls in every nation had only the uncertain legends of the poets as a solace: the priestly utterances, the arbitrary wisdom of the sage, as light on the path of life to death; many, perhaps very many sought salvation and peace at the dumb altar of "the unknown god."—The mystery since then has been made known to myriads of myriads; yet only the smaller part have comprehended it; to the saints alone has it been revealed in their hearts.—Without this "Christ in us" all hope beyond earth is but empty fancy, vanity and delusion; Christ among us and the clearness of His heavenly kingdom about us, only an unknown foreign land into which we have no desire to enter. Then our Christianity is but a borrowed, beautiful garment, which neither fits us nor hides our nakedness.

[SCHENKEL:—Ver. 24. The joy of the Christian in sorrow: 1) Its ground; 2) Its kind.—The blessing of persecution for the church of the Lord: 1) wherein it consists; 2) whereon it rests.—Ver 27. Christ lives among us: 1) A mystery to the unbeliever; 2) the comfort and joy of all believers.—Ver. 28. The task of the evangelical sermon: 1) as to its contents; to warn and to teach; 2) as to its form; "every man in all wisdom;" 3) as to its end; to "present every man perfect in Christ."—Ver. 29. The duty of the evangelical preacher: 1) wherein it consists—in labors and striving; 2) whereby its fulfilment becomes possible—through the help and power of Christ.—R.]

[BURKITT:—Such as are eminent in the church, and, as ministers of the gospel, do lay out themselves more abundantly in the church's service, must expect to meet with a measure, and a full measure of suffering beyond others.—Observe the subject, the manner, the end of St. Paul's preaching. Also his pains and diligence; the gracious help and blessed success he had, humbly and thankfully acknowledged, and ascribed to God.—R.]

[HENRY:—The preaching of redemption 1. to whom it was preached (ver. 23), 2. by whom it was preached. 1) Whence Paul had his ministry (ver. 26); 2) for whose sake he has his ministry (ver. 25); 3) what kind of a preacher Paul was; a suffering preacher (ver. 24), a close preacher (ver. 28), a laborious preacher (ver. 29). 3. The gospel which was preached (ver. 26, 27). 1) A mystery long hidden, 2) now made manifest to the saints.—The meanest saint under the gospel understands more than the greatest prophets under the law.—The ground of our hope is Christ in the word, or the gospel revelation, declaring the nature and methods of obtaining it. The evidence of our hope is Christ in the heart, or the sanctification of the soul and its preparation for the heavenly glory.—R.]

[EADIE:—In the Divine arrangement of the spiritual house, the Apostle held a function which had special reference to the members of the gentile churches. He would not be confined within the narrow circuit of Judaism; the field on which his soul set itself was the world.—The Apostle says of himself that he did not preach, but that he fulfilled the gospel. He carried out its design—he did not narrow its purpose—he opened for it a sweep and circuit adapted to its magnificence of aim, and its universality of fitness and sufficiency. As an instrument of human regeneration, he brought it to perfection.—The glory of Christians is yet to come, but it is certain. Such glory is too bright for earth, and is therefore to be enjoyed in a scene which shall be in harmony with it. Christ is the hope of this glory.—The process of sanctification begets at once the idea and the hope of perfection.—The apostolic preaching was precise and definite. The one theme was Christ, "Him first, Him last, Him midst." Not simply His doctrine, but Himself.—What in other spheres is enthusiasm, in the Christian ministry is sobriety.—The sublime motive to present every man perfect in Christ, through the preaching of Christ, could only be realized by the conferment of Divine qualification and assistance.—BARNES:—In such a work it is a privilege to exhaust our strength; in the performance of the duties of such an office, it is an honor to be permitted to wear out life itself. Doing this, a man when he comes to die will feel that he has not lived in vain.—R.]

4. Anxiety of the Apostle about their being led away by false wisdom.

1 For I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for¹ you and for them at 2 Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen² my face in the flesh; that their hearts might be comforted, being knit together³ in love, and unto all riches⁴ of the full assurance [lit., of the fullness of assurance] of understanding, to the acknowledgment [full knowledge] of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ 3 [or omit all after God],⁵ in whom [or which] are hid all the treasures of wisdom and 4 knowledge. And this I say, lest any man [that no one, μηδείς]⁶ should beguile you 5 with enticing words. For though I be absent in the flesh, yet I am with you in the spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the steadfastness [firm foundation]
 6 of your faith in Christ. As ye have therefore [or As then ye have] received Christ
 7 Jesus the Lord, so walk [walk] ye in him; rooted and built up in him, and established in the faith [or by faith],⁷ as ye have been taught, abounding therein⁸ with 8 thanksgiving. Beware lest any man spoil you [lit., lest there shall be any one that maketh you his booty]⁹ through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of 9 men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ. For [Because] in him
 10 dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. And ye are complete [made full, 11 πεπληρωμένοι] in him, which [who]¹⁰ is the head of all principality and power: in whom also ye are [ye also were] circumcised with the [a, article wanting] circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins [omit of the sins]¹¹ of 12 the flesh, by [in, ἐν] the circumcision of Christ; buried with him in baptism, wherein [or in whom]¹² also ye are risen with him [were raised] with him [or together] through the faith of [in] the operation of God, who hath raised him from 13 the dead. And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, [insert you]¹³ hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you [us]¹⁴ all 14 trespasses; blotting [having blotted] out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took [he has taken, ἔρκεν]¹⁵ it out of the 15 way, nailing [by nailing]¹⁵ it to his cross: and having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a shew of them openly [with boldness],¹⁷ triumphing over them in it.

² Ver. 1.—[Ἐώρακαν (an Alexandrian form of the perfect) is adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer and later English editors on the authority of N, A. B. C. and others.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 7.—Ἐν αὐτῇ is to be retained with B. [D.³ E. K. L. Tischendorf, ed. 7, Lachmann, Meyer, Ellicott, Wordsworth.—R.] It is wanting in N, but ἐν αὐτῇ is added by a later hand.

- * Ver. 8.—[The E. V. is too condensed. "You" is emphatic, the more so, as the correct reading seems to be τις ὑμᾶς ἔστας, B. K. L. Rec., Tischendorf, ed. 7, Meyer, Alford, Ellicott, Wordsworth. Not ἐστὰς ὑμᾶς, Lachmann, Braune apparently.—R.]
- ¹⁰ Ver. 10.—[Ος is the reading of κ. A. C. K. L., Rec. Tischendorf, Meyer and others. ὅ, B. D. E. F. G. Lachmann "Which." E. V., stands here for "who."—R.]
- ¹¹ Ver. 11.—[Τὸν ἀμαρτῶν of the Rec. is generally rejected as an explanatory gloss. Uncial authority very slight.—R.]
- ¹² Ver. 12.—[Εν ᾧ may mean "wherein" or "in whom." If the latter be adopted, read "risen together" instead of "with Him." See EXEG. NOTES;—βαπτισματα is to be retained with most authorities and editors, instead of βαπτισμῶ, Alford.—R.]
- ¹³ Ver. 13.—[Υμᾶς is to be retained with κ. [A. C. K. L., Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Ellicott, Wordsworth.—R.] B. has ἡμᾶς. Some [Rec. D. F.] omit both as unnecessary.]
- ¹⁴ Ver. 13.—[Υμῶν of the Rec. is not well supported, Wordsworth retains it; ἡμῶν. κ. A. B. C. D. F. K., Tischendorf and most modern writers. Ellicott says: "Both external and internal arguments suggest the more inclusive ἡμῶν."—R.]
- ¹⁵ Ver. 14.—[The perfect should be retained by rendering "hath taken," so Tynaele, Coverdale and other versions.—R.]
- ¹⁶ Ver. 14.—[By naming" preserves the modal force as well as the relation of time implied in προσηλώσας.—R.]
- ¹⁷ Ver. 15.—[This alteration is the only one required to make the English text harmonize with Braune's exegesis. The various renderings that are substituted for "spoiled," as well as the marginal reading of the E. V., "in him" for "in it," are discussed in the EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Winning exordium full of tender concern for the spiritual health of the Church. Vers. 1-3.*

Ver. 1. For I would that ye knew (1 Cor. xi. 3; Phil. i. 12; Rom. xi. 25).—"For" links this to the foregoing, and according to the context, to "striving" (i. 29); with good reason did he speak of conflicts in this Epistle, since he was anxious about the Colossians also.

What great conflict I have for you.—Ἠλίκον (only in Jas. iii. 5, where it is used twice of little fire and great wood), derived from ἡλξ (one of the same age, a companion), describes the manner, the vehemence and importance rather than the extent (MEYER and others), as πηλίκος (Gal. vi. 11 †)=qualibus. HESCHTUS: ποδάσπν, ὁποῖον. [ELICOTT: qualitative adjective.—R.] Ἀγῶνα ἐχω denotes the continuance of his anxiety. [EADIE: "intense and painful anxiety." Any reference to outward sufferings (ELICOTT) is very doubtful.—R.] Περὶ ὑμῶν indicates the readers as the object; what is more prominent in ἐπέρ, viz., for their benefit, is put in the back ground. And them at Laodicea adds a neighboring church in the same situation (see Introd. § 4.).

And as many as have not seen my face in the flesh.—On ἐώρακαν (see WINER'S Gram. p. 73). Ver. 2: αἰνῶν, requires us to understand this of persons belonging together and grouped together. It is improper to imply it either to those unknown to Paul in other places, in contrast with those in Colosse and Laodicea (THEODORET, SCHULTZ in Stud. und Krit., 1829, p. 135 sq.), Paul having been in both places, or to those Colossians and Laodiceans who remained unknown to him (ROHR, WIGGERS). Paul merely adds a category for his readers; they had not seen him. [ALFORD: καί is not copulative, but generalizing. See his remarks on the grammatical inference that Paul had not been at Colosse—so most modern editors.—WORDSWORTH is decided in favor of the other view, following THEODORET. The passage so naturally suggests the thought that Paul had not been there, as to require far stronger evidence than has yet been adduced to sustain any other view.—R.] He adds to πρόσωπόν μου (1 Thess. ii. 17; iii. 10) ἐν σαρκί, since the contrast between spiritual presence and lack of personal acquaintanceship (ver. 5) readily suggested this concrete strengthening (bodily face). The reason for it is not to be found in the spiritual physiognomy (OLSHAUSEN), nor is it to be joined with ἐώρακαν (CHRYSOSTOM and others). It marks rather, that the readers need not be surprised at the Apostle's concern, when they did not know each other, that he included all Christians, known and unknown, in his sympathy as brethren, than that the motive of his concern was the fact of his not having himself founded and instructed this Church (SCHENKEL), or his having only an uncertain idea of it (BLEEK). BENDEL: Paulus se omnium gentium debitorum statuit.

Ver. 2. That their hearts might be comforted.—This is the purpose of the conflict (ἔνα). The verb means accurately, "to call upon," then "to admonish" (Phil. iv. 2), "to entreat" (Philem. 10), [rendered "beseech" in both cases in E. V.—R.], "to comfort" (2 Cor. i. 4), so that trust, confidence, strength is there, not doubt, uncertainty, wavering (iv. 8; Eph. vi. 22); hence also "to strengthen, confirm" (Jas. iv. 3; Isa. xxxv. 3). [ALFORD insists that the idea of confirming predominates here. But MEYER, EADIE, ELICOTT agree in upholding the usual meaning.—R.] The Apostle regards the danger from false teachers as misfortune, affliction (CHRYSOSTOM: ὅτε κατηγοριῶν ὅτε ἀπαλλάττων αὐτοῖς κατηγορίας). This comfort and tranquillity should first affect the heart, the centre.—Being knit together in love.—Συμβιβασθέντες according to the sense, as though it were αἰροί, iii. 16; Eph. iv. 2, 3, WINER'S Gram. p. 532. On the meaning, comp. ii. 19; Eph. iv. 16. The participle denotes the way, the mode of the comfort; union in love according to the context: in amore fidelium mutuo, brotherly love, as the ethical element (MEYER) in which the "knitting together" was consummated. The Vulgate (instructi) is incorrect, and LUTHER also: comprehended (coördinate to "comforted").

And unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the full knowledge of the mystery of God [even Christ

* [From the construction of this Exordium I venture to assert that there is no rule laid down by Aristotle, Cicero, and other masters of eloquence, concerning the framing of introductions, which is not adhered to in this brief opening. For three things are required of them in a legitimate Exordium: That it be adapted to render the hearer attentive, and docile, and to conciliate his affection." DAVENANT.—R.]

† [The meaning of πηλίκος (Gal. vi. 11) has been much discussed. See in loc. It is very doubtful whether qualibus is strictly correct.—R.]

ELLCOTT. God Christ, WORDSWORTH.—R.]—Kai joins coordinately the end (εἰς) of the union, and in a two-fold direction; formally and quantitatively, “all riches of the fulness of assurance of understanding,” materially and qualitatively, “to the full knowledge of the mystery of God.” It is not sufficient to maintain, to know individual matters, the understanding must extend to the whole, in its fulness, and must attain to knowledge of the mystery. Comp. i. 9; Eph. iii. 18; in fellowship we advance to full knowledge.—On πληροφορία, see 1 Thess. i. 5; Heb. vi. 11; x. 22; it denotes full conviction, excludes incompleteness, includes joyous self-certainty. [EADIE: “the fixed persuasion that you comprehend the truth, and that it is the truth which you comprehend.” What is commonly termed “assurance of knowledge,” rather than “assurance of faith.”—R.]—On “the mystery of God” see Eph. i. 9. If Χριστοῦ is inserted, this could not be regarded as dependent on θεοῦ (against HUTHER, MEYER, SCHENKEL), since the article is wanting, and every clear ground for it in the text, but only as in apposition to θεοῦ, so that Christ is called God, a singularity which is not Pauline, notwithstanding Rom. ix. 5; Eph. v. 5; Tit. ii. 13 (against STEIGER)—nor is it in apposition to μυστηρίου, as a gloss indicates. [Rejecting the reading of the Rec. as untenable, but one other than the shortest, has a claim upon our attention, the one referred to above: τοῦ θεοῦ Χριστοῦ. BRAUNE refers to the three interpretations suggested. The first: the “mystery of the God of Christ,” is harsh, as well as open to the grammatical objection he urges. The second is defended by WORDSWORTH, following HILARY: “the mystery of the God Christ,” i. e. the mystery of the Divine nature of the Man Christ Jesus. His notes are worthy of attention. The third, making Χριστοῦ in apposition with μυστηρίου seems far preferable: “the mystery of God, even Christ.”—It is well supported by ELLCOTT, and the gloss above referred to (ὁ ἔστιν Χριστός), is not without weight in determining the reading and the interpretation. Even MEYER, in adopting the interpretation “the mystery of the God of Christ,” says: In Christ God has comprehended and consummated the decree of Redemption (the μυστήριον). To him who has acknowledged God as the God of Christ, the divine mystery is thereby revealed.” Of course the meaning of μυστήριον is widely extended by taking Ellicott's view. It includes not simply the mystery of the Incarnation, but also of Redemption as involved in the Incarnation. The next verse can certainly be interpreted more readily, if this view be accepted.—R.]

Ver. 3. In which—Εν ᾧ refers to μυστηρίου. [E. V., “in whom”]—(with the marginal reading “wherein”) refers it to Christ. If Χριστοῦ is retained above, and then taken in apposition to μυστηρίου, the meaning is the same. Unless the reference be to Christ in some direct way, it seems scarcely likely that Paul would say that in it were “hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.” So wide a predicate is best applied to Christ.—R.]—Are.—Εἰσὶν stands first for emphasis, to lay stress upon the fact that in God all mysteries are actually present.—

All the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, πάντες οἱ θησαυροὶ τῆς σοφίας καὶ τῆς γνώσεως.—Σοφία is the practical wisdom, to which every Christian attains, γνῶσις is the dialectic science, which is found only in a mentally gifted and cultivated Christian. [Σοφία, the more general, γνῶσις, the more special, MEYER, EADIE, ALFORD, ELLCOTT.—R.] CALVIN is incorrect: duplicitio ad augendum valet. BENDEL: θησαυροί, hinc plūtos, σοφία hinc σύνεσις, γνώσις hinc ἐπίγνωσις. Hence the mystery must needs be revealed for the treasures are hid, ἀπόκρυφοί, in it. The adjective is a closer definition of the existence of the treasures in the mystery, and not a description of the treasures in themselves, therefore not an attributive joined to θησαυροί (BENDEL, MEYER, SCHENKEL). [ALFORD depends most fully the interpretation: “the secret treasures.” EADIE upholds the view not noticed by Braune, that the treasures are “laid up.” ELLCOTT, whose notes here are valuable, makes it a “secondary predicate of manner,” i. e., the treasures, etc., are in the mystery or in Christ, they are so suddenly; until revealed and made the object of “full knowledge” as above (ver. 2). This recognizes the emphatic position of the verb, takes the adjective in its natural meaning, and accords better with the context. It seems to be BRAUNE'S view. DAVIES refers to the gnostical stamp of the terms in this verse. There is probably an allusion to the false doctrine at Colosse.—R.] The church did not need another system of doctrine, only more profound exposition.*

Brief sketch of the Situation. Vers. 4, 5.

Ver. 4. And this I say, refer to vers. 1–3, not to ver. 3 alone (EKKHSEN, CALVIN, BAHR and others). In ver. 5 he proves his λέγω by his sympathy. The danger which environs his readers, on account of which he cannot be silent, corresponds with his inward conflict about and for them: that no one should beguile you.—The verb (παράλογίζηται, only here and Jas. i. 22) denotes, through παρα, as in παραβαίνω, παράδοξος, a deviation, violation, of the λόγος, the λογίζεσθαι, to miscalculate, to be deceived through sophisms (PASSOW, sub voce).

With enticing words, ἐν πιθανολογίᾳ denotes especially the danger. Πιθανός means “adapted to convince, persuading,” like πειθός, and λογία denotes the mode in which this skill appears, viz.: in speech; it is stronger than ἐν πειθοῖς σοφίας λόγος (1 Cor. ii. 4); it is found here only and in malam partem. LUTHER is incorrect—“with rational speech.” The formal side of the false doctrine, the sophistical, rhetorical, insinuating method is noted, there is nothing from which the purport of the false doctrine can be inferred. [ELLCOTT: “the preposition ἐν has that species of instrumental force, in which the object is conceived as existing in the means,” rather than indicating merely “the element in which the deceit works” (ALFORD).—R.]

Ver. 6. For though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit.—Comp. 1 Cor. iii. 5. External, bodily absence, and spiritual presence, strongly marked by σὺν ὑμῖν, are here contrasted. There is no hint

* [In view of the errors which assailed them, the verse implies that they needed to know, “not more than Christ, but more of Christ.”—R.]

here of a previous presence at Colosse (WIGGERS, Stud. und Krit. 1838, p. 181). [Nor does ἐν πνεύματι refer to the Holy Spirit, even secondarily (DAVENANT).—R.] There is no proof here of the danger of enticement to which the Colossians were exposed, nor of the greatness of the Apostle's anxiety, though these are involved. This proof lies in what follows; a description of the possessions endangered through the dangerous false teachers: joying and beholding your order and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ.—"Joying and beholding" describe the mode of Paul's presence. The joy is emphasized by the position, in order to point to the noble possessions which it concerns: his joy on this account enchains him, so that he stands there as a spectator. The representations made by Epaphras were sufficient to bring him into this attitude, although he was then unknown and absent. The object of the "joying and beholding" is, first, "your order;" its opposite is ἀταξία. It is the external appearance of the Church in good order—fixed, orderly deportment (1 Cor. xiv. 40); ἡσυχία, placed first, indicates the contrast with the false teachers, who disturb such order. Secondly, "and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ," describes sharply and definitely the internal state of the Church. Στερέωμα, firmamentum, like τάξις, is a military word, a fortification into and upon which they could and should fall back; perhaps suggested by ἀγών (ver. 1). 1 Pet. v. 9: στερεῖ τῇ πίστει is similar. It is incorrect to regard the participles as a hendiadys: cum gaudeo videns (BENGEL), or gaudeo videns (GROTIUS), nor is καί causal: quia video (CALVIN), nor explicative: to wit (WINER's Gram. p. 438), nor can the order of words be called illogical. Neither should another object than that of βλέπων be given to χαίρων: his spiritual presence with the readers (MEYER, SCHENKEL), or about you (WINER), [apparently ELLICOTT, see ALFORD also.—R.] Στερέωμα is not στερεότης (HUTHER and others). [ALFORD: not any abstract quality, but as all nouns in -ια, the concrete product of the abstract quality.—R.] Finally we cannot limit this to a part of the Church (FLATT) which was unseduced, or apply it to the whole, hypothetically, were this the case (BAUMGARTEN-ORSIUS). [ELLICOTT: "after these words we have no reason for doubting that the church at Colosse—was substantially sound in the faith."—R.]

Admonition to fidelity in walk, vers. 6, 7.

Ver. 6. As then ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord.—The emphasis rests upon ὡς: on which account καθώς is repeated (ver. 7). "Ye have been taught" there corresponds to "ye have received" here. Comp. ver. 8: κατὰ τὴν παράδοσιν; Eph. iv. 20: ἐμάθετε; 1 Thess. ii. 13: παλαβίζοντες—ἐδίδασθε. It is not then: have accepted [angenommen habt] (LUTHER and others); it refers to correct instruction. "Christ Jesus the Lord" [lit., the Christ, Jesus the Lord.—R.] sets forth the object, and "the summary of the whole confession" (MEYER), giving stronger prominence to the Person. "The Lord" marks, in apposition, what Jesus is for us, whom Paul had named "the Christ" over against God: τὸν κύριον is not to be interpreted, ut dominum (BENGEL and others). [ELLICOTT well remarks:

"Though the reference seems mainly to reception by teaching, the object is so emphatically specified, as apparently to require a more inclusive meaning; they received not merely the doctrinam Christi, but Christ Himself, in Himself the sum and substance of all teaching"—R.] From the favorable state of the Christian cause, the Apostle deduces (οὖν), according to the received instruction, the obligation: walk in him!—Ἐν αὐτῷ standing first, is emphasized; He is the Life-element. "Walk" includes in agreement, external and internal mode and conduct of life. "In Him" is still further explained by

Ver. 7. Rooted and built up, ἐρριζωμένοι καὶ ἐκοικοδομουμένοι, [lit. "having been rooted and being built up."—R.]—The perfect denotes a concluded and still efficient fact,—the present, a continuing state, a process of becoming, a progressing development; hence it is not ἐκοικοδομηθέντες (Eph. ii. 20) or τετελειωμένοι (Eph. iii. 18). BENGEL: præteritum pro initio, præsens etiam in progressu. The figures are different, yet related. Lucian de saltat., 34: ρίζαι καὶ θεμέλιοι. Comp. Eph. iii. 18. Thus the readers are more closely characterized in their relation to Christ, and obligated to Christian walk. [The mixed figures mark "the stable growth and organic solidity of those who truly walk in Christ." "The accessory idea of the foundation is admirably conveyed by the ἐν in the compound verb" (ELLICOTT).—R.] SCHENKEL is incorrect in beginning a new sentence here, because the participles do not correspond with "walk."—In him, is of course to be joined with both participles according to the figure. Christ is first regarded as the soil, and then as the corner stone, [foundation.—R.]; but not as the bond of the root-fibres and the parts of the building (SCHENKEL).

And established by faith—To the objective ground of life, the subjective element is thus added. Βεβαιούμενοι, also in the present, denotes a progressing development, the means of which is indicated by τῇ πίστει: the Christian is fortified by means of appropriating faith; it is almost διὰ τῆς πίστεως (THEOPHYLACT), and not the dative of reference: "as to the faith" (DE WETTE). [The former view is that of MEYER, and EADIE, if ἐν be omitted. ALFORD and ELLICOTT, rejecting ἐν, adopt the latter view. If ἐν αὐτῇ, below, be retained, "faith" must be considered subjective, a view which is preferable on other grounds.—R.] As ye have been taught.—Καθώς connects with τῇ πίστει, and ἐδιδάχθητε reminds of Epaphras (i. 7).—Abounding therein with thanksgiving, is subordinate to "established," in order to denote the tone in which the "becoming established" acts upon the extension and enlargement of the measure of faith. [ELLICOTT: "mainly reiterating with a quantitative, what had previously been expressed with a qualitative reference.—R.] Hence περισσεύοντες ἐν αὐτῇ is abundantes ea, i. e., fide (Phil. i. 9; Rom. xv. 13; 2 Cor. viii. 7), which is felt to be a privilege, a great gift; ἐν εὐχαριστίᾳ—ὡς ἐν εὐχαριστίᾳ (EKUMEN). [ALFORD: "the field of operation in which that abundance is manifested." ELLICOTT more accurately distinguishes: "the accompaniment with which περισσ. ἐν πίστει was associated and as it were, envired."—R.] LUTHER incorrectly joins (reichlich dankbar) "abundantly thankful:" the position of the words and the context, which treats of faith, are against this.

Ver. 8. Take heed lest there shall be any one that maketh you his booty.—The future indicative (ἔσται) denotes an impending danger, whose entrance is feared as certain. (Heb. iii. 12; comp. Luke xi. 35; Gal. iv. 11. WINER'S Gram. p. 469.) Ἵμᾶς ἔσται ὁ συλαγωγῶν is not=συλαγῶν: it marks the continuance of this state; it is not simply that one or another one deceives them, but there is one or another there, who in character and action is a deceiver, ever misleads others. WINER'S Gram. p. 326. Ἵμᾶς, emphatically placed, makes perceptible the advantages described in ver. 4, which they have above others [as well as indicating that they themselves were the booty to be carried away.—R.] The verb, occurring only here in New Testament, means prædam abigere (BENGEL: qui non de vobis, sed vos ipsos spoliari faciat): they themselves were made a spoil, lost to the Lord. LUTHER is incorrect; who may rob you; and the Vulgate (decipiat).

Through philosophy and vain deceit.—The means employed by the seducers. Since the preposition and article are not repeated, one means, a variety is here presented. BENGEL: quod adversarii jactabant esse philosophiam et sapientiam, id Paulus inanem fraudem esse dicit. [Not "philosophy" in general, but what they called such, which was "vain deceit."—R.] In distinction from "enticing words," ver. 4, "philosophy" refers to the substance, the thought and doctrine (against THEODORET, CALVIN and others); in distinction from σύνεσις, ἐπίγνωσις, ἐπιστήμη (against TITTMANN), to a system; according to the state of the Church and the context, an Oriental, and according to vers. 11, 16, 18, somewhat Judaistic system, although the future (ἔσται) may point to one just arising. It is not to be regarded as Hellenic philosophy (TERTULLIAN), nor more particularly as Epicurean (CLEMENS ALEX.), or as Platonic and Stoic (HEUMANN), or Pythagorean (GROTIUS): nor yet as Gnosticism or Kabbalism (BRUCKER) whose germs were just discernible. Philo had already called the Jewish religion τὴν πατρὶον φιλοσοφίαν, and Josephus speaks of the three doctrinal systems of the Essenes, Sadducees and Pharisees, as τρεῖς φιλοσοφίας; yet it is by no means equivalent on this account to cultus divinus (HEINRICH). Paul does not mean philosophy in itself (CALIXTUS: si dicam, vide, ne decipiat vinum, nec vinum damno, nec usum ejus accuso, sed de vitando abusu moneo), but a certain Judaistic-oriental one (MEYER)* which was in itself "vain deceit."

* [MEYER remarks: "This φιλοσοφία is not philosophy in itself and in general, however much it had, in its decay and according to its manifestation in that age, proven itself to the Apostle as folly in comparison with the wisdom of the gospel, but the definite speculation, known to his readers, which obtained in Colosse and that region, and which consisted of gnostic theosophy blended with Judaism (Essenism), designated by the name philosophy, on account of its ontological character, and in general, irrespective of its relation to the truth rightly so called; but perhaps put forward also by the false teachers themselves under this designation, which is the more probable, since Paul uses the word only in this passage." So EADIE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT substantially.—R.]

Eph. v. 6. On this account the Apostle characterizes it more closely:

After the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world.—Emphatically asyndetic, with the preposition repeated; co-ordinate clauses, which are to be joined, not with the verb, but with what immediately precedes. The first: κατὰ τὴν παράδοσιν τῶν ἀνθρώπων marks the origin as purely human in contrast with the revelation from God (BENGEL: antitheton, deitatis). The other: κατὰ τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου marks the substance (BENGEL: antitheton, corporali, ver. 9). Τὰ στοιχεῖα, used in a physical sense 2 Pet. iii. 10, 12, is here, as in ver. 20; Gal. iv. 3, 9; Heb. v. 12, used in a spiritual, didactic sense; beginnings in education, the A B C of knowledge, upon which childish thoughts the Christian as a man looks down (1 Cor. xiii. 11). It is incorrect to interpret: principles of the moral life in the world (LUTHER); precepts of the world (LUTHER); rudimenta legis ritualia is too limited (SCHAUBACH: Commentatio, qua exponitur quid sit. τ. κοσ. in N. T. sibi velit). Comp. on ver. 20. [WORDSWORTH'S interpretation, following that of the Fathers, is curious: "The physical elements, such as the Sun and Moon, regulating times and seasons; and according to superstitious observances of times, Fasts, New Moons, and Seventh Day Sabbaths ordered thereby, as if they were of the same importance as articles of faith, and equally necessary to salvation." ELLICOTT'S view is to be preferred: "all rudimental religious teaching of non-Christian character, whether heathen or Jewish or a commixture of both,—the first element possibly slightly predominating in thought here, the second in ver. 20." Whether the immediate reference be to Judaistic errors or not, the phrase must not be limited to Jewish worship (EADIE) or ritualistic observances (ALFORD), for the Apostle is not describing the things themselves, but giving the category (κατὰ) to which they belong. A careful investigation of his use of the phrase will not justify any such limitation. Comp. Galatians, pp. 96, 105.—R.] And not after Christ.—Sharply conclusive, comprehensive negative. Comp. Eph. i. 21; 2 Cor. v. 17. Incorrect: after the doctrine of Christ (ERASMUS and others). [MEYER: "The activity of this συναγωγὴν does not have Christ as its objective norm." EADIE: "True Christian science has Him for its centre and Him for its object." On the whole verse the notes of WORDSWORTH are very full and interesting as grouping the patristic authorities respecting the angel-worship of the early heretics.—R.]

Praise of the glory of Christ and His work. Vers. 9–15.

Ver. 9. Because in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.—Ὁτι confirms the warning against a doctrine which does not have its norm in Christ, supposing it can transcend Him and yet not attaining to Him. By "in Him dwelleth" (κατοικεῖ νοὶ κατέκρησε) Jesus, whose importance is to be portrayed, is described as a habitation, whose value rests upon what is at home there. ["In him" is emphatic, in him and in none other than him (ELLICOTT).—R.] This is then "all the fulness of the Godhead" (i. 19; comp. Rom. xv. 29; xi. 25). Θεότης must be distinguished from θεϊότης (Rom. i. 20); the former, vocabulum abstractum significantissimum (BENGLER), means Deitas, Godhead [das Gottsein], the Divine Essence; the latter, Divinitas, Divinity [Göttlichkeit], the Divine Quality; what is here viewed metaphysically is regarded in i. 19, charismatically (MEYER). Θεότης is not to be understood as meaning God's will (the SOCINIANS), Divine grace and gift (SCHLEIERMACHER), nor does "all the fulness of the Godhead" refer to the Christian Church (HEINRICH, SCHENKEL and others). Σωματικῶς, placed last for emphasis, limits "dwelleth," which refers, in the present, to the permanent state of the present and exalted Christ, founded (i. 15) upon His nature, and is to be regarded, in contrast with "rudiments of the world" (ver. 8), and "shadows" (ver. 17), as indicating the full nature of the matter, and from the relation of οἶκος and σῶμα (2 Cor. v. 1 sq.) with a reference to the Incarnation (HOFFMANN, Schriftbew. II. pp. 27 sq. 533; SCHMID, Bibl. Theologie, 2, p. 301). Hence it is neither—οὐσιωδὸς (CYRIL, STEIGER, LUTHER), since there is no contrast between οὐσία in Christ and ἐνέργεια in the prophets, nor—ἐν τῷ σώματι, whether this be referred to the Church (SCHENKEL) or to the body, which He assumed of the Virgin, that is now glorified (MEYER): before the Incarnation He was ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ (Phil. ii. 6). Beyond Christ there is no eternal truth; beyond Him is away from Him. [WORDSWORTH interprets: 1, substantially and truly (Hilary); 2, bodily, in distinction from "soul" (Council of Antioch),—quoting Augustine, who combines both views. But the literal interpretation is far preferable: "in bodily fashion" (ELLICOTT). "Before His Incarnation the fulness dwelt in Him, as the λόγος ἄσαρκος, but not σωματικῶς, as now that He is the λόγος ἐσαρκος" (ALFORD). If this be the correct view, then with MEYER we must regard the present, κατοικεῖ, as referring the whole expression to the glorified Christ. He also finds an apologetic design in the emphasis given to the adverb, "bodily," since the false teachers, "by their doctrine of angels (comp. ver. 10), appear to have spiritualistically split up the πλήρωμα τῆς θεότητος."—R.]

Ver. 10. And ye are made full in him.—[Perhaps to bring out the double predication involved in the position of the words, it were better to render: "And ye (being) in Him are made full."—R.] Καὶ is a simple copulative, making the clause depend upon ὅτι. Ἐστὲ (not γίνεσθε) standing first is pregnant: "ye are," need not first become so; the "being" is more strongly marked than the subject, in contrast to Christ; hence ὑμεῖς is not expressed. It is not the imperative (GROTIUS and others): Beneficium Christi, non nostrum officium (CALOV.). But only in Him are they πεπληρωμένοι. ERASMUS: Christo cum sita semel insiti; BENGLER: ipse plenus, nos replete. LUTHER is incorrect: vollkommen. [E. V. also—"complete." EADIE's translation is given above; ALFORD: "filled up;" ELLICOTT, as above, also "filled full,"—Rhemish, "in Him replenished."—R.] The perfect excludes the further effect of the fact. Neither τῆς θεότητος (THEOPHYLACT and others) nor sapientia et virtute (BENGLER) is to be supplied; the first is not indicated by the text, which does not read καὶ ὑμεῖς, nor the second by the context. Divine Truth, Power, Life are treated of. Comp. Eph. iii. 19; Jno. i. 16.—[MEYER: "Out of the 'fulness of the Godhead' which dwells in Christ, flows the being made full of the Christian, which therefore has its ground in none other than Christ and in nothing else than fellowship with Him. Filled with what? The answer is self-evident to the consciousness of the reader. It is the charismatic πλήρωσις, which Christians in virtue of their vital union with the Lord have received and continually possess, out of the metaphysical πλήρωμα dwelling in Christ, out of the 'fulness of the Godhead.'"—R.]

Who is the head of all principality and power.—This affirms the absolute dignity of Christ over against the angelic world (ver. 18). Comp. i. 18. In Him they may, must have enough.

Ver. 11. In whom ye also were circumcised.—[Καὶ, "also," emphasizes the fact stated by the verb, which is a historical aorist: hence "were" not "are" (E. V.).—R.] The reference is to their entrance into Christianity, to conversion, regeneration in Christ. The Christian is circumcised, not indeed as the Judaistic teachers required, with the Jewish circumcision, but: with a circumcision made without hands. περιτομὴ ἀχειροποιήτω ["not hand-wrought," ELLICOTT.—R.]—The Jewish external rite was χειροποίητος (Eph. ii. 11). Comp. Rom. ii. 28, 29; Deut. x. 16; xxx. 6; Jer. ix. 26; Ezek. xlv. 7; Acts vii. 51. He then sets forth, wherein this spiritual circumcision of the heart, which is better than the Jewish, consists: in the putting off the body of the flesh, in the circumcision of Christ.—[The E. V. not only retains "of the sins," but is faulty in punctuation; the second ἐν also it renders "by," when it is parallel to the first.—R.] The first clause is in contrast with the externality, the second with the "hand" that performs it; according to the former this circumcision is a moral advance, according to the latter an act of Christ. "In the putting off the body of the flesh" describes the body on which it takes place, as belonging to the flesh (σάρξ), entirely corresponding with the context, and parallel to "the body of sin" (Rom. vi. 6), which lives in the flesh, so that it is not indifferent (see Eph. ii. 3). The material, earthly body is not spoken of here, as in i. 22, but the sinfully sensuous organism, "the old man" (Rom. vii. 14). The substantive ἀπὸκόσμιος (only here) is emphatic and in contrast with the circumcision, which severs only a small part. It is joined with τὸ ὄψωμα, which naturally neither means, massa, totality (CALVIN and others), nor refers to Christ's body and His death (SCHNECKENBURGER), since αὐτοῦ is wanting. LUTHER, retaining τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, renders incorrectly: "the sinful body in the flesh."—"In the circumcision of Christ" presents nothing new or important, except in the genitive, which denotes the author (THEODORET: αὐτοῦ) of the circumcision. [ELLICOTT: "the originating cause; Christ by union with Himself brings about the circumcision and imparts it to believers."—R.] It is incorrect to apply it to the circumcision to which Christ was subjected (SCHÖRTGEN), or to view Christ only as the Mediator of it (MEYER). Nor should we on account of ἀχειροποιήτου apply it to baptism (STORR [ALFORD apparently], and others).

Ver. 12. Buried with him in baptism.—The participle συνταφέντες, following περιμήθητε (ver. 11), denotes the progress of the entrance of conversion. "Putting off the body" reminded of death; "being buried" was readily suggested. Ἀντὶ, governed by σὺν in composition, denotes the fellowship with Christ, which is consummated "in baptism," that is a water bath and a water grave for the "old man." Comp. Rom. vi. 3, 4. We live Christ's life, with and through Him, symbolically, ethically, spiritually, but actually and really. ["Burial implies a previous death." "The reality of death is evinced by burial." "This point of burial they had reached—when they were baptized—for then they personally professed a faith which implied the death of sin within them" (EADIE). The reference to burial in connexion with baptism, suggests, that death to sin had already taken place, hence this ordinance has not in itself any efficacy "in the putting off the body of the flesh." There is no doubt that the participle describes an action nearly contemporaneous with that of the preceding verb. This rite would speedily follow the "putting off;" though ALFORD is scarcely correct: "the new life being begun at baptism."—Braune admits, as must be done, an allusion to immersion in baptism, but enters into no discussion as to the mode; the question is not deemed so important in Germany as it has been made here. EADIE says: "Whatever may be otherwise said in favor of immersion, it is plain that here the burial is wholly ideal.—Believers are buried in baptism, but even in immersion they do not go through a process having any resemblance to the burial and resurrection of Christ." ALFORD correctly admits an allusion to the κατάνοις and ἀνάνοις in baptism, but adds, "To maintain from such a circumstance that immersion is necessary in baptism, is surely the merest trifling, and a resuscitation of the very ceremonial spirit which the Apostle here is arguing against." A fair exegesis must allow that the passage proves immersion to be baptism; whether baptism is immersion turns on something else than exegesis; see controversial works on both sides of the question. A list will be found. LANGE'S Com. Matthew, p. 560.—R.]

In whom ye were also raised together through the faith.—[So Braune renders. The aorist συννηγέρθητε, must be rendered "were raised." Whether raised "together" or "with Him," depends upon the reference in ἐν ᾧ: in baptism or in Christ.—R.] Ἐν ᾧ is parallel to ἐν ᾧ (ver. 11), and refers like ὅς (ver. 10) to Christ and not to baptism; καὶ συννηγέρθητε does not confirm the latter reference, but requires the former, since καὶ renders prominent an advance from the "burial" in immersion at baptism—the new life would not enter with the immersion but with the emersion, and we should find ἐξ οὗ or δι' οὗ [i. e., were the reference to baptism.—R.]. The fellowship with the life of Christ ("raised together") rests upon union with His Person: (ἐν ᾧ). [So DAVENANT, MEYER, EADIE. For the other view, see ALFORD and ELLICOTT in loco.—R.] Hence there is no pleonasm here (DE WETTE), nor any reference to the resurrection of the body, which is an ideal possession before the parousia, but becomes a reality with it (MEYER), the Greek Fathers: καὶ γὰρ ἐξηγέρμεθα τῇ δυνάμει, εἰ καὶ μὴ τῇ ἐνεργείᾳ). Συννηγέρθητε denotes an accomplished fact, corresponding with that accomplished in baptism, and like this, actual, but according to the context, spiritual, ethical. After the negative side of dying to sin, the positive side of a new life is set forth, prominence being given to the subjective appropriation, διὰ τῆς πίστεως, hinted at already in ἐν ᾧ. BENDEL is excellent: ut mors est ante resurrectionem, sic baptismus natura precedit fidem adultam. The genitive depending on πίστεως: of the operation of God, can only set forth the object, since only this (Eph. iii. 12; Phil. i. 27; iii. 9; Rom. iii. 22; Gal. ii. 16, 20; iii. 22), or the believing subject (ver. 5; i. 4; 1 Thess. i. 3, iii. 2) is denoted by the genitive. [ELLICOTT, while taking this as the genitive objecti, considers the statement of MEYER, referred to above, and endorsed by EADIE and ALFORD, as not perfectly certain.—R.] LUTHER is incorrect: "which God works."

God is then characterized: who hath raised him from the dead, because the syllogism runs: Has God raised Christ, then can He also bring me to new life (comp. Eph. i. 19, 20). It is precisely through faith in such an "operation of God," that this is experienced.

Ver. 13. And you being dead in your sins.—["When you were dead," ELLICOTT.—R.] See on Eph. ii. 1-5. Here the "being dead" is more strongly marked, than the "being;" there the simple dative marks the cause of this condition, here the results manifesting the condition are added; there inward motions (ἀμαρτία) are added to outward transgressions (παράπτωματα), here is added: and the uncircumcision of your flesh (the preposition "in" is supplied in thought).—This means the uncradicated, sensuous, sinful nature which marked the heathen. "Uncircumcision" according to the context is ethical, spiritual (Deut. x. 16; Jere. iv. 4), and is more closely characterized by the genitive. This is exegetical, σὰρξ being used, as in ver. 11, in the ethical sense, so that the carnal nature is regarded as their uncircumcision (BLEEK). BENDEL: exquisita appellatio peccati originalis. MEYER is incorrect in taking νέκρως and ἀκροβυστία literally, and σὰρξ as indifferent. [MEYER seems to place the moral significance in τῆς σαρκός, hence ἀκροβυστία, which is their state still, is now indifferent (ALFORD). This gives to ἀκροβ. its literal meaning. EADIE takes the whole phrase literally: "Uncircumcision of the flesh was the physical mark of a heathen state." ELLICOTT gives a slight ethical force to σαρκός, which he considers a possessive genitive—they were heathens, unconverted heathens as their very bodies could attest. Braune's view seems more in accordance with the context.—R.]

You hath he quickened together with him, συνεζωποίησεν ὑμᾶς σὺν αὐτῷ. See on Eph. iii. 5. Ὑμᾶς [omitted in Rec.; "you" to be inserted in E. V.—R.] and σὺν ["together with"—R.] are repeated as an emphatic reminder to the readers. MEYER incorrectly takes the verb in its literal sense [doubtless to correspond with his interpretation of the preceding context.—R.], and HEINRICH makes Christ the subject, when the context requires "God," quite as much as it refers to the new spiritual life beginning with regeneration, which is eternal life to be perfected at the resurrection. [ELLCOTT also makes "Christ" the subject, rendering "with Himself." His interpretation of the whole passage is modified by this view, which he ably defends; see his notes in loco, which are highly suggestive. Still the predicates throughout are better applied to God; those in this verse, "quickened" and "forgiven," being so generally ascribed to God, that the burden of proof rests with those who take the other view. As they have not succeeded in showing a preponderance of reasons in its favor, it is safer to consider "God" the subject (comp. MEYER).—R.]

The mode of the life is described; having forgiven us all trespasses, χαρισάμενος ἡμῖν πάντα τὰ παραπτώματα (CHRYSTOM: ἡ τὴν νεκρότητα ποιεῖ).—The objective act of reconciliation and justification is referred to, and its universal efficacy denoted by "us" [not "you," the Colossians merely, but all believers.—R.] At the same time the connection between the new life beginning with pardon and justification, and the propitiation of the wrath of God and reconciliation of man with Him is hinted at. BENIGL: cum hac liberatione a peccato conjuncta est liberatio ab opprobrio peccati (ver. 14) et liberatio a potestate tenebrarum (ver. 15).

Ver. 14. Having blotted out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us.—"Having blotted out" (ἐξάλειψας), joined like the preceding participle to "quickened together," is contemporaneous,* and describes significantly the act of Divine grace. The verb (here and Acts iii. 19; Rev. iii. 5; vii. 17; xxi. 4) means to wash out, then to obliterate. "The handwriting against us" is the law obligating us and proving our debt, witnessing against us, a bond [Schulddokument], (Job v. 3; ix. 5). It means God's law among Gentiles and Jews (Rom. ii. 14, 15), not the Mosaic law merely (MEYER); hence we cannot here distinguish between the moral and ceremonial law, and refer this exclusively to the former (LUTHER), or to the latter only (CALVIN), which is also a moral affair, and affects the conscience. "All trespasses" are here treated of [hence "the whole law" DAVENANT, ELLCOTT.—R.], and Christ's death for the Gentiles also, indeed here with special reference to them. The dative τοῖς δόγμασιν (see Eph. ii. 15; ἐν δόγμασιν) denotes the contents of the handwriting, written with well-known commandments (MEYER), as Gal. vi. 11. This is explained by the adjectival and verbal character of the word χειρόγραφον. [The verbal element governing the dative. MEYER would make the dative instrumental; ELLCOTT makes it the dative with reference to, that in which the hostile aspect was specially evinced," objecting decidedly to the government by the verbal element. EADIE and ALFORD agree with Braune: "The simple dative of form, that distinctive and well known form which the handwriting assumed.—R.] The dative is not—consisting in commandments, (CALVIN), nor instead of the genitive (CASTELLIO), nor to be joined to καθ' ἡμῶν (CALOV.), nor connected with both the preceding expressions (WINER's Gram., p. 206); as little does it belong to "having blotted out" in the sense; with reference to ordinances (STEIGER, HARLESS on Eph. i. 1), or through the gospel doctrine of faith (the Greek fathers). SCHENKEL joins it with what follows appealing to Acts i. 22: διὰ πνεύματος ἁγίου οὓς ἐξελέξατο, and BLEEK also without sufficient grounds.

Which was contrary to us.—This relative clause is only an emphatic repetition of καθ' ἡμῶν (MEYER), and not to be distinguished from it as is done by BENIGL: contra esse et inimicum esse differunt, sicut status belli et ipsa pugna. [ELLCOTT: "an expansion of the preceding: it was hostile not merely in its direction and aspects, but practically and definitely." There is no idea of secret hostility, sub contrarius.—R.]

And he has taken it out of the way.—The perfect denotes the completed, still efficient fact; the handwriting is not only blotted out, it is removed entirely, and this continues to be so. Thus the transition from the participial to the finite construction is explained (as i. 26; WINER's Gram. p. 533). The mode of taking it away is described: By nailing it to his cross [to the cross].—R.] It was the law rather than Christ, which was slain and done away with on the cross, because He bore the curse of the law, took away its condemnation. Men slew Christ, but the Lord slew the law on the cross. Gal. ii. 13; 2 Pet. ii. 24. [There seems to be no ground for the opinion, that there is here an allusion to the cancelling of a bond, by driving a nail through it, although WORDSWORTH expresses the thought thus strikingly: "He nailed the bond of our debt to the Tree, and as by the Tree in Paradise we became debtors to God in the first Adam, so by the Tree in Calvary we received remission of our debt in the Second Adam."—R.]

Ver. 15. And having spoiled principalities and powers.—Ἀπεκδυσάμενος, found only here and iii. 9. It denotes the result of the contest against the wicked angels (comp. i. 16; ii. 10; Eph. ii. 2; vi. 11, 12), and has an emphatic position at the beginning of the sentence before the finite verb. BENIGL: qui angelos bonas colebant, malos timebant; neutrū jure. The verb is well rendered by the Vulgate: expoliāns. The middle signification, which is unmistakable in iii. 9, falls into the back ground here. [Two points are open to discussion here: 1. What is the meaning of ἀπεκδυσάμενος? 2. What is the reference in τὰς ἀρχὰς καὶ τὰς ἐξουσίας? 1. The more common interpretation is as above, "having spoiled," but WORDSWORTH, ELLCOTT, ALFORD, render "having divested himself of," "putting off," giving the middle sense. 2. Of what did He divest Himself? Here the commentators above mentioned differ. WORDSWORTH and ELLCOTT, taking Christ as the subject, refer "principalities and powers" to opposing hostile powers of evil, and follow Hilary, Augustine, in explaining thus: the powers of evil had power against Christ, as mortal in His flesh: He divested Himself of His flesh, by thus doing He di-

[* MEYER with reason insists that it is not contemporaneous, but means: "after he had blotted out," etc. "The divine work of redemption in Christ must occur before the forgiveness, through appropriation of it by the believers, could take place."—R.]

vested Himself of them. See WORDSWORTH'S full notes upholding this view. Still it seems to be a forced interpretation. ALFORD does not admit that these principalities and powers are infernal potentates. He considers that the angelic agency (Gal. iii. 19) in the giving of the law is referred to, and these "put off" by the abrogation and taking away of the law, God manifesting Himself henceforward without a veil in the exalted Person of Jesus. This too seems forced. The view so strongly supported by MEYER, which takes God as the subject, "spoiling" as the meaning of the participle, and the infernal powers as referred to in "principalities and powers," is preferable to either of the others, on the ground of simplicity and accordance with the subsequent context.—R.] Thus deprived of their power, stripped of their armor as it were, in their helplessness: He made a shew of them with boldness.—Ἐδεδυμάτισεν (only here and Matt. i. 19) has God as its subject, who now as in a triumph makes a show to their shame and His honor: the subject being the same as that of ἀπεκδυσάμενος, it is not repeated. Ἐν παρρησίᾳ is "frankly and freely" (frank und frei), and denotes the confidence and certainty of the complete, permanent victory (comp. 1 Jno. ii. 28) [LANGE'S Commentary, p. 82.—R.] "Openly" (LUTHER) [and E. V.] is already found in the verb. [The idea of putting to shame (παράδειγμα) does not necessarily belong to the simple verb. ALFORD, to carry out his view of the object of the verb, renders ἐν παρρησίᾳ "in openness" of speech, declaring and revealing by the cross, that there is none but Christ the Head of all principalities and powers. For this there seems to be no good support.—R.]

Triumphing over them in it.—Here θριαμβεύσας αὐτοὺς means "triumphing over them," while 2 Cor. ii. 14: θριαμβεύσας ἡμᾶς has the force of the Hiphil: "making us to triumph." "Them" means the persons conceived of as "principalities and powers." Ἐν αὐτῷ denotes the place of contest, the cross (ver. 14). It is not *—in Christo (BENGE), [ALFORD, margin of English Bible.—R.] It was precisely "the cross, this symbol of shame and sorrow, which was the place of victory over the enemies of God" (SCHENKEL).

[On the whole verse, see EADIE. Both he and BRAUNE agree entirely with MEYER, whose exegesis of this passage is highly satisfactory. WORDSWORTH is unusually full and valuable on this section, though his comments belong more properly to the homiletical department. ELLICOTT'S exegesis is modified by his taking Christ as the subject throughout.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Paul's care of the Churches. Great is the sympathy of Paul, who not only has in eye and mind, as the Epistles to the Corinthians show, all the members of a Christian congregation, but fraternally remembers in prayer and paternally cares for with his counsel, all congregations of the Church of his Lord, even those personally unknown to him, whenever, as in this case, through the coming of Epaphras to him, a way of God's pointing out is opened to him. He does not step aside from his calling, from his immediate sphere of duty, but takes root in the soil appointed to him and bears fruit, but fruit for many without, as far as in him lies, for all. No one can appeal to the Apostle and his part in the great work, who does not take root and bear fruit in his own immediate calling, as though it were too narrow for him.

2. Error a calamity. The Apostle regards error and entanglement therein as calamity and sorrow, which begins with wavering and uncertainty, and has its root in moral deficiency. Hence his sympathizing solicitude, hence his παρακαλεῖν directed to their καρδίας (ver. 2). [EADIE: "The conflict of error with truth could not but lead to distraction and mental turmoil; and in proportion to their misconception of the gospel, or their confusion of idea with regard to its spirit, contents and aim, would be their loss of that peace and solace, which the new religion had imparted to them."—R.]

3. Christian unity. That saying of RUPERTUS MELDENIUS in the seventeenth century: in necessariis unitas, in non necessariis libertas, in utrisque caritas, could have been taken from ver. 2, where "in love" sets forth the subjective, and "unto full knowledge of the mystery of God" the objective moment of true unity. The "mystery" is the "necessary" matter, in which there must be unity; for a) as to its nature it is entirely God's affair; b) as to its purport it is the fulness of all wisdom and knowledge, the treasury of all truth in the world and the plan of salvation in the kingdom of God; c) as to its position it is a fact revealed and revealing in Christ; d) as to its end, it reaches into eternity; e) as to its mission, it guides protectively through time with its errors and dangers; f) as to its requirements, it concerns believing acceptance and living therein. [Be-living, which is implied etymologically and practically in believing.—R.] Accordingly the one centre of both the mystery and the unity is Christ in His Being and work. [Still more if we adopt the reading which makes Christ Himself the mystery. The one "necessary" matter, about which there must be unity, is the answer to the question, "what think ye of Christ?"—R.]

4. The Being of Christ is all the fulness of the Godhead in bodily reality (ver. 9). This Pauline statement is related to the Johannine; "the Word became flesh;" the latter gives prominence to the historical incarnation, the former to the permanent state of the Exalted One.

5. The Work of Christ is pre-supposed as that of a mediator, who suffered death upon the Cross as an atonement for us, whom God the Father has raised again, in order that this fact of salvation should be made of benefit to us; it is essentially of an ethical nature.

6. Salvation is essentially a new life, the cause of which is God (the subject in vers. 13-15), the mediation of which is in Christ, resting objectively upon Christ's death on the Cross, whereby forgiveness of sin has been provided, the accusations and curse of the law done away, the power of the kingdom of darkness broken, and beginning subjectively with faith, the principle of the new life,

* [The original omits "not," but it is an obvious typographical error, which I have corrected without hesitation.—R.]

types of which are found both in the Old Testament and the life of Christ. The circumcision of the Old Testament corresponds with baptism in the New; both point, formally, to a putting away, the former partially, to a separation, the latter totally, to a dying, since the immersion points to the burial of Christ (vers. 11, 12; Rom. vi. 34); materially, both apply to the flesh, on which the sinful nature depends; the dying, being buried and rising again of Christ are events in His life which the believer, in contrast with the world, in and about him, must experience in his inner, moral life. In Christ, therefore, that is fulfilled, which before Him was only hinted at, prefigured; and only from Him and in Him, by means of faith, can the participation in this fulfilment be gained. [EADIE: "The Apostle looks on circumcision and baptism as being closely connected—the spiritual blessing symbolized by both being of a similar nature; though, probably, it would be straining this connection to allege it as a proof that baptism has been in all points ordained for the Church in room of circumcision."—To this may be added that just so far as we can refer to this passage in support of any mode of baptism, to the same extent we can find in it a proof of the connexion between baptism and circumcision. If we press it in the first direction, we must also in the second, as Braune does. Whatever may be gained from it in support of immersion, is equally gained for pædo-baptism.—R.]

7. Sin has so widely developed its power, that not only does every man stand under that power, but each man entirely: he is dead in his sinful doing and sinful being (ver. 13), so that he must be born again. It is the first power, which Christ endured to the uttermost and, sinlessly, victoriously, overcame on the cross in His propitiatory death. With the pardon of sin the new life begins.

8. The law, given on account of sin and against it as an external one, is contrary to man in his sin as his accuser. In Christ it is fulfilled, in Him it is satisfied. Against Him it can present no accusation and no guilt: He is the Fulfilled. Bodily law, which He has at once upheld and torn; upheld on the side of righteousness, torn and done away with on the side of the accuser and the curse. Only when the law is satisfied, is it done and done away; this has taken place in Christ and takes place only in Him.

9. The kingdom of darkness, the spiritual powers of evil have in sin their power over man, but lost it on the sinless Redeemer; in the atoning death of Christ, they gained a victory which was their defeat. Only he who lives to the flesh, remains under the dominion of the Evil one: whoever dies to sin and the flesh with Christ is snatched from this and has a share in the victory of Christ.

10. All mental culture, even the bloom of an organic science, of a philosophy, a love of wisdom, which is merely the intellectual product of the human mind, which does not proceed out of a moral life founded on Christ's life and rooted in Him, is idle, empty deceit and illusion. That which is most elegant, most noble and great without Christ is only elementary, imperfect in comparison with what He offers: the simplest, plainest of what is offered in Him, exceeds that in value. An humble Christian has and can do and knows, more and better than an unchristian philosopher. What is Christian alone is worthy of humanity, humane. As truly Christian life surpasses any other nobly moral life, so truly Christian opinion is more important and more truthful than any otherwise important speculative knowledge.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Do not meddle in spheres and activities, which do not concern you, but, with the gifts entrusted to you, labor in the calling to which you are appointed; do not seek only for intimate friends of the same mind and station as yourself, perhaps in wider circles, to make amends for those indolent or opposed about you.—Take no offence at the ocean depth of the mystery of Redemption in Christ; the pearls of truth and wisdom, thou canst only find there. Before the truths become a harvest which we gather in, they are dull clouds in the distance, or ore in the depths.—What thou receivest as seed, return as blossom, what thou receivest as blossom, return as fruit.—Only the fellowship which has its cement in love, has its eternal end in true knowledge.—Entering into worldly mental culture without, thou not only lovest something, but art thyself lost; lost to God and bound to human principles; you forego a blessed eternity, as you gaily go down the stream of time. No stand-points are more inferior than those without Christ, however well esteemed they may be of men.—Three powers are to be feared: 1) the power of Satan who stands behind the flesh and its motions; 2) the power of the flesh, that breaks out in sin; 3) the power of the law, that appears against our sin as accuser.

CALVIN:—Ver. 15. No tribunal so magnificent, no regal throne so glorious, no triumphal pomp so splendid, no chariot so sublime, as was that gibbet upon which Christ overcame death and the devil, the prince of death, whom He utterly bruised under His feet.

STARKE:—There are three excellent peculiarities, which must be found in a preacher, and also in any Christian, if he would make others know a matter; 1) that he himself be certain of its truth; 2) that he be able rightly to convince others of the same; 3) that he have a good end in view.—As a mother, who has children suffering in various degrees of sickness, attends most to the one who lies lowest, but never on that account permits herself to neglect or slight the others, so an instructor cares most for those hearers, who are in the most dangerous circumstances; yet not so as to forget or neglect the others.—See what belongs to genuine Christianity; a wealth and certainty of faith, a knitting together of hearts in love, a walk in Christ.—When we rightly know and have Christ, we know and have enough, though we know and have nothing else.—God's word is an inexhaustible mine full of treasures and riches; seek! dig! test! you will find one after another unto your spiritual and eternal delight.—Rational speeches are not always the truth, nor are learning and skill always a certain evidence of truth.—If we are rooted in Christ, we must prove by bearing fruit as trees of righteousness. Are we built on Christ, we must stand steadfast and unmovable, so that no winds and rains of affliction can overthrow us. A good inflow makes a good outflow; he who takes in much, can and must also give out much. Since then believers receive so much from and in Christ, so their active gratitude must flow copiously forth in unremitting obedience.—The Church is not a school of sages, where each can display the fanciful dreams of his reason.—In matters of faith the reason is an unfaithful and deceitful guide, that delivers us to error and delusion. The gospel is the true Christian philosophy, transcending all science, all human institutions, from which it can accept no law.—God is the creditor, we His debtors. 1) He is Omniscient, we cannot conceal a debt from Him; 2) He is almighty, He can exact the debt by force; 3) He is just, He will and must be paid; 4) He is omnipresent, none can escape Him. Who must not fear on this account?

GERLACH:—To every man, unenlightened, following his own wisdom, the mystery, plainly as it is revealed in the gospel, is closed, as to the blind eye the sun at mid day does not shine. But whoever knows how to study this great book, Jesus Christ, God manifest in the flesh, finds all knowledge therein. Humility opens the book, faith reads it, and love understands it.—[Jesus Christ; 1) The way on which the Christians walk; 2) the root from which they draw all their life-sap, 3) the foundation on which their whole inner life should rest.—R.]

RIEGER:—In natural things man prefers seeing all with his own eyes, and resting on his own observation rather than on what others can tell him. In the kingdom of grace however, one must be of such a tender heart, that he from the “being knit together in love,” accepts much that others have experienced.—Among the Corinthians there was more of intelligence and knowledge, but less of submissive love reaching to others. On this account he pruned their knowledge and guided them to growing strength in love. Among the Colossians there was more of tractable love, but without sufficient light. Hence he had a conflict, that their obedient love should not be abused, but that they might acquire minds expert in examination.—The Apostle’s word of incitement: walk in Him, means more than following in His footsteps, it signifies, that for such a walk as He walked, all strength is derived from Christ, that the walk is a fruit borne from Christ the vine.—In the time when God permitted the heathen to walk their own ways, He yet granted some footprints, from which something of Him and His truth could be made an object of search. On the part of God these were given as serviceable rudiments, but on the part of men they did not remain purely so. And if now-a-days any one will extol these as the choice relics of antiquity, it is as though some one should devote himself to a heap of sweepings, to find there a lost pearl.

SCHLEIERMACHER.—Ripeness of understanding in regard to the kingdom of God and intelligence respecting the things of this world are not together (Matt. xi. 25; Luke xvi. 8).—Love furthers the growth and maturity of the understanding.—[Why we continue in Christ? He has 1) not only the words of eternal life, but 2) the power of eternal life.—R.]

HEUBNER:—Unity, firm knitting together, incorporation in love, increases the “plerophy” [πληροφια fulness, made an adjective in E. V. ver. 2.—R.]: the correct, firm conviction, the confidence in our insight, when we are certain of the matter.—External discipline and order must ever accompany faith in the life of the Church. Paul mentions their “order” first, because it first meets the eye.—In Christian faith there must be constancy. Growth therein is necessary, but change is destructive.—Man may learn to know himself from the wisdom of the world, but it cannot help him.—He who has the fulness, can give abundantly. In Christ we have abundance, all others let us hunger. Christ’s word satisfies, contents the soul.—All, whom Christ has not awakened, are to be regarded as still dead.—[He who remains under Christ’s standard, conquers.—R.]

PASSAVANT:—What now-a-days is so gladly shunned by many pious people, sometimes as dangerous, again as unprofitable, the Apostle here holds to be necessary, aye, he labors and struggles to bring souls thither. He would know of no poverty of spirit, which, made up of sheer laziness and cowardice, is willingly satisfied with superficial knowledge of saving truth: he insisted rather upon that riches of knowledge and of spirit, which contributes to the genuine poverty of an humble spirit. He would know of no blind or dim faith, but of open seeing eyes. He sought to produce in the Colossians a clear understanding, a plenitude of knowledge,—that their knowledge might suffer from no defects, be diseased from no obscurations or fluctuations, that might profoundly penetrate and gaze into the mystery of God and the Father.—Gratitude then helps us to stand, and joyously stand fast before every foreign spirit, before every foreign power, in every temptation and conflict: it is a rock, from which the darts of unbelief rebound. When the Roman proconsul on the judgment-seat urged that holy man Polycarp to curse Jesus Christ to save his life, the martyr answered, “For eighty-six years I have served Him: He has never yet done me harm. How can I blaspheme my King, who has saved me?”—“Vain deceit,” Paul calls all human worldly wisdom and doctrine, which knows nothing of one true God; “tradition of men, rudiments of the world,” all that oriental philosophy, which with its old and new twilight, its destructive atmosphere, marred the divine doctrine, it would enlarge and complete,—“vain deceit,” that Jewish heaven, which through its ancient consequence, through use and abuse of the Mosaic ordinances and principles, threatened to rob the disciples of their new freedom, or stint them therein, to put again upon them “a yoke which neither their fathers nor they themselves were able to bear.”—

For the Reformation festival [October 31st, anniversary of the nailing of Luther’s theses on the church-door at Wittenberg, 1517.—R.] (ver. 6-9). How do we prove ourselves abundantly grateful for the regeneration of our Church? If we 1) hold fast to the ground of salvation, which it proclaims to us; 2) use the means of salvation, which it offers to us; 3) walk in the way of salvation, which it prescribes to us.

[BISPING:—Ver. 6. Notice that Paul here says, “ye have received Christ,” not the doctrine of Christ. True faith is a spiritual communion; for in faith we receive not only the doctrine of Christ, but Himself, into us: in faith He Himself dwells in us: we cannot separate Christ, as Eternal Truth and His doctrine.—R.]

[BISHOP ANDREWES:—Ver. 14. If one be in debt and danger of the law, to have a brother of the same blood, made of the same woman, will little avail him, except he will come also “under the law,” i. e., become his surety, and undertake for him. And such was our estate. “The hand-writing,” our bond, we had forfeited. This debt of ours was no money debt, we were not sub lege pecuniaria, but capitali; and the debt of a capital law is death. He paid that to the full, and having paid it “blotted out the hand-writing,” cancelled the sentence of the law.—R.]

[HENRY:—Ver. 1. We can think, and pray and be concerned for one another at the greatest distance; the communion of the saints is a spiritual thing.—Ver. 2. The prosperity of the soul is the best prosperity. Great knowledge and strong faith make a soul rich. The more intimate communion we have with our fellow Christians, the more the soul prospers.—Vers. 6, 7, a sovereign antidote against seducers.—They who pin their faith on other men’s sleeves, and walk in the way of the world, are turned away from following after Christ.—It is not enough to put away some one particular sin, but we must put off the whole body of them.—We have communion with Christ in His whole undertaking. We are both buried and rise with Him, and both are signified by our baptism; not that there is anything in the sign or ceremony of baptism, which represent this burying and rising, any more than the crucifixion of Christ is represented by any visible resemblance in the Lord’s Supper.—Christ’s death was the death of our sins; Christ’s resurrection is the quickening of our souls. The Redeemer conquered by dying. See His crown of thorns turned into a crown of laurels. Never had the Devil’s kingdom such a mortal blow given to it, as was given by the Lord Jesus.—R.]

[BURKITT:—Ver. 1. The men of the world little understand, and less consider, what burthen of care lies upon the ministers of Christ, for, and on behalf of the whole Church of Christ in general, which is continually in danger of being corrupted by false teachers, who everywhere lie in wait to deceive.—Ver. 15. Christ’s bloody cross was a chariot of triumph unto Him. Lord! whilst thou wert bleeding and racking upon the gibbet for us, thou wert then rejoicing and triumphing for the benefits redounding to us.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 1. Like the caged bird beating its bared and bleeding breast against the wires of its prison, as it hears the repeated cry of its unseen young ones, the Apostle turned ever and anon toward those churches—nor did he idly chafe in his confinement, but he wrote this letter.—Ver. 4. The traveller who has already made some progress, but who begins gradually to doubt and debate, to lose faith in himself, and wonder whether he is in the right way at all, is prepared to listen to the suggestions of any one who, under semblance of disinterested friendship, may advise to a path of danger and ruin.—No philosophy ever dreamed of such an awful expedient as God robed in humanity, and in that nature dying to redeem His guilty creatures—whose name, nature and legal liabilities He had assumed: and such a scheme never found a place in any system of jurisprudence—what men have sought in deep and perplexing speculations on the order and origin of all things, they will find in this mystery.—The hallowed sphere of walk is “in Him,” but beyond this barrier are sin and danger, false philosophies and mazy entanglements.—Any philosophy not “after Christ” must be earthly and delusive. It has missed the central truth—is amused with the stars, but forgetful of the sun.—Though the scar of circumcision might attest a nationality, it was no certificate of personal character—but wherever “the flesh” was parted with, there was the guarantee of individual purity and progress.—The nails which killed Christ pierced the sentence of doom,—gave egress to the blood which canceled it, and inflicted at the same time a mortal wound on the hosts of darkness.—R.]

[BARNES:—We should be on our guard against the seductive arts of false teachers. It is, in general, a safe rule for a Christian to abide by the views which he had on the great subjects of religion when he became converted (ver. 6). Then the heart was tender—there are some things in which the heart judges better than the head.—If at any time we can ascertain what are the prevalent views of Christ, we can easily see what is the prevailing character of the theology of that age.—Vers. 11-15. Christ has laid us under the highest obligations to serve Him. He has enabled us to put off our sins; He has raised us from spiritual death to spiritual life; He has removed the old ordinances that were against us, and has made religion easy and pleasant; He has subdued our enemies and triumphed over them.—R.]

5. Two special warnings.

(CHAPTER II. 16-23.)

- 16 Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink [in eating or in drinking],¹ or in respect of a holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days [of sabbaths].²
- 17 Which³ are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ [Christ's].
- 18 Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility [arbitrarily in humility]⁴ and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not⁵
- 19 seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind [lit., the mind of his flesh], And not holding the Head, from which [whom]⁶ all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered [being supplied], and knit together, increaseth with the increase
- 20 of God. Wherefore [omit Wherefore]⁷ if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances,
- 21, 22 (Touch not; taste not; handle not; Which all are to perish with the using;) [for destruction in the consumption:]⁸ after the commandments and doctrines of men?
- 23 Which things have indeed a shew [repute] of wisdom in will-worship, and humility, and neglecting [unsparingness]⁹ of the body; not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh [only to the satisfying of the flesh].¹⁰

⁵ Ver. 18.—Μὴ is added in N., where it was originally wanting, as in A. B. and others; but it is not to be omitted, [Οὐκ is also found, but μὴ is the proper form of the negative here. See EXEG. NOTES. The reading of Rec. has preponderant external authority, 6 MSS., nearly all cursives; supported by most versions, Tischendorf, Ellicott. Lachmann, Meyer, Alford reject the negative,—and this view affects the exegesis of the latter two.—R.]

⁶ Ver. 19.—Ἐξ οὗ, masculine, Christ the Personal Head, hence "whom;" "which" in E. V. doubtless stands for "whom."—R.]

⁹ Ver. 23.—[Ἀφειδία, "unsparingness." So Eadie, Ellicott ("unsparing treatment"), Alford, Davies, and older English versions similarly.—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 23.—[This is the interpretation of Braune, Meyer, Ellicott and others. See EXEG. NOTES. More modifications might well be made, but this slight change sufficiently indicates the view upheld below.—R.]

[The text of this short passage, containing not less than 9 ἀπαξ λεγόμενα, is remarkably well established and free from variations.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The first warning, against a fleshly legality.

Vers. 16, 17.

Vers. 16, 17. Let no man therefore judge you.—Since the personality of the readers is strongly emphasized by the position of the words: τις ὑμᾶς in sharp contrast, "therefore" refers to what was said above (vers. 1-15), especially to their endowments and position in Christ: not merely however to the doing away of the Mosaic law (MEYER and others). BENDEL: ex. v. 8-15 deducitur igitur. Κρίνειν means "to judge;" the connexion defines it more closely: allow no one the right to judge and to condemn you, if you do not respond to such demands. The warning is found in this,—permitting their action to be determined by this (BLEEK). Neminem, qui vos judicare conatur, audiat (BENGEL). He treats of Christian, gospel freedom. LUTHER: Let no one make conscience for you (see also Rom. xiv. 22). It is not therefore κατακρινέτω (BAEHR).

In eating or in drinking.—Ἐν denotes the sphere, the point where the judgment was exercised, as Rom. ii. 1. Βρώσει and πόσει set forth the act of eating and drinking—food is βρῶμα; drink, πόμα (Rom. xiv. 17; 2 Cor. ix. 10; 1 Cor. viii. 4; x. 4; Heb. ix. 10). As the Mosaic law had (Lev. vii. 10-27) prohibitions respecting food alone, and forbade wine only to the Nazarites (Numbers vi. 3), and during the time of priestly service (Levit. x. 9), the false teachers had certainly gone beyond this and heightened asceticism for Christians (Matt. xxiii. 24; Rom. xiv. 21). It is a false view, that there is here only a consonance without further significance (DE WETTE). Whether all indulgence in meat (OLSHAUSEN) or in wine (SCHENKEL) was forbidden, does not appear from the context.

Or in respect of a holyday, or of the new moon, or of sabbaths.—After “eating and drinking,” joined with the copulative καί, the disjunctive union with ἡ follows, because the Apostle passes over to another matter. [It is true that eating and drinking may form one category, but in view of the doubtful reading, there is no sufficient critical or exegetical ground for preferring to make the above distinction.—R.] Ἐν μέρει, in respect of, in the point of (2 Cor. iii. 10; ix. 3; comp. WINER’S Gram. p. 571), denotes the category, which includes the species: ἑορτῆς, festum annuum, νομηνίας, in mense, σαββάτων, in hebdomade (BENGEL); the diversity is indicated by ἡ instead of καί. The threefold order of 1 Chron. xxiii. 31; 2 Chron. ii. 4; xxxi. 3, is transposed. Comp. Gal. iv. 10. It is incorrect to apply it to partial observances of festivals (CHRYSOSTOM and others), or to make it=vicibus festorum (MELANCHTHON), or=ne ulla quidem eorum ex parte (STICER); BEZA and others inexactly interpret by respectu. [The E. V. “in respect of” is exact enough, as it certainly suggests the idea of a category,—in the matter of.—R.] Christians should not permit themselves to be bound to Jewish festivals in their worship of God; neither to the three great annual feasts, nor the new moons, nor the Sabbath; σαββάτα=σαββάτων, Matt. xii. 1; Luke iv. 16; Acts xiii. 14; xvi. 13; it does not refer to the triple Sabbath (jubilee year, Sabbatic year, weekly Sabbath, HEUMANN [BARNES]). BENGEL: hic significanter positus; nam sabbata dicuntur dies singuli hebdomados. Thus IGNATIUS contends against the σαββατισμὸν as well as against Judaism in the Epistle to the Magnesians, 9. [The passage reads in English: “no longer observing Sabbaths, but keeping the Lord’s day.”—EADIE:—“nor were they to hallow the ‘Sabbaths,’ for these had served their purpose, and the Lord’s Day was now to be a season of loftier joy, as it commemorates a more august event than either the creation of the universe, or the exodus from Egypt. The new religion is too free and exuberant to be trained down to ‘times and seasons’ like its tame and rudimental predecessor. Its feast is daily, for every day is holy; its moon never wanes, and its serene tranquility is an unbroken Sabbath.” The Jewish Sabbath was kept by the early Christians as well as the Lord’s Day. The practice was condemned finally at a council in the neighboring city of Laodicea.—WORDSWORTH: “σαββάτων, the Seventh Day Sabbath, the Jewish Sabbath, which as far as it was the seventh day Rest, had been filled by Christ resting in the grave. The position of the day is changed, but the proportion remains unchanged, and has received new strength and sanction by its consecration to Christ under the gospel in the Lord’s Day.”—R.]

Ver. 17. Which are a shadow of things to come.—This verse is a proof of the warning. “O [see critical notes; the meaning is the same if the reading ἃ be adopted.—R.] comprises all as a unit, and means: this (eating, drinking, feasts according to the precepts of the laws of Moses) is “a shadow of things to come.” Σκιά, umbra vite, expers (BENGEL), is not=σκιταγραφία, sketched in outline with charcoal, “silhouette” (CALVIN and others), since its antithesis here is not εἰκών, but σῶμα. It denotes the typical in the Mosaic law, not exactly the unsubstantialness (MEYER) or the transitoriness (SPENER), and not at all the darkness (MUSCULUS); for it gives certain intimation of the substance of the reality, and truth of the “things to come” (Heb. viii. 5; x. 1). Ἐστίν denotes the permanent nature of the former things; it is not=ἦν, but the commands and institutions have and retain a typical meaning. Τὰ μέλλοντα are future things, the things of αἰὼν μέλλον, not like this (SCHENKEL), nor is ἀγαθὸν to be supplied, from Heb. x. 1. These things cast a shadow into the αἰὼν οὐτος, so that the light, as well as the μέλλοντα, standing in the light, are before us. So long as one walks in the shadow, holds to it, he is not in the αἰὼν μέλλον, which began with the appearing of Christ, not to begin first with His parousia (MEYER); for there is added:

But the body is Christ’s (WINER’S Gram. p. 495).—This refers to the presence of the αἰὼν μέλλον, which had already entered. However, he, who still holds to the ordinances of the law, and allows himself to be governed by erring and erroneous men, not by Christ, does not hold to Him, is not yet in the Messianic kingdom and age, as he may and should be. The passage treats of a point of view rather than a point of time. See 1 Jno. ii. 8 [LANGE, Comm. p. 53.] “But the body” is in contrast with “shadow,” fulfilment, full substance and life of “the things to come.” Ἐστίν is to be joined to Χριστοῦ; to Him as Head and Lord (vers. 6, 19) it belongs; He has the direction of the “things to come,” is the antithesis of τῆς (ver. 16). It is neither: ad Christum pertinet, ab eo solo petenda est (GROTIUS), ex Christo pendet (STORR), appeared in Christ (HUTHER), nor is σῶμα to be repeated with Χριστοῦ (BENGEL), certainly it is not=the Christian Church (SCHENKEL); as little is σκιά the Jewish Church. [WORDSWORTH: σῶμα is substantial reality. ALFORD incorrectly asserts that the Apostle could not thus have spoken, if the ordinance of the Sabbath had been, in any form, of lasting obligation in the Christian Church. Against this view, see ELLICOTT in loco and his references, also WORDSWORTH, Sermon 44, Christian Sunday.—R.] The joining of this clause to the following verse (Greek Fathers) is objectionable, because it obviously belongs to the antecedent context, and does not belong to ἵνας. Against superstitious worship of angels (vers. 18, 19).

Ver. 18. Let no man beguile you of your reward.—Μηδείς corresponds with μή τις, ver. 16, and introduces a warning. [EADIE remarks the uniform use of the singular in these warnings, as contrasted with the plural used in Galatians. "Either he marks out one noted leader, or he merely individualizes for the sake of emphasis." Probably the latter.—[R.] Here too the stress is laid upon the object ὑμᾶς, placed in an emphatic position. καταβραβεύετω corresponds with κρίνετω (ver. 16). The word is rare, but Attic (Demosthenes adv. Midiam, c. 25), hence not a Cilician provincialism (JEROME); βραβεύειν is to be a βραβεύς [i. e., the awardee of prizes in the games.—R.], to perform such an office, παρὰβραβεύειν is to do this partially, unjustly, in favor of or against a competitor, κατὰβραβεύειν denotes definitely the hostile intent against one entitled to the prize. The prize (βραβεῖον, Phil. iii. 14: "of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus:" 1 Cor. ix. 24) is the imperishable crown (1 Cor. ix. 25) "of righteousness" (2 Tim. iv. 8; ii. 5), "of life" (Jas. i. 12), "of glory" (1 Pet. v. 4). Hence it is not to be interpreted as Christian freedom (GROTIUS) or the honor and prize of true Christian worship (DE WETTE), nor is the verb=κατακρίνειν (BAHR and others). The following thought is not remote from, but not in, the passage; Ne quis brabeute potestatem usurpans atque ad eo potestate abutens, vos currentes morderetur perperamque prescribat, quid sequi; quid fugere debeatis, brabeum accepturi (BENGEL—similarly BEZA). LUTHER is incorrect: let no one frustrate you in your aim; Vulgate also: nemo vos seducat.

Arbitrarily in humility and worshiping of angels.—Θέλων characterizes the design of the false teachers as to its ground. The participle denotes, what is joined to θρησκεία in the compound ἐθελοθρησκεία (ver. 23): the wilful desiring, having pleasure in "humility and worshiping of angels." Θέλειν ἐν = לְרַצוֹן 1 Sam. xviii. 22; 2 Sam. xv. 26; Rom. x. 9; 2 Cor. ix. 8; Ps. cxlvii. 10. It is not to be complemented with τοῦτο or τοῦτο ποιεῖν (= καταβραβεύειν, MEYER). Nor is it to be explained cupide (ERASMUS). The former is both a pleonasm and brachylogy at once: the latter is contrary to usage. To join it with ἐμβραβεύων (LUTHER) is inadmissible. [ELLICOTT follows MEYER and renders: "desiring to do it," but objects to any imputation of malice.—He characterizes the view supported by BRAUNE (AUGUSTINE, OLSHAUSEN and many others) as distinctly untenable and contrary to all analogy of usage of θέλειν in the New Testament; yet his own interpretation is open to the objections made above. ALFORD renders: "of purpose," joining it with καταβραβεύετω, following THEOPHYLACT. The interpretation of MEYER, ELLICOTT, et al., he deems "flat and spiritless;" that of BRAUNE, he terms "a harsh Hebraism—irrelevant." If the view of θέλειν, given on p. 35, note, be correct, then ALFORD's interpretation is inadmissible. BRAUNE's exegesis accords best with the distinction there made. They arbitrarily, spontaneously, from the evil impulses of their own nature, indulged in these things. This is relevant, for this made them dangerous.—R.] The context indicates that the first substantive, elsewhere used in a good sense (iii. 12; Eph. iv. 2; Phil. ii. 3; Acts xx. 19; 1 Pet. v. 5), has here a bad sense: false, affected humility, behind which much spiritual pride may hide. The other substantive (θρησκεία) means worship, adoration, Jas.

vi. 26, 27; Acts xxvi. 5 [E. V. "religion."—R.], the object of which is set forth by the genitive. Comp. Wisdom, xiv. 27; xi. 16; Maccab. v. 6. WINER's Gram. pp. 176, 233. In the Old Testament the angels repeatedly appeared as mediators between God and man, and as representatives of men with God (Job v. 1; xxx. 23; Zach. i. 12; Tobit xii. 15). In the Testimony of the VII. Patriarchs (PHILO) they appear as interceding, helping beings; among the later Jews the opinion is current, that the law was delivered to Moses through angels (BLEEK on Heb. ii. 2). The Fathers refer to the fact that the Jews supplicated angels and councils declare themselves on this point* (BÖHMER in Herzog's Realencyclop. 4. p. 31). [See EADIE in loco. It was at Colosse that special worship was given in after days to the archangel Michael, for an alleged miracle wrought by him, viz., opening a chasm to receive the river Lycus. And at a council held in the neighboring city of Laodicea, the practice referred to in the text was condemned.—(CONYB. and HOWS Am. ed. II. p. 390, note 2).—R.]—"Humility" is to be regarded as so connected with angel worship, that the latter is proof of the former, since the mediation of angels was claimed in approaching God (THEODORET), or because the Majesty of the Only Begotten demanded it (CHRYSOSTOM). It is a mistake to take "humility" in a good sense, but as irony (STEIGER and others), or τὸν ἀγγέλων as genitive subjecti (LUTHER: spirituality of the angels, SCHLEIERMACHER, religion of the angels), or to weaken it to studium singularis sanctitatis, or to understand by it demons, demigods (ESTIUS). ["The Catholic interpreters, Estius and A-Lapide, make a strong effort to exclude this passage from such as might be brought against the worship of the saints" (EADIE), but the connection of the two substantives gives it a direct application to this error.—R.]

Intruding into those things which he hath not seen, ἃ μὴ ἑώρακεν [ἑώρακεν] ἐμβραβεύων, is a further definition of καταβραβεύετω. The verb [participle] occurs only here; to step upon a place, hence spiritual regions through speculation; it is used of the entrance of the gods and their seating themselves (PASSOW sub voce); in distinction from ἐμβάλλειν, it denotes a confident, immediate stepping up, which the description of the regions entered (ἃ μὴ ἑώρακεν)—the transcendental—emphatic from position—shows to be unjustifiable. [The E. V. "intruding" is sufficiently accurate, though BRAUNE's "sich versteigend" is more so.—R.] The negative μὴ instead of which οὐ occurs also, is correct in the relative clause after μυθεῖς (WINER's Gram. p. 448). Without the negative it may be referred to δράματα (Acts xx. 10, 12; x. 3); or δράσεις (Acts ii. 17) with MEYER: but if ὁπθεῖς (Acts ix. 17) must also be so understood according to the context, still ἃ ἑώρακεν (comp. 1 Jno. iv. 20) cannot be rightly referred to enthusiastic fancies. [These passages above cited speak of "visions;" to interpret thus would imply either that these visions were in themselves "illusions," or in their influence became "delusions." ALFORD

renders: "standing on the things which he hath seen" i. e., "an inhabitant of the realm of light, not of faith;" which as ELLICOTT observes "is ingenious, but not very plausible or satisfactory." The difficulty in such interpretations arises from following another than the true reading. The canon respecting lectiones difficiles may be pushed too far.—R.]

Vainly puffed up by the mind of his flesh, is the third trait, more closely characterizing "humility." Εἰκῇ, temere (Rom. xiii. 4) or frustra (1 Cor. xv. 2; Gal. iii. 4; iv. 11), is here joined with φυσικὸς νοῦς in the former sense. [ELLICOTT: "bootlessly, without ground or reason." So BRAUNE: "ohne Ursache." "Vainly" may imply vanity in the cause or the result; here the former.—R.] On account of its position it cannot be joined with ἐπιβαρέων (STEIGER and others). His obscurity is groundless, since it rests upon his own mind, is caused by his own spirit (ἡ πὸ τοῦ νοῦς), and the more so, since "the mind" (νοῦς) is determined by, entirely in the service of and belonging to, "the flesh" (τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ), which while unredeemed serves evil (Rom. vii. 14, 25), and commands the "mind," possesses and rules it, instead of being possessed and ruled by it. CHRYSOSTOM: ἐπὶ σαρκικῆς διαβολῆς [followed by the E. V., "fleshly mind."—MEYER: "It must be noticed that the matter is so represented that the σάρξ of the false teacher seems personified (comp. Rom. viii. 6), as though it had its own νοῦς, under the influence of which he is made proud. The pride of these people consisted in this, that with all their supposed humility, they allowed themselves to fancy, as is generally the case with fanatical tendencies, that they could not be satisfied with the simple knowledge and obeying of the gospel, but could attain to a peculiar, higher wisdom and sanctity."—R.]

Ver. 19. And not holding the Head.—This is the fourth trait to be connected with the "worshipping of angels," denying Christ and the church [die Christlichkeit und Kirchlichkeit].—The object is Christ, to whom the false teachers did not hold fast as Head, hence as before and above all, angels as well. The negative οὐ, not μή as before, denotes a matter of fact (WINER's Gram. p. 452). BENDEL: Qui non unice Christum tenet, plane non tenet: but he may yet belong to the church.—From whom all the body [or the whole body].—R.]—According to the parallel passage, Eph. iv. 15, ἐξ οὗ refers to Christ, hence is masculine, not neuter (MEYER) [So EADIE following MEYER: "not personally as Jesus, but really or objectively." But "the following verse seems to imply distinctly the contrary" (ELLICOTT).—R.] The preposition which is to be joined with αἰσεί denotes the cause from which proceeds what it predicated, viz., the growth, and not a remote one, only conditioning it from without, but indicating the most intimate vital connection between them. "All the body" includes the whole church (Gemeinde) without exception; there is no member that does not derive its growth from the Head. [It is a question whether the reference here is to the body in its entirety, or to the body as including every member.—ELLICOTT and EADIE favor the former view, ALFORD and BRAUNE the latter, which is preferable, as the whole passage is against false teachers, who did not deny the unity of the church, but slighted the fact that each member "must hold fast the Head for himself" (ALFORD). There is then the greater reason for taking "from whom" personally. MEYER, followed by EADIE, refers ἐξ οὗ both to the verb and the participles, which reference does not correspond so well with the above views.—R.]

By joints and bands being supplied and knit together, διὰ τῶν ὁσῶν καὶ συνδέσμων ἐπιχορηγοῦμενον καὶ συνβιβάζόμενον, characterizes the body, the church, as Eph. iv. 16. The first participle belongs to ὁσῶν, the second to συνδέσμων. Both substantives, joined without a repetition of the article, form a category. 'Ἀραὶ are the nerves, σύνδεσμοι the muscles: the former afford help, the latter compactness, firmness. Wherein the assistance consists is not expressly stated, the context only intimating vital activity in general (MEYER), not "nourishment" [E. V.] however, (GROTIUS). 'Ἀραὶ do not refer to faith (BENDEL), σύνδεσμοι to prophets (THEODORET) or believers (EÜMER), for faith is the life and the persons are the members.—[The fact that the two substantives are joined without a repetition of the article, is against the assignment of a participle to each. As ELLICOTT remarks: "The distinctions adopted by Meyer, et al., according to which the ἀραὶ are especially associated with ἐπιχορ., and referred to Faith, the σύνδεσ. with συνβ., and referred to Love—are plausible, but perhaps scarcely to be relied upon. As in Eph. the passage does not seem so much to involve special metaphors, as to state forcibly and accumulatively a general truth."—In the parallel passage, Eph. iv. 16, BRAUNE seems to interpret ἀραὶ, "joints." To limit it specifically to "nerves," seems to be incorrect. EADIE: "We may understand it not merely of joints in the strict anatomical sense, but generally of all those means, by which none of the parts or organs of the body are found in isolation." He is not correct in giving a middle sense to ἐπιχορηγοῦμενον: "furnished with reciprocal aid." Both participles are passive; as present they denote "that the process is now going on" (ALFORD).—R.]

Increaseth with the increase of God, αἰσεί τὴν αἰσχίαν τοῦ θεοῦ—[lit., "increaseth the increase of God."] Accusative of cognate substantive and genitive auctoris.—R.] By this God is described as He who effects the growth from Christ (1 Cor. iii. 6, 12; vi. 18; WINER's Gram. p. 232). The most appropriate preposition for Christ in this figure is ἐξ, for God ἐν πρό. Hence it does not refer to growth well-pleasing to God (CALVIN), [nor "godly growth," CONYBEARE and HOWSON.—R.] But the folly and danger of the false teachers is sharply marked.

Comprehensive conclusion. Vers. 20-23.

Ver. 20. If ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world.—Sketch of their Christian state, in accordance with the context and the preceding passage (vers. 1-15). BENDEL: continuatur illatio v. 16 cocepta. Ei is a rhetorical "if, as is actually the case" (WINER's Gram. p. 418). There are here two definitions of "being dead:" how? "with Christ;" to what? "from the rudiments of the world." The motive for "being dead" is given in vers. 11, 12, and for "with Christ" in ver. 19 (the Head) and vers. 10-15.* For the sake of distinctness, and at the same time to mark the "dying" as an emancipation (BENGEL: conciſe: mortui et ſic liberati ab elementis), the preposition ἀπό is repeated from the verb, where otherwise the dative would be found (Gal. ii. 19; Rom. vi. 2). "The rudiments of the world" are here those rudiments in which they lived before they became "in Christ," when they were still heathen; they should not fall away into such again, seduced by Judaistic false teachers. See on ver. 8.—MEYER incorrectly supposes that Christ also was "dead from the rudiments;" he overlooks that Gentile Christians are referred to; Christ is indeed "the end of the law," but has not to die to it.

Why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances?—"Why" introduces, emphatically in the form of a question, the conclusion that it was wrong. Comp. Gal. iv. 8-10. "As living in the world," like "when we were in the flesh" (Rom. vii. 5), describes their standpoint before conversion, to which they are returning; ὥς denotes the justifiable conclusion and comparison=quippe quia, "as though." δογματίζεσθε is the middle (LUTHER: why do ye allow yourselves to be caught with ordinances?); the verb is=δόγμα τῷέναι, like νομοθετεῖν. It can be neither: one decrees to you (MEYER);* nor: you lay ordinances upon yourselves (BLEEK); they did not do this, nor does it correspond with the situation, while the former does not correspond with the intention of the intensive question, as if it concerned only a sketch of the fact, and not a rousing of the readers against it.

These ordinances are now noted concretely as to their purport: Ver. 21. Touch not, taste not, handle not, μὴ ἅψη, μὴ δὲ γεύσῃ, μὴ δὲ θίγῃς.—The triple reference forming a climax, marks the urgency of the demand for abstinence (MEYER). The reference to ver. 16 allows the omission of the objects, meat and drink, which are required by the second verb γεύσῃ. It is incorrect to apply "touch not" to sexual pleasure (FLATT); this cannot be justified by 1 Cor. vii. 1; 1 Tim. iv. 3, against the context, viz., the former part of ver. 22. The suppression of the object is not to be accounted for by the fear and dissimulation of the false teachers, who did not name it themselves (STEIGER), nor thus: that Paul had not thought on any definite object. The objects he sets forth in paraphrase:

Ver. 22. Which all are for destruction in the consumption, ἅ ἑστίν πάντα εἰς φθορὰν τῇ ἀποχρήσει.—This relative clause sketches the forbidden objects, all of them (ἅ—πάντα); ἑστίν, placed first for emphasis, denotes that their nature is,—"appointed to destruction, perishable" (εἰς φθορὰν), by being used up (τῇ ἀποχρήσει). This verdict reminds us of Matth. xv. 17; Mark vii. 18, 19; 1 Cor. vi. 13. Hence these words must be considered the Apostle's judgment to show, and that not without irony, the perversity of the notion, that through eating and drinking moral detriment originated (CHRYSOSTOM: εἰς κόπρον γὰρ πάντα μεταβάλλεται). They cannot be regarded as the words of the false teachers (VATABLE, SCHENKEL), who will not suffer them to be touched, nor as parenthesis* (MEYER). Nor is ἃ to be referred to δόγματα, implied in δογματίζεσθε above (AUGUSTINE [BARNES] and others), nor is εἰς φθορὰν to be explained as moral corruption (DE WETTE), since it merely describes destruction, decomposition, here of sensuous things. Although ἀποχρήσει must not be taken as the simple noun, it must however be distinguished from παράχρησις and κατ'ἀχρησις, "abuse." [The view Braune upholds is so generally adopted by modern commentators and so far preferable that it seems unnecessary to notice the others particularly. The practical bearing of the passage is obvious to any, who discover its true meaning. That this true meaning has not always been discovered by American Christians is evident from the fact that some still cite: "Touch not, taste not, handle not," in support of "total abstinence" from beverages which can intoxicate. Whatever may be the expediency of such a principle, it is one against which, as a binding rule of universal application, this passage, rightly interpreted, might be used. To use it in its favor is contrary to all fair dealing with the word of God,—a wresting of the Scripture, excusable only on the ground of ignorance, if in these days such ignorance be not rather an aggravation.—R.]

After the commandments and doctrines of men, κατὰ τὰ ἐντάλματα καὶ διδασκαλίας τῶν ἀνθρώπων, sets forth a modality of δογματίζεσθε, marking it as in contrast with God's law and word in Christ, indeed with the law of Moses, beyond which they have gone. "Doctrines" is added in justification of "commandments;" the latter are more restricted, the former more extended; the latter are results, the former set forth the premises and consequences. Matt. xv. 7; Mark vii. 7. [ELLICOTT: they were submitting to a δογματισμός not only in its preceptive, but even in its doctrinal aspects.—R.]

Ver. 23. Which things have indeed a repute of wisdom,—"Which things" refers to "commandments and doctrines of men," and denotes, not single commandments, etc., but the whole category of human ordinances. Ἐστὶν λόγον μὲν ἔχοντα σοφίας is a concession (μὲν), to which the antithesis (δέ) is wanting; still to the very significant λόγος we have the correlate τιμῇ, to λόγον ἔχοντα corresponds ἐν τιμῇ τινι, and on this account to μὲν the following οὐκ corresponds. Hence λόγος here must mean "report," as Luke v. 15; Jno. xxi. 23; Acts xi. 22. So Herodot. 5, 66 (GRIMM, Clavis, sub voce p. 260). CHRYSOSTOM: λόγον φησὶν, οὐ δυνάμειν, ἀρὰ οὐκ ἀληθειαν. The Vulgate therefore: rationem habentia, and LUTHER: "appearance" [E. V.: "show"] are incorrect. [ALFORD: "possessed of a reputation,"—ELLCOTT: "do have the repute"—are enjoying the repute of wisdom.—R.] The omission of a clause introduced by δέ is an anacoluthon, but not strange, since the clause is unmistakable (WINER'S Gram. p. 535). ἔστιν ἔχοντα is used instead of ἔχουσιν, to mark the weakness of men in permitting themselves to be so readily deceived and blinded, and contains a charge against such in general rather than against those in Colosse. Bengel improperly joins ἔστιν with πρὸς πλῆσμονήν, and resolves ἔχοντα into: cum habeant, ut sit incisum; so SCHENKEL also.

* [MEYER (followed by ALFORD) regards the verb as passive, finding here, not a reproach but a warning of the readers, who have not yet been led away. In that case, "as living in the world" indicates the wrong view which the false teachers take of the Christian position. There is much force in his objection to the common view, as implying that they were living as if in the world, a reproach which does not correspond with the tone of the rest of the Epistle. However the implication may only be, that if they allowed this to continue, they would be returning to the world.—R.]

* [The parenthesis of the E. V. seems unnecessary. It was probably designed to connect "ordinances" and "after the commandments of men" more closely. If any clause be parenthetical, it is this one, and MEYER, ALFORD and ELLICOTT so regard it, agreeing entirely, however, with the exegesis of Braune.—R.]

In will-worship, and humility, and unsparingness of the body, ἐν ἐθελουθρησκείᾳ καὶ ταπεινοφροσύνῃ καὶ ἀπειθείᾳ τοῦ σώματος.—"In," standing only at the beginning, denotes that all three belong together. Compounds with ἐθελω are frequent (see Passow's Lexicon) and describe, according to the word, something done freely, voluntarily, on one's own responsibility, arbitrarily, factitiously, affectedly; ἐθελουθρησκεία is self-imposed, arbitrary worship (ver. 18). The object is not added, because self-evident: God. The false teachers in question would worship Him through the mediation of the adoration of angels. Compare ἐπιπορευομένη θρησκεία, by which EPIPHANIUS (haer. 1, 16) describes the piety of the Pharisees. ταπεινοφροσύνη, as in ver. 18, denotes the humility which appeared with ostentation, hence only apparent, external. Ἀπειθεία σώματος denotes the unsparing austerity towards the body through ascetic abstinence. Such mortification is based upon contempt of the creatures, false views of matter as the seat of sin. The first substantive denotes the religious aspect of their conduct, the second, the moral in relation to men, the third, the same as respects earthly things. In such ways they gained a repute of wisdom.

In opposition to this repute, the Apostle adds his judgment: not in any honour, οὐκ ἐν τιμῇ τινι. Here belongs ἔστιν, which follows ἀτινα, in order to contrast with "the repute of wisdom among the people," the Apostle's judgment, viz.: the repute is without honorable grounds, without true honor. This is strongly affirmed; there is nothing at all in it which is really honorable; hence "in any honor" is a sharp negation (οὐκ) of will-worship, humility and unsparingness of the body.—To this negative Paul adds a positive statement: [only] to the satisfying of the flesh, πρὸς πλῆσμονήν τῆς σαρκός.—The former clause denies "the repute of wisdom" as a just repute; this gives a motive for the negation, in connexion with "unsparingness of the body." The false doctrine tends (πρὸς) to a satisfying (in contrast with "unsparingness") of the fleshly nature (τῆς σαρκός opposed to σώματος). It is incorrect to render: "not giving to the flesh the honor due to its necessities" (LUTHER and others). Πληρομονή implies blame (BENGE: ferè excessum denotat) and cannot= πρόνοια (Rom. xiii. 14). The distinction between τοῦ σώματος and τῆς σαρκός, and the omission of τοῦ σώματος after ἐν τιμῇ τινι must not be overlooked. GROTIUS singularly deduces praise from this: habent ista rationem non stultam, si adsint cautiones, si sponte ista suscipiantur non abomi- nando ea, quæ deus creavit,—cum ea modestia animi, quæ alios aliter viuentes non damnet,—si hoc sibi propositum habeant, dure tractare corpus neque carni obsequi ad saturitatem.—[BRAUNE's view is that of MEYER, and is to be preferred, 1) as least ungrammatical; 2) as giving the best correlate to μέν; 3) preserving the distinction between σῶμα and σὰρξ; 4) bringing out the bad sense of πληρομονήν and thus conveying the sharp condemnation, that asceticism, while it appears to subdue the body, serves only to gratify the flesh and its evil nature. For other interpretations see EADIE, ALFORD, ELLCOTT. The latter agrees most nearly with BRAUNE.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Fasts and Feasts are placed together by the Apostle (ver. 16), while as a rule fasting and prayer occur together; Acts xiii. 3: "when they had fasted and prayed;" xiv. 23: "prayed with fasting;" 1 Cor. vii. 5: "fasting and prayer" (A. B. however omit the former). He forbids the one or the other, as little as Christ (Matt. vi. 5, 16); he does not annul the decree of the apostolic council (Acts xv. 20, 28), in which also the ethical and ritual are united. But he opposes first, asceticism which extends to "unsparingness of the body," secondly, an arbitrary abstinence from the means of nourishment obtained for eating and drinking, demanded equally from all, thirdly, those fasts connected with certain arbitrarily chosen days in the year, month and week. He thus opposes that dualistic view of the world, which does not regard and treat matter as the creature of God, which undervalues the body and its life, and in spite of its "unsparingness of the body" serves only "to the satisfying of the flesh;" he demands the maintenance of individual freedom and would commit all abstinence to the free moral resolution (as Rom. xiv. 2 sq., 1 Cor. viii. 1 sq., 1 Tim. iv. 3), and—as far as such abstinence is justified, and may be occasioned or required by internal or external circumstances, by the discipline necessary for the individual, or occurrences that affect him,—he would not have it mechanically and arbitrarily bound to special days, least of all that it should be regarded as of moral merit or as a work of supererogation, transcending or retrieving the purely moral law and moral conduct of life. The Christian should not bind his conscience to men, but only to God's word and God's law. Holy days and seasons should be determined by the great facts of salvation and the great acts of God, and not arbitrarily chosen. Thus we must judge both the Romish worship overrun with fasts and saints' days, and the Methodist and Baptist sects adhering to the Reformed Church. [The author, being a Lutheran, refers to the entire neglect of even such anniversaries as Christmas, Easter and Pentecost.—The special reference to the Methodists and Baptists must be confined to Germany,—and indeed in this country there is no applicability in his allusion to their adherence to the Reformed Church. It is true that until lately the prevailing practice of many churches in America would fall under the condemnation he hints at, and even now these historic days are observed socially rather than religiously, as holidays rather than holy days. The Lord's Day has always been kept in a truer position. I may add that "fasting" is practically ignored as a Christian duty from extreme antagonism to arbitrary fast days, but while the American Church has allowed "no man to judge" "in eating," it has permitted strict judgment "in drinking" to lay a burden on the conscience. Paul places both in the same category (ver. 16). However expedient abstinence may be, this passage (vers. 16, 20-23) forbids the infringement on Christian freedom which is quite common.—R.]

2. The distinction and the connexion of the Old and New Testament economy are here described. The former is "the shadow of things to come" (ver. 17) and "the rudiments of the world" (ver. 20), which are given in heathenism as well as Judaism; contrasted with the former, the New Testament economy is "the body," with the latter it is "perfection" (τελειωσις). Christianity is called "the power of God and wisdom of God" (1 Cor. i. 24), at once to distinguish it from Judaism and to describe it as pre-announced, pre-announced, prepared for in the same. The law is done away, not because it is in itself of no value, but because man is unable to fulfil it, obtains only in Christ, what he cannot attain without Him through the law. See SCHMID, Bibl. Theol. II. 233-235; 322-325. Catholic and Reformed confessions fail in this respect; they regard the gospel as a nova lex, and permit the distinction between the Old Testament and New Testament to fall into the background: the former is pharisaical, the latter spiritualistic. [The position of the law in the Reformed confession does not seem to me to warrant this remark. See the Heidelberg Catechism, Ques. 2, 91, 92. Belgic conf., xxiv. xxv. Perhaps others are more open to this charge. See also Form of Concord, VI.—R.]

3. The observance of the Lord's Day cannot be affected by the warning of Paul (ver. 16). It is certain that the persons who were judging them, were pressing the duty of observing the Jewish Sabbath, not the Christian Lord's Day. It is equally certain that the observance of a weekly day of rest is written in God's physical and social laws for man, as plainly as in the Decalogue. Nor can we escape the conclusion that the fourth Commandment is but a reminder of a previous institution, so that even those who might contend that the whole Mosaic law is abrogated, as a guide to Christian life, do not escape this enactment. But since the Christian would live gratefully, he still finds the rule in God's "holy, just and good" moral law, and sees in his very frame as well as in the frame-work of society, an additional reason for appropriating to "rest in God's service," one day in seven, rejoicing therein, since it now marks the great fact of his Lord's resurrection, and since his Master has Himself explained how it should be observed.—R.]

4. The importance of the doctrine respecting angels (PHILIPPI: Kirchl. Glaubenslehre I. p. 279 sq.), without which the doctrine respecting Satan remains incomprehensible, is as great as the danger from the rationalistic denial of angels, springing from a Sadducean view of the world, and the Romish adoration of angels, growing out of Essenic and dualistic heresy. The latter soon appeared in the Church. In Laodicea (at the council held between 343 and 381), it was forbidden in the 35th Canon. Ambrose first encouraged it (observandi sunt angeli). Augustine warns against it: imitandos eos potius, quam invocandos, and refers to the distinction between cultus religiosus and non religiosus. This, the second council of Nicæa (787) turned in favor of the adoration of angels, and the distinction established between λατρεία, invocation, and τιμητική προσκύνησις, δουλεία, pious veneration, must now serve as a support for the heathenish adoration of angels and worship of the saints (Conc. trid. sess. 25. Cat. Rom. 3. 2; 8. 10). Our symbols maintain: angelos a nobis non esse invocandos, adorandos (Articles of Schmalkald II. 2). [See Reformed Confessions and catechisms generally.—R.]

5. Christ the Head of the Church, is for her the foundation of all religious and moral life: she needs no other mediator with God.—

6. The Church is a living organism, not an establishment or institution. It is a unity of many members; it rests upon an act and work of God in Christ, is from God and to God, has as its end education for perfection and glory hereafter; and possesses, in the word and sacraments and the proper administration of the same, suitable means for the attainment of this end. As to its inmost being, it is a vital relation of the congregation [Gemeinde] to the ever present, spiritual-physically present Lord (HARLESS, Ethik. 6. Aufl. p. 564). [By "Geistlich"—which is untranslatable, Braune means the presence of Christ in the eucharist according to the Lutheran view. Vital union with Christ the Head is not less insisted upon by those who hold the really Calvinistic view.—R.] It is an organization (but not the source), for the facilitating and furthering of Christliness [Christlichkeit], and the sense of this fellowship founded and maintained by Christ with the corresponding conduct is Churchliness [Kirchlichkeit], which is indissolubly connected with Christliness. As Church and Churchdom [Kirche und Kirchenthum] are so distinguished, that the former, as a Divine act, legally and rightly, takes form in the latter, so there is a two-fold Churchliness; one holding fast to the revelation of grace and ordinance of salvation in Christ, the other adhering to the legal forms of a special Churchdom, which has been and is being humanly and historically developed. The former has its source in the invisible Church, the fellowship of the Spirit, the latter in the visible church, which is the fellowship of law, and hence only human, secondary, accessory; it is not the realization of the idea of the Church, but merely a help and external support (STAHL: Rechts- und Staats lehre, p. 164). All ecclesiastical canons non imprimunt credenda, sed exprimunt credita. But in thus distinguishing, rightly, the ordinances of salvation and of the Church, Christliness and Churchliness, and the latter again in this two-fold manner, care must be taken not to undervalue the latter, as well as not to overvalue it.

7. The principle of Christian liberty especially and of Christian life in general is, that one neither makes nor permits to be made an arbitrary law, and so exercises his Christianity upon all that is created, ordinances as well as gifts, that the creature is used in humble obedience to God's will, without the fleshly nature exalting itself. Asceticism degenerates into mere mechanical morality, casuistic hair-splitting about the divine law, an externalizing of self-discipline and self-exertion, a stirring up of spiritual pride. Under austerity respecting externals is concealed effeminacy with regard to heart-emotions, and in the unsparing plagues of the body the flesh is fondled.

[8. The connection of the two warnings. There is instruction in the connection of precepts in Paul's writings. Here are two warnings, one against fleshly legality, the other against worship of angels, both condemned as having a "show of wisdom"—but tending only to the satisfying of the flesh. The connection is not obvious, yet side by side the two errors have existed with the same result. In germ at Colosse, in full flower in the mediæval church, and in modern times, in America especially, fanatical binding of the conscience respecting articles of diet and drink, and "intruding into things not seen," craving for other "spiritual manifestations" than those coming from the Head, have taken root and flourished in the same localities, together with "a show of wisdom" and an intense "satisfying of the flesh." Error has its affinities and its unchanging law of development no less than truth.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Christ wants no legal man, who through zeal in good works will earn the love of God, but a spiritual man, whose faith through grateful love to God is diligent in every good word and work.—In winter fruit trees look more alike than in spring, summer and autumn; where life and liberty are wanting, there is monotony in faith and walk; while lifeless liberty makes every diversity prominent.

STARKE:—That is the devil's way, to judge and make conscience where none should be made, and to make none where it should be. Let us hold to Christ alone, and put no man or creature as mediator with Him; but hold to Him truly too, so that we have His witness, whether we have received of His Spirit to abide in us.—Will worship is worthless.

RIEGER:—Sincerity, which seeks God and clings to His Word, seizing salvation in Christ, as if it were I only in the world, whom it concerned; unity, joining itself to all who are called and pressing to the same goal with the same serviceableness; freedom, which binds and is bound by none in things that can neither hinder nor further me in the ordained course.—Each one has a corner in his heart where rash prejudices can hide, to break out swiftly in natural and spiritual things, so that we can quickly stumble at one thing, or thoughtlessly depreciate another.—[Self-will makes even humility, a vain puffing up.—R.]

GERLACH:—While one lives in the world, he serves its rudiments. Of these God made use in His law to typify in that time of childhood higher, eternal truths. But when the full light of truth has risen, to serve these is to be in bondage to the world. All this is renewed in Christendom, whenever Christ, as the only Mediator is supplanted or thrown into the background by other sub-mediators.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—The right way can only be the one way, in the likeness of the Divine Love to maintain the bond of love among each other, and in common with those who are our brethren to seek and to lead a spiritual life.—[The difficult wisdom of the gospel, which so few attain: rightly distinguishing the internal from the external, substance from shadow, spirit from letter.—R.]

PASSAVANT:—Habit and custom, the regular return of religious exercises and festivals, regular Sabbaths, periodical communion seasons, even set hours of meditations, even family worship otherwise so necessary in addition to public worship,—how easily do all degenerate into empty form and external posture without spirit and life.—He who does not hold to the Head, but holds rather to the thoughts of his own wisdom and the dreams of his own fancy, relying upon systems of human philosophy, upon highly gifted minds, or on the poesy of the human imagination, desiring to seek and find there all that is noble and exalted, salvation, joy, heaven itself, thereby denies and disowns the one great Reconciler and Redeemer, His Truth, His Love, His Right and His Glory: he loses in his folly and ingratitude the whole wealth of the Word of God; he takes the shadow instead of the body, the sheen for the true light, a self-made life for the true Life, God's Life in us.

HEUBER:—The Christian should maintain freedom of conscience. He should not depend on others, but follow his own conscience, not permitting himself to be bound to non-essential exercises. A superstitious over-estimate of things indifferent always leads away from Christ.—Young Stilling, although indulging in many fancies about spirits, remained faithful to the biblical principle, that all such attempts to open up the invisible world about him are culpable and opposed to the present probationary state of man. A Christian, clinging to Christ is secure against all such foolery, which would divert him from his aim.

WILHELM:—The holy simplicity of the Christian. It consists herein 1) that he keeps his goal uninterruptedly in view: 2) guards against all going according to his own choice: 3) studies true humility at heart.—LEHMAN:—Against what must we guard if we would not miss the mark of our heavenly calling? 1) Against our own choice in the matter of our blessedness; 2) against false humility; 3) against carnal mind.

CLAUS:—Two great dangers on the path to the heavenly goal; 1) the error of human ordinances; 2) the pride of our own heart.

[BURKITT:—Abstinence is sinful when men abstain from some meats, upon pretence of holiness and conscience, as if some meats were unclean, or less holy in their own nature than others, or as if simple abstinence at any time were a thing acceptable to God in itself, without respect to the end for which it is sometimes required.—Men are most forward to that service of God, which is of man's finding out and setting up; man likes it better to worship a God of his own making, than to worship the God that made him; and likes any way of worshipping God which is of his own framing, more than that which is of God's appointing.—HENRY: Ver. 19. 1) Jesus Christ is not only a Head of Government over the church, but a Head of vital influence to it. 2) The body of Christ is a growing body.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 16. Sensations of spiritual joy are not to be restricted to holy days, for they thrill the spirit every moment, and need not wait for expression till there be a solemn gathering, for every instant awakes to the claims and the raptures of religion.—Ver. 19. The church can enjoy neither life nor growth, if, misunderstanding Christ's person or undervaluing His work, it have no vital union with Him.—Ver. 20. Christ is the Head and to Him alone do we owe subjection.

What mean they? Canst thou dream there is a power
In lighter diet at a later hour
To charm to sleep the threatenings of the skies,
And hide past folly from all-seeing eyes? (COWPER).

Ver. 23. When Diogenes lifted his foot on Plato's velvet cushion and shouted "thus I trample on Plato's pride," the Athenian sage justly replied "but with still greater pride." The Apostle utters a similar sentiment. These corporeal macerations, as history has shown tend to nurse licentiousness in one age, and a ferocious fanaticism in another.—R.]

[BARNES:—Ver. 16. It is the solemn and sacred duty of all Christians to remit all attempts to make ceremonial observances binding on the conscience.—Ver. 18. "Pride may be pampered while the flesh grows lean."—WORDSWORTH: Ver. 18. Pride in its worst form; Pride dressed up in the disguise of lowliness. And this is the besetting sin of the human heart, which is more puffed up by false humility than by open pride.—R.]

[SCHENKEL:—The danger of constituting oneself a judge of the consciences of others; 1) why it is so near us; 2) why it must be so earnestly contended against.—Christ the only mediator between God and man: It is not humility, but pride, if we seek another.—The officious seeking after revelations outside the Revelation: 1) how dangerous; 2) how foolish it is.—The danger of spiritual pride; 1) Its source—the flesh; 2) its effects—inflation.—Who has died with Christ, can no longer live in the world: 1) The reason, 2) the power of this truth.—Will-worship: 1) a self-deception, 2) a deceiving of others.—Interference with allowable enjoyment by ordinances of men: 1) the wrong inherent in such interference; 2) the impurity to which it leads.—R.]

III. PART SECOND.

Exhortation to vital sanctification.

CHAPTERS III. 1—IV. 6.

1. The foundation and prospect of a genuine Christian mind and walk.

(CHAP. III. 1-4.)

1 If ye then be risen [were raised together]¹ with Christ, seek those things which are 2 above, where Christ sitteth [is, sitting] on the right hand of God. Set your affection
3 [mind] on things above, not on things on the earth. For ye are dead² [died] and 4 your life is [or hath been] hid [ἐκρυπται] with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life,³ shall appear [or be manifested], then shall ye also appear [or be manifested] with him in glory.

² Ver. 3.—[Ἀπεθνήκε; aorist, referring to definite past time, hence: "died"—as in ver. 1: "were raised."—R.]

³ Ver. 4.—N. C. D. E. F. G. and others read ἡμῶν; while B. and many others have ἡμῶν. A. has a lacuna here. The authorities are equal, the internal grounds also; the former is more striking, fitting, the latter the stranger, more difficult reading; not like the other dependent on ver. 3. Certainly it cannot be referred more to Paul and Timothy (Schenkel), but to Christians in general. [Braune, following Meyer, seems to prefer ἡμῶν; but with Rec., Lachmann, Tischendorf, and modern English editors, ἡμῶν ("our," E. V.) is to be preferred.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The injunction. Vers. 1, 2.

Ver. 1. If ye then were raised together with Christ takes up from the foregoing (ii. 12) a comprehensive thought, in a form reminding us of ii. 20, to make it the basis of the exhortation. "If," like ii. 20, is not a doubtful hypothesis, but fact (ii. 12), from which, as undeniable, a certain conclusion is deduced (οὕτως). By "raised together with Christ" we must understand the ethical renewal (see notes on ii. 12). MEYER, who apparently refers this also to the corporeal resurrection, overlooks the "shall be manifested" (ver. 4), and errs in regarding "actual" and "objective" as identical notions in contrast with "ethical;" this latter is no less actual. [ALFORD, ELLICOTT, WORDSWORTH refer the aorist to "baptism." It refers to the definite point of time when this actual, "ethical" change took place. Is that necessarily at baptism? The two former object to the ethical sense on the ground that the injunction which follows would then be superfluous. Why should not a motive be drawn from this? What has been done for them is the ground for their doing, "seeking."

—R.] Seek those things which are above.—Τὰ ἄνω, placed first for emphasis, is like τὰ ἐπουράνια (Eph. ii. 6); to seek such things is a necessary consequence and requirement of being "raised together with Christ." BENGE: Christus a resurrectione statim contendit ad cælum (Jno. xx. 17). Comp. Phil. iii. 14, 20; Matt. vi. 20, 23; Rom. ii. 7.—Where Christ is, sitting at the right hand of God.—"Where" marks "the things above" as the region of the heavenly things of the Messianic salvation; "Christ is, sitting at the right hand of God" indicates both the exultation after deep humiliation and certain rest after severe conflict. Thus a motive is given for the exhortation. Comp. Ps. cx. 1. [The passage seems to abound in motives, though this is the principal one. The E. V. overlooks the fact that there are two enunciations: "Christ is there, and in all the glory of His regal and judiciary power" (ELLICOTT).—R.]

Ver. 2. Set your mind on things above.—The emphasis rests on the object; hence it is placed first here also. This is not mere repetition. After "seek" (ζητεῖν), which manifests itself in active and outward conduct, prominence is given to the cogitations of thought (φρονεῖν, Phil. iii. 15, 19). BENGE: qui vere suprema querunt, non possunt non sapere suprema.—Not on things on the earth.—This is—τὰ ἐπίγεια, "earthly things" (Phil. iii. 19), τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, "the things that are in the world" (1 Jno. ii. 15). The earthly, that which is "to perish with the using" (ii. 22), should not be the object of inward care and thought; this is a sign of being "of the world," which is not=being "in the world" (Jno. xvii. 14, 16, 12). The use of earthly things is not forbidden, but we are bidden, in the right use of the earthly to mind and seek heavenly things. [THEOPHILUS: Four-footed beasts are like images of men who mind earthly things; but they who live righteous lives soar aloft, like birds, on the wings of the soul, and mind those things that are above (WORDSWORTH).—R.]

Ver. 3. The Proof. For ye died, i. e., died to the world, to the earth (ii. 20: "from the rudiments of the world"). The aorist (ἀπεθάρτετε) is used to denote an act that has occurred. Ye cannot then go backwards, live again or longer after the former fashion: your life is now another one.—And your life is hid with Christ in God.—"And" adds to the negative side, the having died, the positive side, "your life," which however is "hid." The perfect (κέκρυπται) denotes the continued relation, the verb itself marks the state of the existent life as still hidden, of course from the world, from men, from themselves also (1 Jno. iii. 2: "It doth not yet appear"); the coherence of the life of Christians is denoted by "with Christ," the inherence by "in God" (MEYER). Comp. 1 Pet. iii. 4: "the hidden man of the heart;" Acts xvii. 28: "in Him we live and move and have our being." [EADIE, against BARNES: "the idea of concealment, and not that of security, seems to be principally contained in the verb, for it is placed in contrast with open manifestation of Christ's appearance. But this concealment is no argument against present and partial enjoyment."—R.]—Evidently this is to be understood of eternal life, which has been awakened and is furthered in the present in consequence of the new birth. It remains concealed until its completion, which enters (ver. 4; Rom. viii. 19) with "the coming" (2 Thess. i. 8; 1 Tim. vi. 14; 1 Cor. i. 7; 2 Thess. i. 7) of its Author and Finisher, Christ. The Greek fathers, CALVIN, GROTIUS, MEYER, incorrectly regard it as the life hereafter, [ALFORD: the resurrection life.—R.], as if the Christian life were not already substantially, though incipiently, the life to be completed hereafter. GROTIUS is incorrect, jus ad rem rei nomine appellat; HEINRICH: sicuti Christus; ROSENUELLER: in mente dei. [ALFORD: notice the solemnity of the repetition of the articles; and so all through these verses.—R.]

Ver. 4. The exalted prospect. When Christ shall appear.—Rapidly, without καὶ or ὅτε, this reminder and prospect is added, to animate their zeal. "When" marks the time, viz.: the appearing of Christ.—Our life—[the E. V. inserts "who is," thus bringing out the force of the passage.—R.] This is in apposition with "Christ," as "the hope of glory" (i. 27). It forms the basis of the conclusion ("then shall ye also appear"); hence it is added to signify not merely that Christ is a remote and sundered Cause, but Impulse, Power, Object and Substance of the Life itself (Phil. i. 21; Jno. xi. 25). BENGE: Ratio sub qua manifestabitur. [EADIE is unfortunate in his interpretation: "shall appear in the character of our life." Christ is our life itself, the essence and the impersonation of it (ELLICOTT).—R.]

Then shall ye also appear with him in glory.—"Then" refers to "when" (BENGE, prius non debemus postulare); "ye also" to "Christ." [ELLICOTT: The more verbally exact opposition would have been "your hidden life;" but this the Apostle perhaps designedly neglects, to prevent ζωὴ being applied as it has been applied, merely to the resurrection-life.—R.] "With Him," which might otherwise have been omitted, is emphatic. "Appear with Him in glory" is—"glorified together" (Rom. viii. 17), there preceded by "suffer with Him," as this is by "died" (ver. 3; ii. 20: "with Christ"). Comp. 1 Cor. xv. 42-44, 53.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Here and hereafter no more fall into two incongruous parts, than the year with seed time and harvest, human life with childhood and riper age, man with body and soul, the church in invisibly visible manner, with its militant and triumphant congregations. It is more than indistinctness and superficiality, it is anti-christian error to say, as does Kaiffert (De ζωής αἰώνιον notionē, p. 93): vitam enim piām et honestam, quam homo Christianus in hac terra vivere possit ac debeat, Paulus dicere non poterat nunc cum Christo in deo (in cælis puta, in quibus Christus nunc est) reconditam esse, atque olim in splendide Jesu reditu de cælo revelatam iri: hæc nonnisi vitæ cælesti conveniunt. Such an affirmation grossly offends against the Lord's words (Jno. v. 24, "hath eternal life") and Paul's (Phil. iii. 20: "our conversation is in heaven"). So "ethical" and "physical" are very different, but not incongruous ideas. The Ethos should become Physis, and the latter should be made ethical. The Hereafter is not locally separated, is not a limited place, but a spiritual life-sphere, whose rudiments and germs lie in the narrow corporeal life, as in a concentric inner circle. God's world cannot be dualistically split into a visible and invisible world; as little can it be separated by a rationalistic or deistical cross-cut into an upper and under world. He has created His world, the material world, to be glorified with a receptivity for eternal spiritual being, finitum infiniti capax.

2. The Ethical Consequence of the Christian view is: in the earthly life to begin the heavenly, in time to seek and to find eternity, faithful in the least, the perishing, to gain the greatest, the eternal. Aptly and elegantly says the Epistle to Diognetus (chap. v. 6 in Scholz: Apostolic Fathers, p. 170) of Christians; they inhabit—Being in heaven. Comp. the beautiful hymn of Richter: es glänzet der Christen inwendiges Leben.

3. Only in and with Christ can we be even here assured of and joyful in eternal life; the true life is Christ in us.

4. The motive to constancy and fidelity in such a life is the glimpse of future glory, not the slavish fear of perdition, but child-like confidence and joy in the glory of the heritage and the heritage of glory.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Do not indefinitely seek what is above in heaven, but think of this, that there Christ is in glory with the Father, resting in the assurance of victory, taking part in the rule of the world. As the leaves that cool thee with their shade, shining in the sunlight and gaily rustling and dancing on the stem, were only born in the spring, begotten the summer before, in the sleeping eye as in a cradle, so in the heat of life is hiddenly prepared thy life to be manifested above: so God creates thy life in the quiet depth of the heart through and with Christ.—Wouldst thou be one day in heaven, then must heaven be in thee here: first the kingdom of God is in thee, then thou in it.

STARKE:—Ascendamus interim corde, ut olim sequamur et corpore (Augustine).—Think not, that by earnest meditation on the kingdom of God, all duties of house and office must be laid aside. We can find a place for that, even when the body is outwardly busy. Indeed through spiritual care of the soul, external business is properly regulated, sanctified and blessed.

GERLACH:—As Christ has concealed Himself from the bodily eye, and now lives a higher, heavenly, divine life; so does the Christian united to Him through faith. But the life of Christ will not always be thus concealed.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—The old man and the new man: this is the great contrast in which Paul's entire proclamation of the gospel moved. The old man is both the man of sin and the man of the law; the new man is both the new creature in whom Christ lives, and he, who serves the righteousness, which comes through faith and avails before God.—The walk is manifest, the life is hid, we can conclude respecting the latter, only from what is manifested in the former.

PASSAVANT:—The world knows not, sees not, what a new being has arisen in the believer through the risen Christ. He feels the life of Jesus in his heart.—Highest stand the prophets, apostles, martyrs, who "overcame by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and loved not their lives unto the death" (Rev. xii. 11). But all the rest, who have fought unto death, in patience and long-suffering, in holy fidelity, who are made kings and priests, will be called conquerors by their Head.

HEUBNER:—The higher, heavenly sense of the Christian proceeds from Christ, the Risen One,—this is its origin, its power—thither it goes also to His heavenly glory as its goal. He who has found the higher, forgets the lower.—PALMER:—The life in God: 1) a life of profound concealment, yet to be made manifest; 2) a life in blessed rest, yet with daily unrest and labor; 3) a life in heaven, yet with an appropriate blessing for earth.

GESETZ UND ZEUGNISS [a German theological periodical.—R.]: Live with Christ in God! 1) We have to make this way clear to ourselves; 2) to acquaint ourselves with the nature and quality of this life; 3) to inquire respecting the end, to which it develops itself.—The sign of spiritual resurrection; 1) heavenly mind; 2) divine life; 3) blessed hope.—The exhortation of the Apostle: Seek the things which are above! 1) How the Apostle explains it; 2) what grounds he adduces for it.—Our past and present and future [Unser Sonst und Jetzt und Einst.] 1) our past; a seeking and minding what is on the earth; a life without Christ and without God, manifest in sin and shame. 2) Our present; a seeking and minding what is above, where Christ is; a life hid with Christ in God. 3) Our future; a possessing and enjoying all that after which we here strive in faith; a life with God manifested with Christ in glory.

[ANDREWEES: Vers. 1, 2. Christ is risen, and if Christ then we. If we so be, then we "seek;" and that we cannot unless we "set our minds." On what? On "things above," not on earth, but where "Christ is." And why there? Because where He is, there are the things we seek for, and here cannot find. There He "is sitting" and so at rest. And at "the right hand" so in glory. "God's right hand" and so forever. These we seek, rest in eternal glory. These Christ hath found and so shall we, if we begin to "set our minds" to search after them.—LUTHER:—Ver. 2. We live not in the flesh, but we dwell in the flesh. BR. DAN. WILSON:—Things on earth too naturally draw us down, attract us, fix us. Esau's red pottage prevails over the birthright. The guests in the parable turn away to their land, or oxen, or families. The Gadarene mind wishes Christ to depart from its coasts.—R.]

[EDMIE:—The pilgrim is not to despise the comforts which he may meet with by the way, but he is not to tarry among them, or leave them with regret.—WORDSWORTH:—Be ye good trees. Now, in the world's eye, is your winter; to men ye appear like dry sticks. Your life is hid with Christ. Ye are dead in appearance, but not dead in reality; dead as to show of luxuriant leaves, but not dead in your spiritual root. Your root is Christ. His coming will be your summer. Then ye will put forth a glorious foliage. Ye will appear with Him in glory. And the leafy fig-tree of this world will be withered by His coming.—R.]

[BEVERIDGE:—Sermon on ver. 2. 1) Why “not on things on the earth?” a) they are below you and unsuitable to you both as men and Christians; b) they can never satisfy your desires; c) are troublesome and disquieting; d) unimportant and unnecessary (can neither make you happy themselves, nor conduce thereto); e) fleeting and unconstant. 2) Why “on things above?” a) nothing was made or designed as a proper object for our affections but these; b) our relations “above;” c) our possessions. 3) What affections? a) our thoughts and meditations; b) our affection of love; c) our desires; d) our joy. Thus become holy and happy.—R.]

2. General exhortations.

CHAPTER III. 5-17.

a) Exhortation to put off the old fleshly nature.

(CHAP. III. 5-11.)

5 Mortify therefore your¹ members which are upon the earth: fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection [lustfulness],² evil concupiscence [or shameful desire],³ and 6 covetousness, which is idolatry: For which things⁴ sake the wrath of God cometh on the 7 children of disobedience:⁵ In the which [Among whom]⁶ ye also walked sometime 8 [once], when ye lived [imperfect, were living] in them. But now ye also put off all these; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy [evil speaking],⁷ filthy [abusive]⁸ communi-9 cation out of your mouth. Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the 10 old man with his deeds; And have put on the new man, which is renewed [is being renewed]⁹ in [unto, εἰς] knowledge [,] after the image of him that created him:
11 Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor [omit nor]¹⁰ free: but Christ is all, and in all.

¹⁰ Ver. 11.—Before λευθερός, A. and others read καί, a few also before Σκῦθης, but both weakly supported. [“Nor” is unnecessarily supplied in the E. V.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The first exhortation concerning the relation to the pleasures and possessions of earth. Vers. 5-7.

Ver. 5. Mortify therefore your members, which are upon the earth.—“Mortify therefore” is joined to vers. 1-4, containing an inference from “were raised together” (ver. 1) and “died” (ver. 3). Their being dead has as its result a new life, in which a “making dead” (νεκροῖν) is possible and necessary. The verb (only here and Rom. iv. 19; Heb. xi. 12) is reddere νεκρόν, i. e., cadaver omnibus viribus privatum (πτόμα), stronger than θανατοῖν (Rom. viii. 13). See TITTMANN, Syn. I. p. 168. [The aorist denotes a definite act, which ELLICOTT thus expresses: "kill at once;" ALFORD: "put to death."—R.] After the Christian died (ver. 3), he has as quickened (ver. 1), with the newly gained vital power, to kill the "members which are upon the earth." This expression corresponds with the context, and refers in its sense to "putting off the body of the flesh" (ii. 11). There the whole organism was brought into view, here the individual members; there "of the flesh" describes what here, in accordance with ver. 3, is described by "which are upon the earth" (BENGEL: where is found the sustenance of those members, of which collectively the body of sin consists). Because they are "fleshly," there is a motive for putting them to death. This must be understood in an ethical, not a physical sense (LUTHER, UNGER and others), not of the Church members as the vital activities of the body of the Church (SCHENKEL); for the Christian is not required to mutilate his body, nor are members or masses of members "who are on the earth," organs of the Church and its activity, since it is a creation of God; the words might be applied to Christians, who are worldly-minded, but, as regards these, νεκροῦν, putting to death, is a duty only in the view of fanatics.

[ELLICOTT thus aptly paraphrases: "As you died, and your true life is hidden with Christ, and hereafter to be developed in glory, act conformably to it—let nothing live inimical to such a state, kill at once the organs and media of a merely earthly life." Put to death the portions of your body, which are the instruments of sin, as respects the sphere (on the earth) of these sinful activities, and the actions and desires below specified: a duty very different from and more difficult than asceticism, or obedience to "the commandments of men" (ii. 21, 22).—R.]

The substantives, which follow in appositional relation to "members," show more specifically what is meant: fornication, uncleanness, lustfulness, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry.—BENGEL: "these (μέλη, members) are enumerated." There is no metonymy here (DE WETTE), nor are these the ethical ingredients inhering in the members (MEYER, WINER's Gram. p. 494). On the first two and the last substantives, see on Eph. v. 3. "Lustfulness" (πᾶθος) [not limited to unnatural lust, as Rom. i. 26.—R.] and "evil concupiscence" (ἐπιθυμία κακή) are to be referred, according to the context, to sexual sin; the former denoting rather the formal eagerness, the latter the intrinsic unworthiness, determined by the object; the former is always the latter also, but not vice versa (1 Thess. iv. 5: "in the lust of concupiscence," ἐν παθεὶ ἐπιθυμίας). [The latter being more general.—R.] The category introduced by "fornication," on account of its manifold and frequent manifestations (Gal. v. 19), is prominently set forth in detail; unnatural uncleanness is included in the last two substantives, but not specially described (ERASMUS and others).

By the side of "fornication" thus specified, the Apostle puts "covetousness" as a second category, indicated by the article. Bengel: articulus facit ad epitasin et totum genus vitii a genere enumeratarum modo specierum diversum complectitur.

He gives prominence to this by means of the relative clause, which characterizes it and gives a motive for mortifying it. "Which" (quippe quæ, "which indeed;" WINER's Gram. pp. 111, 157). See on Eph. v. 5. It is incorrect to apply it to insatiable voluptuousness (ESTIUS and others) or to "gains from lust" (BAHR and others). [Braune in the parallel passage extends the application of the relative clause to all the preceding forms of sin, which application is grammatically inadmissible here, though allowable there. Πλεονεξία, "covetousness," is marked by the article as the notorious form of sin, not merely introduced thus as forming a new category; for while it is another form of sin, there is an intimate connection in point of fact, "monsters of covetousness have been also monsters of lust." Covetousness has as its primary object—wealth—but there is no objection to expanding its meaning here, as TRENCH does. He intimates that the Greek Fathers use this word to designate both the sins of impurity and avarice, "even as the root out of which they alike grow; namely, the fierce and ever fiercer longing of the creature which has turned from God, to fill itself with the inferior objects of sense is one and the same." Syn. N. T. § 24. This is idolatry. It is worthy of notice too that idolatry and lust are connected historically, as well as in the O. T. passim.—R.]

Ver. 6. For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh.—Thus he adds a motive for the necessity of the exhortation, "mortify:" you must either kill or be killed. The relative refers to the sins mentioned above,* on account of which "the wrath of God cometh." See on Eph. v. 6. [Also for notes upon: on the children of disobedience, which Braune rejects here.—R.] The absence of "on the children of disobedience" denotes a reference to God's judgment on earth, under which the saints also suffer. The expression, which is to be distinguished from "the day of wrath" (Rom. ii. 5), and the context which is to be distinguished from 1 Thess. i. 10, "the wrath to come," does not refer to the future judgment (MEYER, BLEEK and others). [ELLICOTT, following Theophilus, refers it to punishment here and hereafter. There is this strong objection to Braune's view, that the New Testament does not represent the wrath of God as coming in any sense upon the saints. If the longer reading be adopted, his remark is also grammatically incorrect. Whatever interpretation be put upon ἐν οἷς, the following verse excludes the Colossian Christians from the threatened wrath.—R.]

Ver. 7. Among whom ye also once walked.—If "on the children of disobedience" be retained, the relative must be joined to that antecedent; otherwise it refers as ὁ δὲ ἄ to the enumerated sins. "Once walked" denotes their conduct in different relations. See on Eph. ii. 2.—When ye were living in them.—[That is, in these sins, as the sphere of life. There is no tautology if the personal reference of the last clause be adopted.—R.] The verb, in emphatic position, marks the internal life with undisturbed gratification, while "walk" denotes the manifestations of it in thought, word and deed; the imperfect ("were living") refers to a continued state, the aorist ("walked") to the individual acts, corresponding thus with the meaning of the verbs. Their sinful walk was conditioned by their sinful nature, not merely by habit and circumstance. BENDEL: Vivebatis tanquam in vestro principio, origine, elemento (Gal. v. 25). Hence ἐν τοῦτοις and ἐν οἷς refer to the same antecedent. This is not tautological (MEYER) but emphatic: the first is not merely walking in heathenism, and the other a vicious life (SCHENKEL); the former is rather the "act" and the latter the "power" of sin (CALVIN) or the one "energy," ἐνεργεία, the other "habit of nature" (EUSTIUS).—[It is obvious how much is gained in the exegesis of this verse, by retaining "on the children of disobedience." It then means: "Among which children of disobedience ye also walked, when ye were living in these sins." Surely with preponderant uncial authority, this exegetical advantage should decide in favor of retaining it, instead of being used to support the omission as lectio difficilior.—R.]

* [ALFORD, reading ὁ δὲ ἄ, refers it to "idolatry" alone, and hence in his exegesis, makes it "the all-comprehending and crowning sin." MEYER, adopting the same reading, refers it to the whole immoral character just named.—R.]

The second exhortation concerning their social relations to each other. Ver. 8-11.

Ver. 8. But now ye also put off all these.

—"Put now" (ἐννὶ δε), in contrast with "once," (πότε, ὅτε), is the present Christian state, which begins with conversion. Hence "put off" corresponds with "mortify" (ver. 5), or "put away from you" (Eph. iv. 31), and "ye also" puts the readers here beside other Christians, as in ver. 7 by other heathen. "All these" (τὰ πάντα) refers to what follows (WINER'S Gram. p. 102); not to all those (ver. 5) and these also which follow (MEYER, SCHENKEL). [ELLIOTT, ALFORD follow MEYER, but BRAUNE's view is more strictly grammatical. EADIE unfortunately makes the verb indicative instead of imperative.—R.]—Anger, wrath, malice, evil-speaking, abusive communication out of your mouth.—See on Eph. iv. 31. The last substantive is wanting there, but corresponds to αἰσχροτύχη καὶ ὑποβολή (Eph. v. 4). It describes shameful speech in general, which, according to the context injures the neighbor, who hears it or of whom it is spoken, as "evil speaking" (βλασφημία). It is not to be applied to lewd speaking (FLUTHER and others), at least not exclusively, though it may include it. The first three substantives form a climax, describing the internal condition, from perceptible excitement to passionateness which is its basis, then to deep-seated malicious nature; the other two refer to speech, hence to both is significantly added: "out of your mouth." It might be joined with "put off," but without any reference to the first three, since it would not be enough that among Christians these never found expression in words (SCHENKEL); they should not be found at all.

Ver. 9. Lie not one to another.—See Eph. iv. 25. Εἰς denotes the direction: belie not one another. [The practice is thus stamped as a social wrong (ELLIOTT). MICHAELIS observes that it is only in this Epistle and that to the Ephesians, that the Apostle warns his readers against lying (BARNES).—R.] The aorist participles

(which follow (vers. 9 b-11) give a motive for the injunction in vers. 8, 9 a.—Seeing that ye have put off the old man.—[The E. V. thus admirably expresses the force of the aorist participle ἀπεκδυσάμενοι.—R.] The aorist requires this as the Apostle's view: first, the experienced death and rising, then the active mortification of the members, first the experienced putting off the old man and putting on the new, then the active removal of what is contrary thereto, here a motive, drawn from what has preceded, is pre-supposed. Hence the Vulgate: expoliantes, and BENDEL: "putting off," as if it were contemporaneous, are incorrect; LUTHER also: put off, as though it were an injunction. The verb is to be taken according to the parallel expression (Eph. iv. 22: ἀποθεθε) like the substantive ii. 11, and its object as in Eph. iv. 22. The old man, the sinful nature as it is before conversion and regeneration is to be laid off as a garment that has become useless, with all its peculiarities, hence: with his deeds.—Here is the stringent conclusion that what was detailed above must of course be put away. Comp. Rom. viii. 13; Gal. v. 24: "the flesh with the affections (παθήματα) and lusts."

Ver. 10. And have put on the new man.

—The putting off and on, connected by καί, are to be regarded as contemporaneous, according to the principle: natura et gratia non patiuntur vacuum (nature and grace do not tolerate a vacuum); only in the domain of grace in distinction from the physical, the initiative is with the new man and in virtue of the divine power creating him. In contrast with παλαιός, old, we have in Eph. iv. 24, καινός, new, as not yet present, here νέος; παλαιός being therefore old, superannuated, senile; both are found in Eph. iv. 23, 24 (ἀνανεοῦσθαι—καινόν) and here in the adjective and added participle. The motive drawn from νέον, recent, young, as it were [newly entered and fresh state. ELLIOTT.—R.], lies in the danger prepared by the false teachers for Christians, who had been just now or not long converted.

The condition of the new man and his immediate task is more closely defined: which is being renewed, τὸν ἀνακαινούμενον.—The present participle denotes what is to go on in the present. The context requires the middle sense to denote the self-exertion, the active life. The new man is not anything complete at once, but in a state of vital growth, of further development, and that by the Holy Spirit (Tit. iii. 5). [This seems to contradict the last opinion that the participle is middle. ALFORD, ELLIOTT, WORDSWORTH all regard it as passive. The latter naturally suggests: "the new man was born in you at your regeneration in baptism, but needs the daily renewal of the Holy Ghost." Omit "in baptism," and the explanation will be generally received as correct. The passive or middle interpretation will be adopted as the stress is laid upon the divine or human side of the progressive work of sanctification, and yet as the Apostle is speaking of the new man, of our becoming holy, which lies back of active holiness, the passive is to be preferred. The new man is being renewed, rather than renewing himself.—R.] Comp. 2 Cor. iv. 16. The preposition ἀνά marks the further, upward, onward striving, which is then more closely defined:

Unto knowledge, after the image of him that created him.—"Unto knowledge" denotes the end, "after the image of Him that created him," the norm. According to ii. 2; i. 9, "knowledge" is not further characterized as a knowledge corresponding to the image of the Creator, for by thus regarding both clauses as one (HOFFMANN, MEYER), no natural sense is given. In this knowledge, which cannot be supplied by worldly wisdom, the new man must grow according to the image of his Creator, God; this image is Christ, since the Christian is a "new creature" (2 Cor. v. 17). There is an unmistakable allusion and reference to the first creation" (Gen. i. 25, 27). The second new creation is not to be separated from the first, the Christian is the genuine man, Christianity is true, God-willed humanity. [The latter clause is to be joined with "being renewed" (ALFORD, ELLICOTT). The final word "him" refers to the "new man." The passage means more than the restoration of the image of God lost by Adam. "It is certain that the image of God, in which Christ's Spirit re-creates us, will be as much more glorious than that, as the second man is more glorious than the first" (ALFORD). So EADIE in loco. Compare Eph. iv. 24.—R.]

Ver. 11. Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond, free.—"Where" refers to the region of the new creation in Christ, in contrast with the domain of creation without Christ; in the latter there is division, contrariety and discord; in the former union, fraternity. Just as in the parallel passage (Eph. iv. 25: "for we are members one of another"), this fellowship of the regenerate, the converted, requires truth and friendship among each other. It is incorrect to join "where," as =qua in se, to the yet remote "knowledge" alone, finding here its object now brought in (SCHENKEL). ἔνι means, as in Homer: there is there, therein; οὐκ ἐνι denies division as respects nationality ("Greek and Jew").* as respects religion ("circumcision and uncircumcision"), culture ("Barbarian, Scythian"), social status ("bond, free"). It is worthy of note, that, in nationality, the Greek who ruled in language is put before the Roman who held empire; in religion, Israel honored with revelation takes precedence; in culture, the step is from the uncultivated to the extreme savage (BENGE: "Scythians, more barbarous than the Barbarians;" βαρβαρότατοι), as in Rom. i. 14, the polished Greek not being again mentioned, while the summary is indicated by the omission of the conjunction; in the social category, the slave stands before the freeman to note the receptivity of the insignificant, and the exalting power of the gospel. Comp. Gal. iii. 28. [LANGE's Com. pp. 88, 91.—R.]

But Christ is all and in all.—"But" presents the contrast to the condition in the region of the natural life; hence within the Church there is not difference, divisions; in spite of the distinctions, there is no schism there, but union, concord on the ground of unity; in all these four directions (τὰ πάντα), and in all the individual persons, the Christians ("in all," καὶ ἐν πᾶσι) is the same (Χριστός), "who alone occupies the whole, as the saying is, between stem and stern, and is both beginning and end" (CALVIN). Comp. 1 Cor. xv. 28; Gal. vi. 15. BENGE: "Scythian is not Scythian, but Christ's; Barbarian is not Barbarian, but Christ's. Christ is all things, and that in all who believe. In Christ are new creatures." [MEYER: "The subject is placed at the end, for the greatest emphasis. He, the all determining principle of the new life and activity (τὰ πάντα) in all his believers (ἐν πᾶσι), forms the higher unity, in which all those old divisions and antitheses become without significance and as if no longer existing." ELLICOTT: "Christ is the aggregation of all things, distinctions, prerogatives, blessings, and moreover is in all, dwelling in all, and so uniting all in the common element of Himself."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Christian Exhortation. All truly Christian exhortation to a moral life, internal and external alike, is directed mainly towards the right use of salvation as already possessed, towards its preservation in given circumstances, and the maintenance of conduct which meets the conditions of the rightly adjusted relations of the Christian. What is accepted and received as a germ through faith in the mercy of God in Christ, must be held fast, ever more vitally appropriated, nourished and developed practically in every direction. The regenerated believer, with the powers imparted to him by God, must now so work, that his action and conduct are as much his consenting, as God's continued action. Christ for us becomes Christ in us, and Christ before us becomes Christ through us.

2. The world in and about the Christian. With respect to its pleasure, sensual, especially sexual pleasure, he must strive after purity; with respect to its possessions, after contentment, in order not to fall away from God and under His wrath. [For the sin of sensuality is not only intimately connected with that of covetousness, but both are essentially idolatrous. Those "without God" (Eph. ii. 12) are "in the world," and the world's pleasures and possessions are put by them in the place of God.—R.]

3. Towards his neighbor, especially the brethren, there must be friendliness in disposition, word and truth.

4. All sin must be repelled. All that is opposed to what is required, both in its various shades from coarser to finer and finest, and in its different manifestations in act, word, thought, perception, from external to internal and inmost, must be contended against and repelled. Only what is sinful, yet all that is sinful, is contrary to Christianity and Christian character.

5. Christ the point of unity. Upon the absolute dignity of Christ and His central position toward the world (i. 17: "in Him all things subsist"), which points to His Divine Fulness (i. 19; ii. 9), to Him as the image of the Creator, rests the fact that He is the absolute point of unity, the central and terminal point for men. What He is for the macrocosm He is also for the microcosm; He is the Second Adam, "a quickening spirit" (1 Cor. xv. 45). Hence the requirement to become a Christian and be a Christian must be deemed absolute for every man. Union with Christ is absolutely right, but it alone; contrasted with it all diversities as to nationality, confession, culture and station (ver. 11) are only relatively right; this they are, in so far as that absolute right remains unimpaired. Cosmopolitism in political and social life, union in denominational life are fruitless, or stunted products of the natural man working within the Church, when and where they do not recognize and maintain union with Christ, established above all unions. This is then the rule: one with Christ, united with one another. By this every Christian, that is every evangelical Christian, and every age, such as that of the Reformation, must be tested. [By it too must be tested many human organizations, which aim at uniting selfish men so as to contribute to the common good. Many social and political problems remain to be solved, but social science has not always remembered that "the putting on of the new man" alone brings man "where there is neither Greek nor Jew—bond nor free, but Christ all and in all."—R.] Compare the notes on Eph. iv. 22 sq.; v. 25; v. 5, 6.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

With every sin look at its concealed beginning in the heart, and its public issue in the judgment of God, who regards the heart.—Be not content with strength enough to prevent the sin of the heart from breaking out unto word and work. Be so ashamed of the past, that the present may not be as it was, and the future become far worse.—As a rule lying to others is closely connected with lying about others.

STARKE:—Improvement of the sinful life is as difficult for the flesh, as if the man should go to his death; for he is as much in love with fleshly lusts, as if this were his life. One of the chiefest members of the old man is "the lust of the flesh;" this secret poison hides in all. Though this fire be at once quenched in believers, yet, if they do not take care, the ever-glowing cinders may easily and quickly burst into a flame again. 2 Sam. xi. 2 sq.—Covetousness breaks not only the eighth and tenth commandments of the second table, but the first and second of the other also; hence the covetous are idolaters too.—Old rags we throw away; sin, which makes us so old and deformed and ugly before God, the Christian must so put away, that he not only restrains its outbreak, but also exhausts the spring itself, draining it more and more, even if he does not dry it up entirely.—[What a mark of our great corruption, that the tongue, which should be the means of doing our neighbor good, is so often the instrument to injure him.—R.]—The state of the regenerate is a putting off the old and a putting on the new man. Hence in a believer there are as it were, two men or a double nature, Spirit and flesh, which contend against each other. Gal. v. 17. The one from its corrupt propensity wills what is evil, the other from divine operation what is good.

RIEGER:—With all that belongs to the old nature, we are never done; yet we should not be grieved by the way; the quietest plan is with childlike mind to learn, and to regard the matter as ever in progress.—GERLACH:—The capacity for knowing and loving God is that alone wherein man excels the rest of creation, whereby he rules it. Is he a mirror of the Most High, then there is in him an image of God, which sin has not obliterated, but so polluted and marred that his own power can never more restore it.—When the image of God is restored in the soul, the partition-walls among men fall down.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—When Christians seem to us to be not yet permeated entirely by the new life in Christ, we may not thence infer an entire lack of the Spirit.—Paul admonishes them to put off their old members, not by virtue of the old man itself, but by virtue of the new and because the vital strength of the new man in them is presupposed.—This work of putting off the old man and putting on the new is a common one, and we should not believe in the fancy that somewhere it is wanting altogether.

PASSAVANT:—[Ver. 15. Covetousness which is idolatry can be found among Christians, in men who rejoice in a Christian education, and bow before the cross of Christ as the tree of life. The life of the covetous man is hid with his hoards in iron chests; the life of the Christian is "hid with Christ in God."—Ver. 7. It is better, if one has never walked in these things, if they have never been the elements of our life, for then our sanctification is easier. On this account we should learn the fear of God from our youth.]—Ver. 8. A single word, slipping from the mouth of the Christian can pollute the whole God-sanctified new man.—[Ver. 9. It is long before a tongue, hitherto unaccustomed to lie, becomes accustomed to the truth; this is the work of the Spirit of God, which is the Spirit of truth.]—Ver. 11. God regards in us only His Son and His image, as He hates only the old man and his corruption.—R.]

[BURKITT:—Ver. 7. No argument will prevail more with a Christian to follow on the work of mortification closely for the time to come, than the remembrance of his long continuance in sin in time past.—Ver. 9. Lying makes a man like the devil, who was a liar as well as a murderer from the beginning.—Ver. 11. O blessed Jesus! Art thou thus all to me? I will labor to be all to thee; to give thee all that I am.—R.]

[HENRY:—Ver. 5. It is very observable, that among all the other instances of sin which good men are recorded in the Scripture to have fallen into; (and there is scarcely any but some or other in one or other part of their life, have fallen into;) there is no instance in all the Scripture of any good man charged with covetousness.—Ver. 9. Lying makes us like the devil (who is the father of lies), and is a prime part of the devil's image upon our souls.—Ver. 10. The new man is said to be renewed in knowledge; because an ignorant soul cannot be a good soul. Light is the first thing in the new creation, as it was in the first.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 5. If the heart is dead let all the organs which it once vivified and moved die too—nay, put them to death. Let them be killed from want of nutriment and exercise.—This desire of having more, and yet more, is idolatry. What it craves it worships, what it worships it makes its portion.—Ver. 11. 1. Such distinctions do not prevent the on-putting of the new man. 2. In the church, prior and external distinctions do not modify the possession of spiritual privilege and blessing.—WORDSWORTH:—Ver. 5. You must be dead to earth, in order to life in heaven. While we mortify our members upon the earth, we quicken our members in heaven.—R.]

b) Exhortation to Christian love one toward another, and to glorifying the name of Christ in word and work.

CHAPTER III. 12-17.

- 12 Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy [or saints]¹ and beloved, bowels of 13 mercies [mercy], kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, longsuffering: Forbear-ing one another, and forgiving one another [each other],² if any man have a quarrel [or complaint, μομφήν] against any: even as Christ³ forgave you, so also do ye [doing 14 yourselves].⁴ And above [But over]⁵ all these things put on charity [love], 15 which⁶ is the bond of perfectness. And let the peace of God [Christ]⁷ rule in your hearts, to the which also ye are [were] called in one body; and be ye thankful.
16 Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly [;] in all wisdom; [omit semi-colon] teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and [omit and]⁸ hymns [and] spiritual songs, singing with grace [in grace⁹ singing] in your hearts to the Lord 17 [God].¹⁰ And [everything] whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus,¹¹ giving thanks to God and the Father [God the Father]¹² by him.

¹ Ver. 12.—[“Ἅγιοι, “saints,” if used substantively as Branne holds. See EXEG. NOTES. There are several quite unimportant various readings in this verse; οἰκτιρμοῦ and πραΰτητα are preferable to οἰκτιρῶν and πραότης of the Rec.—R.]

² Ver. 13.—[Ἀλλήλων—ἐαυτοῖς; there is nothing in the E. V. to indicate that different words follow the two participles.—R.]

³ Ver. 13.—Instead of ὁ Χριστός, C. [K. L., most versions, Tischendorf, Meyer, Ellicott, Wordsworth, Rec.], A. B. and others [Lachmann, Alford] read ὁ κύριος. N. ὁ θεός. Besides, θεός τοῦ Χριστοῦ, deus in christo, occur.

⁸ Ver. 16.—Καὶ before ὑμνοῖς and ψαλμοῖς added from Eph. v. 19.

⁹ Ver. 16.—[Branne omits the article before χάριτι and renders “in thanksgiving.” But it is retained by most modern editors on the authority of B. and others. See EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 16.—[Τῷ θεῷ is the reading of the mass of MSS., adopted by most modern editors; κυρίῳ, Rec. Lachmann, probably taken from Eph. v. 19.—R.]

¹² Ver. 17.—[Καί, probably from Eph. v. 20, is omitted in N. A. B. C., by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Ellicott, Wordsworth.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The virtues of the new man in intercourse with the brethren (vers. 12-14).

Ver. 12. Put on therefore.—To the “have put on the new man” (ver. 10) there is joined, as a consequence (“therefore”), the positive precept, which finds a motive, as a continuing and valid requirement, in the “being renewed;” although they have put on the new man, they have yet to take up anew the single parts. [ELICOTT, following HOFFMANN, thinks ὅν has here more of its reflexive force, taking up what has been said and continuing it: “as you have put on the new man, put on all its characteristic qualities.” But even this paraphrase implies a “moral consequence.” “For although the putting on of the new man as a fact, has historically occurred through the conversion to Christ, yet it has, according to the nature of the new man, its continued acts, which should occur, viz., through the appropriation of those virtues, which the new man as such must possess” (MEYER).—R.]

As the elect of God, [holy or] saints and beloved, conditions the justice of the precept and the indispensableness of complying with it. “As” gives prominence to the actual condition, relation, in which they stand.—“Elect of God” is used substantively as Matt. xxiv. 31; Mark xiii. 27; Luke xviii. 7; Rom. viii. 33; Tit. i. 1: “saints” (ἁγιοί) as Rom. i. 7; xv. 25, 26, 31; xvi. 2, 15; 1 Cor. i. 2, etc. Ἅγιος τοῦ θεοῦ (Mark i. 24; Luke iv. 34; Jno. vi. 69) is a description of the Christian; ἅγιοι αὐτοῦ (“His saints”) also occurs (2 Thess. i. 10). The position of the genitive (τοῦ θεοῦ) however requires it to be joined with the first term (“elect”). “Beloved” is also used substantively as Eph. i. 6. The climax here is unmistakable: as to the ground, they are without desert “elect of God,” as to their condition they are “saints,” as to their relation to God, they are, as the perfect denotes, the continued objects of His love (1 Thess. i. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 13). BENDEL: “the order of words corresponds exquisitely with the order of things: eternal election precedes sanctification in time, the sanctified feel love, and then imitate it.” The last, firmly founded on the preceding, has the stress laid on it. All three are correlatives of “putting on the new man,” which presupposes the “election of God” (vers. 10, 11). Hence neither are the last two substantives and the first an adjective (BLEEK), nor the first subject and the two others predicates (MEYER, BENDEL). [So also EADIE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT. Either view is admissible on grammatical grounds. ELLICOTT urges that the force of the exhortation rests on their character as “elect,” while ALFORD insists that as ἐκλεκτοί is a word, which must find its ground independently of us in the absolute will of God, it cannot be an adjunctive attribute of the other two. On the whole the view of MEYER, followed by the commentators just mentioned, and implied in the E. V., is preferable. For it seems better accordant with Paul’s method of stating the truth of Divine grace, and with the position of the words to lay the emphasis upon the phrase “elect of God,” and not to regard the three phrases as co-ordinate. “The consciousness of this extraordinary privilege, of being the elect of God, who as such are holy and beloved of God—how it must have affected the conscience of the readers and aroused them to the very virtues, corresponding with so high a position, which Paul here enjoins!” MEYER.—R.]

Bowels of mercy, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering.—“Bowels of mercy” stands foremost; viscera of the quality of mercy, of which they are the seat. Phil. ii. 1, we find “bowels and mercies.” The first word denotes what is inmost, most individual (Phil. i. 8; Philem. 12; 2 Cor. vi. 12; 1 Jno. iii. 17). Luke i. 78, “tender mercy of God” lit., “bowels of mercy of God” is similar. So Eph. iv. 32, “tender-hearted,” “heart of mercy” (εὐσπλαγχνία). The manifestations of mercy then follow, forming a climax; “kindness” which as the opposite of “severity” (Rom. xi. 22) helps outward need, “humbleness of mind” (ταπεινοφροσύνην) which recognizes our own unworthiness and the superiority or talent of a brother, “meekness,” which as the opposite of “fierceness” (ἀγριότης), is mild toward faults which are blameworthy, and “long-suffering” which restrains itself so as to quietly bear reprehensible injuries in the hope of a better mind and consequent improvement on the part of the offender. See on Eph. iv. 2, 32. TITTMANN, Synon. I. 140-142. [Comp. TRENCU; Syn. New Testament, sub vocibus. He makes “meekness” to be at first in respect to God, then toward men as growing out of this. But in this case it is primarily toward man, though implying the other as its ground (ALFORD, ELLICOTT, while EADIE excludes the reference to God).—R.]

Ver. 13. Forbearing one another and forgiving each other.—These participles define the modality of the exhibition of the virtues just mentioned; they must be appropriated by practice which makes the master. The present tense indicates permanence. On “forbearing,” see Eph. iv. 2, on “forgiving,” Eph. iv. 32. “One another” (ἑλῆν ἑλῶν) marks the purely reciprocal, mutual enduring, forbearing; “each other” (ἑαυτοῖς) indicates at the same time also, that they have experienced such forgiveness from without, from Him who is their Example. That which is difficult to bear and forgive in others, is not simply what one does against us, but also what he does in general, what is displeasing, unpleasant, or offensive in his manner, whatever in his relations to us may give occasion for blame (μομφήν), so that the participles refer to all the preceding virtues, not to the last one only. BENDEL arbitrarily distinguishes: forbearing in present offences, forgiving past offences.

If any man have a complaint against any.—[Μουῖός, only here in N. T., but classical: “ground of blame,” “just cause of complaint.”—R.] TITTMANN, Syn. I. 29. distinguishes ἀμεμπτος and ἀμωμος—each is free from blame, the former because it is perfect and absolute in its members, the latter because it is free from vice; in the former nothing more can be desired, in the latter there is nothing to be reprehended. On this account, as well as because πρός, not κατά, is here used, a more general relation than that of hostility is indicated; this must be regarded as referring in general to an experience occurring every where, yet mildly described hypothetically, that one can easily find something to blame in another, as is indicated above. [The Greek conditional protasis here used always implies that the hypothesis is correct.—R.]

Even as Christ forgave you, so also doing yourselves.—Χαρίζομενοι is to be supplied in thought (WINKER’S Gram. p. 526). Hence there is no parenthesis here, nor a disrupted sentence, as though an imperative were to be supplied. [The E. V. gives the imperative, which is objectionable; ELLICOTT preserves the construction by rendering as above.—R.] This expression is explained, ii. 13; Eph. iv. 32. Here we have “Christ,” in Eph. i. 1: “God in Christ;” this variation will explain ii. 13. BENDEL is excellent: Christus, cui maxima fuerat nobiscum querendi causa. Accordingly “the grace (χάρις) of the Lord Jesus Christ” is often spoken of. “As” denotes the mode of forgiveness, as Luke vii. 37-47; xxiii. 34, not the accomplishment of reconciliation with God by His death.

Ver. 14. But over all these things put on love.—“Love,” as in i. 4, 8; Eph. iv. 2, is to be taken as “brotherly love,” which must come over all those virtues, upon them (ἐνδύσασθε, ver. 12). [So E. V. supplies "put on," though "above" may or may not have the local or semi-local (ELLICOTT) force, which ἐπὶ here conveys. EADIE renders "in addition to," weakening the force of the passage. WORDSWORTH quotes Clement, who apparently refers "love" to "love to God."—R.] In reference to this "love," the Apostle adds: which is the bond of perfectness.—By the neuter [ὁ, not ἡ ἡ ἡ—R.] the putting on of love as an act, is denoted. [The article is wanting—hence Braune renders "a bond." ELLICOTT says the omission may be due to the verb substantive.—R.] Συνδεδεσμος, the encircling band, reminds us of a girdle, put over the clothes to hold them together. The genitive therefore adds those virtues included under the category of "perfectness," as Acts viii. 23: "the bond of iniquity;" Eph. iv. 3: "bond of peace." It is parallel with "in love" (Eph. iv. 2). Comp. Rom. xiii. 10: "love is the fulfilling of the law." The Pythagoreans called friendship "the bond of all the virtues." Hence ὁ is not to be rejected and ἡ ἡ ἡ substituted (BLEEK), nor ἀγάπη to be regarded as neuter (MEYER); ii. 19 is not a parallel case, since there the masculine is used, and the construction is according to the sense, as Christ is conceived of under κεφαλή. Nor is love to be regarded as the upper garment (MEYER), nor "bond" as "sum total" (Insbegriff, OLSHAUSEN), nor as the efficient cause of "perfectness" (SCHENKEL); nor yet is the genitive to be taken attributively as that of quality (GROTIUS). [To refer "which" to the putting on of love is a doubtful interpretation. It does not agree so well with the figurative representation of the Apostle, who has already been speaking (ver. 12) of what they were to put on, and seems to be mentioning here the last garment required to complete the attire. To make the act of putting on the "bond of perfectness" would be an unnecessary obscuring of the metaphor; especially as we may readily take ἀγάπη absolutely. There is the same objection perhaps to MEYER's view, that love is here represented as an upper garment, but a close-fitting upper garment might well be, at the same time, the bond which enclosed and held together all the others. Adopting this view, we may not only say, that love itself is "that bond which unites all the graces into completeness and symmetry" (EADIE), but "without love there is no perfectness; this has its conditio sine qua non in the including of all its other parts in love" (MEYER). Love is the principal of all the other virtues, but is here named last, as if supplementary, because of the figure. Braune's view of the genitive, which is that of MEYER, is to be preferred to that of ELLICOTT, who regards it as a genitive of the subject: "love is the bond which belongs to, is the distinctive feature of perfection." ALFORD well remarks: "Those who find here justification by works, must be very hard put to discover support for that doctrine."—R.]

The frame of mind in which Christian love is to be exercised. Ver. 15. And let the peace of Christ rule in your hearts.—This is not a command, but only a wish, the fulfilment of which is of importance. The subject, which in Phil. iv. 7 is "the peace of God," is that peace wrought by God through Christ in the Holy Ghost, which, according to Jno. xiv. 27 ("my peace I give unto you"), can be accurately termed "of Christ." (See WINER's Gram. p. 175.) It is the calm of the soul resting on the consciousness of having a reconciled God and Father, in Christ the Saviour.—[ELLICOTT says, the idea in Phil. iv. 7 "is substantially the same, except that perhaps peace is there contemplated as in its antithesis to anxious worldliness, while here it is rather to the hard, unloving and unquiet spirit that mars the union of the one body." It must not be limited to, though it certainly includes, mutual concord.—R.]—The verb ἡ ἡ ἡ, "to be an umpire," and as such to award the prize as well as regulate the contest, marks the administrative activity in distinction from the legislative found in ἡ ἡ ἡ. [The idea of presiding, ordering, ruling, is to be retained; the reference to bestowing (WORDSWORTH), or even winning a prize, which some commentators find here, is forbidden by the phrase which follows.—R.]—The phrase "in your hearts," ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ὑμῶν, is not—"in you," ἐν ὑμῖν (ver. 16); it refers to the inner, most individual relations, where the peace of Christ is to rule; it is not therefore to be referred to the unity of believers among themselves (Greek Fathers, CALVIN, GROTIUS, MEYER).

To the which also ye were called in one body.—["To the which," almost=for into it (ELLICOTT).—R.] This peace is the immediate end of the calling; this calling is marked by "also" (καὶ), which joins it to "rule," as that to which the rule of peace has to correspond. The result of the consummation of the calling on the part of God, and of its acceptance on the part of men, is described by "in one body" This refers to the Church as the body of Christ (Eph. iv. 4; ii. 16); which is the sphere and place, in which this calling is consummated and the called are to move. Therefore it is not—εἰς ἓν σῶμα (GROTIUS), nor is the Church as an organism the object of the Divine calling (SCHENKEL), which is addressed to individual persons. The calling in itself and the implanting in the Church constitute a benefit, important on account of the peace joined with it, and obligating to friendliness toward the brother, who has become partaker of the same; hence Paul adds: and be ye thankful [sc. to God.—R.]—Comp. ii. 7; iv. 2; Eph. v. 4. Knowledge of the benefit of the calling and the peace, together with gratitude therefor, must increase. The adjective (εὐχαριστοί) does not occur elsewhere in N. T. Incorrectly rendered "amiable," "friendly," by JEROME, ERASMUS, BAHR, [CALVIN].

Helps to the exercise of Christian love. Vers. 16, 17.

Ver. 16. Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly.—"The word of Christ" is the word which He has spoken and caused to be proclaimed (1 Thess. i. 8; iv. 15; 2 Thess. iii. 1), and which communicates the inward peace, directing and leading to right conduct toward the brethren: "the word through which ye were called" (BENGEL); elsewhere called "the word of God" (i. 25; 1 Cor. xiv. 36; 2 Cor. ii. 17; iv. 2) from its highest cause, "of truth" (Eph. i. 5, 13) from its purport, "of life" (Phil. ii. 16) from its effect. But it must have a permanent locality, "as in a temple" (BENGE): let it dwell "among you," as the context demands. It is not—"in your hearts" (ver. 15) "in you" (THEODORET, BEZA and others). [EADIE: "within you;" MEYER, ALFORD: in you as a church, which seems to be Braune's view. Preferable on the whole, and suggestive of the truth, that want of general diffusion of the word of Christ among the people "richly," much prevents their obeying the following precept.—R.] "Richly" relates to substance, hence, not used in a stunted, abbreviated eclectic fashion. ["Not with a scanty foothold, but with a large and liberal occupancy" (EADIE).—R.] It does not refer to frequency of use, or to the members of the Church—among many (SCHENKEL).

In all wisdom teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, hymns and spiritual songs.—["In all wisdom" is joined with what follows. The construction is thus rendered more harmonious; the preceding clause has its emphatic adverb last, and the two qualifying participial clauses each begin with an adverbial phrase of manner. EADIE, following the pointing of TISCHENDORF, joins "psalms," etc., with the second clause, but this destroys the correspondence, while the objection he urges, in regard to psalms and hymns as the material of instruction, is not in keeping with his own quotation from Basil's encomium on the Psalms.—R.] The participles, which are to be joined with "you" in the nominative, just as in Eph. iv. 1-3 (WIKER's Gram. p. 532), refer to the application and use of the word present among them, describe the manner in which the word dwells among them. This explains "speaking to yourselves" (Eph. v. 19). The first verb indicates the intellectual, the other the moral reference. To both belong the definition of manner "in all wisdom" (comp. i. 28), which is placed first emphatically, and the asyndetic datives which define the means to be used [or "the vehicle in which" the teaching and admonishing was communicated (MEYER).—R.]. These means act the more instructively and effectively, the more familiar one is with them, for the hymn grows out of the word of God and of Christ, and these grow into such songs, as the Bible, the Psalter and Church history attest. TERTULLIAN: Post aquam mannaalem et lumina, ut quisque de scripturis sacris vel proprio ingenio potest, provocatur in medium canere. Comp. Eph. v. 19. The reference is to public worship, to the use of the word of Christ and singing at the agapæ and in the family circle; it should not be limited to the latter (MEYER).

In grace singing in your hearts to God.—[BRAUNE adopts the reading ἐν χάριτι, and therefore renders "in gratitude" (Dankbarkeit), but with LACHMANN, TISCHENDORF, MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, WORDSWORTH, it is better to retain the well supported article: τῇ χάριτι; then refers to Divine grace, the element to which the singing was to be circumscribed,—that which should accompany it.—R.] The clause corresponds in its structure with the foregoing; "in all wisdom,"—"in grace," the participles, then the closer definition; they are coördinate therefore. It is altogether improper to join both with "be ye thankful," making "let the word . . . richly" parenthetical, or to connect "in psalms," etc., with this clause (SCHENKEL), on the ground that singing instruction is inconceivable, or to join ἐν χάριτι with πνευματικαῖς (LUTHER: spiritual, lovely songs). Since "singing" on account of "in your hearts" (see ver. 15) must be referred to something internal, and "to God" indicates its direction, "in grace" must be a closer definition of the singing; "in gratitude," as I Cor. x. 30. The meaning of χάρις is like gratia. It cannot mean "in gratefulness" (iv. 6; Eph. iv. 29; ERASMUS, SCHENKEL), nor in grace, nor with the article: in the grace impelling thereto (CHRYSTOSTOM, MEYER). [If the article be retained, this is undoubtedly the meaning; not only because usus loquendi favors such a view, but because the other meaning: "thankfully" would be a flat and unmeaning anticipation of "giving thanks" below (ALFORD).—R.] The opinion that the phrase "in your hearts" refers to the existing abuse of singing with the mouth (THEOPHYLACT) is not justified, since the reading is not τῇ καρδίᾳ, and the tone which accompanied instruction is here noted. [Yet the former clause seems to refer to singing with the mouth, and this to that "in the silence of the heart" (MEYER).—R.]

Ver. 17. And everything whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus.—It is evident that "do" must be supplied with "all" (πάντα), and that "all in the name of the Lord Jesus" corresponds with "everything whatsoever" [πάν ὃ τι—the absolute nominative.—R.]; "everything whatsoever" referring to individual things, and "all" taking up the same collectively. On this account, it is incorrect to explain it: "in every thing which ye do, do all in the name," etc. (MEYER), or that out of the doing in general the doing in particular proceeds (SCHENKEL). [EADIE makes the plural "individualizing" also.—R.] The repetition as well as the position of πάν, together with the giving of a category ("in word or deed"), and the marking of the individual acts (ὃ τι) as well as the conditional form (ἐὰν ποιῇτε) require that it be understood of the entire action (BENGE: facitis lato sensu ponitur, ut etiam τὸ loqui incendat) and this should be "in the name of the Lord Jesus." This is joined by "and" to "the word of Christ" (ver. 16). In addition to His Word, His Name, His Person should be availing to us; the former in us, and we in the latter, as in the life-sphere dearest to us, out of which we never go, the element which we cannot lack. See Eph. v. 20; Phil. ii. 10. The variation from "Christ" (ver. 16) and "Jesus" here makes us think of the model of the Incarnate One in the form of a servant. "In the name" is not "with invocation of" (CHRYSTOSTOM and others). BENGE extends it too far: ut perinde sit, ac si Christus faciat, ver. 11, vel certi ut Christo omnia probois.

Giving thanks to God the Father by him.—The participle refers to the mood which should ever attend their "doing" (see ii. 7; Eph. v. 20), and which expresses itself in hymn and song. The repetition (vers. 15-17) marks the importance of "giving thanks." On "God the Father," see Eph. i. 3; v. 20; vi. 23; Col. i. 2. As "Father" is without any closer definition, it means of course, "of Jesus." [ALFORD, however, justly remarks: "the words must be taken as approximating in sense to that more technical meaning which they now bear, without exclusive reference to either our Lord or ourselves."—R.]—Δι' αὐτοῦ, "through him," is, according to Eph. v. 20,—"in the name of the Lord," marking more strongly the mediation of the thanksgiving, the Christian sentiment (Rom. i. 8; vii. 25). There is nothing here to indicate opposition to angel-worship (THEODORET, BAEHR). [ALFORD: "'through Him,' as the one channel of all communication between God and ourselves, whether of grace coming to us, or of thanks coming from us. 'No man cometh unto the Father but by me' (δι' ἐμοῦ), Jno. xiv. 6." MEYER: "For Jesus, as the personal, historical Mediator of the Messianic Salvation through His atoning work, is therefore for the Christian consciousness the Mediator of thanksgiving; He it is, through whose favor the Christian can and does give thanks."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. *Conduct determined by condition. The Christian is "elect," "holy," "beloved." In the first there is a negative reference to the mass and world, out of which he is taken, in the second a positive reference to the same, asserting that he is consecrated to God, while the third declares, positively also, that he is an object of the love of God; the first denotes simply the occurred fact, the third gives prominence to the continued effect, while the second sets forth the status. The relation is constantly defined as passive; the Christian has experienced something, without previous merit or meritorious assistance. This condition and promotes his conduct, with thankful zeal, in order to show in response what he has experienced, viz., love. [The Apostle here as always (comp. Rom. viii.; Eph. i.) treats of "election" as a fact, which is made known to us, in order to awaken love in us. It is doubtless necessary that it be at times handled polemically and dogmatically, but he uses it most like Paul, who speaks of it as a fact, revealed by God, evidenced as true of persons by corresponding facts, viz., Divine acts of grace which make men "holy and beloved," and in itself an act of Divine grace, which the Christian can so apprehend as to derive from it a constant motive to such Christian graces as the Apostle here enumerates. So far from being made thereby harsh, proud and unforgiving, they "therefore" put on bowels of mercy, kindness, humbleness of mind, etc.—R.]

2. The new Christian condition or relation is first of all a relation toward God, yet it at the same time influences essentially the relation between those concerned and transferred by it. It is precisely by this that it must prove itself, the religious by the social. First of all this relation of man to God brings a discord into the individual himself, because it divides him into the receding old man, and the advancing new man.

The principle of the old man, selfishness, is made by this relation, to yield or become yielding to the principle of the new man, viz., self-denying and world-denying love and the social virtues: mercy, kindness, humility, meekness, long-suffering, appear as necessary manifestations of the reality of the relations towards God. These virtues must show themselves toward the sins, faults and offences of a brother, just as God's love has shown and still shows itself toward us.

3. Christian love is active. In the social Christian virtues there is no weakness, effeminacy, indifference. It is not indifferent, indolence but active love, energetically breaking out in these as its forms. The Apology for the Augsburg Confession, iii. § 110, rightly repels the assertion of the Romanists, that love justifies, since it does not establish the relation to God, only proves that it has been established, in and by the conduct toward the brethren.

4. Christ, in whom God's love has become and still becomes our portion, remains the only model, the exclusive norm.

5. His peace in the heart, His word in the Church, are the attendants of Christian love, the former as its tone, the latter as the means of promoting it; without the first, rest, confidence and joy were wanting, without the other, certainty, correctness and strength.

6. The Christian Song, deriving its contents and its growth from the word of God, promoted culture and progress in the Christian life; it is in itself a sermon from the Divine word, and has its value in the fact that it is such. The Christian entrusted with it, should use it in the wider and narrower circle of his associates. Produced by spiritual, natural endowments from the use of God's word and experience in life and heart, it is an excellent means of edification and growth for the new man. [The question of Psalmody and public praise, is to be settled by (ver. 16) and similar passages. The word of Christ is to be its substance; all that is not of the word of Christ is to be excluded, all that is, may be included. Hence the Psalter in the main source, but not the only one. "In all wisdom" is its mode, hence mere rhymes of a pious turn are not included. Its end is mutual edification, not entertainment, hence the hymn must be adapted to this end, and the singing of it "to edification." Those who cannot sing to edification may sing in their hearts, but the text implies that "this teaching and admonishing" is not the privilege of a few, but of Christians as a body.—R.]

7. The walk in fellowship with Christ, the practice of Christian virtues, advances us from the rudiments of a pupil to the perfection of a master. Not for merit, but for growth, Christian walk and Christian virtue are indispensable.

8. Gratitude, corresponding with the status into which we have been brought, with the glory of our relation to God, is most important and constant in Christian conduct. [Hence the excellence of those symbols, which treat of Christian morality under the head of the gratitude of God for redemption. See Heidelberg Catechism. This view guards alike against the extremes of antinomianism and legalism.—R.]

* [I have thus attempted to retain the neatness of Braune's sentence: "Das Verhalten ist durch das Verhältnis bestimmt." with indifferent success.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The Christian's station, ornament, strength, tone and weapon.—All morality takes its rise in religion, which is essentially love, given of God, who gave Himself and accepted us, or peace, in which all the antagonisms within the personality of the man himself in his conscience and will, or between himself and the world or his neighbor, or the nearest of all, i. e., God the Lord Himself, was and is taken away.—Love is not a garment, that can be thrown over other virtues, but the soul of all to hold them together, their germ and impulse, their strength and beauty.—Ought the word of God to do well in you, then live in it, and let it live into you.—It is rudeness of mind to have no taste for the sacred poetry of the Church, the flowering of the Divine word in a gifted human soul, and a misfortune to have no benefit of it in the joy and sorrow of life.—A stamp you must have, lo, nothing is current in his eyes but His own Image.

STARKE:—Nothing gives the devil so much room to come into the heart as hatred and anger; God's children drive out both by meekness and spit on the embers, so that they may not break out into a fire.—He who bids us put up the sword, allows us still a shield for our protection; He who has commanded us to be as doves, has desired that we be "wise as serpents."—A little child, that falls so often and so easily, is lifted up and carried; so gently and tenderly must weak Christians be dealt with. The world sets itself to righting and fighting, if attacked even by a cross word; but a Christian overcomes all by forgiving and yielding; he yields his own right [not the right, however,] and does not think of revenging himself.—That the wolf devours the lamb is nothing uncommon, but that one lamb eats another is deplorable and unnatural; we who are Christ's sheep will cherish love toward one another.—Behold the necessity of household devotion. All others have their assemblies, merchants, mechanics, etc., yes even the Godless, that they may mock at God and His word, should not believers then establish their holy assemblies?—We must thank God not only for His benefits, but also for His fatherly chastisements. "Both in His gifts and in His chastisements, praise Him, who either wins thee by giving, that thou mayest not want, or punishes thee when wandering, that thou mayest not perish" (AUGUSTINE).

SCHLIERMACHER:—Christian social life: 1) what the deeds peculiar to the new man are; 2) what is distributed to each by virtue of these peculiarities of the new man; 3) the common rule for every one.—Controversy does not divide love and is not against the Christian spirit, if it only proceeds from a desire after nothing save what is true and right.—Love "the bond of perfectness:" 1) by which all imperfections are balanced; 2) by which all that bears in itself only the appearance of the new man, not its true spirit, is overcome; 3) by which we become helpful to others.

PASSAVANT:—Forbearance may be difficult in certain cases; forgiveness is harder still.—However necessary this gift (God's word) from above is, it will be learned from daily experience, that the Christians here and there are a very sensitive folk, not permitting themselves to be easily admonished or exhorted, hence the so frequent halts and retreats.—The first Christians from among the Jews soon found in their Psalms from earlier ages, thoughts and words for the later inward experiences, for the thanksgiving, praise and adoration of their new life; and those who came out of heathenism, listened with wonder, when these words of the sacred singers were transferred into their own language, and learned thence the quiet joys and devotions of God's children in Israel. But soon too under their beautiful sky new Psalms and hymns in their own Greek tongue were born out of the deep inspiration and the holy and happy feelings of their redeemed souls. This glorious gift of spiritual song contributed greatly to the spread of the pure gospel in the age of the Reformation. The great Reformer of the Germans with his friends soon became their choristers, and it is a precious privilege to follow them and so many God-inspired men of after days in singing these beautiful Psalms and sweet hymns.

GENZKEN:—The choice communion garment of the children of God: 1) who gives it to them (ver. 15); 2) how it is woven (vers. 12-15); 3) how we should put it on.—HARLESS:—The proper self-education for the maintenance of divine love and divine peace: 1) constant practice in obedience to God's word; 2) sanctification of all our doings in the name of the Lord Jesus; 3) unceasing thanksgiving for God's unmerited grace in Christ.—SCHNER:—Spiritual songs: 1) Eagles of Christianity; 2) missionaries of Protestantism; 3) heart-preachers of our nation; 4) mouth of our worship; 5) the Apostles in our houses; 6) the crown of our congregations.—WOLF:—The comfort and joy of the Christian in spiritual songs. They serve: 1) as witnesses of the truth from all stations for the strengthening of our faith; 2) as confessions from the inner life of experienced Christians for the soothing of our spirits; 3) as awakening voices of the Spirit to enliven our own meditation.—KÖHLER:—The new man, as St. Paul depicts him, outshines all the lustre of the world! 1) His richly-colored garment; 2) his golden girdle; 3) his heart's peace; 4) the weapons of his hand.—PRÖHLE:—Bible and hymn book, two precious household treasures; 1) their worth; 2) their use.—Love in all human unions, the most perfect bond: 1) the noblest; 2) the gentlest; 3) the firmest.—Exhortation to Christian families to engage in family worship; it is 1) a venerable custom inherited from our fathers, though unfortunately disappearing from many houses; 2) deeply grounded in the character of Christianity, as well as in the nature of the family circle; 3) of the most blessed influence upon the home life itself.

[BEVERIDGE:—Ver. 17. Doing all in the name of the Lord Jesus. 1) What is meant by "the name of the Lord Jesus." a. Lord of all, b. Jesus, Saviour. c. Lord Jesus by the Incarnation. d. Mighty works in His name. 2) And we ought to do all, etc., a. only what God commands or allows. b. in a firm faith in His Holy name. c. for His glory. 3) Instances of things thus done in God's word. Religious assemblies, Sacraments, Thanksgiving, Censures of the church, Resisting the devil, even giving a cup of cold water. All that a Christian may do, can be done in His name.—R.]

[BURKITT:—Ver. 12. Humility is a certain evidence of our holiness, because it is a great part of our holiness.—Ver. 13. He must have no friends, that will have a friend with no faults, consequently Christians stand in need of forgiveness from each other.—Ver. 14. 1) The upper garment is larger and broader than the rest; so ought charity to extend itself to all persons and upon all occasions. 2) The upper garment is usually fairer than the rest; so doth charity shine brightest amongst all the graces. 3) The upper garment distinguishes the general orders and degrees of men; thus Christians are known by love, as by a livery; it is the bond that Christ's sincere disciples wear.—Ver. 16. If the heart and affections be not stirred in this duty of singing, the outward grace, though never so graceful availeth nothing.—R.]

[HENRY:—Ver. 12. They who owe so much to mercy, ought to be merciful to all who are proper objects of mercy.—There must not only be an humble carriage but an humble mind.—Ver. 13. We need the same good turn from others which we are obliged to show them.—Ver. 15. The work of thanksgiving to God is such a sweet and pleasant work, that it will help to make us sweet and pleasant towards all men.—Ver. 16. The gospel is the word of Christ, which is come to us; but that is not enough, it must dwell in us, or keep house, as a master, who has a right to prescribe and direct to all under his roof.—Ver. 17. They who do all things in Christ's name, will never want matter of thanksgiving to God the Father.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 14. "Love the bond of perfectness." Bound up in this zone, every Christian excellence fills its own place, and keeps it, and the whole character is sound, does not distort itself by excess, nor enfeeble itself by defect.—Ver. 15. A peace, which is not the peace of Christ, is often rudely disturbed, for it is but a dream and a slumber in the midst of volcanic powers, which are employing the time in gathering up their energies for a more awful conflict.—Ver. 16. Such ought to be the habitual respect to Christ's authority, such the constant and practical influence of His word within us, that even without reference to Him, or express consultation of Him, all we say or do should be said and done in His Spirit.—Art, science, literature, politics and business, should be all baptized into the spirit of Christ.—R.]

[BARNES:—Ver. 16. He who is permitted to make the hymns of a church need care little who preaches, or who makes the creed.—Ver. 17. We are to engage in every duty, not only in the name of Christ, but with thankfulness for the privilege of acting so that we may honor Him.—SCHENKEL:—The victory of peace in the heart: 1) It comes from Christ; 2) it is accomplished in the church; 3) it is constantly attended by thanksgiving.—The proper Christian congregational singing: 1) The choice of hymns; 2) the kind of singing; 3) the source from which it should spring; 4) the end, which it should aim at.—The nature of Christian gratitude as shown: 1) In that, for which the Christian is thankful; 2) In whom he thanks; 3) In whose name he gives thanks.—R.]

3. Specific exhortations.

CHAPTER III. 18—IV. 1.

a) To wives and husbands.

(CHAP. III. 18, 19.)

18 Wives, submit yourselves unto your own [omit own]¹ husbands, as it is fit [or as it 19 should be]² in the Lord. Husbands, love *your*³ wives, and be not bitter [or embittered] against them.

¹ Ver. 18.—Some MSS. have inserted, probably from the parallel passage [Eph. v. 22], τοῖς ἰδίοις, omitted in N. A. B. C. and others.

³ Ver. 19.—N. A. B. and others omit ὑμῶν after γυναικας. [Retained by Lachmann, Meyer and others. In any case, "your" is required by our English idiom.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 18. Wives, submit yourselves unto your husbands.—See on Eph. v. 22. Αἱ γυναῖκες is found there also, while instead of ὑποτάσσεσθε, ὑποτασσόμενοι must there be supplied from the verse preceding. Τοῖς ἑνδοξασιν does not refer to men as a category, but the given, proper men [i. e., "husbands," as in E. V.—R.].

As it should be in the Lord.—The imperfect denotes this pre-supposition: that what was exhorted, was not as yet attended to (as Eph. v. 4. WINER's Gram. p. 254); hence it means: "as it should be," corresponding with the fellowship which has in Christ its life-sphere. This is applied somewhat differently in Eph. v. 22: "as unto the Lord." There the dignity of the man is made more prominent, by comparing the husband to Christ and the wife to the Church. It is incorrect to join "in the Lord" to "submit" (CHRYSOSTOM and others), or to take ἀνῆκεν as a perfect with a present signification (HUTHER, BLEEK also).

Husbands, love your wives.—See Eph. v. 25.—And be not bitter against them.—[ELICOTT renders μὴ κικραίνεσθε, "be not embittered"—referring it to a state of mind, rather than to specific acts.—R.] This special warning concerns a foul blot in married life, when the husband, as head of the house, not as head of the wife, not in love to her, but ruled by the old man, either shows bitterness in word or deed, or in tone, to the wife, should she be wanting in humility and submission, or have violated or disregarded the household right of the husband; or treats her with indifference, neglect or harshness, without any fault of hers, from the cares and weariness of business, or the changing moods of the flesh, or mere habit. The preposition πρὸς, "against," denotes the direction only; it does not necessarily imply hostility towards the wife; she need only learn from his conduct, that in his false self-love he does not love her as himself, but as one unregenerate might do. BENGL: πικρία odium amoris mixtum; multi, qui foris erga omnes humani sunt, tamen domi in uxorem ac liberos, quos videlicet non tement, occulta facile acerbitate utuntur, quæ ubi vincetur, specimen est magnæ mansuetudinis.

[STEIGER would account for this special exhortation here and in Eph. by the supposition that the doctrine of the false teachers had developed a dangerous licentiousness. But had there been a polemic reference, the Apostle would have entered into the subject more fully, and not been content with these simple exhortations (MEYER). The social morality of these Asiatic cities was undoubtedly debased, but this was the case throughout the whole Roman empire. From this briefer form of the exhortation, ELICOTT infers that our Epistle was written before that to the Ephesians.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Compare notes on Eph. v. 22, 23.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—That there are so few wedlocks which are properly regulated and rightly enjoyed on both sides, arises usually from the fact of the wife's avoiding submission, or of the husband's not knowing how to govern properly.—The male sex has usually more fire than the female, so that it can easily happen that a man in his power goes too far and deals too hardly with his wife.

RIEGER:—Most of the mistakes of married life are consequences of the sins of youth, especially of those seductive blandishments under which the marriages were formed.—Even that which is polluted, should any one in a time of ignorance be betrayed into a dubious union, may be washed away, cleansed and sanctified.—He who knows and considers his loveless heart, as God's word discloses to men their natural evil disposition, and by these two words especially: hard-heartedness and anger, will dig deeply and lay well the foundation in his love.—Negligence in affection is itself the first rupture of the marriage tie. But in love we have a fortress that can stand many an assault.

PASSAVANT:—It is exceedingly painful and saddening, to be forced by the reports of missionaries, to see at what a low grade of intelligence and in what a sorrowful condition in general, woman is kept among heathen nations—the Bir-mese perhaps and the Karens excepted—with what neglect and contempt and abuse she is treated.—Over the grave of many a great man, of many a sleeping saint, often too of one snatched as a brand from the burning, stands in lines, that angels read: he had a pious mother!—The man is the head; a high vocation, a higher power and strength, and a great responsibility! It pre-supposes quiet wisdom, earnest character, rational sway with benevolence—bearing, forbearing, patience, with mildness and friendliness;—and this cannot exist with a firm, faithful, ever equal love, without holy love toward the wife's soul, before the Lord.—This exhortation of the Apostle pre-supposes also, that there will be many an opportunity of becoming embittered, and that the wife's nature will be the occasion of it. Yet the husband should not allow himself to be overcome by the weaker vessel; but here there must be humility and bowing of heart before God every day.

HEUBNER:—Bitterness steals upon us at the very first in the closest unions, as we discover the weaknesses of another, or where there are many hastinesses. The husband can be easily led into this, if the wife does not gratify his wish.

[SCHENKEL:—Why Christian morality requires the submission of the wife in the household.—The dangers of bitterness in married life: 1) Its extent; 2) Its causes; 3) Its results.

SCHLEIERMACHER:—The regulation of household life. It should be so regulated, that 1) all that is done, is done in the name of Jesus; 2) that thanks are in every way given to God, through the conduct of our household life.—R.]

b) To children and parents.

(CHAP. III. 20, 21.)

- 20 Children, obey your parents in all things: for this is well pleasing unto [in]¹ the 21 Lord. Fathers, provoke not your children to anger [omit to anger],² lest they be discouraged [disheartened].³

¹ Ver. 20.—[The reading of Rec., τῷ Κυρίῳ, has not the support of any uncial MS., and is rejected by all modern editors" (Ellicott). Tischendorf (eds. 2 and 7) reads ἐστὶν ἐν ᾧ ἡ ἀγάπη, but the order of N. A. B. C. D. E. is ἐν ᾧ ἡ ἀγάπη ἐστὶν, followed by Lachmann, Meyer, Alford, Ellicott.—R.]

³ Ver. 21.—[Ἀθρομῶσται, "disheartened," Eadie, Alford, Ellicott. Older versions render: "made feeble-hearted," "of a desperate mind."—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 20. Children, obey your parents in all things.—See Eph. vi. 1. "In all things," κατὰ πάντα, here definitely expresses what is indicated in the parallel passage by the phrase, "in the Lord;" it is not to be limited (ΘΕΟΦΥΛΑΚΤΗΣ). It sets forth the principle, the rule, exceptions being left out of view (MEYER). [EADIE suggests, that as the reference is to Christian parents, who were to govern in a Christian spirit, the Apostle takes heed of an exception. On the exceptions see BISH. TAYLOR, Duct. Dub. III. 5. ELLICOTT remarks that ὑπακούειν includes not merely submission to authority, but obedience to a command. TITT. Syn. I. p. 193.—R.]

For this is well-pleasing in the Lord.—(Eph. vi. 1, "right".) Hence the reference here is to judgment and complacency, there to precept and authority. "In the Lord," before Him, as He looks at the matter. We need not supply τῷ θεῷ (Rom. xii. 2) in thought (DE WETTE), nor take ἐν κυρίῳ as the Christian qualification (MEYER) [ALFORD]; the former is not warranted by the context, the latter is contrary to usage and indistinct in itself. [ELLICOTT is more exact: the preposition defines the sphere in which the τὸ εὐάρεστον was especially felt and evinced to be so.—R.]

Ver. 21. Fathers, provoke not your children.—(See Eph. vi. 4: παροργίζετε.) The verb is used, 2 Cor. ix. 2, in a good sense, here in a bad sense; what is forbidden occurs through severe, unjust, capricious treatment. [We might render: "do not irritate your children."—R.] The motive for the warning is found in the result, which is marked as fixed and certain: lest they be disheartened.—BENGE: "A broken spirit, the bane of youth." There is a lack of affection and confidence, pleasure and power for good and against evil.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Comp. on Eph. vi. 1-4.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—Disobedient children offend not only their parents, but God Himself; therefore they have no prosperity.—Children are not given for the service of parents, but parents are ordained for the benefit of children.—Actual chastisement should never be resorted to, until the child has been convinced of its guilt and well merited punishment, and God been earnestly implored to bless the infliction. The additional advantage thus gained is that meanwhile one's rising passion can be allayed and the punishment inflicted with proper moderation. The child, too, is thereby shown that the chastisement springs from love, and is more of an advantage than a punishment.—In the discipline of children, ignorance, weakness, hastiness, thoughtlessness and childish character must be distinguished from wanton wickedness.

RIEGER:—Our heavenly Father, the Father of our spirits, Himself carefully guards against our becoming disheartened under His chastisement, and nothing rejoices Him more than that we "cast not away our confidence;" and so also in the relations of parents and children, much depends upon our not being rendered morose by the faults, but taking courage in final triumph.

PASSAVANT:—In this obedience of children from the very cradle lies the foundation and beginning of all good discipline, of all welfare and blessing, external and internal, in the heart, in the family, in the state, in all phases and circles of social life.—Has many a yoke of early years been borne in the patience of faith, with what a peaceful gaze does one look back! Those who have grown old should again take it upon them, and as children kneel before their parents.

HEUBNER:—Christian nurture dare not intimidate, but should promote a noble frankness and openness.

[BURKITT:—God takes a mighty pleasure in the performance of relative duties; they are not only pleasing, but well-pleasing to Him; we are no more really than what we are relatively in the account of God; that which we call the power of godliness, consists in a conscientious performance of relative duties.—R.]

[HENRY:—Ver. 21. Let not your authority over them be exercised with rigor and severity, but with kindness and gentleness: lest you raise their passions and discourage them in their duty, and by holding the reins too strait, make them fly out with the greater fierceness. It is by the tenderness of parents, and dutifulness of children, that God ordinarily furnishes His Church with a seed to serve Him, and propagates religion from age to age.—R.]

[EADIE:—The child should feel that the punishment is not the result of fretful anger.—Children teased and irritated lose heart, renounce every endeavor to please, or render at best but a soulless obedience.—The twig is to be bent with caution, not broken in the efforts of a rude and hasty zeal.

—SCHENKEL:—The evil effects of too severe a training of children. 1) In what they consist 2) Whence they arise.—R.]

c) To servants and masters.

(CHAP. III. 22—IV. 1.)

22 Servants,¹ obey in all things your masters according to the flesh; not with eye-service [eye services],² as menpleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing God [the Lord].³ And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily [whatever ye do, do it from the 24 heart],⁴ as to the Lord, and not unto men; Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: [.] for ye serve [Serve ye]⁵ the Lord Christ. But [For]⁶ he that doeth wrong shall receive⁷ for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons.

IV. 1 Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal; knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven.

² Ver. 22.—The reading, ὁφθαλμοδουλαίαις, is well attested by N. C. K. L. It is lectio difficilior, while the singular is probably taken from Eph. vi. 6. [Tischendorf, Alford, Ellicott and others adopt the plural mainly on critical grounds; the singular is attested by A. B. D. F., adopted by Lachmann, Meyer, Eadie, Wordsworth.—On the different shade of meaning see EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

³ Ver. 22.—N. A. B. C. and others have κύριον; θεόν is weakly supported.

⁸ IV. 1.—Ὁ ὕπανός is established by N. A. B. C. and others, instead of οὐπανός. [Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Ellicott, Wordsworth, adopt the singular; the plural apparently taken from Eph. vi. 9.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 22. Servants.—This point is treated in the most detailed manner, as though this were the state of the Church in the main: as Eph. vi. 5–8; also Tit. ii. 9, 10; 1 Pet. ii. 18–25 (comp. i. 18–21). Comp. also 1 Cor. i. 20, and 1 Pet. i. 1, according to which Peter wrote to the Church at Colosse also. The view of SCHENKEL: "it is possible, as MEYER supposes, that this (i. e., the minuteness) was occasioned by the flight and conversion of the slave Onesimus, a native of and fugitive from Colosse," is groundless. [Braune's opinion that δουλοὶ includes all servants, bond or free, seems correct (see Eph. vi. 5), but the free servants were the exception then. "Nothing is said for or against slavery in this passage," whatever may be implied.—R.]

Obey in all things your masters according to the flesh.—See Eph. vi. 5. "In all things" (κατὰ πάντα), as in ver. 20, is new. [Wordsworth remarks on this phrase in ver. 20 and here: "An example of a precept proceeding on the charitable supposition that the other party will do its duty; for if Parents and Masters order any thing contrary to God's law, then Children and Servants must 'obey God rather than men' (Acts v. 29)."—R.] Contrasted with "masters according to the flesh" is One "according to the spirit," "in heaven" (comp. ver. 24; iv. 1).

Not with eye services, as men-pleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing the Lord.—"Not with eye services" marks by the use of the plural, the individual manifestations of eye service; found only here and in Eph. vi. 6 (singular). ["Here the concrete acts, there the abstract spirit" (ALFORD).—R.] It is contrasted with "but in singleness of heart," which is wanting in the dishonesty of "eyeservice;" "as men-pleasers" is contrasted with "fearing the Lord." ["The Lord," κύριον, κατ' ἐξοχήν, κατὰ πνεῦμα; the turn of the thought in the correct reading is lost both in the E. V. and the rendering above. MEYER: "The obedience of the Christian slave becomes man-pleasing towards his master, and eye-service in appearance, if it be not subordinated to the fear of Christ, the higher Master, and accordingly conditioned by this."—R.] The same words as in Eph. vi. 5, 6, but more sharply conceived. [EADIE, referring this to slaves exclusively, remarks: "The Apostle does not speak vaguely, but hits upon those vices which slavery is so apt to engender—indolence, eye-service and reluctance in labor."—R.]

Ver. 23. Whatever ye do.—Whatever ye do in servitude (BENGEL). The verse relates to individual and little things. See Eph. vi. 8.—Do it from the heart, as to the Lord and not unto men.—Ἐκ ψυχῆς, standing first for emphasis, and demanding glad, willing action, refers back to "in singleness of heart;" "as to the Lord," demanding constant mindfulness of the present heavenly Master, to "fearing the Lord;" while the absolute negative "not (οὐκ) unto men" refers to "men-pleasers." [MEYER: "As to the Lord, the point of view of the doing; this should be regarded as taking place for Christ, as service rendered to Him. And the relation to the human master (ἀνθρώποις, dative of the category) should not, in this method of regarding it, be taken into the account at all,—on the principle of not serving two masters,—hence οὐκ is not relatively, but absolutely negative."—R.]

Ver. 24. Knowing.—["Seeing ye know," da ihr wisset.—R.]—The motive for such conduct (Eph. vi. 8).—That of the Lord ye shall receive the reward [or recompense] of the inheritance.—"That" sets forth the tenor of this Christian consciousness. "Of (ἀπὸ) the Lord" denotes that the Lord is the Possessor, Source and Origin, while παρὰ (Eph. vi. 8) indicates the immediate communication through the Lord (WINER'S Gram. p. 343). "Ye shall receive" points to the future, its signification referring to a reception of that which is lacking. "The recompense" (ἀνταπόδοσιν, only here; Rom. xi. 9: ἀνταπόδομα) with the article denotes a recompense in prospect, while the preposition (ἀντὶ) indicates that it is one compensating for the present privations by means of an inheritance, which is wanting to and yet wanted by the slave here; for "of the inheritance" (κληρονομίας) is an epexegetical genitive (WINER'S Gram. p. 494), as Jas. i. 12; Acts ii. 10. This inheritance is the full salvation, heritage of heaven, "although in this world you do not have an inheritance, yet you have part of the inheritance passing from the Master to the free" (BENGEL).

Serve ye the Lord [Master] Christ.—The Apostle's comprehensive conclusion. "Christ, who recompenses those serving Himself" (BENGEL). It is incorrect to join "of the inheritance" with "the Lord" (serve the Master of the inheritance), and also wrong to take the verb as indicative [as is done in the E. V., to which the incorrect reading γάρ has probably led.—R.]; neither find any reason or necessity in the context.

Ver. 25. In view of the importance of this matter, another reason is added: For he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done.—The meaning of this general proposition (locus communis) clearly is that every one reaps what he sows (WINER'S Gram. p. 576); sowing wrong, he reaps wrong, as he reaps good when he sows good (Gal. vi. 8). This confirms the exhortation to serve Christ, for slaves and domestic servants alike; from it they should deduce the conclusion, to gladly obey. It is "contrary to the meaning," not to apply it to the slaves (MEYER, who renders ἀδικεῖν, to injure, limiting it to the masters. SCHENKEL). Paul admonishes the slaves here, while he encourages them Eph. vi. 8. [The reference is doubtful. ELLICOTT, ALFORD follow MEYER, and refer ἀδικεῖν to the master. The proposition is undoubtedly general, and has an application to both master and slave. The context seems to indicate the latter as the reference intended by the Apostle.—R.]—"Receive" refers to the judgment of the Lord, in which the "inheritance" is concerned, and "wrong which he hath done" (ὃ ἡδίκησεν) marks the connection of the wrong on earth, and condemnation, destruction in eternity, where sin has transferred itself in its results and consequences.

And there is no respect of persons.—This means in this connection, that the low and insignificant as well as the high and distinguished are equal before God. The former often boast themselves of their poverty, as if on account of this they must be finally blessed and receive reward; "the insignificant often think, that they are to be spared on account of their insignificance" (BENGEL). This is not far-fetched (aus der Luft gegriffen, MEYER), but taken from the context. Eph. vi. 9 refers to masters. [The idea is indeed common among men, that God respects not the person of a rich man, but that of a poor man.—R.]

IV. 1. Masters, οἱ κύριοι.—See Eph. vi. 9.—Give unto your servants that which is just and equal.—Τὸ δίκαιον is what belongs to the slave of right—not historical, human right, but according to the regulations given within the domain of creation, and the rights thus set forth; hence what belongs to them as God's creatures, as human beings. "And" something truer and higher; "that which is equal," τὴν ἰσότητα, denotes the equality ordained within the domain of Redemption, according to which the redeemed are brethren (Philem. 16); this parity they should show in their treatment of the slaves. It is incorrect to regard it as merely "equity" (STEIGER, BLEEK) [ALFORD, "fairness"—R.], or "impartial treatment" (ERASMUS and others). [ELLICOTT says of the view of MEYER as given above: "This is ingenious and plausible, but not satisfactory," from its association with δικαίον. There is this objection to it, that it limits the duty to Christian masters in their dealings with Christian slaves. See EADIE in loco. Notice the "dynamic" form of the middle παρέχεσθε: supply on your side, as far as you are concerned.—R.]

The motive is added: knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven, who is over you, and your Almighty, Omniscient, Just and Eternal Master. See on Eph. vi. 9.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Compare Eph. vi. 5-9.

[These precepts in force where there are no slaves. Through God's merciful Providence, the application of these precepts to a state of slavery has become unnecessary among us. But the relations of master and servant, employer and employee still exist, and there is as much need for the application of the Apostle's words to those who occupy these relative positions, as to servants and masters in the relation existing at Colosse. When we consider how much is said of the conflict between labor and capital, how large a part of the comfort and happiness of women in the household depends on the right conduct of these relations, we may be glad that Paul writes not merely for a state of slavery, but for all masters and servants, and at the same time regret that social science has so often attempted to settle troublesome questions of this kind, without the aid of Christianity. A large class are becoming not only unchristian but antichristian, because Christianity, which abolished slavery, has not yet been thoroughly applied to the relations of labor and capital.—Too many fancy that God is no respecter of the person of a capitalist, but takes the working man's part, whether justice be on his side or not.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—God in His wisdom has so classed men, that some are subjects and servants, while others command and should rule. This is not contrary to the equality of Christians, or to Christian brotherhood; they are still one in Christ. Therefore servants should not have so great a dislike to service, but serve with alacrity and with the heartier obedience, particularly as they are not slaves, but free.

RIEGER:—Him who fears God and honors God by keeping His commands, God honors in turn by giving him a suitable respect in the government of his own house. Men-pleasing and eyeservice at first succeeds very well, but in the long run it becomes intolerable.

PASSAVANT:—A Christian may well tremble as he looks at his servant and asks himself: Why am I his master? Why is he my servant? The answer is: That I may take him just as he is, so bear and forbear with him as to sweeten his servile condition with all lenity and consideration, as to sanctify his calling to him, helping him out of his natural or habitual sins.

HEUBNER:—The character and doings of the Christian are soulful (ἐκ ψυχῆς). The doings of others are cold and dead.—Unrighteous servants will be punished too; God does not let Himself be led by weak sympathy into indulgence.

[SCHLEIERMACHER:—All improvements in the social relations of men must proceed, not from a disturbance of order and a violent throwing off of obedience, but from the greater power of love.

—BURKITT:—Wink at some trivial miscarriages of servants. He must keep no servant that will have a servant with no faults.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 22. Refractoriness on the part of the slave would at once have embittered his life, and brought discredit on the new religion which he possessed; but active and cheerful discharge of all duty would both benefit himself, promote his comfort and recommend Christianity.—Duplicity is the vice which the slave uses as his shield.—IV. 1. Let the great Master's treatment of you be your model of your treatment of them.—(Abridged) Three positions of the Apostle fatal to slavery: 1) He denies that slaves are an inferior caste (Homer, Aristotle); 2) certain duties to slaves spring from natural right; 3) in the Christian Church there is neither "bond nor free." Master and slave were alike the free servants of a common Lord in heaven.—R.]

4. Concluding exhortation.

Respecting prayer, walk and speech.

(CHAP. IV. 2-6.)

- 2 Continue [Persevere]¹ in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving;
- 3 Withal praying also for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance [^{lit.} of the word], to speak the mystery of Christ, for which² I am also in bonds: That I
- 5 may make it manifest, as I ought to speak. Walk in wisdom toward them that are
- 6 without, redeeming the time [καιρόν, the opportunity].³ Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man.

³ Ver. 6.—[See EXEG. NOTES below and on Eph. v. 16.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The connection: These three exhortations do not apply to particular classes, but are of a general character. In fact they refer to that service in the gospel, which each member has to render; for they point to the ways in which the hindrances to that service may be removed. They are based upon the thought: if you do your duty as Christians in general and particular alike, you render service not merely as members of the congregation, but as servants of the Church, you are not merely to be regulated by the will and word of the Lord, but also do your part in helping others to do the same. This service is to be rendered by: Prayer, especially supplication for the Apostle, walk and speech. They are not therefore supplementary exhortations (MEYER), nor are they to be joined either to iii. 17, or to iv. 1.—“ye have a Master in heaven” (SCHENKEL).

Prayer. Vers. 2-4. Persevere in prayer.—Like Acts i. 14; Rom. vii. 12. Κατεπέω, to be strong, πρός indicating the direction; it describes a strong persistence, an importuning of some one (Mark iii. 9; Acts viii. 13; x. 7). The meaning is the same as “pray without ceasing” (1 Thess. v. 17).—And watch in the same with thanksgiving.—[Lit. “being watchful in it.”—R.] The participle (γρηγοροῦντες) marks the modality of the perseverance in prayer; the verb enjoins lively circumspection according to the word of Christ: “watch and pray” (Matth. xxvi. 41; Mark xiv. 38). Comp. Eph. vi. 18; 1 Thess. v. 6; 1 Cor. xvi. 13; 1 Pet. v. 8. There should be watchfulness during the prayer (“in the same”), directed to God’s benefits, thus “thanksgiving” would be united with it, if not as a constituent part (SCHENKEL), yet in the consciousness as a motive and tone (ii. 7; iii. 15, 17). [The first ἐν denotes the sphere, the second the accompaniment.—R.]. There is no warrant for joining “with thanksgiving” with “persevere” (BÜHMER).

Ver. 3. Withal praying also for us.—Eph. vi. 19, 20 is the parallel passage. “Withal” [ἀμα, at the same time—R.] denotes that this supplication should not be wanting as a constituted part of the prayer of the Colossians. “Us” (Eph. vi. 19, “me”) includes not merely Timothy (MEYER and others), but other companions also, such as Epaphras. [The use of the singular in the immediate context forbids our limiting it to the Apostle himself.—K.]

That God would open unto us a door of the word.—[“That” (ἵνα) blends the purpose and the purpose of the prayer, the latter being more prominent. ALFORD, ELLICOTT.—R.] Eph. vi. 19 speaks of “utterance” (σλόμα), but this passage does not. “Door” according to 1 Cor. xvi. 9; 2 Cor. ii. 12, means “free activity;” it is not = σλόμα (CALVIN, BENGEI and others), and includes more than “boldly” (CHRYSOSTOM), which ver. 4 sets forth. Paul thought of his freedom and his coming to Colosse (Philem. 22). [“The Apostle longed for liberty, not for itself, but for the opportunity which it gave him of preaching the gospel.

The opening of the door of his prison would be the opening of a door of discourse.” EADIE.—R.]

To speak the mystery of Christ.—The infinitive is epegetical of λόγον, as ver. 6 (WINNER’S Gram. p. 298). See Eph. vi. 19; iii. 4. [EADIE: “An infinitive of result;” MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT; “infinitive of purpose.” This is preferable, and is a form of the epegetical infinitive. “Τοῦ Χριστοῦ” is a genitive subjecti, the divine mystery included in the appearing and the redemptive act of Christ, since the divine decree of Redemption, concealed before it was made known through the gospel, was accomplished in the mission and work of Christ.” MEYER.—R.]

For which I am also in bonds. [“I have been and am bound.”—R.]—“For which” (δὲ ὅ) refers to “mystery,” the preaching of which had brought him into bonds, and on account of which too he desired liberty. The perfect denotes that the imprisonment still continues; and “also,” that this is added to other afflictions; while his activity is not destroyed (Eph. vi. 20, “I am an ambassador in bonds”), it is very much limited. [“Also” marks the extreme to which he had proceeded in his evangelical labors (ELLICOTT)—R.]

Ver. 4. That I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak.—“That” (ἵνα) marks “make it manifest” as the end, the purpose of the “speaking,” as the common object requires. “It” is “the mystery of Christ,” and the “speaking” will “make manifest” this. Hence the clause depends neither on “I am in bonds” (BENGEL), nor “praying” (BEZA). Paul wishes liberty (the opening “of a door of the word”), in order to be able to make it manifest. “As I ought to speak” refers to the apostolic activity in going from city to city, land to land (Rom. i. 13, 14; xv. 16), with “boldness” presupposed. “Ought” refers then to the Divine call to the Apostolate among the Gentiles, which includes zeal and intrepid candor.

The walk. Ver. 5. Walk in wisdom toward them that are without.—After what was to take place in the supplication for the Apostle and to be done by him, follows what they had to do actually and immediately, and this is first of all “walk without word.” Hence this exhortation is not added without special connection (MEYER). The element in which the Christian is to move with his conduct is placed emphatically first; “in wisdom” (see Eph. v. 15; i. 8; Col. i. 9, 28; ii. 23. Comp. Matt. x. 16). The direction of the walk is denoted by “toward them that are without” (1 Cor. v. 12, 13; 1 Thess. iv. 12; 1 Tim. iii. 7); those who do not belong to the church, to the believers.—Redeeming the opportunity.—The participle gives a closer definition of the walk, inhering in the wise walk, as the present indicates. See Eph. v. 16. Here τὸν καιρὸν stands first, because each favorable point of time is to be made use of, for furthering the kingdom of God, and winning others by such use of it. LUTHER is inexact: accommodate yourselves to the time. It is incorrect to regard it as referring to the shortness of time (CHRYSOSTOM), to the evil time (CALVIN and others), or to deny the reference to those without (MEYER), which is contrary to the context.

The speech. Ver. 6. Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt.—The next means of intercourse, “your speech,” is naturally in close connection; it is therefore to be regarded as directed toward “those without.” It should “always” (πάντοτε, i. e.—ἐκάστοτε), according to the context (“every man”), toward well and evil-disposed people, at opportune and inopportune times (not as SCHENKEL thinks, in good or ill humor), have two peculiarities: “with grace,” it should be invested with grace (Luke iv. 22; Eph. iv. 29) [ELLCOTT: χάρις was to be the habitus orationis. It does not mean Divine grace, but a result of it.—R.]; it should be “seasoned with salt.” “Salt” has something sharp, energetic, but beneficial, which, as the perfect participle indicates, has been previously appropriated and continues to operate. According to the first peculiarity, the speech should not be repellant, but attractive; according to the second, not feeble and insipid, but apt, striking and interesting. The former has as its opposite, what is insolent and ugly, the latter, what is flat and powerless. The figurative expression is not therefore a strengthening or explanation of the literal one (MEYER). [The reference is not to the conservative power of salt, nor to wit, “Attic salt,” but as salt makes food agreeable to the palate, so their speech should be commended to the hearers by a wholesome point and pertinency. ELLCOTT.—R.]

That ye may know, εἰδέναι, expegetical to “speech,” as λαλῆσαι (ver. 3). See WILNER’S Gram. p. 298. [ELLCOTT: “expressive of consequence.”—R.]—How ye ought to answer every man.—“How” indicates that this respects the form; the correct substance is pre-supposed. “Ye ought to answer every man” refers to intercourse in conversation with heathen, unbelievers, as the context (ver. 5) demands. It is applicable to the questions of unprejudiced, inquiring or evil-disposed unbelievers about points of doctrine, moral principles, Christian things or persons, and ecclesiastical ordinances. Comp. Acts xvii. 18 sq.; xxiv. 24 sq.; xxviii. 21 sq.; 1 Pet. iii. 15.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Comp. on Eph. vi. 18-20; on Eph. v. 15, 16; on Eph. iv. 29.

1. Prayer should have, as THOMAS AQUINAS says, three qualities, it should be assiduous, watchful and grateful. The perseverance, with which prayer uninterruptedly draws itself through all events, internal and external, like a thread, or encircles them like a chain, is its vital power; the watchfulness, the lively circumspection, the gratitude, are the quiet tone or firm basis of the same.

2. Freedom has no absolute value; the use and application made of it, gives it its value; and that just to the extent that in it the task set before its possessor is served or satisfied.

3. Wisdom, and that too in the silent walk, is demanded of the believer, toward the unbeliever, the opponent of the gospel; not from fear before him, but from solicitous love to those who should be won, should become what they are not as yet, brethren; from fear of God, who will save them also.

4. In the speech of a Christian in social intercourse with those, who are not yet or no longer brethren, but who may become so, two things are of importance with respect to Christian or ecclesiastical things: suavity and sharpness. The former depends on the character, the heart, the disposition, and the piety, the latter on the mind, the understanding, the culture and experience of the world; the former reckons upon benefiting, winning, the latter upon conviction, clearness, instruction; the one guards against unsatisfactory brevity, dogmatic harshness, injurious sharpness in wit or sarcasm; the other against gossiping length without meaning, garrulous pleasure without aim or end, tedious, flat and offensive talk without truth or shape.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—Prayer is the most excellent means of becoming skilled in all the duties of Christianity.—RIEGER:—Much depends not only upon what? but how? one speaks.—The Scriptures attach much importance to speech and the guarding of the tongue; and this has much influence upon the pollution or the unpolluted preservation of the rest of the walk.

GERLACH:—Salt is sharp, yet it gives to all food that pleasant taste, which renders it palatable. So the sharpness of Christian earnestness, of the fear of God’s anger and punishment and of the desire for blessedness lends to all the words of the Christian their true grace and sweetness.—SCHLEIERMACHER:—Grace is that which attacks and befriends the soul: salt, the power of our words and life, that which penetrates the soul.

PASSAVANT:—The more trustful the prayer, the more open will the heart become for thanksgiving and praise; and the more thankful the heart, the more trustfully and filially will it pour itself out in prayer to the Lord.—Strong and firm, kind and pure, quiet and secure as those may be in heart and conscience, who stand without, they yet stand without, hindered by all sorts of spirits and by their own as well, exposed or given up to all change, all humors, all winds and storms, to a vain and perishing world separated from God, by which they are sooner or later deceived, misled and robbed, driven hither and thither now by waves and now by flames, where there is no help, no Helper and no God; they stand without that tabernacle of God among men, where alone truth and peace are to be found.—We may deal too imprudently, impatiently and roughly, without taking into account old habits and the stiff prejudices of years, unconcerned, whether we do good or harm, anger or appease by our demeanor, without showing any forbearance or affection toward those who have remained behind us, thus forgetting that once we were and lived no better, aye worse perhaps.—Or we may go too far the other way and not discern the spirits, may conduct ourselves without any prudence and foresight toward those of different views, acting toward those who are strangers to our faith, even opponents of it, with the greatest friendliness and intimacy, as if there were no dissimilarity between those without and those within: this is not the wisdom of the friends of the Lord.—A lazy weakness and leniency is not worthy of the truth, it brings scandal soon.

HEUBNER:—The more remiss in prayer, the more unfruitful is it.—The door of the heart is not to be broken through, the mind must open it.—Christianity recognizes some esoterics and exoterics.—What is Christian grace? Something different from the Grecian. It is the expression which arouses a sacred pleasure in the person and makes it sacred love felt.—NITZSCH:—Continue in prayer! 1) We should strive to follow in their fulness the occasions thereto afforded us by God; 2) Seek in definite needs and desires to strengthen and perfect our prayer before God, or, in respect to our pilgrimage in general as well as in special states, continue in prayer.

[BURKITT:—Ver. 2. Need will make us beggars, but grace only thanksgivers.—Ver. 6. Our speech must be seasoned; 1) With the salt of truth; 2) with the salt of wisdom and prudence. The people wondered of old at the gracious words which came out of Christ's mouth; and we may justly wonder at the graceless words which come out of the mouths of many that are called Christians.—HENRY:—Vers. 2, 3. The best and most eminent Christians need the prayers of meaner Christians, and are not above asking them.—Ver. 6. Though our speech be not always of grace, it must be always with grace.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 2. Pray, wait, be not discouraged. Beware of spiritual sleepiness in devotion. There are many reasons of thanksgiving and not the least of them is the privilege of prayer itself.—Ver. 3. The Apostle was no Stoic, he felt the need of these prayers and set a high value on them. He knew the power of prayer. "For us he suffered. How dear then should his memory ever be to us."—Ver. 5. The world's Bible is the daily life of the Church, every page of which its quick eye minutely scans.—Zeal without knowledge is as the thunder shower that drenches and injures, not the rain that with noiseless and gentle descent softens and fertilizes.—Ver. 6. One kind of answer will not suffice for all, but each one is to be answered as he should be. Therefore the necessity of the "grace" and of the "salt."—BARNES:—Ver. 5. If you should have cheated a man out of never so small a sum, it is vain that you talk to him about the salvation of his soul. He wants no religion that will not make a man honest.—R.]

IV. THE CONCLUSION

CHAP. IV. 7-18.

1. Personal Intelligence.

(CHAP. IV. 7-9.)

7 All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you, who is a beloved brother, and a 8 faithful minister and fellow servant in the Lord; whom I have sent unto you for the 9 same [this very] purpose, that he might know¹ your estate, and comfort your hearts; With Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you. They shall make known unto you all things which are done here.

¹ Ver. 8.—The reading γυνώτε-ἡμῶν, A. B. and others is better supported than γυνώ-ῶμῶν. In N, τε is erased by another hand and η placed over ὅμων, though afterwards cancelled. [The reading which Braune rejects, (followed in E. V.) is best supported by versions and adopted by the following editors: Tischendorf, De Wette, Alford, Ellicott, Wordsworth, Griesbach, Scholz, Lachmann and Meyer adopt γυνώτε-ἡμῶν. Alford thus accounts for the corrections in N, γυνώ-ῶμῶν was the original reading; N,¹ inserted τε; N,² erased it, altering ὅμων to ἡμῶν, but correcting it afterwards.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 7 and 8 are the same as Eph. vi. 21, 22, except that here and fellow servant is added after "faithful minister," having the same adjective and qualifying clause (in the Lord) as the latter. Thus Paul makes Tychicus prominent not, merely as brother, but also as colleague, not however, ascribing apostolic authority to him (SCHENKEL). [If the reading γυνώ-ῶμῶν be adopted, there is a further variation from Ephesians. Since the Colossian Church was in danger, it would seem more important that Paul should know their state, than that they should know his circumstances, and hence more probable that Tychicus was sent for the former purpose. This is a strong exegetical reason for preferring the reading followed in the E. V.; that he might know your estate. (See ALFORD AND WORDSWORTH.)—R.]

Ver. 9. With Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother.—On Onesimus, See LANGES Comm., Philemon [p. 4, et passim]. Paul calls him "brother" on account of his faith, notes that he is faithful (can be relied upon), and is dear and valuable to him. To recommend him, he places him with Tychicus, who has only an official position in advance of him. Πιστός, as in ver. 7, must mean "faithful," not "believing," (BAEHR), which is implied in "brother."

Who is one of you.—He is thus described and recommended as a Colossian, a townsman of the readers. [He who had been a fraudulent runaway slave is restored as "one of themselves," commended thus in an Epistle to be read publicly in Colosse and elsewhere (ver. 16). "How much native truth, courage, and beauty is there in Christianity, which enabled the Apostle to speak thus of a runaway slave, to the inhabitants of that city from which he had fled! What other religion in the world could have done this?" (WORDSWORTH).—R.]

They shall make known unto you all things which are done here.—[Τὰ ὅδε, "things here."—R.] In common and in agreement they will make known how it is here in general, as Tychicus will especially inform them of the personal circumstances, on account of which he was sent. This clause is thus readily reconcilable with the well attested reading. [According to the other reading, Tychicus was sent to learn officially concerning them, and to comfort them with his tidings, which Onesimus shared with him. ALFORD: "Is it likely with this re-statement (of ver. 7), that the same should be stated again in the middle of the sentence, which would be the case with the other reading (γνώτε-ἡμῶν)?"—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Comp. Eph. vi., 21, 22. What was common in faith on the Lord, is much more than what was diverse in station and culture. Even the position of an Apostle was not so exalted, that a Christian was not Paul's brother, and a servant of Christ his colleague.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE:—A Christian must not regard the former faults of his neighbor, occurring before his conversion, still less reproach him with them, rather praise and esteem the virtues, which God has granted him since.

[BURKITT:—Nothing endears persons so much to one another, as religion and the grace of God. These ties are stronger than those of nature. No such love as likeness occasions, especially likeness to God.—Happy it is, when the conversation of Christ's ministers is such, both in public and private, that they need not be ashamed to have it known, or that the Church may understand it.—R.]

[HENRY:—Ver. 7. It adds much to the beauty and strength of the gospel-ministry, when ministers are thus loving and condescending one to another, and by all just means support and advance one another's reputation.—Ver. 9. The meanest circumstance of life, and greatest wickedness of former life, make no difference in the spiritual relation among sincere Christians: they partake of the same privileges, and are entitled to the same regards.—R.]

2. Greetings and messages.

(CHAP. IV. 10-17.)

- 10 Aristarchus my fellow prisoner saluteth you, and Marcus, sister's son [cousin]¹ to Barnabas, touching whom ye received commandments: (if he come unto you, receive him);² And Jesus, which [who] is called Justus, [.] who are of the circumcision. These only [Of those who are of the circumcision, only these] are my fellow workers unto the kingdom of God, which have been a comfort unto me. Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ, [Christ Jesus]³ saluteth you, always labouring fervently [ἀγωνιζόμενος, striving] for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete [fully assured]⁴ in all the will of God. For I bear him record, that he hath a great zeal [much labor]⁵ for you, and them that are in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis. Luke, the beloved physician, [or the physician, the beloved], and Demas, greet you. Salute the brethren which [who] are in Laodicea, and Nymphas, and the church which is in his⁶ house. And when this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea. And say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it.

6 Ver. 15.—Ἀὐτοῦ is well attested by D. E. F. G. K. L. and others; Ν. [A. C.] have αὐτῶν. B. reads Νύμφαν—αὐτῆς. The context requires the first, since Νὺμφᾶν, the masculine name, is to be retained, and the explanation that the plural refers to Nymphas and family, is unnatural. [Lachmann follows B.; Meyer, Alford adopt the plural; Rec. Tischendorf, Eadie, Ellicott, Wordsworth: Νυμφᾶν—αὐτῶν. The variation is of little importance, has probably arisen from a desire to identify the whole church of Laodicea with that in the house of Nymphas (Ellicott).—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The greetings, vers. 10–14.

Ver. 10. Aristarchus my fellow-prisoner saluteth you.—According to Acts xix. 29; xx. 4; xxvii. 2, he was a Macedonian from Thessalonica, who had not shared the imprisonment in Cæsarea, but seems to have joined Paul on his departure for Italy, since when first mentioned again, according to Philem. 24, he was a “fellow-laborer” with the Apostle, hence not exactly in bonds (CHRYSOSTOM and others), but a voluntary companion of Paul in his imprisonment, as Epaphras is there called “fellow-prisoner,” but not here.—Both seemed to have shared alternately the imprisonment of Paul. The word is further applied to captives in war, and corresponds with “fellow soldier” (Phil. ii. 25; Philem. 2). “Nothing better than this encomium” (CHRYSOSTOM). [This conjecture of MEYER respecting voluntary imprisonment is the most probable one. They may have undergone actual trial and thus exchanged places, but the reference to a bygone imprisonment (STEIGER) is unsatisfactory.—R.]

And Marcus, cousin to Barnabas.—This was the Evangelist; ἀνεψιός is Geschwisterkind [the relation between children of brothers and sisters], hence not cousin in the most extended sense, nor nephew (LUTHER). BENDEL: “Barnabas was better known than Mark; hence the latter is named from the former.” [Perhaps better esteemed also.—R.] THEOPHYLACT: “he praises this one from his kindred; for Barnabas was great.” On Mark, See LANGE’s Comm. Mark, [p. 4–7, Am. ed., where he is represented as the nephew of Barnabas, however.—R.] Touching whom ye received commandments.—“Touching whom,” Mark, not Barnabas (THEOPHYLACT): “ye received commandments” refers to a fact of earlier date, of which they are reminded. What, from whom, when and how? is and remains undetermined. BENDEL incorrectly takes ἐλάβετε as meaning accipitis after the manner of letter-writing, and supposes it took place with this letter through Tychicus and Onesimus; ἐντολὰς forbids our referring it to letters of commendation (GROTIUS) [from Paul (DAVENANT) or the church of Rome (ES-TRUS).—R.]; the plural and the omission of the article forbid our finding the command in what follows (CALVIN, BENDEL, and others). It is possible that there is a reference to the collections for the church at Jerusalem. We cannot infer from this, that there was an Epistle of Paul, since lost (REUSS). [In all probability these “commandments” had been written, and were of a commendatory nature, yet this is only conjecture.—R.]

If he come unto you, receive him.—A parenthesis, referring to a journey of Mark from Rome to Asia [ἐὰν ἦλθῃ implying that he would come.—R.], agreeable intelligence to the Colossians. We cannot accept the view of WIE-

SELER, that Paul had anxiety lest Mark might not be well received on account of Acts xv. 38, 39, since all closer definition which would support this, is wanting. [Yet the thought is naturally suggested and is adopted by most English commentators. WORDSWORTH: “There would be something very graceful and affecting to their minds, on St. Paul’s part, to St. Barnabas and to St. Mark. It would seem to say, Barnabas was tender-hearted to St. Mark his kinsman; he did for him a kinsman’s part; and Mark, though he faltered for a time, has profited by his kinsman’s kindness, and by my severity; and he has now returned to me, and to the service which he quitted for a time; never to leave it more. You may have heard of the separation which took place between Barnabas and me; you may have heard of Mark’s dereliction of me. You will therefore rejoice to hear that now he is with me; I send you his greetings. I have given you commandments concerning him; and if he comes to you, I desire you to receive him.”—R.]

Ver. 11. And Jesus, who is called Justus: unknown, not the one mentioned Acts xviii. 7 (THEOPHYLACT), who being described as “one that worshipped God” could not have belonged to the Jews.—Of those who are of the circumcision.—These three were Jews, who were attached to the Apostle to the Gentiles.—Only these are my fellow workers unto the kingdom of God.—He thus gives a motive for the last clause; Jewish Christian teachers were mostly anti-Pauline in their labors (Phil. i. 15, 17), hence he adds as a result for himself, and to distinguish them from such as were indeed fellow laborers for the kingdom of God, but not such as he could find comfort in: which have been a comfort unto me.—[ALFORD and ELICOTT render: “which have proved a comfort unto me.”—R.] Παραγορία, comfort, is found only here in the New Testament. He did not need a confirmation of the correctness of his doctrine; but comfort thus came to him. BENDEL: παραυθία is in private grief, παραγορία is in public danger. [ELICOTT objects, intimating that the latter admits of physical references, while the former is more ethical. There is some difference of opinion as to the punctuation of this verse, whether the stop should come after “circumcision” as in E. V. or after “Justus” (MEYER, LACHMANN, ALFORD). The meaning plainly is: that these three were Jews, and that these three alone of the Jewish Christians co-operated with him. Braune implies that others are here called “fellow-workers,” but these three, distinguished by the last clause as having been a comfort, while EADIE, ALFORD and others think that he means to distinguish these alone as “fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God,” i. e., in its wide sense, as including the bringing in of the Gentiles. The former is preferable. WORDSWORTH remarks: “Therefore it does not seem probable that St. Peter was now at Rome.”—R.]

Ver. 12. Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ Jesus, saluteth you.—

See i. 7; also above, ver. 9. Affection and sympathy were demanded by his place of nativity, recognition and regard by his office. Then follows the description of his devoted activity: always striving for you in prayers.—Comp. Rom. xv. 30. "For you" answers to "of you," the external union is not without internal sympathy. The verb denotes the ardor and zeal of Epaphras, as well as the danger of the Church.

That ye may stand perfect and fully assured in all the will of God—"That" marks the purpose of the prayer; "stand" renders prominent the constancy and firmness (Eph. vi. 11; Phil. i. 27). "Perfect," more fully defined by "and fully assured" [perfect participle] as a fact of experience and continued efficiency, and by "in all the will of God" i. e., in all directions (WINER'S Gram. p. 105), as the vital sphere in which the "perfectness" and "fulness" were to move, limits the standing fast to the ethical department of the Christian's life. [On πεπληροφ., see ii. 2, πληροφροια; also 1 Thess. i. 5.—R.] "In all" etc., is not to be joined with "stand" (BENGEL, MEYER, BLEEK); nor does ἐν mean "in virtue of," and "will" the decree of God (BAHR).

Ver. 13. For I bear him record.—Attesting witness.—That he hath much labor for you.—This refers to the trouble which he had in spirit, as "striving" (ver. 12), and also to the time and vital energy consumed for them. Hence not merely labor of the spirit (BLEEK), though proceeding from this. [ELLICOTT: "labor, not such as attends a combat (EADIE) but such as implies a putting forth all one's strength." WORDSWORTH: The sentence is like a reply to those at Colosse who might have misinterpreted the absence of Epaphras from his flock, into a sign of indifference to their welfare. This absence was not voluntary. Philem. 23.—R.]—And them that are in Laodicea and them in Hierapolis—On Laodicea, see Introd. § 4, 1. Hierapolis, also a Phrygian city on the Meander, near to and east of Colosse, famous for its warm baths. The place is now called Pambuk Kulası. The activity of Epaphras was wide-reaching. [MEYER: "Certainly Epaphras had labored also in these neighboring cities as founder of the churches, or at least as an eminent teacher."—R.]

Ver. 14. Luke, the physician, the beloved.—This was the Evangelist; the first phrase defines his station, the second his relation to Paul and to the Church. He attended the Apostle from Caesarea to Rome (Acts xxvii. 1, WINER'S Realwörterbuch, II p. 34), but must not be confounded with Lucius (Acts xiii. 1). Lucas from Lucanus (WINER'S Gram. p. 97). [WORDSWORTH: "It would seem that St. Luke was known to the Colossians as a Physician. The neighboring city of Laodicea was a great medical school (Strabo. xii. p. 580). It may have had professional attractions for him." The suggestion that he may have been known through his Gospel implies that it had been already written, a point which cannot be discussed here. See LANGE'S Commentary, Luke p. 6, where SCHAFF favors the view that it was written during Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea.—R.]

had not yet forsaken him. On account of the absence of any further description, BENGEL groundlessly supposes that the Epistle was dictated to him, and SCHENKEL, that the Apostle had already some disagreement with him, although in the cotemporaneous Epistle to Philemon (ver. 24) he is reckoned before Luke as a fellow laborer. [MEYER also deems this probable.—R.]

Messages. Vers. 15-17.

Ver. 15. Salute the brethren who are in Laodicea.—This shows the proximity and close union of the two Churches.—And Nymphas, and the church which is in his house.—"And" joins one person of Laodicea, giving him prominence, viz., Nymphas, adding also, as the motive, this distinction: "and the church which is in his house." Comp. Philem. 2; Rom. xvi. 6; 1 Cor. xvi. 19. Such churches included not only the members of the family and intimate acquaintances (Greek fathers, ERASMUS and others), as if the reading were τῆς οἰκίας, but all those who assembled together there for worship. It is incorrect to understand by this the whole Church at Laodicea (BAHR)—"which are in Laodicea. GROTIUS improperly places Nymphas and his house in the neighborhood of Laodicea.

Ver. 16. And when this epistle is read among you.—Undoubtedly he means the Epistle to the Colossians lying before them (see WINER'S Gram. p. 102). The verb (ἀναγινωσθῆναι) marks the reading as an understanding on the part of the readers answering to that of the author, referring to the meaning of what was written, while "legere" refers merely to the form, the letters taken together. "Reading it aloud to others" (vorlesen) is not implied in the word, but in the circumstances, as 1 Thess. v. 27, in the dative; 2 Cor. iii. 15; Acts xv. 21, in the times and the object.—Cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans—"Cause that" gives prominence to the purpose as in Jno. xi. 27. This injunction grows out of the similar circumstances, explained and conditioned by the proximity and connection of the two Churches.

And that ye likewise read that from Laodicea.—"That from Laodicea" is placed first for emphasis to mark the antithesis. See WINER'S Gram. p. 511. "Ye likewise" places the Colossians beside the Laodiceans, after whom they also should read the Epistle. Evidently then a letter written to the Laodiceans is meant, which the Colossians should cause to be forwarded to them from Laodicea. See WINER'S Gram. p. 584. The context indicates that Paul had written it, since otherwise he would not have known that the Laodiceans had one, and what its contents were. He had probably written and sent it at the same time, counting upon the oral information of Tychicus (ver. 9), and was certainly induced to do so by Epaphras (ver. 13). But nothing further is known save the admission that it is lost, as indeed the Canon of Muratori cites an Epistle to the Laodiceans (comp. Introd. to Ephesians, § 5, 1). [As usual, where nothing is known, conjectures are abundant.—R.] The following opinions are inadmissible: —that it was a letter written from Laodicea to Paul (ERASMUS, CALVIN) [so A. ALEXANDER, Canon, p. 296.—R.]; or one written thence by Paul, as 1 Tim. (THEO-PHYLACT); or the Epistles to Philemon (WIESLER, THIERSCH); that it was a purely private letter without appropriate doctrinal contents, a mere note, though of great value for the social relations and personal apprehension of those receiving it; that it was 1 John (LIGHTFOOT), or Hebrews (STEIN), or even Ephesians (BAEHR, MEYER, BLEEK) [CONYBEARE and HOWSON, I., 394-8, where this view is advocated at length—R.]. The Apocryphal Latin Epistle to the Laodiceans, first translated into Greek by ELIAS LUTHER (1699), and inserted in German Bibles before that of LUTHER, a poor bungling affair of twenty verses, cannot be the one referred to. [MACKNIGHT'S conjecture, deemed probable by MIDDLETON, BLUNT and WORDSWORTH, is "that the Apostle sent the Ephesians word by Tychicus, who carried their letter, to send a copy of it to the Laodiceans, with an order to them to communicate it to the Colossians." WORDSWORTH remarks: that all St. Paul's Epistles were designed for general circulation. ELLICOTT in loco, after a clear statement, inclines to the view "that an actual Epistle to the Laodiceans is here alluded to, which possibly, from its similarity to its sister Epistle, it has not pleased God to preserve to us." EADIE: "Probably it was wholly of a temporary and local nature. An inspired writing is not necessarily a canonical one." The two leading hypotheses are: a) That it was the Epistle to the Ephesians, 1) regarded as an encyclical letter; 2) or, as addressed to the Laodiceans originally; 3) or circulating as MACKNIGHT suggests; all of which are open to great objections *). b) An Epistle now lost, for on exegetical grounds we must believe that it was a letter which the Laodiceans had or would have received, to come to Colosse from them. The latter is most probable, and does not involve the loss of a canonical book. (So BARNES).—R.]

Ver. 17. And say to Archippus.—(Philem. 2, "our fellow soldier"). He was doubtless a Colossian.—Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord.—An exhortation corresponding with the recognition in the other Epistle (Philem. 2), hence not a reproof, as though great attention were needed (SCHENKEL). Comp. 1 Cor. i. 26; x. 18; Phil. iii. 2. "Which thou hast received in the Lord" describes the kind of ministry meant; as to its origin, it was delivered to him (BENGEL: vocatione mediata), for the Church indeed, but not more closely described. It is arbitrary to regard it as the diaconate or administration of the episcopate during the absence of Epaphras (ESTIUS) [ELLICOTT and WORDSWORTH deem this not improbable—R.]; so also the opinion that he was a young man (EWALD), or now feeble from age (BENGEL). "In the Lord" is not—"from the Lord" (BAEHR), nor "for the sake of the Lord" (FLATT), nor "according to the precepts of the Lord" (GROTIUS, who joins it with "fulfil"); it simply denotes the sphere in which the ministry moved, marking a responsible position. Comp. Acts xx. 24. [ALFORD: "The sphere of the reception of the ministry; in which the recipient lived and moved and promised at his ordination; not of the ministry itself." This is more accurate.—R.]

The purpose of taking heed to the ministry: that thou fulfil it.—It is not trajectory: "that thou fulfil the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord" (GROTIUS and others). See 2 Jno. 8. Comp. Acts xii. 25; 2 Tim. iv. 5. Nor is there any reproof here, only exhortation, the circumstances of the Church being a motive for it; the service must be fully rendered to guard the Church from corruption. It must be noticed that the Church should thus speak to Archippus, in the words of the Apostle, however. [EADIE: "It was an admonition of Paul to Archippus through the Church." THEOPHYLACT finds in it also a command to the flock to recognize and obey the Pastor. This may be implied, but this interpretation belongs to a later age. See ALFORD, MEYER. Also WORDSWORTH, who quotes Theophylact with approval.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Men may be against us, yet not against Christ. In the various apprehensions of the all-important matter, affecting and effecting the salvation of the soul, viz., Christianity and the Person of Christ, and amid all contrary and trying experiences, the clear view and impartial judgment should and will yet discover, that some are fellow-laborers, even if very few occupy precisely the same stand-point, and share the same views and methods. Only these three Jewish Christian teachers are comforting helpers and friends, yet he recognizes others still as his "fellow workers" unto the kingdom of God, and Paul does not regard anti-pauline Christians as anti-christian people. As little as anti-catholic is anti-christian, so little is all and every thing anti-Lutheran anti-christian also, or whatever and whoever is against you, against God and Christ.

2. Hospitality has now an entirely different form from that of earlier times, owing to the total change in circumstances. The character of this duty and custom remains unchanged in this respect, that to the poor and distressed as well as to friends and brethren, our house offers a place of friendly reception and hospitable help, according to the circumstances and needs of the case. Our house should not at times become a public house, but in the privacy of home we should still be good hosts for Christian sociality and Christian beneficence.

3. Firmness and constancy are, naturally, fundamental traits of the character of the Christian and the Christian Church, but their foundation and element must be the will of God in the various relations of life. The Christian should yield to no human opinion, to no thought of time, not to worldly wisdom or to the lust of his flesh and self-will. In God's "Will" we find our "Ought," and to this our "Can" must reach. [In Gottes Willen liegt unser Sollen, und darauf muss unser Können gehen.]

4. Fervent supplication is a duty and important work, not without labor. In it not only is the heart elevated with its love, but it extends itself, it strengthens and nerves itself for skilful action. Epaphras, who approached God in supplication for his Colossians, journeyed also to Rome to see Paul, and was interested in the neighboring churches.

5. Every Church has its heads and leaders, as well as its members, those known and esteemed and of wide reputation, and those unknown, unthought of, hidden ones. The former are not without the latter, are for them, and these too are with the former and for them also.

6. What was then said to one Church was of value to another, is of value to all, to the whole Church. The "form of a servant" in which single writings of the Bible appear, as occasional letters, as shared by the whole Scripture, in this we perceive the glory of the Lord, for such means suffice for His work.

7. Independency Paul does not address his words to an Independent congregation of Christians. He places three congregations: Colosse, Laodicea and Hierapolis, together in union with himself and with each other.

8. Nor does Paul foster the hierarchical spirit of the clergy: the latter constitute a member of the body of the Church, to which the whole should furnish the impulse. The Apostle points from the Romish or Jewish Church of the clergy, to the evangelical Church of the people.

9. The ministerial office has a great responsibility on account of Him who imparts it, on account of Him in whom it is to be accomplished, and on account of those for whom it is to be fulfilled.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

It is of great value to know that good men think kindly of us. A greeting has in it something very beneficent. Do not forget to deliver it; do not consider such negligence a small matter. Be as careful about it as the Apostle.—Delight especially in those who gather others about them and serve the Church.—Do your part in helping every one to the conscientious performance of their ministry; show them especially their responsibility; remember, it is not enough that thou hast received, thou must fulfil, what thou hast received.

STARKE:—Every father should have and hold in his family a proper household church. That brings edification and blessing. Whoever tries it will find it so.—Reading the Word of God is not an especial privilege for this and that one alone, but for each and every Christian.—

RIEGER:—We have children, households, entangling connections; and we ever say: to these too we must take heed. But "to the ministry," however, first and foremost.—SCHLEIERMACHER:—All associations of Christians in a society of personal friendship, which involve a dissimilarity to others, should end in such an understanding that each one, in his own place and in his own spirit, but joined in common love to the others, will forward the great work of blessing men through Christ.

PASSAVANT:—Ver. 10. Mark had struggled through and out of the old nature, and become a faithful servant in the gospel: we never go further in God's ways in vain.—Ver. 15. It was no slight evidence of the faith and love of this householder to Christ and His cause, that he received into his house the assembly of first Christians, these heathen converted out of darkness into light; such an one must assuredly anticipate many a pain and persecution.

[HENRY:—Ver. 10. We must forget as well as forgive.—Ver. 12. They who would succeed in prayer, must take pains in prayer.—Ver. 14. Luke was both a physician and an evangelist. Christ Himself both taught and healed, and was the great Physician as well as Prophet of the Church.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 12. Love so pure and spiritual as that of Epaphras will produce an agony of earnestness.—Ver. 14. "Honor a physician with the honor due unto him for the uses which ye may have of him, for the Lord hath created him, for of the Most High cometh healing" (Ecclesiasticus xxxviii. 1, 2). It was indeed a common saying,—ubi tres medici, duo athei. Luke might have been an example to the profession.—R.]

[WORDSWORTH:—Ver. 14. This special mention ("the beloved") may have been designed by St. Paul to impart a Christian dignity to the medical profession, which was not held in high repute by the polite nations of antiquity; and to remind its practitioners, particularly those of Laodicea, to whom this Epistle was to be sent (ver. 16), of the honor and holiness of the medical calling, as ministering to the human body, which had been ennobled and consecrated by the Incarnation of Christ. Though special and supernatural gifts of healing were vouchsafed to the Church in those days, even then the ordinary means were not superseded, which were provided and bestowed by Almighty God for alleviating the sufferings of humanity through the art and skill of the Physician.—R.]

3. Closing words.

18 The salutation by the hand of me Paul. Remember my bonds. Grace be with you. Amen.¹

¹ Ver. 18.—'Α μ ἡ ν is wanting in Σ. A. B. C. F. G. and others. It was afterwards added in Σ; and is found in D. E. K. L. The subscription in Σ. reads πρὸς Κολοσσαίς, others supplement it: ἀπὸ 'Ρώμης (A.), ἐγράφη ἀπὸ 'Ρώμης (B²), ἐπιγράθη, ἀρχεται πρὸς Φιλιππησίους (D. E.), ἐτελέσθη πρὸς Κολοσσαίς, ἀρχεται πρὸς Θεσσαλονικαίους πρώτη (F. G.). [Rec.: πρὸς Κολοσσαίς ἐγράφη ἀπὸ 'Ρώμης διὰ Τυχικοῦ καὶ Ὀνησίμου. The most accurate of all these spurious subscriptions.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 18. The salutation by the hand of me Paul.—Exactly like 1 Cor. xvi. 21; 2 Thess. iii. 17. Comp Gal. vi. 11. BENGEL: "This verse Paul adds with his own hand, acknowledging what precedes as his own." The clause results rather from the Apostle's wish to add a word with his own hand, than, as BLEEK supposes, from the wish of the Church to receive at least a few autograph words, to which he has acceded.

Remember my bonds—especially in praying. ["Every limitation is unwarranted" (MEYER).—R.] "My" is emphatic; he is more concerned about the preservation of his person in triumphant fellowship with the Lord, for His sake and that of His Church, than for release or the alleviation of his imprisoned condition. It is a final exhortation, touching in its simplicity, not a request for assistance (HEINRICH). [The connexion between the autographic salutation and the exhortation must not be overlooked. It was the chain itself, linking his right hand to the soldier, rendering it difficult for him to write to those for whose sake he was in bonds. How natural to add, especially to these Gentile converts: "Remember my bonds." See ALFORD, ELLICOTT, SMITH's Dictionary Antiq., Catena.—R.]

Grace be with you.—"Grace," simply as Eph. vi. 24; 1 Tim. vi. 21; 2 Tim. iv. 22; Tit. iii. 15; Heb. xiii. 25. "With you" (μεθ' ὑμῶν), also as 2 Tim. iv. 22. The grace of God communicated in Christ is externally and internally with Christians.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. More depends upon inner preservation of the person from fall and weakness than upon external deliverance from earthly distress.

2. From those who stake body, goods and life on the cause of the Kingdom of God, blessing in word and deed is to be experienced; they bless, having more than a benediction.

3. To such the Church not only owes gratitude and grateful thought, but can afford them joy and strength. So much depends on living communion with its reciprocal results.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[WORDSWORTH:—St. Paul's bonds were providential. If he had been continually moving from place to place in missionary journeys, the Church might perhaps have never possessed this Epistle. She therefore has good cause to remember his bonds with thankfulness. The word of God here written is not bound. The fact that this Epistle was written by him in this state of duress and restraint, and yet designed to minister comfort to others, and that it has never ceased to cheer the Church of Christ, is certainly one which is worthy of everlasting remembrance.—R.]

THE END.

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

EDITOR'S PREFACE.

THIS eighth volume of the English edition of Dr. LANGE's "Bible-Work" contains the exposition of seven Epistles of the New Testament, by the combined labor of ten European and American scholars, as follows:

I. and II. Epistles to the THESSALONIANS. By Drs. AUBERLEN and RIGGENBACH.
Translated by Dr. LILLIE.

I. and II. Epistles to TIMOTHY. By Dr. VAN OOSTERZEE. Translated by Drs. WASHBURN and HARWOOD.

Epistle to TITUS. By Dr. VAN OOSTERZEE. Translated by Dr. DAY.

Epistle to PHILEMON. By Dr. VAN OOSTERZEE. Translated by Dr. HACKETT.

Epistle to the HEBREWS. By Dr. MOLL. Translated by Dr. KENDRICK.

These authors and translators represent five countries—Germany, Switzerland, Holland, Scotland,* and the United States; and seven communions—the Evangelical Lutheran, Swiss Reformed, Dutch Reformed, Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal, Congregational, and Baptist.

The reader may therefore look for a considerable variety of talent and difference of opinion in minor points of doctrine and polity. But in all essential articles of faith, he will find a striking degree of unity—a unity more spiritual and free, and for this very reason more deep and real than the consensus patrum, so called, by which the Roman Church would fain prevent or obstruct all further progress in working the inexhaustible mines of revealed truth. Far above all sectarian steeples rises the hill of Zion, where the discords of human creeds are solved in the divine harmony of "one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all."

The numerous additions of the translators, from their own researches, and from leading English commentators, will be found to raise the value of the American edition far above the German original.

As general Editor, I wish here publicly to congratulate the translators on the suc cessful completion of their laborious task, and to express my grateful appreciation of their hearty and efficient co-operation in this noble work. I only regret that one of them—the late lamented Dr. LILLIE, like the like-minded Dr. AUBERLEN—was not permitted to see the volume which owes so much to his accurate scholarship and faithful study.

The Epistles to the Corinthians are nearly ready for the press; as is also the volume on Genesis. The remaining books of the New Testament, excepting the Apocalypse, which has not yet appeared in Germany, are all in course of preparation by able and competent scholars.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE

OF THE

AUTHORS OF THE COMMENTARY ON THE THESSALONIANS.

BY

THE AMERICAN EDITOR.

CHARLES AUGUSTUS AUBERLEN, to whose competent hands the Commentary on the Epistles to the Thessalonians was first intrusted, and who would have prepared other parts of Lango's Bibelwerk (probably the Book of Daniel and the Apocalypse of John), had not a premature death removed him from his earthly labors, was born Nov. 19, 1824, at Fellbach, near Stuttgart, in the kingdom of Württemberg, which for its small size has given rise to an unusual number of distinguished divines, philosophers, and poets. He was educated at Esslingen, Blaubeuren, and at the University of Tübingen, where he stood among the first in his class. For a short time he was in danger of being carried away by the enthusiasm then prevailing among German students for the humanitarianism of Goethe's poetry and Hegel's pantheistic philosophy. But his pious education and associations, the influence of his teachers, Drs. Schmid, Landerer, and Beck, and the diligent study of the Bible and the older Württemberg divines, especially Bengel and Oetinger, guarded him against serious error. After a literary journey through Germany, Holland, and Belgium, and a second residence at Tübingen as Repetent (Fellow or Tutor) of the Theological Seminary, he accepted a call as professor extraordinary of theology at the University of Basel in 1851, and was happily married in the same year to a daughter of Dr. Wolfgang Menzel, the well-known author of a History of Germany, a History of German literature (translated into English by the late President Felton of Harvard University), and other works. In 1860 the University of Basel, at its fourth centenary, conferred on him the honorary degree of D. D. In that post he labored with great acceptance and rising fame to his death, May 2, 1864. As his theology, so his departure was full of joyful hope.

Dr. Außerlen was one of the most gifted and promising of the present generation of evangelical divines in Germany, combining thorough learning with devout piety and profound reverence for the Word of God. He had imbibed the spirit of Bengel and Oetinger, but was fully at home in all the modern systems of theology and philosophy. He devoted special attention to the prophetic portions of the Scriptures. Characteristic for his standpoint is the following passage from the preface to the second edition of his work on Daniel: "The elevation on which Scripture places us is one, not merely of the life, but also of knowledge, and to descend from it is likewise to suffer a mighty loss in ideas, especially in the moral sphere. Here that word holds good: 'In Thy light we see light.' . . . Here is a real solution of the problems of life—here a real answer to the questions of existence, so far as one can be given at all for beings, who as yet walk not by sight."

The principal works of Dr. Auberlen, besides a part of the Commentary on the Thessalonians, are the following :

The Theosophy of Friedrich Christoph Oetinger in its leading features. With Preface by Dr. R. Roth (of Heidelberg). Tübingen, 1847.

The Prophet Daniel and the Revelation of John, Basel, 1854 ; 2d edition revised, 1857. A very superior work, which has been translated into English (for Clark's Foreign Library), and into French. It is not a full commentary, but a comparative exposition of the chief sections of the two books as a basis for a Biblical philosophy of history.

The Divine Revelation, Basel, 2 vols. 1861-64. The second volume, in the preparation of which he died, is unfinished, and was published after his death by Prof. Gess.

Comp. the Biographical Notice in the second volume of Auberlen's work on Revelation, and an article of Dr. FABRI in HERZOG's Theol. Encycl., vol. xix. p. 789 sqq.

DR. C. J. RIGGENBACH, who completed the Commentary on the Thessalonians after the death of his friend and colleague, is a native of Switzerland, completed his studies at Berlin during 1839-41 (simultaneously with the writer of this notice), and, after laboring as pastor for some time, was elected professor of theology at the University of Basel, where he labors still and enjoys the full confidence of the Christian community. He was once a follower of the Hegelian philosophy, but became a thorough convert to orthodox practical Christianity. He is the author of a valuable work on the Life of Christ, and of several popular lectures against modern infidelity.—P. S.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE OF DR. LILLIE.

It becomes my sad duty, as the general editor of Lange's Commentary, to send out this part of the work with a biographical notice of the translator. A few weeks before his death, Dr. Lillie paid me a visit, in excellent health and spirits, and intrusted to me the manuscript of his translation, after having put to it his last touches in my study. We settled the form of the title page and several matters relating to the final revision. At his request I prepared the biographical notice of my friend Auberlen, who was called hence while engaged in this same Commentary. How little did I dream at that time that I would have so soon to add his own obituary, and to finish his work, as a labor of love to a departed friend and esteemed co-laborer!

The Rev. JOHN LILLIE, D.D., was born, December 16, 1812, at Kelso, Scotland, the youngest of a family of six children. He entered the University of Edinburgh in 1828, and was graduated in 1831, with the first honors of his class. During his course he received several prizes, among which was the gold medal given annually by the "Writers to the Signet" to the best Latin scholar. I well remember in what high terms his Latin Professor, James Pillans, to whom he gave me a letter of introduction in 1854, spoke of the classical scholarship, talent, and industry of his former pupil. His Alma Mater publicly recognized his merits, by conferring on him, in 1855, the diploma of Doctor of Divinity.

From 1831 to 1834 he studied theology, taught a classical academy at Edinburgh, and travelled in England.

In August, 1834, he sailed, in company with elder members of his family, for the United States, and completed his theological studies in the Seminary of the Dutch Reformed Church at New Brunswick, N. J. In February, 1836, he was ordained and installed minister of the Reformed Dutch church at Kingston, Dutchess Co., N. Y., where he labored with ability and fidelity till August, 1841, when he was invited to the Presidency of the Grammar School connected with the University of the City of New York. Shortly afterwards he took charge of a church in Stanton street, New York, and edited the Jewish Chronicle (from 1844 to 1848) in behalf of missions among the Jews.

In 1852 the "American Bible Union," which was organized in 1850 in the city of New York, engaged his services, and subsequently those of Drs. Conant, Hackett, Kendrick, Rödiger, Forsyth, and other scholars of various denominations, for the difficult work of preparing a new or revised version of the Holy Scriptures. He assisted the Society in collecting for the purpose one of the most complete and valuable exegetical and critical libraries extant, including a rare set of the best editions of the Greek and Latin fathers, and all the German commentators of note. He went into this arrangement as an enthusiast for Biblical studies, and in full sympathy with the movement for such a revision of the authorized English Version of the Scriptures as would correct admitted errors, and embody the approved results of modern textual criticism and biblical research for the benefit of all the Protestant churches of the English tongue. His part in the work, however, like that of several other scholars, was merely of a preliminary and strictly literary character; the final revision, for popular use, being reserved for a special commission, which has since completed the revision of the New Testament.

In this connection Dr. Lillie labored for five years with great zeal and energy. He fixed up a study with exquisite scholarly taste in the venerable Baptist church in Broome street, and felt perfectly happy in the company of all the great Bible translators and commentators, whose stately folios and handy octavos were laid out before him, together with grammars, dictionaries, and other auxiliary works of ancient and modern lore.

He prepared in the service of the Bible Union new versions and philological commentaries on the Epistles to the Thessalonians, the Epistles of John, the Second Epistle of Peter, the Epistle of Jude, and the Revelation; * which were published in 1854 and 1856 in beautiful quarto style in three columns, containing the Greek text, King James' Version, and the Revised Version, the greater part of the page being occupied with learned notes, and the amplest references to former versions and commentaries. They were published, however, merely as literary works, with the express declaration of the Bible Union "that the translation is not final." These philological commentaries, together with the similar works of Dr. Conant on Job and on Matthew, and of Dr. Hackett on the Epistle to Philemon, are undoubtedly the most scholarly publications of the "American Bible Union," and have a permanent exegetical and critical value. The late Dr. Joseph Addison Alexander, of Princeton, often spoke in very high terms of Dr. Lillie's commentaries, and expressed to him the wish that he might treat in the same thorough manner all the books of the New Testament. Dean Alford, of England, was stimulated by them to write his article on "Bible Revision" in the Edinburgh Review.

Close application to study somewhat weakened the otherwise vigorous health of Dr. Lillie. In June, 1854, he sailed for Europe and returned in October, fully restored for his work.

In 1857, he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian church at Kingston, N. Y., where he labored faithfully and acceptably till his death. In January, 1867, he paid a visit to New York, and was hale and strong and in excellent spirits. On his return, Saturday, January 19, during a snow storm of unusual severity, he caught a cold, but recovered, and attended to his pastoral duties till the week of his death. On Sunday, the 17th of February, he preached his last sermon with unusual vigor and solemnity; on the day following he was taken sick with inflammation of the lungs, and on Saturday, the 23d, in the fifty-fifth year of his life on earth, he peacefully fell asleep to awake in his heavenly home. He bore the severe pains of his illness without a murmur,—so completely had his naturally irritable temper been softened and subdued by Divine grace. He left behind him a most amiable and worthy wife (a daughter of A. Bruyn Hasbrouck, LL.D., late President of Rutgers College, N. J.), and six promising sons and daughters. His funeral was largely attended, the church being insufficient to accommodate the assemblage of ministers and people. On March 17, 1867, the Rev. W. Irvin, of Rondout, N. Y., at the request of the First Presbyterian church of Kingston, preached an appropriate memorial sermon in the Reformed Dutch church of that place, to which he had devoted the first years of his ministry. The session of his church, as also that of the Reformed Dutch church of Kingston, the Ulster County Bible Society, and the higher ecclesiastical courts with which he was connected, gave fit expression to their high sense of esteem and affection, in a number of highly complimentary resolutions.

Besides the exegetical works already mentioned, Dr. Lillie wrote a volume of Expository Practical Lectures on the Epistles to the Thessalonians (published by his friends and countrymen, Messrs. R. Carter & Brothers, N. Y., 1860), and occasional sermons and pamphlets, which are all written with great care and some of which were published by request. He finished in manuscript a Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter, which he regarded as his best work, and which we hope will before long be given to the public.

* Also the First Epistle of Peter and the Epistle of James; but these were never printed.

The last work of his life was the translation of the Commentary on the Thessalonians for the American edition of Lange's Bible-Work. I could not have found in America a scholar better qualified for this task than Dr. Lillie, who had made the Epistle to the Thessalonians the subject of repeated and thorough study, and had already published on this portion of the Scriptures a philologico-critical commentary with a new translation, and a volume of Practical Expository Lectures. He finished the manuscript of the translation a few weeks before his death, but read the proof only of the first sixteen pages. The task of completing his work fell upon me, as the responsible editor. I read the proof with scrupulous regard to his copy. Lillie's Thessalonians will be found to be one of the best executed portions of the American edition of Lange. The translation is remarkably accurate and elegant, and the additions from his own researches and the best English commentaries are carefully selected and valuable. He took great delight in this task, especially in the critical notes below the text, and would have contributed other portions to this Biblical work, had Providence spared his life. I had already assigned to him the Apocalypse (for which, by his previous labors and his deep interest in eschatology, he was likewise thoroughly prepared), and the books of Leviticus and Numbers.

Dr. Lillie was undoubtedly one of the first classical and Biblical scholars in the United States. He would have adorned a chair of Biblical Literature in any of our Theological Seminaries, although his difficulty of hearing might have interfered somewhat with his efficiency as a teacher. He was naturally a close student, and had rare opportunities for cultivating his talents in the best institutions of his native Scotland. He was remarkably accurate and nice, even to the smallest minutiae of Greek accents and punctuation. Besides the Latin, Greek and Hebrew, he had mastered the French, German and other modern languages. He was at home in the ancient and the English classics, and in the vast field of Biblical literature, especially in the critical department.

He was, moreover, an earnest, solemn, and impressive preacher, a faithful pastor, a conscientious and devout Christian, a genial, hospitable companion, with a stout Scotch heart, an ardent temper, strong affections, and a frank, social disposition. In his theology he was thoroughly orthodox and evangelical, but with a strong leaning to millennialism, and considerable sympathy with the spiritual and devotional (but not with the hierarchical and ritualistic) features of the Irvingite movement. He admired the writings of Auberlen, the author of a portion of the commentary on the Thessalonians. Much as he cherished the hope of the second coming of Christ, he knew how to subordinate disputed eschatological opinions to the great central truths of the gospel, on which the churches are agreed.

In personal appearance, Dr. Lillie was a fine-looking, robust gentleman, with a genial face and manly bearing, very neat in his dress and methodical in all his habits. He was called away in the midst of his usefulness to see his Lord and Master face to face, for whose coming he had so often and so earnestly prayed.

To this notice I am happy to add a tribute to the memory of Dr. Lillie from the pen of his countryman, fellow-student, and life-long friend, the Rev. JAMES INGLIS, who edits in this city a highly spiritual and devotional periodical, The Witness. The letter, which I subjoin, with his kind permission, breathes the spirit of a sweet and holy friendship that was made in heaven and for heaven, and outlives the fleeting changes of earth. It reminds me of those beautiful lines in which Gregory Nazianzen, in a sad moment of temporary alienation, describes his friendship with Basil, which commenced in the community of literary study at Athens, and culminated in the consecration of their souls to Christ and the service of His Church :

Τοιαῦτ' Ἀδῆναι, καὶ πόνοι κοινὸι λόγων,
Ὅμοστέγος τε καὶ συνέστιος βίος,
Νοῦς εἰς ἐν ἀμφοῖν, οὐ δύω, δαῦμ' Ἑλλάδος,
Καὶ δεξιὰ, κόσμον μὲν ὡς πύρρῳ βαλεῖν,
Αὐτοὺς δὲ κοινὸν τῷ Θεῷ ξῆσαι βίον,
Λόγους τε δοῦναι τῷ μόνῳ σοφῷ Λόγῳ.

NEW YORK, October 12, 1867.

REV. DR. SCHAFF:

DEAR SIR:

Any of the early and intimate friends of Dr. Lillie would be embarrassed in speaking publicly of his memory; I most of all, who, in the intimate associations of our college life, when I shared the same room with him, knew him best. Our embarrassment arises from his superiority as known to us, to all that he ever made himself publicly known to be; so that our severest estimate of him might be regarded as the partial judgment of affection. Professor Pillans in his old age stated to me that John Lillie was the most accomplished scholar of all the pupils who had passed from his care in a professional career, which, at Eton and Edinburgh, extended over more than half a century. Probably any member of the Faculty of Letters in the University of Edinburgh at that day, would have endorsed this testimony. His attainments at the age of twenty-one, were not those of a precociously brilliant or a merely studious youth, but rather those of a vigorous and cultivated mind in its maturity. When from this distance of time I recall them, they seem more wonderful to me now than they did then. If he did not fulfil all the high expectations which we cherished of his future eminence in the world, his was not the failure of a superficial precocity which had awakened hopes which it could not make good, but the sacrifice of worldly ambition to the higher aims of an office to which he was called by the Lord, by whose blood he was redeemed, and by whose love he was constricted. We are more than content with his loss of an earthly crown, since we know that "when the Chief Shepherd shall appear," the loss will be compensated by a crown of glory which fadeth not away.

The life of such a student as he was, was necessarily far apart from the vices and follies which dishonored the name of student in that day. But besides the habits which kept him aloof from ignoble dissipations, he was distinguished by a peculiar sensitiveness of honor, truthfulness and purity which gained involuntary respect even from those who were irritated by its living reproof. The tone of his mind was indicated by an enthusiastic admiration of the prose works of Milton, upon which his early style and use of English were moulded. The inspiration of liberty from that source determined him to seek a home in America. After years of separation I saw what the grace of God could effect even in such a character as his; I saw the difference between the fruit of the Spirit and the highest human virtue.

He was what is styled a Calvinist, not as a mere theologian, but as a Christian whose soul yielded a reverent and uncavilling submission to what God has been pleased to reveal of Himself, and what to many are mere speculations or party distinctions, were to him divine and influential verities. He was clear and uncompromising in his testimony to the truth as it is in Jesus, in whose glorious person and perfect work he found life and all that satisfies life. To him it was evidently a small matter to be judged of man's judgment, and so he was often found on the unpopular side with the truth of God. He was the earnest advocate of Millenarianism, when to be a Millenarian was to expose himself to ecclesiastical ostracism. He dared take the attitude of a candid enquirer into the claims of the self-styled "Catholic Apostolic Church." But when it is said that "he sympathized with some features of the Irvingite movement," it should be known that it was not with the doctrinal system nor with the ritualism of that Church that he sympathized.

His sympathy, so far as it went, arose from his exalted conception of what the Holy Scriptures teach of the Church as the temple of the Holy Ghost, the body of Christ, invested, as the representative of her Head, with His authority and endowed with His ascension gifts; and from his convictions regarding the destiny of the Church as the bride, the Lamb's wife—in the words of one of his published sermons, "The Queen-consort of a renewed and emancipated world," in which the everlasting purpose of Divine love will be accomplished and the manifold wisdom of God will be displayed. He could not be satisfied with low views of the Church as a voluntary association of men, defining its own prerogatives, framing its own laws, choosing its own ministry, whose qualifications and functions it prescribes, adapting itself to the expediences of the hour, and renouncing a heavenly destiny for the empty boast of a temporal triumph. He was attracted by the pretensions of a body which claimed to realize his august conception, or, permit me to say, the divine revelation of the Church's existence, and which, in its testimony, gave great prominence to the Church's glorious destiny. But the fact that he did not die in the communion of "the Catholic Apostolic Church," is the proof that, on careful examination, he did not find its pretensions substantiated.

Pardon me that I have written at such length on these points to you who are so much more capable than I am to do justice to the character, gifts and views of my friend. I know what your friendship was to him in his lifetime, and I am happy that it is your hand that is to pen the brief record which will associate his memory with the enduring work in which he counted it a privilege to be your fellow-laborer. For me it would perhaps have seemed more fitting that I should speak only of the generosity and tenderness of his unfailing friendship, and the disinterestedness of his brotherly love. The memory of these is rather to be cherished as a solace of the "little while" which separates me from him who was the last of the friends of life's spring-tide who remained to be the companion of its autumn days, and the only one of them whose sympathy relieved "the sear and yellow leaf" with the light of that blessed hope in which he sleeps, and in which I am, Dear Sir,

Yours, with high respect,

JAMES INGLIS.

P R E F A C E .

THE exposition of the two Epistles to the Thessalonians was at first undertaken by my dear colleague, Professor Dr. ATHERLEN, who, however, was able to complete only the first two chapters of the First Epistle. A disease, which unhappily compelled him for years to forego severe labor, led him, on an understanding with the esteemed editor, to commit to my hands the continuation of the work. It grieves me that he was not to live to see the task accomplished. On May 2d of the present year he entered into rest.

For the Introduction to the First Epistle and for the last three chapters of the same, as well as for the whole of the Second, I alone am to be held responsible. The two chapters executed by my predecessor I went over along with him; but here, with the exception of a few additions* to which he assented, every thing is from his hand. May the reader not find in what follows too great a contrast. Some points in which I slightly differ from the view of my late friend are in part too unimportant to require alteration, as, for example, the way in which ἐμφορῶν is connected with what precedes (i. 8); the view of the dative ὑμῖν (ii. 10); the question to what ὁ refers (ii. 13); in other cases subsequent opportunities were found of recurring to them; thus, in regard to ἐργον τῆς πίστεως (i. 3) I refer to the note on 2 Thess. i. 11, and a small supplement in reference to the handicraft of the Apostle is furnished at 2 Thess. iii. 7-9.

For what help I am indebted to Dr. STOCKMEYER, Pastor of St. Martin's, Basel, is mentioned in the Homiletical and Practical Notes to 1 Thess. iv. 1-8.

In now sending forth, along with the legacy of an honored divine, the first fruits of my labor in this department, I can but wish and pray God, that the joint work may promote the understanding of these glorious Epistles, love to the truth therein proclaimed, and the edification of the Church of Christ.

DR. C. J. RIGGENBACH.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL

THESSALONIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. TO WHOM THE EPISTLE WAS ADDRESSED.

THESSALONICA (see Winer, Realwörterbuch), called Therme by Herodotus and Thucydides, lies at the head of the Sinus Thermaicus. The later name was given to it by Cassander in honor of his wife Thessalonica, a daughter of Philip. (Others allege that the name was intended to commemorate a victory over the Thessalians.) Under the Romans Thessalonica was the chief city of the second region of the province of Macedonia, and the residence of a Roman Prætor and Quæstor. Pliny mentions it as libera. Subsequently it is called Metropolis, and that not only for Macedonia, but also for Achaia. Throughout the whole mediæval period it is a city of importance, belonging for a time to Venice, but since 1430 to Turkey.* At present it bears the slightly abbreviated name of Saloniki, and still, as in the time of the Romans, the population is large, and includes thousands of Jews. What was wanting in Philippi Paul found in this flourishing capital and emporium—namely, a synagogue.

The founding of the church in this place is related in Acts xvii. 1 sqq. It was one of the fruits of the second missionary journey, Acts xv.–xviii., and the second church† that arose on the European continent. First in Philippi (where perished republican Rome a century before) had the Apostle fulfilled to him the promise implied in that vision of the man of Macedonia. (Acts xvi. 9). And there too he had had his first experience of a persecution springing altogether from heathen motives. The selfishness of those who made their gains by soothsaying had turned against him the pretext of the religio illicita. After the bloody violence, and while his wounds could scarcely yet have been healed, he had in company with Silas, his fellow-sufferer, and with Timothy‡, on whom the persecution had not fallen, repaired in joyous elevation of spirit to Thessalonica.

* [CONYBEARE and HOWSON, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, c. ix.: "The heroic age of Thessalonica was the third century. It was the bulwark of Constantinople in the shock of the barbarians; and it held up the torch of the truth to the successive tribes who overspread the country between the Danube and the Ægean,—the Goths and the Slavus, the Bulgarians of the Greek Church, and the Wallachians, whose language still seems to connect them with Philippi and the Roman colonies. Thus, in the mediæval chroniclers, it has deserved the name of 'the Orthodox City.'"—J. L.]

† [Or possibly the third. It is not improbable that the church at Rome, as well as that of Philippi, preceded it.—J. L.]

‡ [That is not equally certain. Only Paul and Silas are mentioned at the departure from Philippi, and during the stay at Thessalonica. Timothy may for some reason have been left behind at the former place, as he was afterwards at Berea. Or the omission of his name may be accounted for as in Doctrinal Note 2 on 1 Thess. iii. 2.—J. L.]

He made his appearance in the synagogue, where he found ready such a point of attachment as it was his principle to avail himself of (agreeably to Rom. i. 16; ix. 4, 5, and not at variance with the geographical partition of Gal. ii. 9). Starting from the Scriptures of the Old Testament, he sketched the full prophetic image of the suffering and risen Messiah, and then he set forth the fulfilment, to wit, that in Jesus the predicted Christ had appeared. The Second Epistle shows us how he especially expounded to them the prophet Daniel. Some (not many) Jews were convinced, together with a great multitude of devout Greeks (proselytes);—the insufficiently attested reading καὶ Ἑλλήνων would distinguish between devout persons (proselytes) and Greeks (still altogether heathen); that some had been idolaters is presupposed also at 1 Thess. i. 9;—and, lastly, special prominence is given to the fact that not a few of the most honorable women believed; not that a higher value is put upon their souls on account of their rank, but they had more opposition to overcome than others. It is moreover implied in the exhortations of 1 Thess. iv. 6–11 that the majority of the converts consisted of tradesmen and mechanics. All these by God's appointment fell to the Apostle's share,* after he had preached in the synagogue only three sabbaths, though no doubt he did so in the intervals also, as his custom was, to wit, within doors while working with his hands (1 Thess. ii. 9). But that he still labored on in the young separated church for some time after the three sabbaths is improbable (against WIESELER, Chronol. des apost. Zeitalters, p. 40; and others†); for the Apostolic History, without giving the least hint (as in Acts xviii. 7; xix. 9) of such a continuance of labor, connects immediately with the mention of the three sabbaths the account of the uproar that drove the Apostle away. Again, that the Apostle worked at his trade proves nothing for a longer stay; and quite as little does the statement (Phil. iv. 16), that the Philippians had sent him presents once and again to Thessalonica. It may even be questioned whether Paul here refers to his first residence in Thessalonica; but even so, the two communications may have followed quickly one on the other.

Thus within scarcely three weeks‡ was formed a numerous and flourishing congregation. The time, indeed, was fully occupied, the people in a susceptible state of mind, and Paul fervent in spirit, as also the Epistles show; but the phenomenon is still an extraordinary one, and Paul himself holds it up as such.

The powerful movement was met by a powerful hostility. The unbelieving Jews knew how to use idle people in stirring up a tumult. The Apostle himself they did not find, but his host Jason and some other Christians they dragged before the Præfectus urbis on a charge slanderous, but crafty, and adapted to Roman ears. These seditious men, they said, who had agitated the whole orbis Romanus, incited to revolt against the Emperor by proclaiming Jesus as king. Just at that time the Jews (assidue tumultuantes, Sueton.) had been expelled from Rome by Claudius (Acts xviii. 2), and found themselves everywhere jealously watched as disturbers of the peace. How gladly did they now seize on the pretext, for the sake of clearing themselves, and fastening an effective calumny on those they hated! The reproach that is cast at us lights only on them. So they feigned loyalty, and betrayed their dearest religious hopes to the princes of worldly empire; precisely like the accusers of Jesus before Pilate (Luke xxiii. 2; John xix. 12 sqq.). The Apostle is struck by the resemblance, 1 Thess. ii. 14 sqq. It is commonly supposed that the peculiar emphasis laid by Paul in his preaching on the βασιλεία Θεοῦ (1 Thess. i. 10, and elsewhere)§ had given occasion to this perversion. But it is no less true that the wickedness of the Jews, of which he had already had manifold experience, impelled the Apostle, as being itself a momentous sign of the time, to proclaim the nearness of the judgment. That Israel is filling up the measure of his obduracy, is an idea with which he is fully impressed. Therefore does he proclaim the coming of the Lord, but, of course, in a manner remote from all political offence. The Roman magistracy is spiritually incapable of investigating the matter; the people are alarmed by fears about the uproar and Roman vengeance; but the course of the authorities is moderate. They take security that no disturbances are meditated; and Paul, to spare the young church a renewal of the storm, withdraws to Berea. From this place, which lay not two days' journey to the south-west, he might still work in the direction of Thessalonica. But the Jews of this city showed themselves to be peculiarly implacable adversaries (as Saul had been before the day of Damascus). They drove him also from Berea, and he, leaving behind his two attendants, set off for Athens.

‡ [ALFORD: “We are hardly justified in assuming, with Jowett, that it was only three weeks. For ‘three Sabbaths’, even if they mark the whole stay, may designate four weeks: and we are not compelled to infer that a Sabbath may not have passed at the beginning, or the end, or both, on which he did not preach in the synagogue.”—J. L.]

§ [This idea is favored also by the special charge urged at Thessalonica against the preachers, to wit, that they were revolutionary propagandists, “doing contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying, that there is another king, Jesus,” Acts xvii. 7.—J. L.]

The Apostolic History makes no mention at all of Timothy as having come to Paul at Athens, and as having been sent from there to Thessalonica (1 Thess. iii. 1, 2), but only that he came again to him from Macedonia, Acts xviii. 5; comp. 1 Thess. iii. 6. Where Paul was at that time, the Epistle does not tell us. According to the Acts, the meeting took place at Corinth, and indeed along with Timothy Silas also came from Macedonia. And so it appears likewise from 1 Thess. i. 1, that both of his assistants were with the Apostle when he wrote the letter. As to whether and how the accounts from these two sources may be more closely adjusted, see the note on 1 Thess. iii. On the whole it is evident that, while independent of one another, they agree well together.

§ 2. PLACE, TIME, AND OCCASION OF WRITING.

From what was last mentioned we may gather that the subscription in old manuscripts: "Written from Athens," is not only (as are all these subscriptions) spurious, but also incorrect. It arose probably as a hasty inference from 1 Thess. iii. 1, as if the place where Paul wrote must have been the same as that from which he sent Timothy. In Corinth rather was our Epistle written, and indeed at the time when Paul was commencing his labors in that city; not very long after the conversion of the Thessalonians (1 Thess. i. 9); immediately after Timothy's return to Paul (1 Thess. iii. 6, ἀπρ.); consequently in the year 53* (prior to 54 when Claudius died, comp. Acts xviii. 2; and see WIESELER, Chronol. des ap. Zeitalters, p. 253). Such is also the old and generally received opinion. That in favor of its later composition (WURM: at the date of Acts xviii. 22; SCHRADER: at that of xx. 2; KÖHLER, on account of 1 Thess. ii. 14 sqq.: not till the time of the Jewish war, later than Acts xxviii.) rests on untenable grounds. The mention of presidents (1 Thess. v. 12)—and that without any official title—does not disprove the recent establishment of the church. Though at a later period, when a selection could be made, no novices were chosen (1 Tim. iii. 6), yet Acts xiv. 23 shows that Paul left no church without presidents. Further on we shall meet with still other considerations that are supposed to support a later composition, and shall find them equally invalid.

But what it was that prompted the Apostle to write is easily explained from the condition of the church. The faithful pastor could not but be deeply concerned about it. He knew that quick conversion is not experience and confirmation. Except where circumstances prevented, he always spent considerable time on the firm settlement of a church (Acts xviii. 11, 18; xix. 8, 10). But driven as he had been so soon from Thessalonica by violence, he sought from a distance to provide against the noble church being again torn from him by persecution or seduction (1 Thess. iii. 5). Twice he sought to return in person (1 Thess. ii. 18); once perhaps from Berea. And when this, probably on account of the threatening malice of his enemies, could not be accomplished (Satan hindered us, he says), he sent Timothy in his stead (1 Thess. iii. 2). Nor was this any light task for his still youthful associate, who seems, indeed, thus far to have less attracted the enemies' notice. Through the reports of Timothy the Apostle was greatly rejoiced (1 Thess. iii. 6 sqq.); he was able to thank God that under all persecutions (ch. i. 6; ii. 14 sqq.; iii. 3) they were steadfast in the faith, an example to all (ch. i. 7) in brotherly love (ch. iv. 9), and in the Christian walk generally (ch. iv. 1 sqq.). Still his longing to be able to visit them himself is not at all abated (ch. iii. 10 sqq.); rather it was just what he had learned through Timothy that induces him in the mean time to commune with them at least by letter. He will thereby yet further strengthen what Timothy has wrought, draw ever tighter the bond between himsel and te church, and by his exhortation supply what he had observed to be wanting in them. As the readers of the Epistle are there represented, they appear to us throughout standing in the freshness of their faith and first love, but yet as beginners, in need of establishment; troubled, on the one hand, by a want of clear apprehension, and in danger, on the other, from the terrors of persecution and the power of delusion. The Apostle, however, treats them with a noble tenderness, without expressing distrust on account of their inexperience, and knows how to combine in the wisest way encouragement with admonition.

§ 3. GENUINENESS OF THE EPISTLE.

What OLSHAUSEN wrote as early as 1840 about the First Epistle to the Thessalonians being one of the few New Testament Epistles, that have had the good fortune to be attacked neither formerly nor in recent times, was not quite correct even then. For already in 1835 had BAUR (die Pastoralbriefe) and in 1836 SCHRAEDER (der Apostel Paulus) brought forward at least suspicions against its genuineness. Since then BAUR (Paulus, der Apostel Jesu Christi, 1845, p. 480; with corroborations in theol. Jahrb., 1855, II.) has decided against the authenticity not only of the Second, but also of the First Epistle; not, however, that this was any misfortune for it; for the result can only be the recognition so much the more thorough of its peculiar character and high value.

The evidence of antiquity for our Epistle is neither stronger nor weaker than it is, e. g., for the Epistle to the Galatians, and the so-called internal grounds are all that Baur urges against it. He finds the contents unimportant; there is an utter lack of special interest, of precise motive; mere general exhortations, instructions, wishes, which in other Epistles occur incidentally, are here the main thing. Besides, the Epistle shows itself to be dependent on the book of Acts and on other Epistles; especially do we meet with many things to remind us of the Epistles to the Corinthians. The very detailed statement of the conversion of the Thessalonians appears to be altogether aimless; why write to a church everything that it knows from its own experience? Moreover, it is assumed that the church has not been long in existence, and yet it is asserted that in every place it is commended as an example of faith (ch. i. 7, 8); that it has already shown its brotherly love to the brethren in all Macedonia (ch. iv. 10); that withal there is already imminent danger of the prevalence of an idling disposition (ch. iv. 11); and already has Paul once and again desired to return to Thessalonica (ch. ii. 17 sq.). That the Epistle speaks of the coming of the Lord in a very familiar way, Baur is compelled to allow; essentially as 1 Cor. xv.; and then again, he thinks, quite otherwise, far more in the style of the Jewish Rabbis than in that place. So also the way in which it speaks of the sufferings of the Jewish Christians, and already takes for granted the destruction of Jerusalem (ch. ii. 14, 16), is quite unpauline; and equally so 1 Thess. v. 27.

BAUR's attack has met with nothing but contradiction: from KOCH (1848), then especially from LÜNEMANN (1850-59), from WILIB. GRIMM (Stud. und Krit., 1850, iv.), LANGE (das ap. Zeitalter, I. 108; 1853), REUSS (Gesch. der heil. Schriften des Neuen Testam., 2d ed., 1853; 3d ed., 1860. "The suspicion appears to be arbitrary, got up to favor a historical system."), GUERIKE (Isagogik, 2d ed., 1854), LIPSIVS (who indeed sets up untenable fictions of his own, Stud. und Krit., 1854, IV.; against him Lünemann and others), HOFMANN (die heil. Schrift Neuen Testaments, I. 270; 1862), BLEEK (Einleitung in's Neue Testament, 1862), and even (as regards the First Epistle) from HILGENFELD (Zeitschrift für Wissensch. Theologie), 1862, III.

That the contents of the Epistle are unimportant can be affirmed by BAUR only from his having an eye exclusively for abstract ideas, and not for living personal interests. He partly contradicts himself, when in the section on the Parousia he finds the (solitary) dogmatic idea that had led to the composition of the Epistle. At the same time, on the affinity and the difference of this idea, compared with the teaching of the Apostle elsewhere, he decides just as he does on the questions of style. When a resemblance presents itself, it must be a servile imitation; but let a peculiar thought or an original application occur, then it is said: That is unapauline. In truth, the points of agreement with other Epistles are not more marked than, for example, between the Epistle to the Romans and that to the Galatians, and in every instance the word suits the connection. On the other hand, what there is of peculiar is by no means unapostolic. The exposition will have to show how very Pauline the whole is, even to the niceties of thought and style.

On the whole, it must be said that BAUR even precludes himself from understanding the Epistle. What he urges with most plausibility is, the features that seem to be inconsistent with the composition of the Epistle soon after the establishment of the church. But if we reckon the Apostle's ministry in Berea, in Athens, and now also in Corinth at about half a year, and represent to ourselves, moreover, the unusually striking character of the conversion that had here taken place, we perceive that a speedy and widespread propagation of the important news is fully explained; and nowhere more easily than at a maritime emporium, like Corinth, might people come from all sides to whom Paul had no need to tell the story of Thessalonica, as the report thereof had already reached them. As to Paul's having by this time desired once and again to visit Thessalonica, on that point after what was said before not another word need be wasted. That the church should already have shown its brotherly love towards the Christians in Macedonia, and that, on the contrary, there were faults to be censured, such as a fanatical indolence, how long time after its establishment was required for that? Indeed, of the latter fact it is to be said, that it is more easily accounted for at the beginning, immediately after the conversion, than subsequently at a time of quiet composure.

Still more is that the case in regard to the doctrine of the resurrection. To be sure, BAUR thinks that the anxiety about the Christians who had fallen asleep cannot be conceived as existing only a few months after the founding of the church, but rather implies that nearly a generation of Christians had already died. But could there not be anxiety as to the fate of the departed, though there were but a few of them? some perhaps martyrs? or even though none had died? if only, in the time of persecution, the nearness of death stood more than usually threatening before the eyes of all? Nay, must we not ask in turn: Supposing that the Epistle were spurious, not written till a lifetime after the founding of the church, at a period also when the clear apostolic instruction had long been everywhere spread abroad, what forger would still have invented even then such a case of dark apprehension, as that the dead might fare worse than those who should survive till the Coming? But this apprehension might easily arise among novices, who had enjoyed the apostolic instruction for only three weeks. Not less are we justified in asking: What forger would have allowed the Apostle, a lifetime after Paul's death, to write about the hope that he himself might survive till the Coming (ch. iv. 17)? As composed in the beginning and by Paul himself, the whole is intelligible; as a fiction of a late date, the whole becomes incomprehensible.

That holds good also in a particular relation. BAUR finds something at variance with the Apostle's manner, in the way in which the author sets up the Jewish Christians as a model, and assails the Jews without. He is able to recognize him only when he is contending with the Jewish Christians. But the real Apostle informs us how the churches in Judea rejoiced in his ministry (Gal. i. 22 sqq.), and at a much later date he makes collections for the saints in Jerusalem. On the other hand, he suffered not only from the false brethren, but expressly also from the Jews (2 Cor. xi. 24-26). And that is what we meet with in Thessalonica; not yet, as afterwards in many places, a Judaistic strife within the church, but, suitably to the earlier period, an attack from without by altogether unbelieving Jews. There is no ground for the idea of LIPSCHT, that the Apostle is trying beforehand (ch. ii. 3, 5, 6) to avert Judaistic aspersions; it was rather unbelieving Jews that slandered the Apostles as agitators, and as persons who flattered the people from motives of ambition and greed. The Romans would not of themselves have thought thus early of regarding the gospel as dangerous to the state; their moderate course even shows, that they laid no great stress on the slander itself. Those who got it up were Jews. That Jews perceived sooner than the heathen the power of the gospel to transform the world, is what was to be expected; that they raised the charge of a revolutionary movement, is the lie of their passionate hatred. Therefore also does the Apostle pronounce on them a severe, but well-merited, judgment (ch. ii. 14 sqq.). They have killed their Messiah, as formerly their old prophets; the followers of the Messiah in Judea they have persecuted, and now also they have driven out us Apostles; from Thessalonica last of all, but on previous occasions also (comp. Acts ix. 23, 29; xiii. 50; xiv. 19). The aorist cannot hinder us from referring the statement to the whole of the persecution of the Apostle, which is thus taken together as one act; and so likewise in the case of the prophets. But in this way, says the Apostle, they fill up the measure of their ungodly and misanthropic temper. It is not simply the odium generis humani, in the sense of a Tacitus, that he upbraids them with, but that they are contrary to men, in that they will not suffer the word of salvation to be spoken to the Gentiles. So now the wrath is come upon them, ready for the final burst. Does not the Apostle here speak quite like a prophet of God, just as in Rom. ix.?

And to what now does the whole amount? What of the detailed recital of things that the Thessalonians knew by their own experience? In this DE WETTE also sees nothing but a gushing of the heart, and thinks that only in the exhortations and instructions (chh. iv. and v.) are we to seek for the object of the Epistle. We hold, on the contrary, that to describe the first three chapters as aimless is nothing else but to confess that one does not yet understand the Epistle; whereas thoroughly to understand it will be the best vindication of its genuineness.

§ 4. COURSE OF THOUGHT AND IMPORTANCE OF THE EPISTLE.

The very simple course of thought in the Epistle is as follows: After the salutation ch. i. 1 comes the FIRST PART, CH. I. 2—III. 13, PERSONAL AND HISTORICAL.

I. Ch. i. 2—ii. 16. Paul signifies to the Thessalonians the genuineness of his preaching and of their faith.

1) Ch. i. 2—7. He begins with thanksgiving for the state of the church. He is sure of their Divine election. How? Because of the peculiar joyousness and power of his preaching, that had there been granted to him and his companions, and because of the unreserved readiness with which they received the word. The extraordinary result is for him an ever memorable work of God.

2) Ch. i. 8—10. Others also far and wide have been struck both with the agency of the Apostle and the conversion of the Thessalonians.

So should the Thessalonians likewise be ever mindful not to allow themselves to be withdrawn from the ground of their former experience. To recall afresh and explain what they had gone through ought to retain them in this position.

Once more, and with yet greater exactness, he reviews both sides of their experience:

3) a. Ch. ii. 1—12. The conduct of the Apostles, when, coming from their recent ill treatment at Philippi, they had so joyfully proclaimed the gospel, free from all deceit, impurity, and selfishness. By this too he would establish them—arm them, that is, against all insinuations that might possibly have staggered them. Let Jewish calumny charge us with what it will, and let Gentile adversaries repeat it, in order to turn you away from us; you know that your experience of us has been different. And so he

b. Ch. ii. 13—16, bears testimony to their hearty faith, through which they had willingly endured all opposition; they have thereby (they first from among the Gentiles) entered into the noble fellowship of the oldest churches persecuted for the gospel's sake; but the instigators of the hostility will be overtaken by the judgment.

It tends mightily to strengthen them, when he interprets to them their experience, and opens to them a clear insight into the state of the times. But that they may understand how that even after his expulsion he had by no means unfeelingly abandoned them, he informs them

II. Ch. ii. 17—iii. 13, what he had done for them since his departure;

- 1) Ch. ii. 17-20, how he had once and again desired to come to them;
- 2) Ch. iii. 1-5, how he had sent Timothy in his stead, and so for their sakes had deprived himself of his attendance;
- 3) Ch. iii. 6-13, how he is now full of thankful joy over his report; yet he intimates at the same time, that he might nevertheless still supply something lacking in them. Since he cannot at present accomplish this in person, he therefore does it at once by letter, and so follows the

SECOND PART, CHH. IV. AND V., DIDACTIC AND HORTATORY.

The warnings that meet us here have reference, first of all, to sins to which the temptation must have been peculiarly great in a Gentile city of maritime trade. Farther on, the instructions and exhortations respect merely such manifestations as could not but occur in a young and unsettled church—cases of indistinctness and excitement in doctrine and life; to this belongs as well the fanatical indolence as the setting aside of ordinary occupations. In particular, we find

- 1) Ch. iv. 1-8, a warning against fornication and covetousness;
- 2) Ch. iv. 9-12, an incitement to growth in brotherly love, and, that love be not prejudiced, to quiet and sober industry;
- 3) Ch. iv. 13—v. 11, instruction and exhortation respecting the coming of the Lord;
 - a. Ch. iv. 13-18, they who have fallen asleep will rise again, and so at the Lord's advent will suffer no loss;
 - b. Ch. v. 1-11, but when He will come, we know not; let your walk, therefore, be at all times watchful and sober. Then come
- 4) Ch. v. 12-24, the closing exhortations: to honor their presidents, to live in peace, to keep themselves free from all bitterness against persecutors, to unite vivacity with sobriety of spirit. The whole concludes
- 5) Ch. v. 25-28, with the salutation and benediction.

Thus the Epistle is throughout adapted to the need of the church—an exceedingly significant example of fatherly loving care of a church still in its infancy. And this is just the earliest of the Apostle's letters that have been preserved to us.

It was natural that in the Epistle to the Galatians, whose life of faith was threatened by false doctrine, Paul should have had to let his dialectics act in a quite different fashion. It was natural that the spiritual life of the Corinthians, much more richly developed, but distracted also by internal division, should have demanded from the Apostle work of more varied thought. In the Epistle to the Colossians also he has to do with an adulteration of the Gospel, and one indeed more refined. If the Epistle to the Romans marks the highest achievement of the apostolic thought, and that to the Ephesians the mightiest prophetic flight of his spirit, the one that comes nearest to our Epistle in tone and style is that to the Philippians. And this is readily understood; for the two Macedonian churches, less conspicuous for a high display of the charisms, than for the inner life of faith and love, gave the heart of the Apostle for that very reason the most untroubled joy. But such is the rich fulness of his apostolic spirit, that he was able to be to all his churches all that they required.

Of the style of our Epistle BENIGL says: Habet hæc epistola meram quandam dulcedinem, quæ lectori dulcibus affectibus non assueto minus sapit quam ceteræ, severitate quadam palatum stringentes.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE THESSALONIANS.

CHAPTER I 1.

SALUTATION.

1 Paul, and Silvanus, and Timotheus [Timothy],¹ unto the church² of the Thessalonians *which is*³ in God the Father and *in*⁴ the Lord Jesus Christ: Grace be unto you [Grace unto you, χάρις ὑμῖν],⁵ and peace (from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ).⁶

⁴ [The repetition of the in is also superfluous.—J. L.]

⁵ [See the Auth. Vers. at 2 Thessa. i. 2; Rom. i. 7; Philom. 2. Koch: "By the omission of the verb the expression gains in strength and emphasis."—German, after Luther: sei mit euch.—J. L.]

⁶ The words εὐεχὴ εὐαγγελίου καὶ εὐπρεπὸς ἰσοῦ Χριστοῦ are wanting in important manuscripts [B. F. G.], versions [Vulgate, Syriac, &c.], and all the [ancient] commentaries, and are therefore bracketed by Bengel and Lachmann, and cancelled by Tischendorf,* Pott, De Wette, Lünemann, and others [Alford, Ellcott, Amer. Bible Union], though defended by Schott, Olshausen, Koch, Reiche, and others. It is an obvious conjecture, that the words were brought here from the opening of the other Pauline Epistles, and in favor of this view is the brevity by which the inscription of this earliest of the Epistles is on the whole distinguished. In the precisely similar opening of the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians the words in question are also found, and are there undoubtedly genuine. We let them stand here likewise [in bracket], in accordance with the principle which we intend to follow also in other cases, that for homiletic treatment a various reading only then comes to be of decisive importance, when the authorities are so weighty that a universal, or at least nearly universal, agreement prevails among the critics in regard to it. [In this case, moreover, the common reading is sustained by the Codex Sinaiticus,† A. D. E., and other uncials.—J. L.]

* [I refer throughout to Tischendorf's seventh edition, the eighth, now in process of publication, not having got as far as the Epistles.—J. L.]

† [To this already famous manuscript, for which its discoverer, Tischendorf, is probably justified in claiming the primacy in the department of textual criticism (in se habere rei criticae principatum), there is no reference whatever in Dr. Aubrien's portion of this Commentary. The reader will here find the results of a full and careful collation of it (as well as of the modern critical editions) throughout both Epistles.—J. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Paul, Silvanus, and Timotheus [Timothy].—On Paul, see the Acts of the Apostles, and the Introduction to the Epistle to the Romans.—Silvanus. He is called in the Acts Silas; by Paul and Peter, Silvanus. A distinguished leader (ἡγούμενος; comp. Lechler at Acts xv. 22) and prophet of the church of Jerusalem, he was chosen by the Apostolic Council as one of the bearers of its decrees to Antioch, where he then remained for a longer period in friendly intercourse with the Gentile Christians, exhorting them and confirming them in the faith (Acts xv. 22, 27, 32 sq.). Even though Acts xv. 34 be not genuine, yet that choice and this sojourn are sufficient to show, that Silas was one of the Jewish Christians who, like Stephen, had from the beginning a freer, open sense for Gentile Christianity and Paulinism. In recognition of this large-heartedness Paul chose him for his attendant on his second missionary journey (Acts xv. 40), during which the church at Thessalonica was founded (see Introduction), and so we find him by his side in work and suffering, before magistrates, in stripes, in prison, in prayer, in miraculous deliverance, in flight, Acts xvi. 19, 25, 29; xvii. 4, 10, 14 sq.; xviii. 5. He accordingly appears in the inscriptions of the two Epistles to the Thessalonians, and 2 Cor. i. 19. Subsequently Silvanus is simply mentioned by Peter as bearer of his First Epistle to Asia Minor, where he was already known, ever since Paul's second missionary journey, as "a faithful brother" (1 Pet. v. 12; comp. Fronmüller in loc.). Silvanus, from his original position at Jerusalem in friendly relations to Peter, and then a companion of Paul, is a man of whom it must be thought a peculiarly natural thing, that he again appears by the side of Peter, when the latter addressed himself to the at least to some extent Pauline churches of Asia

Minor. He belongs to those men of second rank in the apostolic period, in whom the oneness of the Pauline spirit with that of the first Apostles, and the credibility, of late so severely assailed, of the book of Acts, are in an artless way historically represented. According to the tradition of the ancient Church, Silvanus should have been the first Bishop of Thessalonica, but Silas—whom it distinguishes from Silvanus—Bishop of Corinth (see Winer, bibliisches Realwörterbuch, 8d ed., II. p. 459, Art. Silas). As this distinction is certainly erroneous, since Silas is merely a contraction, such as frequently occurs in proper names, for Silvanus, as Ἀσρίτας for Ἀσρίταρος, in German Niklas for Nikolaus, &c., and since in the Acts we find Silas, and in Paul's Epistles Silvanus, associated with Paul and Timothy at Thessalonica and Corinth, so the whole tradition admits of easy explanation as an arbitrary inference from the New Testament data, Silas appearing for the last time at Corinth, Acts xviii. 5, and Silvanus in the forefront of the Thessalonian Epistles.—On Timothy, who had in like manner attended the Apostle during the founding of the Thessalonian church, see the Introduction to 1 Tim. Everywhere Paul speaks of Timothy with paternal tenderness, and bears the highest testimony to his character. Not only does he mention him generally as a brother (2 Cor. i. 1; Col. i. 1; Philem. 1; 1 Thess. iii. 2), not only as a servant of God and his own fellow-laborer in the gospel of Christ (1 Thess. iii. 2; Rom. xvi. 21; 1 Cor. xvi. 10), a servant of Jesus Christ, like himself (Phil. i. 1), but he calls him his faithful and beloved, his genuine child in the Lord (1 Cor. iv. 17; 1 Tim. i. 2, 18 [γνήσιον τέκνον]; 2 Tim. i. 2), and writes to the Philippians (ch. ii. 19 sqq.) of their knowing the proof of him, that, as a child the father,* he has served with him in the gospel; indeed he says expressly (v. 20) that he has—so at least during the first Roman imprisonment, when he wrote this—no one likeminded, who will so sincerely and disinterestedly care for the church. Thus in the glorious circle of apostolic men that surrounded Paul Timothy takes the first place. "No one," says F. RANKE, "has the Apostle embraced with more cordial and fatherly affection than Timothy—one of the loveliest and most refreshing sights of the apostolic age."—It is undoubtedly as being the older man that Silvanus is here and 2 Cor. i. 19 placed before Timothy,† whose youth is still spoken of in the Epistles written to him at a much later date (1 Tim. iv. 12; 2 Tim. ii. 22). It is worthy of note and agrees with what has just been said, that in the narrative of travel in the Acts (chh. xvi., xvii.) Timothy, after the mention of his being added to the company, is not again immediately named, whereas Silas is mentioned frequently along with Paul. First on occasion of the separation from Paul is Timothy afterwards named along with and after Silas (ch. xvii. 14 sq.; xviii. 5).—The Apostle names, and his practice is similar in other places also (comp., besides the inscriptions of 2 Thess., 2 Cor., Phil., Col., and Philemon, in which Timothy in like manner appears, 1 Cor. i. 1 Paul and Sothones, and Gal. i. 1, 2 Paul and all the brethren that are with me, Silvanus and Timothy as joint authors,‡ as virtually joined with him in getting up the Epistle, though he alone is the writer, and dictates the Epistle perhaps only to one of them. As they have preached the Lord together orally (comp. 2 Cor. i. 19), so should also the written word go forth from all the three. The three men who had become dear to the church must again appear before her mental vision united as in the beginning; she must recognize their fair, lasting concord one with another, and know that she has received the same gospel, not merely from an individual, but from the mouth of two and three witnesses (Matt. xviii. 16, 20), and is borne on more than one heart (comp. ver. 2: we give thanks). Therefore also Paul does not need to describe Silvanus and Timothy more closely; they are held still in fresh, living remembrance by the church.—For just the same reason also he does not designate himself more fully as an Apostle, &c. As already remarked by CALVIN, he needs not to come before the Thessalonians with official authority, but merely to recall his person to their memory, as he lived and wrought among them in the power of the Spirit. In this brief, free self-designation LÜCKMANN finds with reason a mark of the earlier composition and authenticity of our Epistles. At a later period, indeed, Paul does not in the inscriptions of his Epistles call himself an Apostle in cases, where he can count on faithful, unimpaired love and recognition on the part of a church or an individual; yet even there the inscriptions are fuller, as Phil. i. 1; Philem. 1. But after that his apostolic authority was assailed, from the time of the Epistle to the Galatians, his general custom was to append his official to his personal name, and then frequently he makes use of that for longer or shorter additions corresponding to the actual contents of the letter, so that no inscription is in all respects the same as another. Even in Thessalonica, it is true, attempts to create distrust were not wanting; but these affected not his apostolic authority as such, but his entire person. This freedom of the Apostle in his self-designations is characteristic and instructive. As he directs his letters, not to the office-bearers, but to the church, so, unless there be a necessity for it, he does not himself come forth in his official authority. He has no stiff official style, but here too he proportions every thing to the circumstances and exigencies of the particular case. Accordingly, he here distinguishes himself by no addition from Silvanus and Timotheus, but simply takes the precedence of them, and thereby at the same time designates himself as properly the author of the Epistle. Certainly in this is shown also the humility of the Apostle, and so far the remark is not incorrect, that Paul omitted his apostolic title out of modesty, whether towards the Thessalonians (CHRYSOSTOM, &c.), or towards Silvanus and Timothy ZWINGLI, PORT, &c.). Only we are not to find here the proper motive of the omission (comp. Col. i. 1). The humility is all the more genuine, that it comes out thus silently and unconstrained.

2. To the church.—Paul writes not to the presbyters, teachers, &c., but to the churches; where he names the office-bearers, it is by way of supplementary appendage (Phil. i. 1).* In the most solemn manner he requires, ch. v. 27, that all the brethren should read the Epistle. To deny the reading of Holy Scripture to the laity, therefore, is to contravene its original destination. In his earlier Epistles (to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Corinthians) Paul writes τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ or ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις; in the later ones (Romans, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians) τοῖς ἁγίοις, &c., which indeed is added in those to the Corinthians.*

3. In God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.—These words are to be closely joined with τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, as if they were preceded by τῇ or τῇ ὁσῇ, as in the opening of 1 and 2 Cor., where it is said, only in reverse order: τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ τῇ ὁσῇ ἐν Κορίνθῳ (comp. 1 Thess. ii. 14). The addition attached by means of the preposition forms here, in fact (comp. Winer, p. 123), with the substantive but one main idea, and is to be connected with it merely by the voice. This happens with special frequency in the case of the Pauline formula: ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, to which our expression is nearly allied (comp., in particular, Phil. i. 1: τοῖς ἁγίοις ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ τοῖς ὁσῇ ἐν Φιλιπποῖς, also Col. i. 2). Thus the want of the article intimates that it belongs to the idea of the Church, to be in God and Christ. "Est hæc nota veluti approbatio veræ et legitimæ ecclesiæ" (CALVIN). In this very brevity of the expression is something great and profound. It denotes not merely fellowship with God (BENGE, LÜDEMANN), but a real, essential being in God and Christ (Rom. xvi. 11; John xv. 4; xvii. 21 sqq.; 1 John ii. 5 sq.; v. 20). "It is a high dignity, to which nothing is equal, when one is in God" (CHRYSOSTOM). Whereas Thessalonica previously lay with the whole world in the wicked one (ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ masc., 1 John v. 19; comp. ver. 18; ἐν τῷ ἀληθινῷ opposed to ver. 20)—whereas in that place there were only Jews, who had no part in Christ, and Gentiles, who had none also in God—there is at this time a church there, that is in God the Father, and in Christ Jesus. Here is a miracle of God, over which the Apostle gives Him glory and thanks; as always at the beginning of his Epistles, when he turns his eye on the churches, so also here, ver. 2.

4. Grace unto you [German: Grace be with you.—J. L.] and peace. The old epistolary style combines in the inscription what with us is distributed into the address, salutation, subscription, and direction. The Pauline benediction is χάρις καὶ εἰρήνη; only in the Epistles to Timothy (and perhaps Tit. i. 4) χάρις, εὐεος, εἰρήνη; the first form also in 1 and 2 Peter, the latter in 2 John; Jude 2: εὐεος καὶ εἰρήνη καὶ ἀγάπη. Χάρις reminds us of the Greek salutation χαίρειν (comp. Acts xxiii. 26), which occurs also in the apostolic circular (Acts v. [xv.] 23; James i. 1); εἰρήνη, of the Hebrew (likewise Arabic, see WINER, Realwörterbuch: Höflichkeit) form of salutation and benediction, שלום (Gen. xliii. 23; Judg.

xix. 20; 1 Chron. xii. 18; Ex. xviii. 7; Judg. xviii. 15; 1 Sam. x. 4; xxv. 6, 6). As James in a lively manner connects, ch. i. 2, χαρὰ with the χαίρειν, so Paul has given it a turn of yet deeper Christian import in χάρις, while the εἰρήνη ὑμῶν had already by the Saviour or His return from death been brought to a Christian maturity and depth (John xx. 19, 21, 26; comp. also Luke x. 6, 6), especially in connection with His farewell discourse, in which He had promised, as the fruit of His victory over the world, and so as a distinctive family legacy in opposition to the world, to bequeath His peace to His own (John xiv. 27; xvi. 33). By their juxtaposition both words are raised completely out of their Gentile and Jewish outward significance, as referring almost solely to the natural life and welfare, into the "fulness of the peculiar salvation and blessing of Christians." A notable instance of the way in which the New Testament dialect was formed.—Χάρις is, first of all, favor generally, kindness, especially towards inferiors, the ἀγάπη in self-manifestation (just as righteousness is holiness in self-manifestation), and in this sense it is used also of the child Jesus, Luke ii. 40: χάρις Θεοῦ ἦν ἐν αὐτῷ. But in a more special sense χάρις denotes (opposed to δουλεία, νόμος, ἔργα, Rom. iv. 4; vi. 14 sq.; xi. 6) the exhibition of the Divine love as free and undeserved in regard to such, as have not merely no legal claim to it, but have according to law deserved the opposite (Rom. iii. 23, 24; Eph. ii. 3-5). This is the New Testament saving grace, which in Christ Jesus has appeared to sinners (Tit. ii. 11; John i. 17). It is not merely the principle of the redemption accomplished once for all, but it continues also to be the sustaining ground, the nourishing power of the new spiritual life with its manifold gifts in Christians (comp. Acts xxiii. 11 [no doubt a misprint for xi. 23]; vi. 8; Eph. iv. 7), and so is ever afresh inwardly sealed and communicated to them from God in Christ through the Holy Ghost (comp. Rom. v. 5; John i. 16). In this sense, according to which grace is thus not simply a sentiment, but at the same time a Divine self-communication, Paul desires for his readers ever fresh grace from God and Christ. Εἰρήνη need not be taken, with DE WETTE, MEYER, &c., against the Greek and New Testament usage, as = salvation, but with most since CHRYSOSTOM, who on this point as a Greek has a special voice, as = peace. This is the immediate effect of grace in the heart of man, the restoration, after the distraction and discord of the life of sin, of the harmony of the inner life, with its pure enjoyment, resting on the fact that the oppression and curse of sin are removed from the conscience, and man knows that in Christ he is brought again into his true relation to God, the filial relation (Rom. v. 1), and is thereby comforted and strengthened against the oppositions and vexations of the world (John xvi. 33). The enhancement of this peace, when it pours its quickening and elevating influence into the experience, is joy (χαρὰ, Rom. xiv. 17; Phil. iv. 4; John xv. 11; xvi. 22, 24; xvii. 13; 1 John i. 4; 1 Pet. i. 8—a fundamental idea of the New Testament, too much neglected by us in life and doctrine). Peace being the feeling of convalescence and healthfulness of the new life, the home-feeling of the returned prodigal, it impels the man of itself to abide in the healthful life-element of home; it has a power to keep the heart and mind, the whole mechanism of the inner life, in Christ Jesus (Phil. iv. 7), and is therefore suitable in every relation as a chief benediction for Christians.

adds: "The opinion of Wiesinger is at least as probable, that the real reason is to be found in the circumstances of the church, and that there was a tendency to undue assumption on the part of some individuals, which needed such an effective check as was implied in the special acknowledgment of those who bore office in it."—J. L.]

* [ELICOTT: "The variation is slightly noticeable; it does not however seem to point to gradually altered views with regard to the attributes of the church (JOWETT), but merely to the present comparative paucity of numbers (compare Chrysost.), and their aggregation in a single assembly." And the same considerations may perhaps account for the fact that only in these two earliest Epistles does Paul address the church as composed of persons belonging to the city, and not as established in the city itself. Comp. Col. iv. 16.—J. L.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Of the natural world these two things are true: In God we live, move, and are [Luther's version: sind = εἰμὲν.—J. L.], all things harmoniously existing in the Logos (Acts xvii. 25–28; Col. i. 17); and: The whole world lieth in the wicked one (1 John v. 19). The original Divine powers of creation and the superadded powers of the prince of this world, life and death, intermingle therein in a mysterious manner. Through Christ this mixture is dissolved, and the separation, the great judgment of the world, is effected, whereby the Satanic element is cast out, and the world brought back again to its original ground of life (John xii. 31; Col. i. 20). It is in His own person first of all, the person of the Son of man who has entered through death into His glory, that the world's judgment is fulfilled, that which is of the devil is rightfully abolished, and humanity introduced anew to God. Whosoever would again live wholly in God must be in Him. But this new being and life unites itself to the world first inwardly in the spirit. As therefore all creatures in respect of their natural existence, that is, so far as they live generally in the world of death and corruption, live, move, and are in God and immediately in the Logos, drawing continually from His omnipresent, all-pervading energy the breath of life, so Christians, in respect of their inner, pneumatic, incorruptible existence, are and live first of all in Jesus Christ, the glorified, who being the Lord is also the Spirit* as God (2 Cor. iii. 17), and so the Head and all-pervading life-principle of the Church born of His Spirit (Col. i. 18; ii. 6, 7; Eph. i. 22 sq.; ii. 21 sq.), the element in which Christians live, as the branches in the vine (John xv. 4 sqq.), so that all they do is done in Christ Jesus (Col. iii. 17, and the phrase, occurring more than a hundred times with Paul, ἐν Χριστῷ or ἐν κυρίῳ). Because in Christ, they are then also, in this higher sense of the spiritual, eternal life, in God (1 Cor. iii. 23; xi. 3; John xiv. 20). Thus in the Church is a beginning made towards the attainment of the great, Divine purpose in the world, again organically to comprehend the whole in Christ and in God (Eph. i. 10; 1 Cor. xv. 28).—[WEBSTER and WILKINSON: The full significance of this important preposition ἐν, in its N. T. use with Θεῷ, Ἰησοῦ, Χριστῷ, Κυρίῳ, can only be understood by realizing the all-pervading doctrine of the Holy Ghost.—J. L.]

2. It is of doctrinal significance, that ἐκκλησία denotes as well the universal, as the individual or local, church. The distinction between congregation and church [Gemeinde und Kirche] does not exist in the New Testament usage. Not merely a philological exactness, but one of Luther's genial instincts must be recognized in his having preserved this identity of expression, and everywhere in the New Testament translated ἐκκλησία by Gemeinde [congregation]. Spirit is, according to Oetinger's word, where every part can again become a whole. The same is true also of the place of the Spirit's manifestation, the Church. The Apostles, anxious as they were for the order of single churches (Acts xiv. 23; Tit. i. 5), made no arrangement before their departure for securing the external unity of the Church, which till then had rested in their persons.

* [HODGES: "Not one and the same person, but one and the same Being, in the same sense in which our Lord says: 'I and the Father are one.' It is an identity of essence and of power."—J. L.]

From this fact, which has not yet been sufficiently considered, we perceive two things: 1. That the Church can be one in the Spirit, even where there is a separation of outward communions; 2. that we should make moderate account of the Church as an institution. The New Testament has no word for churchly.*

3. "Nothing speaks more strongly for the Divinity of Christ than the practice, which pervades the whole style of Scripture, of joining Christ with God, and ascribing to Him strictly Divine operations." OLSHAUSEN on Rom. i. 7. There is everywhere in the New Testament, even in the Synoptical Gospels, a multitude of indirect evidences for the Divinity of Christ, modes of speech which can only on this supposition be understood in their full, natural sense. Christologies which recognize in the Redeemer merely the sinless, supernaturally begotten, eternally ordained central Man (SCHLEIERMACHER, ROTH, SCHENKEL), have in them important elements of truth, but do not ascend to the biblical height. In the inscriptions of the Pauline Epistles Father and Son are joined together as Θεὸς πατήρ, with and without ἡμῶν, and κύριος (again with and without ἡμῶν) Ἰησοῦς Χριστός. Now it might be supposed, especially on account of the ἡμῶν common to both, that πατήρ and κύριος answer to one another, the former expression derived from the family, the latter from the state and kingdom; or the former from the filial relation, the latter from that of a servant (comp. Mal. i. 6 and the frequent δοῦλος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ). But both the verbal arrangement and the decisive passage 1 Cor. viii. 5, 6 (comp. 1 Cor. xii. 5, 6; Eph. iv. 5, 6) show that the correspondence is rather between θεός and κύριος, πατήρ and Ἰησοῦς Χριστός. And this reminds us that the LXX. put κύριος for יהוה (in conformity with the oral יהוה†) and θεός for אֱלֹהִים (comp. also John xx. 28 and 2 John 3, where to κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστός is still added, with a specific relation to the πατήρ, ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ πατρὸς). Thus the appellation κύριος also becomes a witness for Christ's Divinity, as NITZSCH has particularly pointed out. (Cfr. his article on the essential trinity of God, Studien und Kritiken, 1841, p. 322 sqq., and System der christl. Lehre, 5th ed., p. 145, 189.) The peculiarity of the designation of Christ as κύριος is, that therein the Divine essence (κύριος = יהוה) and the historical, official position and operation (κύριος κυριεύων, Rom. xiv. 9, Lord and King of the kingdom of God, on which account ἡμῶν is easily subjoined) are combined in one. The latter signification evolves itself in the Gospels by various steps and deepening shades of meaning from the dialect of common life, where κύριος as applied to Jesus is scarcely any longer an ordinary word of courtesy, but, as in the sphere of revelation generally, every nomen again becomes omen, a reverential address to One whose essential superiority is recognized, as well as his possession of a miraculous power (John iv. 11, 15, 19; Matt. viii. 2, 6, 8, 21, 25; xvii. 4; xx. 30, 31; xxii. 43-45; xxv. 37, 44; xxvii. 10; John vi. 68; ix. 36, 38; xiii. 6, 13 sq.; xx. 13, 28; xxi. 7; comp. Acts i. 36; x. 36), whereas on the other hand the deeper, Jehovahistic-Messianic usage of the Apostles, especially of Paul, is found employed at the very beginning, among the links of connection with the Old Testament, by the angel Gabriel (Luke i. 16, 17, and so accordingly vv. 43, 76; comp. also Matt. vii. 21, 22; Acts vii. 59; ix. 13, 14). In the Book of Acts the expressions ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ and ὁ λόγος τοῦ κυρίου are used interchangeably (ch. iv. 31; vi. 2, 7; viii. 14; xvii. 13, &c.; viii. 25; xiii. 48 sq.; xv. 35 sq.; xix. 10, 20). In this higher use of the word it is clearly implied, that Christ attained His central position as Lord and Head of the Church, of humanity, of the world, only by means of His Divinity. But certainly there is in it also an expression of the distinctive character of His Divinity, to wit, of subordination rightly understood—the Father being the Supreme God over all, and so also the God of Christ (Eph. i. 17; John xx. 17; Rev. iii. 12), but the Son God as manifested, mediating, standing on the pinnacle of the world (Eph. iv. 5, 6; 1 Cor. xii. 5, 6). God, Lord, Spirit, are the trinitarian expressions of Paul; Father, Son, Spirit, those of the Evangelists, of the Lord, and of John.—That God, the Most High, is our Father, who loves us, and to whom we should draw near with filial confidence, and that Jesus Christ is our Lord and Jehovah, who as Man draws near to us as Saviour—this truth meets the readers of Paul's Epistles at the very outset, full of grace and peace.

* [German: dass man von der Kirche als Institution müssig halten soll. Das Neue Testament hat kein Wort für kirchlich. Nor has the N. T. any word for evangelical, trinitarian, &c. The logic of this second inference, from which I beg leave to express my dissent, is quite as feeble, as its spirit would seem to be at variance with that of the N. T. throughout. It is surely of the Church as an institution that Christ speaks in Matt. xvi. 18; xviii. 17; and Paul, for example, in Eph. iv. 4–13; 1 Tim. iii. 15; &c. Nor is there any good reason why we should shrink from acknowledging, that whatever plausibility there may be in this sort of indifferentism, which is indeed common enough, in regard to the outward constitution of the Church, is derived, not at all from the N. T., but from the historical, and, alas, still seemingly helpless, confusions of Christendom.—J. L.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Paul and his friends a model of Christian fellowship: 1. Generally of brethren with one another; 2. of teachers with one another (Paul and Silas, comp. Acts xvi. 17); 3. of teachers and scholars (Paul and Timothy). The brotherly fellowship of teachers laboring in a church, as a main condition of blessed working: 1. The personal fellowship of spirit; 2. the fellowship of doctrine; 3. that of prayer and intercession (comp. v. 2 and 2 Thess. i. 3, 11).—Christian brotherhood and Christian friendship, their oneness and their difference, shown in the relation of Paul to his fellow-laborers and especially to Timothy.—RINGER: In the kingdom of Christ even the most highly-gifted person does not choose to be so alone, nor alone to perform everything, but gladly seizes occasion to support his own witness to the truth, and mode of acting therein, by the consent of others. In this way likewise a man can really well commend himself to the consciences of others, when they perceive in him a willingness to let others also stand beside him as his equals.

Believers should regard themselves as those who are in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. Comp. TERSTEGGEN'S: "All-pervading Air, wherein we ever move, of all things principle and life, &c." [Comp. Acts xvii. 28.—J. L.]—ROOS: Civil societies have their ground in an external force and a temporary expediency; a Christian church has its everlasting ground in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ, who is acknowledged and adored in common.—DIETRICH: Nowadays in most countries one knows only of churches on a merely natural foundation.—The great joy, which the Apostle always proclaims to his readers at the beginning of his Epistles, that God is our Father and Jesus Christ our Divine Lord.

The two vital points [Herzpunkte] of Christianity: 1. In the heart of God, and from Him, grace; 2. in the heart of man, and from him in the church, peace.—THOMAS AQUINAS: χρῆς principium omnis boni, αἰχμή finale bonorum omnium.—PHIL. MATTH. HAHN: We have daily need of fresh emanations of grace and peace from the highest source. 1. The emanations of God's grace are innumerable: forgiveness of sins; the witness of the Spirit, that we are the children of God; light and life-power from the word. 2. Every new effluence of grace gives also new peace within the heart, since in full assurance of the Holy Ghost we know that we have not to fear God's wrath on account of our former sins, and that the impending day of wrath will not consume us (see on Col. i. 2; Eph. i. 2).

PERSONAL AND HISTORICAL.

CH. I. 2—CH. III. 13.

I.

Paul shows the Thessalonians the genuineness of his preaching and of their faith.

(CH. I. 2—CH. II. 16.)

CHAPTER I. 2-7.

—The Apostle thanks God for the gracious standing of the Thessalonians (v. 2), which he describes in its human manifestation (v. 3), as well as its Divine ground (v. 4). The latter is their election, to be inferred from the fact, that the Gospel was, on the one hand, preached amongst them with power (v. 5), and, on the other hand, was received by them with joy, so as to furnish an example to others (vv. 6, 7).

2 We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you¹ in our
 3 prayers; remembering without ceasing² your work of faith, and labor [toil, κόπου] of love, and patience of hope in [of]³ our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight
 4 of [before, ἔμπροσθεν] God and our Father [our God and Father, τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ πατρὸς
 5 ἡμῶν]; knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God [brethren beloved of 5 God, your election]⁴; for [because, ὅτι] our gospel came not unto you⁵ in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in [Sin. omits this ἐν] much assurance; as [even as, καθὼς] ye know what manner of men we were [proved 6 were found]⁶ among you [for ἐν ὑμῖν Sin. has simply ὑμῖν] for your sake; and ye became followers [imitators, μιμηταί] of us and of the Lord, having received the word in 7 much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost; so that ye were [became, γενέσθαι] ensamples [a pattern]⁷ to all that believe [all the believers]⁸ in Macedonia and [in] Achaia.⁹

⁸ V. 7.—[ἵνα ὡς πιστεύουσιν]:—“πιστ. not having here a pure participial force, . . . but, as often in the N. T., coalescing with the article to form a substantive.” Ellicott.—J. L.]

⁹ V. 7.—[Most critical editions repeat the ἐν before ῥῇ Ἀχαΐᾳ, with nearly all the uncial manuscripts, including Sin.—Here, and in v. 8, Macedoniæ is in Sin. Μακεδ.—J. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. (V. 2.) We give thanks.—With such a thanksgiving for the faith of his readers, or rather an assurance that he is always giving thanks on that account, Paul begins all his Epistles to churches (and also 2 Timothy and Philemon), with the exception of that to the Galatians, where he sets out with a characteristic δαυδ(ω). What God has done and continues to do in sinners appears to him ever afresh great and worthy of praise, nor does he even allow himself to be disconcerted in his thanksgiving by the many faults and imperfections still adhering to the churches, while on the other hand by testifying his thankful joy in his readers, every one of whom is to understand that he himself is included therein (πάντων), he opens his way to their hearts. But pro gratulatione gratiarum actionem ponit, ut Dei beneficium esse admoneat, quicquid prædicat esse in ipsis laude dignum (CALVIN).—The plural, found here and 2 Thessalonians and Colossians, is not the literary We (PELT, [CONYBEARE,] &c., contrary to 1 Corinthians, Philippians, Philemon, &c., but includes Silvanus and Timothy (comp. ch. ii. 18).* As the three men preach and write together, so also they pray together. Excellently DE WETTE: “In other cases the Epistles begin with such declarations of thankfulness only by way of preamble, and so that soon a special object of the Epistle is announced; but here the thanksgiving is connected with a good deal that the Apostle feels himself impelled to write to the young church respecting its condition, and his own relation to it; and this forms a principal part of the Epistle, if not its main substance.” The Apostle gives thanks for the Christian standing of his readers, and to confirm them therein, and remove all doubt of its Divine reality, as well as of the purity of the motives with which he himself had led them into their position, is really, strictly speaking, his object in chh. i.—iii.

2. Making mention of you.—That μεταί ποιούμ. supplies the particular explanation, or modal definition, to εὐχαρ.: “whilst we make mention of you,” is clear; and equally so that εἰδότες, v. 4, supplies a causal definition: Paul thanks God for the Thessalonians, because he knows their election. But it is a question, whether the intermediate participle is to be made parallel to the first or the third. The former view is adopted by most, and then at first sight a beautiful parallel results: μνημονεύοντες answers to the μεταί ποιούμ., the ὑμῶν is extended in ὑμῶν τοῦ ἔργου—Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, and ἐπὶ τῶν προσευχῶν, &c. returns in ἐμπροσθεν—πατρὸς ἡμῶν. But the parallelism is only too strong, and amounts to tautology; the first clause were of no account alongside of the second. We shall, therefore, dc better (with CHRYSOSTOM, CALVIN, SCHOTT, KOCH), by taking μνημον. as parallel to εἰδότες, and finding in v. 3 the first, and in v. 4 the second, ground assigned for the thanksgiving. In favor of this, also, is the analogy of Col. i. 4 and 2 Thess. i. 3. To thanksgiving for the Thessalonians the Apostle is impelled on the human side by his remembrance of their work of faith, &c.; on the divine side, by his reasonable conviction of their election.*

3. (V. 2 [3].) Without ceasing.—ἄδιαλείπτως is by the Peschito, Vulgate, LUTHER, BENGEI, EWALD, and many others [BENSON, BURTON, BLOOMFIELD, ALFORD, WEBSTER and WILKINSON, &c.—J. L.], rightly construed with what precedes; and for this the analogy of ch. ii. 13; Rom. i. 9; comp. 2 Tim. i. 3, is decisive. The word, moreover, is used by Paul in only one other place, 1 Thess. v. 17, and thus always in connection with prayer. Nor does the word so arranged drag (LÜNMANN); rather it is distinguished, and πρόσθε thereby receives its special illustration. The Apostle would certify the Thessalonians with peculiar emphasis that they are constantly in his devotional remembrance. On the other hand, μνημονεύοντες does not in this way become flat (DE WETTE), but is just as marked and forcible as the parallel εἰδότες at the head of the clause.†

4. (V. 3.) For we are mindful [Remembering].—Μνημονεύειν is not merely transitive = μελεῖν ποιῆσαι, to mention, bring to remembrance (DE WETTE, LÜNMANN, &c.†), but it also means, and indeed primarily, to be mindful (μνημον.), as κυρνεύειν, δολεῖν = κύριος, δοῦλος εἶναι. Thus everywhere in Paul's writings, and generally in the New Testament; whence arises a new proof in favor of our view of v. 3 (though, even taken intransitively, the word might be understood of remembrance in prayer).—Paul remembers what he himself has seen at Thessalonica, and what Timothy has since reported to him (ch. iii. 6). He goes on to speak in unusually strong terms of the excellencies of the Thessalonians, as in the second chapter he has to commend his own ministry. In this there is neither flattery nor egotism; nor is it simply even a father's joy in the young church, that puts such words in his mouth. He is rather "exhibiting evidences to the Thessalonians, that they had attained to a genuine faith, and that there is in them a true work of God" (J. MICHE. HAHN).

5. Your work in [of] faith.—ἔργων is to be connected with the following substantives, and that in such a way that its force extends over all the three main ideas.—It is, then, of three things that Paul is mindful, and this threefoldness he defines according to the three fundamental elements of the Christian life, which he so often extols: faith, love, hope (comp. ch. v. 8; 1 Cor. xiii. 13; Col. i. 4 sq.). But here these occur only in a subordinate, genitival way. And the genitives are all of the same sort: genitives of the origin (DE WETTE, SCHOTT, and most);* they mark the feeling that produces ἔργον, κόπος, δυσκοιμία, showing itself practically therein. In German we should best employ compound substantives: Glaubenswerk, Liebesmühe [faith-work, love-toil], were this kind of phrase possible in the last instance. Now in this way also may be explained the only one of these expressions that is difficult, and has been very variously understood: τὸ ἔργον τῆς πίστεως, with which comp. 2 Thess. i. 11. Here ἔργον, as parallel to κόπος, cannot denote a single work, but is something continuous, a totality, like our day's-work, life-work. And so ἔργον is already found also in classical Greek = business, occupation; it denotes every human activity, especially in so far as it displays a free energetic movement, or is connected with toil and effort (PASSOW). In the New Testament and with Paul the word stands repeatedly for a man's whole life-work, the sum of his ἔργα, as it is sometimes said that God judges according to works, at other times according to every one's work (comp., for instance, Rom. i. [ii.] 6 with 1 Pet. i. 17; Rev. xx. 12 with ch. xxii. 12). Τὸ ἔργον τῆς πίστεως is thus a course of action, with the accessory idea of vigor, strength, as proceeding from faith; the resolute, serious authentication of faith; practical earnestness in Christianity (comp. for the expression τὸ ἔργον τοῦ νόμου, Rom. ii. 15, in which only the genitival relation is somewhat different; whereas the material parallel cited by DE WETTE and others, Gal. v. 6: πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη, is in so far less apt, as it confounds the second particular, the κόπος τῆς ἀγάπης, with the first). To the later Pauline usage, formed in connection with the doctrine of justification, our expression stands as yet in no direct, conscious relation; but in reality it forms a double antithesis to the ἔργα νόμου, since faith and law stand mutually opposed (Rom. iv. 13 sqq.; Gal. iii. 23 sqq.), and so the singular τὸ ἔργον to the anarthrous plural—the undivided unity of the spiritually quickened life-work to the incoherent multiplicity of single, more or less external, works and performances. For the thought, such passages may be compared as Col. i. 10; Eph. ii. 10, and especially Tit. iii. 8 (καλῶν ἔργων προτίστασθαι οὐ περιστευκότες θεῷ); ch. ii. 14, 7; i. 16; 1 Tim. ii. 10; 2 Tim. ii. 21; iii. 17. As Paul has the expression τὸ ἔργον τῆς πίστεως in his two earliest Epistles, so his latest, the Pastoral Epistles, insist with peculiar earnestness on the evidencing of faith in good works. Herein moreover lie hints for the reconciliation of Paul with James. After what has been said, we can now readily estimate the divergent explanations. It is a mistake, were it only on account of the analogy with what follows, to take τῆς πίστεως, nearly in the sense of

* [ELLCOTT, who takes the other view of μνημονεύοντες, as being parallel to the preceding μελεῖν ποιῆσαι, would distinguish the three participial clauses thus: "The first serves principally to define the manner, the second the time and circumstances, the third the reasons and motives of the action."—J. L.]

† [All this fails to satisfy me that the construction of our English version should not be retained. The whole sentence is thus better balanced. Paul having assured the Thessalonians that he was always thanking God for them, it was much less important to add immediately that he made continual mention of them in his prayers, than that the continual remembrance of their Christian character and its fruits was the reason why his reference to them in his prayers always took the form of thanksgiving to God. The other texts cited cannot control a sentence of different structure. ELLCOTT also adheres to this arrangement as "far more natural," and refers in its behalf to Chrysostom and the other Greek commentators.—J. L.]

[This meaning, which BEZA here introduced (commemorantes), and which ALFORD has lately adopted: making mention of (though in his New Testament for English Readers, published in the same year as the last edition of the Greek Testament—1885—he follows the Common Version, remembering), is borne by the word, out of 21 instances of its occurrence in the New Testament, only at Heb. xi. 22, and there the construction is different.—J. L.]

* [ELLCOTT is inclined to make them simply possessive genitives, and ἔργον, κόπον, δυσκοιμίαν the prevailing features and characteristics of πίστεως, ἀγάπης, ἐλπίδος, respectively. But the two ideas are in this case essentially one—at least inseparable in fact;—the former belonging to the latter as modes of self-manifestation.—J. L.]

John vi. 29, as a genitive of apposition [HOFMANN, ALFORD]: the work, that consists in faith; whether, indeed, we understand this, with CALVIN and CALOV, of faith as a mighty operation of God in man, or, with CLERICUS and MACKNIGHT, of the reception of the Gospel as man's work, so far as that involves, for example, the subduing of prejudices. It is also erroneous, because resting on an indistinct conception of the ἐργον and of the genitival relation, and likewise as violating the analogy with what follows, and encroaching in the third member, to lay the chief stress, with CHRYSOSTOM, THEODORET, PELT, LÜNMANN (though he rightly says that ἐργον is emphatic), and others, on πίστεως: faith, something begun with energy, and in spite of all temptations steadfastly retained. Rightly ANSELM: quomodo fides vestra non est otiosa, sed semper bonum opus gignit; DE WETTE: moral activity, proceeding from faith; and similarly BENDEL, OLSHAUSEN, &c.

[At 2 Thess. i. 11 Dr. RIGGENBACH would modify the above explanation of ἐργον τῆς πίστεως by limiting the expression to the inward work of faith in the soul itself, and cites Rom. iv. 20, 21 as a better parallel than Gal. v. 6. An obvious objection to this is, that what Paul had observed of the faith of the Thessalonians, and what he now remembered of it, could only have been its outward manifestations in the life, not its internal operation in the heart. And just so in regard to their love and hope.—J. L.]

6. Toll in [of] love.—["Such as their own Jason had shown amid persecutions, in Acts xvii." JOWETT.—J. L.]—The first expression bears on the relation to God, the second on that to the Christian brethren (comp. Col. i. 4), the third on that to the world and its persecutions. The governing substantives advance from the active to the passive: ἐργον is vigorous doing, δυσκοινη patient suffering, κόπος forms the transition: toil is a doing combined with suffering; strenuous, fatiguing, devoted labor. Patience is the last and highest; rightly to suffer is more and harder than rightly to work; even in the case of the Lord suffering was the last, decisive test, and became the means of His perfecting and glorification (comp. 1 Pet. iv. 14). In these three, then, are shown and verified faith, love, hope—the root, stem, and crown of the new life. Faith lays hold of the grace exhibited in the facts of redemption, and is thus the foundation of Christian life, the reimplanting of man through Christ in God. Thence arises love as the echo and answer to the Divine love in the heart of man; it is the pure opposite of selfishness—that principle of sin—and so is the soul of the Christian life, and of the present Christian fellowship—the fulfilling of the law. Hope knows that the future belongs to the Lord and His Church; it is the real expectation and sure prospect, that the pneumatic life, which now already, descending from the Lord, dwells in his members, shall outwardly also penetrate and transfigure all things, and subdue its still existing antagonists, the flesh and the world, by means of new revelations of the Lord. Thus, in these three subjective factors of the new life is reflected at the same time the historical character of the objective kingdom of God.—With regard to the Thessalonians, therefore, Paul rejoices first of all in the vigor and earnestness of their life of faith, in that they have not yet become faint, and then in the fact that during this hard time, when their church is exposed to manifold vexations, they not merely in a general way hold together in mutual love, but also with laborious effort and sacrifice come to one another's help—in beneficiis spiritualibus vel externis (BENDEL). Comp. the examples, Acts xvii. 5, 9; Rom. xvi. 4, 12; 1 John iii. 16.—With this is connected finally

7. (V. 3.) Patience in [of] hope. ἡμεῖς, properly the staying under (under the cross), patient, unwearied constancy in suffering; here in persecution (see Acts xvii. 5 sq.). This constancy proceeds from hope, because in view of the future glory one can the more cheerfully bear the present suffering (Rom. viii. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 17 sq.; Heb. xi. 26; xii. 2 sq.). Patience, therefore, appears as the inseparable companion of hope (Rom. viii. 25); likewise, in the reverse order, as producing it, for in the spiritual life there exists a reciprocal influence (Rom. v. 3 sq.); or it even takes the place of hope beside faith and love (Tit. ii. 2; comp. 2 Tim. iii. 10; 1 Tim. vi. 11).—τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ refers not to all the three preceding virtues as derived from Christ (OLSHAUSEN, [STEIGER, on 1 Pet. i. 2, WORDSWORTH, WEBSTER and WILKINSON]), nor yet to δυσκοινη (BENDEL, after 2 Thess. iii. 5), but to ἐλπίς as a genitive, not of apposition (LUTHER), but of the object. Christ is the proper object of hope (and as such is certainly Himself also called ἡ ἐλπίς, Col. i. 27; 1 Tim. i. 1), not only because on Him all our trust (this the more common meaning of ἐλπίς) rests, but especially because it is through His return and the revelation of the Kingdom of God therewith connected, that the Christian's hope of glory is fulfilled (Tit. ii. 13). Let it be observed, how by the addition of this genitive the element of hope, so important in our Epistles, already appears here in a fuller and more emphatic way than the other two.*

8. Before our God and Father.—ἡμῶν belongs to both substantives.† The words ἐμπροσθεν, &c., may be joined either with the verb μνημονεύοντες (DE WETTE, OLSHAUSEN, [LÜNMANN, ALFORD, ELLICOTT], &c.), or with the three substantives, τοῦ ἐργου, &c. (CHRYSOSTOM, THEODORET, CECUMENIUS [Bishop HALL, JOWETT, WORDSWORTH]). Even in the first case μνημον. need not be understood of mention in prayer, but that Paul before God, that is, so often as he comes before God in prayer, remembers their work of faith, &c.; that is the ground of his thanksgiving; comp. ch. iii. 9, a parallel passage that favors this view. But opposed to it is the verbal arrangement, since ἐμπροσθεν, &c. would in this way drag; and the other connection, which no more than ἐν δεξ. v. 1, requires the article to be repeated (against LÜNMANN), might be preferable.‡ By this means the entire conduct of the Thessalonians is put in relation to God (comp. ch. iii. 13), as v. 4 will presently describe in turn God's bearing towards them. CHRYSOSTOM [WORDSWORTH]: "Since no man praised or rewarded what they did, therefore Paul adds these words, as if he would say: Be of good cheer, you suffer in the presence of God."

9. (V. 4.) Knowing.—Εἰδότες is thus parallel with μνημονεύοντες, v. 3; comp. the note on that word. Paul makes the two participles emphatic by placing them in the front. By the side of the remembrance of what actually lay before his eyes, he sets the knowledge, the firm assurance of something, of which one cannot be so easily certain, and in this way he intimates so much the more strongly, that on this point he is sure of his ground. To an afflicted person no higher comfort can be given, than when it is allowed to say to him: I know that thou art chosen.—With this also agrees the address: brethren beloved of God (ἀγαπημένοι, perfect participle: embraced once for all by the Divine love); they are permitted to regard themselves as objects of the Divine love, of electing love; they are to know that their Christianity is not a human dream and vapor, but the evidence that the everlasting purpose of God's own love is directed towards them. Comp. 2 Thess. ii. 13, where an address almost entirely similar stands also in connection with election; Col. iii. 12; Rom. xi. 28; Ps. lx. 7 [5]; cviii. 7 [6],* where the members of the chosen people are called יְהוָה יִרְדֵּי LXX. ἀγαπητοί. Thus the members of the Old and of the New Testament Church are spoken of both as God's chosen and as His beloved. Ἐκλογή, selection, the election of grace, is the acting of the Divine love, whereby God has from eternity freely devised in Christ the plan of salvation, according to which all men should be called in succession to the kingdom of heaven,† and has likewise received into the same these ordained persons.‡ Ἐκλέγεσθαι answers to יִרְדֵּי, e. g. Deut. vii. 6, and includes three things: ἐκ-λέγ-εσθαι: the stem marks the freeness of the Divine choice; the middle, that God has chosen men for Himself, into the fellowship of His love, for His own; ἐκ, to select, out from the world, comp. John xv. 15; xvi. 19 [John xv. 16, 19]. In our place ἐκλογή denotes, not, as Rom. ix. 11, the act of choosing, but, as 2 Pet. i. 10, the being chosen [MÖLLER §]; Rom. xi. 7, the chosen. Paul constantly gives this title of elect to Christians, in whom through their calling and faith the purpose of redemption is realized; see vv. 5, 6.

* [The above definition of the hope, as having immediate reference to Christ's second coming (comp. v. 10), is given by very many of the best interpreters, from AMBROSIASTA to ALFORD and ELLICOTT.—J. L.]

† [So the Dutch version, CONTEBARE, PELT, JOWETT, &c. The other construction, however, is in this case grammatically allowable. ELLICOTT rather prefers it; see his note on Gal. i. 4.—J. L.]

10. (V. 5.) Because.—Οτι not = that (LUTHER, BENGEL, SCHOTT, &c.), but = because, for. It serves not to analyze τῇ ἐκλογῇ, but to confirm εἰδότες τὴν ἐκλ. ὑμῶν. The Apostle assigns two grounds of his knowledge of the election of the Thessalonians, both lying in the nature of the case, so far as from the realization of election an inference may be drawn backward to its existence: 1. the call had come to them in power (v. 5); 2. they had received it in faith (v. 6). The first takes place on the part of God through the apostolical preaching, the second on the part of men; and therefore to τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἡμῶν (v. 5) the οὐαίς (v. 6) is emphatically opposed.

11. Our gospel came [German: showed itself unto you.—Before Paul came to Macedonia and Thessalonica, as RIEGER also and OLSHAUSEN remind us, he was forbidden by the Holy Ghost to preach the word in the provinces of Asia and Bithynia (Acts xvi. 6, 7); from which he could but infer that the hour of their election had not yet struck (it came later, ch. xix. 10). Instead of this, he was called by a vision to Macedonia (ch. xvi. 9, 10), and here, and therefore also in Thessalonica, he was able to preach with more than ordinary power and assurance in the Holy Ghost. By this he perceived that God's saving purpose was directed to the Thessalonians. Ἐγγενήθη εἰς, or, which is the same in sense, πρὸς ὑμᾶς, not: was with you (LUTHER), as if it were ἐν ὑμῖν,* but: came to you, showed itself in its direction and relation to you. By Ἐγγενήθη the certainty of the fact is expressed in a sonorous word, which is therefore thrice repeated in vv. 5, 6, and precisely at the essential points. This we have attempted to represent in the translation by: showed itself.†

12. Not in word only, but, &c.—Comp. as specially parallel 1 Cor. iv. 20; only that μόνον is wanting there, because the λόγος τῶν πεποιτισμένων is in question, here the preaching of the Apostle. Δύναμις is the objective Divine force, which shone forth from the Apostle in preaching, and wrought as a power on men's souls, spiritualis doctrinae energia (CALVIN); πληροφωρία, the subjective fullness of conviction, assurance, confidence, and joyfulness, with which he was able to speak; EWALD: gushing fulness. In the middle stands the common principle of both: the Holy Ghost, who animated the Apostle, and was, indeed, the Author alike of the former fact, the real power, and of this consciousness, the fullness of confidence. By means of ἐν πνεύματι ὁρίσας, significantly placed in the centre, as it were the soul of both, δύν. and πληροφ. receive their precise specification; for with more power and assurance can even a worldly orator speak.—Power and spirit belong together (comp. 1 Cor. ii. 4; Rom. xv. 19; Acts i. 8; x. 38; comp. Luke i. 35), and so spirit and life (Rom. viii. 12 [11]; John vi. 63; 2 Cor. iii. 6; Rom. viii. 2, 10).

13. Even as ye know what, &c.—With this begin the appeals, so frequent in the sequel, especially ch. ii. 1-12 (vv. 1, 2, 5, 9, 10, 11), to the personal knowledge of the Thessalonians respecting the Apostle's behavior among them. These can only be explained by the fact, that some sought to misrepresent that behavior, and bring it under suspicion. Οἷοι, how behaved, in what power and fullness of the Spirit (OLSHAUSEN); carried out in detail, ch. ii. 1-12. So little does the Apostle divide his gospel; his preaching, his office, from his person, that for proof of the former he appeals, and can appeal, to the latter. He says not: how we preached, but: how we were. The whole man preached. Such a fine advance of the thought characterizes the style of the Apostle.—By the δι' ὑμᾶς put significantly at the close Paul hints thus early at what he afterwards also further unfolds, ch. ii. 1 sqq., that in his ministry he had sought not his own advantage, but only the salvation of the Thessalonians.

14. (V. 6.) And ye became, &c.—After v. 5 should be placed, not, as is commonly done, a period,

* [The German Bible, like the Hebrew, includes the titles of the Psalms among the numbered verses.—J. L.]

† [I do not know where Scripture teaches that this is a part of the plan of salvation; or where ἐκλογή is employed to express any such idea; nor is it easy to see how it could be, except, indeed, as the human race might be spoken of as thus distinguished from the angels that stand.—J. L.]

‡ [What persons? All men in succession? or the Church members referred to in the previous sentence? In either case reception and election represent totally different ideas.—The whole definition is lacking in accuracy and precision. Nor do these qualities by any means characterize all that is added on this topic under the Doctrinal head. This is not the place for the discussion of theological systems. But I may be allowed simply to refer to what is said on this point in my Lectures on Thessalonians, p. 55 sqq. and p. 542 sq.—J. L.]

but a comma, v. 6 being still dependent on ἐν of v. 5, as the emphatic ὑμεῖς is no doubt opposed to τοὺς ἄλλους of that verse;* see Exegetical Note 9 [10]. Thus v. 6, with which v. 7 is connected, contains the second ground from which is inferred the election of the Thessalonians, namely, the reception on their part of the call. But, as Paul preached, not merely in a general way, but with power, &c., so they too received the word, not merely in a general way, but in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost. Through these corroborating circumstances on both sides the conclusion in regard to the election becomes the more certain. And therefore is this corroboration emphasized in v. 6 by prefixing μνηταὶ ἡμῶν ἐν ἐνθουσιασμῷ, &c.; for the tertium comparationis lies not in δέξασθε τὸν λόγον, which indeed were unsuitable, in particular, to the Lord, but in this, that in great affliction, with holy joy of the Spirit, they yielded themselves to God in faith, as Paul and the Lord had done in their preaching and official procedure. On μνηταὶ, comp. 1 Cor. iv. 16; xi. 1; Phil. iii. 17; Eph. v. 1; Gal. iv. 12, and the Doctrinal division.

15. Having received the word, &c.—When through the preaching of the gospel a man experiences in his heart the truth and glory of salvation, this will the more vividly mount even to joy of the Holy Ghost, the more that outward affliction, that is, hostility and persecution for the gospel's sake, seeks to dispute with him the possession of salvation. As a counterpoise to the world's intimidation and vexation, the Holy Ghost works this inward joy at the opening prospect of an everlasting communion with God (πνεῦματος ἁγίου, genitive of the origin, like the genitives of v. 3). And now the question is, whether the man gives the victory to this joy or to that affliction, to the new power of the Spirit or to the old power of the flesh. If he does the first, the case comes to δέχεσθαι τὸν λόγον.† The δέχεσθαι—on which comp. ch. ii. 13; Luke viii. 18; Acts viii. 14; xi. 1; xvii. 11; James i. 21 (δέξασθε τὸν λόγον, imperative)—expresses man's agency in the work of salvation, as this is likewise marked by ὑμεῖς. But this agency is not an independent efficiency (Pelagianism), nor any coöperation (Synergism), but an acceptance, the affirmation of the Divine working on us and in us, a free receptivity.‡ While a man thus gives admission to prevenient grace, asserting itself to him inwardly in the word of the Spirit (v. 5), and acting upon his heart, he yet recognizes the new life as entirely the work of the Holy Spirit, because he himself has not effected, but merely received it.—On the affliction of the Thessalonians, see Acts xvii. 5 sqq. At Thessalonica, and generally in the primitive Church period, conversion was an act of personal courage and vigorous self-denial, since a man had to be prepared to surrender comfort, honor, property, and life itself.

16. (V. 7.) A pattern to all the believers

* [The Author's German version repeats the ἐν: and because ye became, &c. But it is better, with ELLICOTT, to regard the connection of v. 6 with that particle as rather logical than structural, and so "to place neither a period (TISCHENDORF, ALFORD), nor a comma (LACHMANN, BUTTMANN), but a colon, after v. 5." In the Translation, indeed, ELLICOTT, perhaps through oversight, retains the period.—J. L.]

† [The joy of the Holy Ghost is rather the accompaniment and the fruit of faith, than, as here represented, the preparation for it.—J. L.]

answers to the μνηταὶ of v. 6: The true followers become themselves in turn patterns for others. This circumstance, moreover, that they had become a pattern for others, might be of use to the Thessalonians for confirmation in their faith, and for their conviction of its reality; the Apostle, therefore, still further enlarges upon it in the following section (vv. 7–10), to which our verse forms the transition.—Believers is one of the most frequent designations of Christians in the New Testament—comp. Acts ii. 44; iv. 32—along with ἄγιοι, &c.

17. Macedonia and Achaia, whither the Apostle journeyed from Thessalonica. Achaia, originally the most northern territory of the Peloponnesus, was from the year 146 before Christ the name of the Roman province that embraced the Peloponnesus and Hellas, since by the overthrow of the Achæan League the Romans had made themselves masters of Greece. The two provinces of Macedonia and Achaia together formed the entire Greek domain, and are therefore often named together (Acts xviii. 12; xix. 21; Rom. xv. 26; 2 Cor. ix. 2).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. (V. 2.) The exordiums of the Pauline Epistles afford us noteworthy glimpses of the devotional life of the Apostle. So faithfully and constantly did he bear churches and individuals on his heart in intercession and thanksgiving, that he is able to speak of it to his readers in terms, which to the common sense appear hyperbolic. And it is true that the apostolic is by its very nature hyperbolic, inasmuch as the Apostles transcend the ordinary measure, and excel all others not only as preachers and founders of the Church, but also as men of prayer. When the Twelve at Jerusalem gave up the external services to the deacons, they said: "But we will give ourselves continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word" (Acts vi. 4). Prayer is to them the full half, and indeed the first half, of their office. And so Paul too begins his Epistles, in which he addresses the word to the churches, with a distinct reference to the fact, that he is constantly praying for them. By prayer we act upon God; by the word, on the world, on men. To every labor for the world must be added the blessing of God; the moral can prosper only on the religious ground. Hence for every man the golden, in its simplicity inconceivably wise and comprehensive, rule: Pray and labor. But for the laborer in the word, whereby the world is to be brought to God, and the Spirit of God is to enter men's souls, the rule has a double value. And indeed from the statements of the Apostle we observe that he had regular exercises of devotion; as a result of which, his Epistles manifest a continual devotional frame.

2. (V. 3.) On faith, love, hope, see Exegetical Note 5.

3. (V. 4.) Election is not to be so understood, as if God had appointed some men to salvation, to the exclusion of others. The latter are not rejected, but simply passed by for a time [1—nur zurückgestellt]. Election has reference to an organic position in that kingdom of God, to which all men are appointed, and, in connection therewith, to a temporal entrance into the same (see Rom. ix.—xi., and on that passage especially J. T. BECK, Versuch einer pneumatisch hermeneutischen Entwicklung des ix. Kapitels im Brief an die Römer, Stuttgart, 1833). "God chooses for Himself out of all, before others and for others." (RICHTER, Hausbibel, on Eph. i. 4.) Quite as little is election to be so understood, as if in the elect grace wrought irresistibly, so that they could not fail to become and remain believers. Rather, when God's hour for a man has struck, there goes forth to him through the Gospel the call (v. 5), which he can receive or not (v. 6;—on the relation between grace and freedom, see the second Note on that verse); and, when he has received it, it is still for him a question of permanent interest, that he persevere and continue steadfast in grace (see 2 Thessa. ii. 13-15: ἐλθεο ὑμᾶς ὁ θεὸς διὰ τῆς ἀρχῆς—ἐκλήσεν διὰ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου—ἵνα οὖν στήκετε. 2 Pet. i. 10): "Scripture certainly knows only of a Divine causality in the matter of salvation; but neither does it conflict with this, that the conditions of obtaining salvation rest with man."* (STRICK, on Eph. i. 4.) By means of the first view, that the election of grace is to be understood in an organic and historical sense, the difficulty in regard to the reprobi is solved; by means of the other, that freedom, or, more precisely, man's free receptivity is not annulled, but unbound, by grace and the election of grace, is solved the difficulty in regard to the electi. "A prædestinatio sanctorum is spoken of, but without at the same time affirming also a reprobatio impiorum or a gratia irresistibilis." (OLSEN, on Eph. i. 4.) Predestination is a decretum absolutum, and to that extent remains ever a mystery, in so far as it rests on the free good pleasure of the Divine love and wisdom, which according to their sovereign decision, yet not otherwise in the kingdom of God than in secular history, assign to one a distinguished, to another an inglorious position; but it is no decretum horrendum, because on the ground of what God gives men move with freedom, and so the claims of conscience and reason remain secure. Nay, only thus does predestination become, what it is to Paul, the Divine world-idea, the plan, formed in Christ, of creation and redemption, which lies at the basis of the entire development of the world, and comprehends the successive elevation or reintroduction of the creatures into the glory of the Creator. But for believers the knowledge of election has a double significance—a humbling one, made especially prominent in Rom. ix.; and one that lifts up, with which the Apostle has to do here, and at Eph. i. 4; Rom. viii. 28-30. The first consideration is the consciousness, fatal to all self-righteousness, that our salvation rests not on any doings or performances of ours, but is founded wholly out of and above ourselves in the free, everlasting mercy of God. The second is the lofty and joyful assurance, wherein believers find comfort, that their salvation is therefore not of yesterday, but from eternity; that it rests not on weak, human props, but in the eternal purpose of grace of the Father in the Son, into the world-pervading realization of which they know themselves to be taken up. The grace of God is all-embracing; but it is precisely in consequence of the universality of the gracious disposition that despisers perish. JUL. MÜLLER: "Love could not be in earnest with itself, did it not deny its denial." [Matt. x. 33; Luke xii. 9.] To believers, on the other hand, it never occurs either to suppose that now indeed they can no longer miscarry, or even to claim superiority to other men, as if God had not loved the world. "From all weakness and temptation we may ever again revert to the eternal foundation, that in Jesus Christ God has foreordained us, that within the eternal contemplation of His Son is included our election, which now advances in manifestation and accomplishment, till we hear the gospel and are sealed by the Spirit. Only this is implied in the election of grace, as Paul explains it, that faith has reason to consider itself chosen; of those who do not attain to this grace he speaks not at all." ("Minutes of the Preachers' Conference at Stuttgart, May 12, 1852, p. 309.)—[BARNES: It is possible for a people (and for individuals) to know that they are chosen of God, and to give such evidence of it that others shall know it also.—J. L.]

4. (V. 5.) The call does not come through every sort of gospel-preaching, but through preaching filled with the Spirit, and an essential point in the matter is the personal endowment of the preachers. Comp. the Exegetical Notes 11 and 12.

5. (Vv. 6 and 7.) Christianity proposes to men no new problems which they must first solve by themselves, and as it were in new paths; it is also in this respect not a law, but a gospel. The primary problem is solved, the way is prepared, and in this way there are forerunners, in whose footsteps we simply tread, God, Christ, and His witnesses. God was imitated by Christ (John v. 19 sq.), Christ by Paul and the Apostles (1 Cor. xi. 1), Paul by the Thessalonians and all who so walked (Phil. iii. 17), and then again these imitators themselves became a pattern for others (see Exegetical Note 15). Nor is that a spiritless imitation, but a following (Luke ix. 23 sq., 57 sq.) in the power of the Spirit, who begets ever new, fresh life, though in historical continuity; since He is a Spirit of remembrance (John xiv. 26), yea, the ever-present God Himself, authenticating His earlier creations by those subsequent, so that preceding spiritual men become models and instruments of training for the later, and that word: Learn of me (Matt. xi. 29), finds its fulfilment perpetually renewed. Thus the Church hangs through Christ on God, and from God there goes forth through Christ and His Apostles into the world an unbroken succession of bright forms, a cloud of witnesses (Heb. xii. 1), who are images and representatives of God in the world, and, in connection with their predecessors, leave a personal impress of the heavenly, spiritual quality, according to the circumstances and needs of each several period. As we commence the missionary work amongst a heathen people, not by translating the Bible into their language, but by sending messengers to them—(it is not without reason that προεστέλλετο occurs in the missionary charge, Matt. xxviii. 19)—so, in general, to the word of the Spirit, even the preached, audible word, must still be added the visible stamp of the Spirit in living personalities, who show by act the power and glory of the gospel, and in whom can be seen, if the expression is allowed, the holy arts of the spiritual walk—the spiritual dietetics. On this rests the high importance of good biographies, and yet more of the living observation of Christian characters. What Christian owes not his best thanks to such life-impressions? For, indeed, humanity is so organized, and this is its noble distinction, that what is deepest rests ever on the relation of person to person: the relation of father and child, of master and disciples, penetrates everywhere. ÖRTINGER: "It cannot be denied that an embodied visible gospel* is necessary to the right use of the written rule, and of the hearing of preaching. The written standard must be made available through the help of the Spirit in the members." Hence the importance of Church History in its innermost sanctuary, so far as it is a history of the invisible Church, of men of God, of true saints. That is the most living tradition, the tradition of the Spirit and of power. In this sense also an essential importance belongs to the Church as well as to Holy Scripture. She is in a certain sense a continuation of the actual revelation of God alongside of the verbal revelation, wherein, it is true, the word of God reaches, as it always does, far beyond the fact, and the latter serves only as a step and means of guidance to the former (comp. John ii. 11 and 22; v. 36 sqq. and 39 sqq.; xiv. 10, 11). And thus shall it be, till what we shall be appears; then fact and word become one.

* [Only let it be added, that the "Divine causality" extends also to the "human conditions," though in such a way, however to us incomprehensible, as does not at all impair, but rather strengthens, man's free moral agency. See Acts dii. 46; xvi. 14; Eph. ii. 8; 2 Tim. ii. 25; Luke xxii. 32; 1 Pet. i. 5; Jude 24; &c.—J. L.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

V. 2. Prayer, as in the apostolic Epistles, so generally, the beginning and foundation of the promulgation of the word. The preacher's office a perseverance in prayer and in the ministry of the word; comp. Acts vi. 4.—The Apostle's daily communication with his churches by prayer.—ZWINGLI: True love is careful for the brethren.—A Christian preacher gives God glory and thanks for what through him has been wrought in souls; and just so the praise of other men becomes in the Christian's mouth thanksgiving to God.—RIGGER: Oh, the lightening of the official burden, when the Lord still opens our eyes, and shows us for what we have to give thanks, and for what to pray!—THEODORET: We should first give thanks for the good already bestowed upon us, and only then pray for what still is wanting. So do we find it everywhere with the Apostle.—DIEDRICH: Happy the man, who is able to let all his joy pour itself forth in pure thanksgiving to the Father. Otherwise there is even no joy worth anything.—CALVIN: An important motive to zealous progress is the reflection, that God has granted to us noble gifts for the perfecting of the work begun; that under His guidance we have already made advances on the right road for reaching the end. For as an idle confidence in the virtues to which men foolishly lay claim puffs them up, and makes them secure and sluggish, so the recognition of God's gifts humbles pious souls, and incites them to a solicitous zeal.

V. 3. CALVIN: A brief description of true Christianity: 1. That faith be earnest and vigorous; 2. that no pains be spared, so long as there are neighbors to be assisted, but that all the pious assiduously fulfil the obligations of love; 3. they should studiously endeavor, in the hope of Christ's manifestation, to despise all things else, and by patience overcome both the irksomeness of the long interval (to the appearing of the Lord), and all the temptations of the world.—LUTHER: Faith is a lively, active, practical, temperate thing, so that it cannot but do good works unremittingly. It does not even ask whether good works are to be done; but let a man rather ask whether he has done, and is ever doing, them. Without constraint, therefore, a man becomes willing and glad to do good to every one, to serve every one, to suffer in every way, from love to God and for His glory, who has shown him so great grace; so that it is impossible to separate works from faith, as impossible as for heat and light to be separated from fire.—BENGL: He, who from regard to his own profit and ease withdraws from labor, loves little.—RIGGER: Love will have reality and truth, nor that in such measure only as is convenient for every man, bringing him honor and a good name, without too closely compromising his own life; but so that a man must descend withal from his own station, and the distinctions thereto belonging, and, instead of finding his pleasure in himself, place himself in the circumstances of another: that is what is meant by the labor of love. Under the patience of hope may be comprehended the entire career of our Lord Jesus Christ. For it is all summed up in this, that He condescended to what was most ignominious, and maintained Himself above what was most glorious; as now in our career of faith everything depends on the hope of the kingdom breaking its way through tribulation with the patience of Christ.

V. 4. Election the highest comfort of the tempted.—ZWINGLI: Paul therewith guards his commendation, lest they arrogate to themselves what belongs to God alone.—Marks of election: 1. a powerful call; 2. a believing reception of the gospel as the word of God; comp. ch. ii. 13.—An anointed preacher may thus comfort tempted believers, and one Christian another: I know that thou art chosen.—RIGGER: The Apostle speaks thus decidedly of their election, in consequence of the call and the evidence of their obedience to it. Nor is it even beyond our present measure to form such a judgment, in praise of the work of God in a soul, though formerly, to be sure, it may have been more perceptible. Our office otherwise loses its proper force [Seele, soul], when we never dare to discern between the righteous and the unrighteous, or to recognize as dead or alive what really is so.

Vv. 3, 4. [SCOTT: Faith which worketh not obedience; professed love that declines self-denying labor; and hope which is separated from patient continuance in well-doing, can never prove a man's election.—J. L.]

V. 5. The right preaching of the kingdom of God, like itself, stands not in words, but in power.—Spiritual power dwells in the preaching, when the hearers feel that the preacher himself is a man of firm conviction, who stands in the joyful assurance of that which he preaches.—Power on others and assurance (within) we cannot give to ourselves; it is a gift of the Holy Ghost. Even an Apostle cannot everywhere work with equal force. It behoves us, renouncing self, to yield ourselves to the Lord.—The preacher's doctrine and life must form one whole.—JOHN MICH. HANN: A holy, Christian behavior makes impressions on elect souls. Wherever we go or sojourn, let us never forget that we too are closely watched and observed. Our aim must be to walk as elect, holy and beloved, not only before our Holy Father, but also before the dear ones whom our Lord has purchased for Himself.

V. 6. The right disposition of preachers and hearers.—DIEDRICH: Ye are in the heavenward march of the children of God, that is led by the God-Man.—RIGGER: To hear and receive God's word has been specified by the Saviour Himself as the decisive badge of those, who are of God and of the truth; especially when one is not deterred by the outside covering of shame and affliction.—ROOS: A gospel or good news should cause joy, and, if unable to cause any, it is no gospel. When amongst

* [German: ein sichtbares und sichtbares Evangelium.]

Jews, Heathens, or Christians, unbelief, idolatry, and all damnable ungodliness is reprov'd, this rebuke should be keen and of swift operation; but so likewise should joy over the simultaneously proffered grace swiftly rise, and cause the pain occasioned by the rebuke to be disregarded, when compared with the richness of the proffered grace, or with the happy condition into which a man now enters.—[JOWETT: The suffering that comes from without cannot depress the spirit of a man who is faithful in a good cause. It is only when "from within are fears" that the mind is enslaved.—J. L.]

V. 7. RIGGER: Who becomes a follower of the Lord, without confiding also in brave predecessors and comrades, and becoming their follower? It amounts to a great perverseness, when any would break down confidence in those who by word and work, doctrine and life, are helpers of the truth, and would pretend in this to a zeal for the Lord, supposing that they are striving merely against a ruinous dependence on men. Whoever in his following casts off humility, fails likewise to attain the grace to become a pattern.—Even believers need patterns of the genuineness and evidence of joy under affliction.—[WEBSTER and WILKINSON: It requires higher grace, and is a more important duty, to be an example to believers than to the world, ch. ii. 10.—J. L.]

CH. I. 8-10.

2. Other Christians also, who have heard thereof, bear witness to the blessed work of the Apostle at Thessalonica, and the thorough conversion of the Thessalonians.

8 For [Sin. omits γὰρ] from you sounded out [hath been sounded forth, ἐξήχηται] the word of the Lord¹ not only in Macedonia and Achaia,² but also in every [but in every]³ place your faith to God-ward [toward God] is spread abroad [hath gone forth, ἐξελήλυθεν], so that we need not [have no need]⁴ to speak anything. For they themselves shew of us [report concerning us, περὶ ἡμῶν ἀπαγγέλλουσιν] what manner of entering in [entrance, εἰσόδον] we had⁵ unto you, and how ye turned to God from [the]⁶ idols, to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven [who delivered [the heavens]],⁷ whom He raised from the⁸ dead, even Jesus, which delivered us [who delivered us]⁹ from the wrath to come [the coming wrath, τῆς ὀργῆς τῆς ἐρχομένης].

⁶ V. 9.—[τῶν εἰδώλων = εἰδωλῶν, Is. ii. 18. Comp. 1 John v. 21.—J. L.]

⁷ V. 10.—[τὸν οὐρανόν. Comp. Acts ii. 34; &c.—J. L.]

⁹ V. 10.—[Or, our Deliverer, τὸν ῥυόμενον ἡμᾶς. See Exeg. Note 13. Our Translators here followed the Vulgate, qui eripuit, against the older English versions.—For ἀντὶ, Sin. and one cursive manuscript have ἐκ.—J. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. In commencing a new short section with v. 8, we vary from the common view which takes the whole of the first chapter together. But there are evidently three different testimonies adduced by Paul in support of the two facts, which he is now engaged in proving—his own pure, powerful preaching, and the genuine faith of the Thessalonians. He first gives his own testimony, ch. i. 2-7, especially v. 5 sqq.; then he brings forward that of Christians elsewhere, ch. i. 8 to 10; lastly, he appeals to the Thessalonians and their remembrance of his entrance among them (ch. ii. 1-2), just as on his side he bears witness to them of their believing reception of the word, of which they had, and still have, experience as the word of God (ch. ii. 13 to 16).

2. (V. 8.) There is a question, first of all, of the punctuation of v. 8. Ordinarily a comma is put first after Ἀχαΐα, and then there arises a double inconvenience. In the first place, the proof (γὰρ) stretches unsuitably beyond the thing to be proved (v. 7): Ye are become a pattern to the believers in Macedonia and Achaia, for not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but everywhere, have you been heard of. In the second place, the clause with but is, in a manner at once unsuitable and really insignificant, provided with a new subject and verb, whilst we are expecting only: From you the word of the Lord has come forth not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but in all places. If Paul meant to introduce a new subject and verb into the latter clause, he must have placed after οὐ μόνον the subject and verb of the former clause, together with ἀπ' ὑμῶν, which answers to the ὑμῶν after πίστις.^{*} It will therefore be better, with CALVIN, LÜNMANN and others, to put a colon after κυρίου, so that now ὁ μόνον ἐν, as well as ἀλλ' ἐν, is dependent on ἡ πίστις ὑμῶν ἐξηγήλυνεν.† If in this way the second of the difficulties named is obviated, so not less is the first also, since now the logical relation, expressed by γάρ, of v. 8 to v. 7 is formed thus: Ye are become a pattern to the believers in Macedonia and Achaia; for even in other quarters it has become known, how the word of God has wrought among you. On this new thought the Apostle now dwells, and carries it out by itself still further and beyond v. 7. For the exemplariness of the Thessalonians is not the main thought to be established in the following verses, but forms merely the transition to the new witnesses, the citation of whom is (according to Note 1) properly his object. That the clause with ὁ μόνον appears attached to the preceding one by asyndeton need not disturb us, since, with explanatory clauses particularly, this is frequently the case, comp. ch. ii. 7, 9. Winer, p. 478.

3. From you hath been sounded forth.—Ἀφ' ὑμῶν stands emphatically first; ἀπό in the proper local sense: out from you. ἔξηγγηται in the New Testament ἄραξ λεγόμενον; ἐγγεῖν commonly intransitive, but also in classic Greek transitive = to cause to sound forth; ἐξηγγέται, it sounds forth, is heard abroad. Similarly here with the sense of the perfect: The word of God has been so powerful among you, has produced a movement so lively and loud, that the sound thereof, so to speak, [as of a trumpet; CHRYSOSTOM,] has propagated itself to a distance—that people have heard it everywhere. BENGL: claro sono diditus est. The idea of resonance (echo) does not lie in the word. Comp. the parallel ἐξηγήλυνεν: has pressed forth, become known (Luke vii. 17).

4. The word of the Lord—your faith in God.—These two expressions of themselves describe Christianity on its two sides; the word on the Divine side, but offering itself to men; faith on the human, but turning to meet the approach of God; vv. 5 and 6. In the present connection, however, where the second clause merely carries out further the first, and where also, therefore, the verbs are synonymous, both points are jointly intended under both expressions: ^{*} the word of God, as it was preached by the Apostle and believingly received by the Thessalonians (so also OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, KOCH), and hence the emphatic position of ἀφ' ὑμῶν; faith, as it was aroused in the Thessalonians by the Apostle's preaching (LÜNMANN). But still the word of the Lord stands first, precluding mere human glory—The word of the Lord (as in Thess. iii. 1), the word or the gospel of Christ (Col. iii. 16; Rom. i. 9, and often), not different from the word or gospel of God (1 Cor. xiv. 36; Rom. i. 1, and often), just as in the Acts ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ and ὁ λόγος τοῦ κυρίου are used interchangeably. It is not a genitive of the object = verbum de Deo, but, as is clear especially from ch. ii. 13, a genitive of the subject or author = the word which Christ or God causes to be proclaimed (LÜNMANN, &c.). Faith in God, because most of the Christians in Thessalonica had previously been heathens, see v. 9; πίστις πρὸς, instead of the common εἰς,† also at Philom. 5; comp. 2 Cor. iii. 4.

5. In every place, where, that is, there are Christian churches, even beyond Macedonia and Achaia; similarly full expressions, Rom. i. 8; Col. i. 6, 23. But since Paul had not in the meantime left these countries, ὅπου καὶ &c. must have reference to letters or visits. EWALD and others call attention to the fact that precisely in Corinth where Paul wrote our Epistle, with trade converging there from all quarters of the Roman world, was it possible for him to give such an assurance. The church need not, therefore, have already existed for a long period (against BAUR), but its rapid, powerfully spreading conversion must have excited great attention. The words also indicate an intercourse of the liveliest kind among the Christians.

6. (V. 9.) They themselves.—Ad sensum, the explanation is from the previous ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ (v. 8). —Concerning us.—Ἡμεῖς refers, as the double specification (ὁποῖαν καὶ ἡμεῖς) shows, to the Apostle and his helpers on the one side, and the Thessalonians on the other.‡

7. What manner of entrance we had unto you.—εἰσόδον does not answer to the German Eingang in the sense of friendly reception, entrance into the heart (PELT, OLSHAUSEN and many). Opposed to this is partly the word itself (see ch. ii. 1 sq. and comp. Acts xiii. 24), and partly the connection, since it is in the following clause, καὶ ἡμεῖς, that mention is first made of the reception of the Apostle and his preaching. The word means a going in, introduction (CHRYSOSTOM, CALVIN, DE WETTE, &c.): "what sort of an introduction we had to you, to wit, with the preaching of the gospel; i. e. (comp. v. 5), with what power and fulness of the Holy Ghost (CALVIN), with what inward confidence and contempt of outward dangers (CHRYSOSTOM, &c.), we proclaimed to you

† [Others, on the contrary, as MARTIN's French version and MICHAELIS, introduce the colon immediately after τόπῳ, and throw all that precedes on the first verb. "The most simple explanation," says ELLICOTT, "appears that of RÜCKERT (Loc. Paul. Expt. Jena, 1844), according to which the Apostle is led by the desire of making a forcible climax into a disregard of the preceding nominative, and in fact puts a sentence in antithesis to ὁ μόνον—Ἀλλὰ instead of a simple local clause, ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ, or ἐν ὅλῃ τῇ ἐσθμίᾳ (Rom. i. 8), as the strict logical connection actually required." But if we acquiesce in this view of the case as one of interrupted or mixed construction, it is not necessary, as I remarked in the Revelation of the verse, Note g, with RÜCKERT, to lay the main stress on ἡ πίστις ὑμῶν, or, except in the particular of local extent, to find any increase of force whatever in the latter clause. On the contrary, ἀφ' ὑμῶν ἐξηγγέται ὁ λόγος τοῦ κυρίου sounds something greater than ἡ πίστις ὑμῶν ἐξηγήλυνεν; and the very feeling of the writer that the former phrase implied, on the part of the Thessalonians, more of evangelic influence, if not missionary activity, than could properly be ascribed of them in reference to the regions beyond their own Greek provinces, may have prompted the use, in the latter connection, of the weaker form of expression: From you hath been sounded forth the word of the Lord, and not only is that true, as I have just intimated (v. 7), in relation to Macedonia and Achaia, but everywhere, throughout all the household of faith, the fact and the circumstances of your conversion are familiarly known." ALFORD retains the ordinary punctuation, but regards the "new subject and predicate as merely an epexegetical of the former."—J. L.]

^{*} [This view of the synonymous equivalence of the two clauses is given by BAUMGARTEN, and is adopted, besides those mentioned above, by ALFORD. But see Note i on p. 70.—J. L.]

† [ELLICOTT: "The less usual preposition πρὸς is here used with great propriety, as there is a tacit contrast to a previous faith, πρὸς τὰ εἰδωλά (see ver. 9), in which latter case the deeper πιστ. εἰς . . . would seem theologically unsuitable."—J. L.]

‡ [So LÜNMANN. But the common restriction of ἡμεῖς to the preachers is greatly to be preferred; see ALFORD. Of the other view ELLICOTT remarks: "The studied prominence of ἐπὶ ὑμῶν and the real point of the clause are thus completely overlooked: Instead of our telling about our own success, they do it for us; ἡ γὰρ αὐτοῖς ἐχρῆν παρ' ἡμῶν ἀκοῦναι, ταῦτα αὐτοὶ προλαβόντες λέγοντι, Chrys."—J. L.]

the gospel." Mark the expressive emphasis in ὁμοίως; it is not merely ἢ or ὁμοίως (comp. ὁμοίως, v. 5) or ὁμοίως. Ὅτι likewise is not = that [ALFORD: how that, referring merely to the fact; and so ELLICOTT], but = under what difficult circumstances, and with what joy of the Spirit withal; it points back to v. 6. just as ὁμοίως to v. 5. At the same time we here detect the joy of the foreign brethren over the faith of the Thessalonians.

8. How ye turned to God from the idols.—Ἐπιστρέψατε is the regular New Testament word for conversion; in the Acts, where it is naturally of frequent occurrence, with the addition ἐπὶ τὸν κύριον (ch. xi. 21), or εἰς φῶς (ch. xxvi. 18), or ἐπὶ τὸν θεόν (ch. xxvi. 18, 20; xiv. 15; xv. 9), often too with an ἀπὸ, whose substantive describes heathenism sometimes on the side of its demoniacal background, sometimes on the side of men, sometimes of the idols, viz. ch. xxvi. 18 ἀπὸ τῆς εἰδωλολatrias τοῦ σατανᾶ, ch. xv. 19 ἀπὸ τῶν εἰδωλῶν, ch. xiv. 15 ἀπὸ τῶν ματαίων ἐπιστρέψατε ἐπὶ τὸν θεόν. With this class is connected the expression in our verse. The latter, negative element corresponds to repentance (Acts xxvi. 20); the former, positive one to faith (Acts xi. 21).

9. To serve the living and true God.—*Δουλεύειν and ἀναμύνειν are infinitives of the purpose. The primary feeling of profound awe in presence of Deity, that belongs to human nature and especially to antiquity, finds expression also in language. The Old Testament employs, over against God, the expression that denotes the relation of the most unconditional subjection, that of the slave to his master: עֶבֶד (Ex. ix. 1, 18; Deut. viii. 19; and often); to which expression the corresponding inner sentiment is fear (פֶּלַח, Jon. i. 9; comp. פֶּלַח, of God, Gen. xxxi. 42, 53). To fear God and to serve God, these are the two most common Biblical expressions for religion. And so in our text also appears δουλεύειν θεῷ as the designation of religion or of religious practice generally; or rather, what we are accustomed to designate by these faint expressions, is in a more concrete and living way conveyed by the Apostle in that phrase, as we too have the beautiful word Gottesdienst [Divine service]. By means of the additions to τῷ θεῷ the phraseology becomes a closer description of the true religion, in opposition to the false: ζῶντι, living, in opposition to the dead idol-images (see Rom. i. 23); ἀληθινῷ, existing in objective truth and reality, in opposition to the merely imaginary, lying idols (see Rom. i. 25). It may be thought strange that the Apostle uses, in regard to Christianity, such a general expression, that is applied also to the Old Testament religion as contrasted with heathenism, whereas he then puts what is specifically Christian, not into faith in Jesus, the Son of God and the Saviour, but into the expectation of His return from heaven. But it is just in its connection with v. 10 that the general expression of our verse acquires also a more especially Christian sense. A man can, in truth, only then really serve God, when he has access to him through Christ, and is by His blood purified from the dead works of the old, ungodly mind (see Heb. ix. 14). And that Paul had not been silent on this point at Thessalonica, that he had proclaimed Christ as the Son of God, as the Saviour, and salvation in His death and resurrection, all that we see from v. 10. But certainly our two verses show that his preaching at Thessalonica had turned, not so much round this central doctrine of salvation, as about the beginning and the end, the first things and the last. A parallel is furnished by the speech which the Apostle soon afterwards delivered at Athens (Acts xvii. 22-31). There too he first of all leads his hearers over from the idols to the living God, and speaks of Christ especially as the future Judge, and only incidentally, in connection with that, of His resurrection, and of faith therein; though this, it is true, significantly enough forms the conclusion. —[WEBSTER and WILKINSON: "He puts together the first and last articles of their creed; and then supplies the two most important of the intervening articles." —J. L.]

10. (V. 10.) And to wait for.—The Apostle defines the life-aim of the converts in two particulars, the service of God, and the waiting for the return of His Son from heaven. Though we should even say with OLSHAUSEN, that ἐπιστρέψατε includes faith, and δουλεύειν implies love, it is only the more surprising that hope is raised into such explicit and emphatic prominence. This agrees and is connected with the whole eschatological tenor of our Epistles, as well as of the Apostle's oral teaching at Thessalonica, and it contains a weighty warning for the Church (see Doctrinal and Ethical, no. 8). BENIGL says in his New Testament on our text: 'To wait for the Son of God is the most appropriate mark of a true Christian. Ἀναμύνειν only here in the New Testament; elsewhere we find use of the eschatological waiting προσδέχεσθαι, Luke xii. 36; Tit. ii. 13; ἀπεκδέχεσθαι, Phil. iii. 20; Heb. ix. 26 [28]; 1 Cor. i. 7; Rom. viii. 19, 23, 25; Gal. v. 5; προσδοκᾶν, 2 Pet. iii. 12-14.

11. From the heavens &c. coming, belongs to ἀναμύνειν. The plural of οὐρανοί, which occurs so often in the New Testament, but in Luther's version is unhappily obliterated (so even in the address of the Lord's Prayer), is to give us an impression of the manifold, rich life of the super-terrestrial world (John xiv. 2). These heavens, which frequently seem to us so remote, strange, and shut, will open their doors, and from them the Son of God will come forth with the heavenly host, to the dismay of the world and the joy of His own. Comp. Acts i. 11.

12. His Son, whom He raised from the dead.—The expression, Son of God, is thus used of Christ by Paul in his very first Epistle, though as yet without further specification. But it must be considered, in the first place, that the expression is plainly chosen for the purpose of designating Christ in his inner relation to God mentioned immediately before, and, secondly, that already in connection with it even here is the characteristic from heaven, which holds good as well of His first appearing (Gal. iv. 4, ἐκ οὐρανοῦ, sent forth; Rom. viii. 3; 1 Cor. xv. 47): The Son of God is of heavenly, Divine origin. To the heathen at Thessalonica Paul had proclaimed not merely the true God, but also, what was still more unknown to them, that this God has a Son, who has become our Deliverer (ὑψίστος). The resurrection of Jesus from the dead is the great fact by which He is shown to be the Son of God (Rom. i. 4), and by which at the same time His return is rendered possible and certain (1 Pet. [i.] 3-5). Was ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν to form an antithesis to ἐκ τῶν οὐρανῶν? Comp. Rom. x. 6, 7.

13. Jesus, our Deliverer.—The majestic title, Son of God, is on purpose followed simply and plainly by His human proper name, Jesus. [WEBSTER and WILKINSON: presenting our Lord to us as He was revealed and known in the flesh.—J. L.] τὸν βυδμενον: not βυδμ., with reference to the past deliverance by His death; * nor βυδμ., with reference to the future deliverance at the judgment † (both, the latter as founded on the former, at Rom. v. 9, 10), but comprehensively βυδμ., our Deliverer, absolutely and evermore; the participle having thus a substantial sense (Winer, p. 316); comp. Rom. xi. v. 26, after Is. lix. 20 βύτισ. ῥέσθαι (comp. Col. i. 13; Rom. vii. 24; Matt. vi. 13), stronger than σώσει, expresses the deliverance as a mighty fact, a strong, powerful extrication from the judgment, which shall inevitably smite all who have no part in Jesus. τὸν βυδμενον has an explanatory relation to Ἰησοῦν (comp. Matt. i. 21; Acts iv. 10–12), similar to that of ὃν ἤγειρεν &c. to τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ. [BENGEL: Christus nos semel ἐλυτρώσατο, redemit: semper βύεται, eripit.—J. L.]

14. From the coming wrath.—Wrath is the holy will of God, energetically upholding, over against the sinful creature, His own inviolable order of life and government as the highest interest of the world, and for that reason surrendering for righteous punishment the party resisting it to self-chosen destruction. The word is used sometimes of the affection in God, His punitive justice (Rom. ix. 22; Heb. iii. 11; iv. 8; Rev. vi. 16; and often in the Old Testament); sometimes of the effect in the world, thence resulting, the judicial punishment (Luke xxi. 23; Rom. ii. 5; iii. 5; comp. xiii. 4, 9 [5]; Eph. v. 6; Col. iii. 6); sometimes in such a way that both ideas are included (John iii. 36; Rom. i. 18; ii. 8; Eph. ii. 3; Rev. xiv. 10; xvi. 19; xix. 15). Here and in ch. ii. 16; v. 9 ὀργή stands in the second signification. This is shown also by the addition ἡ ἐρχομένη (comp. Col. iii. 6): the approaching, infallibly imminent punishment; similarly ἡ μέλλουσα ὀργή, Matt. iii. 7; and then Rev. xi. 18, ἡ ἄδεν ἡ ὀργή σου. Salvation or the deliverance is just the being rescued from the judgment that overwhelms the world, Rom. i. 16–18 and, referring back to this, ch. v. 9–11; and this is the immediate sense of σώσει, σωτήρ, σωτηρία, as here of βέσθαι. In 1 Thess. v. 9 also ὀργή and σωτηρία stand as mutual opposites. Because in Christ judgment has already passed upon the world (John xii. 31), therefore whosoever believeth in Him is no longer judged (John iii. 14–18; v. 24).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. (V. 8.) The man who walks uprightly before God, God accredits also before his brethren, imparting to them through all that is seen of him joy, refreshment, strength, so that they in return are able by their testimony to his conversion and spiritual walk to strengthen and encourage him, when tempted thereupon from without or within. This is the Christian import of the ideas glory, honor, praise, &c. The lofty consciousness, as it is here aroused by the Apostle, does not flatter self-love, but begets an earnest sense of obligation. To be a city on the hill, to which the eyes of all look, is no light responsibility, and brings a man under the discipline of the Spirit. The increase of idle talk is repressed by much affliction.

2. (V. 9, 10.) Christian truth is so rich and many-sided (πολυκύκλος, Eph. iii. 10), that it may be delivered in very various ways and from different points of view. Not only do we find in the New Testament a peculiar style of teaching in the case of every apostolic writer, but even the same Paul, it is evident, addressed the Thessalonians orally and in writing otherwise—put other truths in the foreground—than, for example, in the Epistles to the Galatians and the Romans; and yet at Thessalonica also there was laid the foundation of a steadfast Christianity, approved in trial. This consideration likewise cannot but inspire us in the Church with a large-heartedness and liberality of view in regard to the different ways of conceiving and representing the truth, provided only they stand sincerely and earnestly on the one foundation, 1 Cor. iii. 11, whether they be rather mystical or intellectual, churchly or specially biblical, practical or scientific (in the sense of Eph. i. 17 sq.), clinging to antiquity or looking towards the future. Church Confessions tolerate and require by the side of them all forms of expression. In our hymn-books too we find PAUL GERHARDT, TERSTEEGEN, ZINZENDORF, GELLERT [TOPLADY, COWPER, the WESLEYS], and others, in peace together, uttering one language in various dialects.

* [See Critical Note 9.—J. L.]

3. (V. 10.) The earliest Epistles of Paul are distinguished by their eschatological complexion. Subsequently he went back from pæschatology to the doctrine of faith and justification (Galatians and Romans), of Christ and the Church (Philippians, Ephesians and Colossians).* In his development of doctrine he pursued a regressive course similar to that of Messianic prophecy before him, and of the Church after him: first, the glorious end, and after that, the way to the end. But neither Old Testament prophecy nor apostolic teaching ever on the way lost sight of the end, the glorious consummation in the kingdom of God. And even in one of his latest Epistles (Tit. ii. 11 sq.) Paul has a passage very kindred to ours: conversion here has its counterpart there in the (objective) appearing of Divine grace, whose aim is declared to be a godly life with denial of the heathen worldly-mindedness (= to serve the living and true God), while expecting the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ (= to wait for His Son from heaven). The Church, however, has, especially since the days of Constantine, too much neglected to wait for the coming of Christ; even the Reformation restored, indeed, the genuine Pauline faith, but not yet the full hope. Calvin finds it here worthy of note, that for the hope of eternal salvation Paul puts the expectation of Christ. For, he adds, without Christ we are lost and hopeless; but, where Christ comes forward, there shines life and prosperity. Very beautiful; still one perceives that he had not yet attained to the full apostolic consciousness of the importance of Christ's coming as distinct from the blessedness after death,† when, it is true, we are even already present with the Lord. If the Reformation is a working back to what was originally exhibited for the Church in Holy Scripture, we have then here one of the points in which the Reformation of the 16th century needs to be carried yet further. As we would walk in the footsteps of Prophets and Apostles, and in particular even of our Paul, we must recognize it as our task to quicken anew the element of hope in knowledge and practice. The beginnings, moreover, of such a work show themselves latterly in almost all evangelical countries.

* [According as the development of error, and the circumstances of particular churches, required.—J. L.]

† [For sufficiently obvious reasons, the general tone of the Reformation period on the subject of Christ's second advent is not quite that of the apostolic age. Much more emphatically, however, is this true of the times that followed, the Reformation. In the writings of the more eminent Reformers themselves, LUTHER, MELANCTHON, CALVIN, KNOX, &c., not a few strong and fervid utterances are found, to which the remark of our Author would not do justice. For example, immediately preceding the above quotation from CALVIN we find these words: "Ergo quiaquis in vitam sanctam cursu perseverare volet, totam mentem applicet ad spem adventus Christi"—where there is no reference whatever to death or the intermediate state. And similar testimonies could easily be multiplied (see the Homiletical Notes on v. 10, and my Missionary Address, on The Hope

V. 8. The clear pealing sound, that rings out from the living Church. J. M. HAHN: The awakening of some souls may produce much reflection far and wide.—J. G. KOLB: A good man may through his earnestness become the light and salt of a whole neighborhood. (Kurzer Lebensabriß von J. G. Kolb, nebst einer Sammlung von Betrachtungen, Stuttgart, 1859).—The report of faith a sweet savor of Christ (comp. 2 Cor. ii. 15 sq.). CHRYSOSTOM: As a sweet-scented ointment keeps not its fragrance shut up within itself, but sends it afar, so likewise noble men keep not their virtue shut up within themselves, but through their reputation are of service to many for their improvement. CHRYSOSTOM then further makes mention of the renown acquired by Macedonia, of which Thessalonica was a principal city, through Alexander the Great, who was not without reason beheld by the prophet [Dan. vii. 6] as a winged leopard, the swiftness and force being thus described, wherewith he scoured the whole world; and so what happened in Macedonia became not less universally known than what occurred in Rome (the seat of the fourth-world empire of Daniel; see Rom. i. 8).—THE SAME: In such circumstances there frequently arises envy (there is indeed, alas, such a thing as spiritual envy; see Gal. v. 26, φθονῶντες; Phil. ii. 3, 4; 1 Cor. xii. 15 sqq.); but even this also your excellence has overcome, and they themselves are heralds of your conflicts.—ZINZENDORF: When Jesus glorifies His time of grace now here now there, rejoice thou in the mercy to others returning.—The testimony of others to our faith a comfort in trial.—[BAXSON: It was an honor to any church or city, to have the gospel go out from thence to other places.—J. L.]

V. 9. When the Lord enters the heart through the powerful preaching of the word, that is even the entrance of a king, though in humble raiment.—ZWISGLI: Paul did not ride into Thessalonica with such pride and pomp, as Cardinals, Bishops, and Popish Legates are wont to display.—RIGGER: The idols of the altar were hot to be overthrown by the purer knowledge of God, which many philosophers at that time had; the word of the Cross must come, which brought the idols to an end in the heart's affection, and forthwith also in the members; then too of the Church, before the Synod of New York, 1865). But take only this pregnant one from Bishop LATIMER's Third Sermon on the Lord's Prayer: "All those excellent learned men whom, without doubt, God hath sent into this world in these latter days to give the world warning—all those men do gather out of Sacred Scripture that the last day cannot be far off. And this is most certain and sure that, whenever He cometh, He cometh not too timely; for all things which ought to come before are passed now; so that, if He come this night or to-morrow, He cometh not too early." The modern device, of interposing between us and that blessed hope the promised times of universal blessing, had not yet been thought of.—J. L.]

they fell as to the service that was paid to them at the altar.—CALVIN: The end of true conversion is the living God. Many renounce superstition only to fall into what is worse; for, losing all sense of God, they plunge into a worldly-minded, irrational * contempt of the Holy One.—The same: We must first be converted, before we can serve God.—THE SAME:—No one is duly converted to God, but the man who has learned to yield himself fully to Him as a servant (in servitutum).—RIGGER: Conversion from idolatry to God was certainly in former times a great change; but neither is it at the present time any trifle, when on obedience to the truth the idols of wealth, pleasure, fleshly ease, honor from men, seeking to save one's life in this world, self-love, confidence in the flesh, and such like, are cast forth from the heart's affection.—THE SAME: The living and true God can be served only in spirit and in truth; and that requires a conscience purified in the blood of Jesus from dead works. Without fellowship with the Light, a man deals even with the living God as with a dumb idol (John iv. 23, 24; Heb. ix. 14; see John i. 5-10).

V. 10.—[On the first clause of this verse, see a good note by BARNES.—J. L.]—The Christian is a man who serves God and waits for Jesus.—CALVIN: In the service of God, which in the corruption of our nature is a more than difficult matter, we are kept and established by the expectation of Christ; otherwise the world drags us back to itself, and we grow weary. Waiting for the Lord a main point 1. in the doctrine of Jesus and His Apostles, 2. in the life of faith of the Apostles and first Christians.—RIGGER: As to what is behind, free from everything; for what is before, watchful (Mark xiii. 33 sqq.; Luke xxi. 36).—[ALFORD: The especial aspect of the faith of the Thessalonians was hope: hope of the return of the Son of God from heaven: a hope, indeed, common to them with all Christians in all ages, but evidently entertained by them as pointing to an event more immediate than the church has subsequently believed it to be. Certainly these words would give them an idea of the nearness of the coming of Christ; and perhaps the misunderstanding of them may have contributed to the notion which the Apostle corrects, 2 Thess. ii. 1 sqq.—J. L.]—We must be in earnest with the expectation of Christ's coming, if we would stand in the fullness of apostolic Christianity. This carries with it, 1. a Warning, a. against every kind of worldly happiness, and service of perishable things and men, especially against the modern absorption in practical and theoretic materialism, even of a refined sort; b. against the Romanizing over-valuing of what we already have even in the Church, and against striving for the Church's outward dominion and glory; c. against false ideals of a great future of the life of nations, to be introduced by our own, be it even Christian, power and activity; and against the so frequent intermixture, concurrent therewith, of the world and the kingdom of God; 2. Comfort, a. in regard to imperfections and sins in ourselves, in the world, in the Church: it has not yet appeared, what we shall be (1 John iii. 2); b. in regard to the sufferings and afflictions, which are the divinely appointed way to the future glory, 2 Cor. iv. 17 sq.; Rom. viii. 17.—CHRYSOSTOM: The sword in hand, the good in expectancy.—[VAUGHAN: A summary of the Christian life in all times; service, and expectation. The loss or disparagement of either has been in all times the cause of injury to the Church. The one, by itself, degenerates into a dry routine of duty: the other, into excitement, dreaminess, and indolent sentiment. The two together make up that life of practical piety which is the true end and chief glory of the Gospel. Tit. ii. 12, 13.—J. L.] Jesus, the Deliverer from the future wrath: 1. The wrath cometh; the world is going on to meet the judgment: an irrefragable matter of fact. On one hand, ROOS: When the unbelieving world looks out to the time after death, it sees nothing, hopes for nothing, fears nothing, except when conscience is stirred; whereas there is to be feared a fearful wrath of God, which at the appearing of Christ shall wholly burst over it, and, even before that, will make the condition of the soul separated from the body an unhappy condition. On the other hand, RIEGER: The wrath of God, its revelation against all ungodliness of men, judgment on hidden sins, is already written deep in the consciences of all men. Under that wrath abide, and are even already grievously tormented by the fear of it in this world and the next, all who are not begotten again by the gospel unto hope. 2. In Christ is deliverance from the judgment. CALVIN: It is an invaluable privilege that believers, as often as the judgment is spoken of, know that Christ will come for their deliverance.—THE SAME: The wrath of God is a future thing. We are not to measure it by our present afflictions in the world, as nothing is more absurd than to snatch at the enjoyment of transitory blessings, by way of forming an estimate of the grace of God. Faith is the sight of the invisible, and so is not misled by the aspect of the present life. Whilst the ungodly revel in their security, and we languish in sorrow, let us learn to fear the vengeance of God that is hidden from the eyes of the flesh, and rest in the calm pleasures of the spiritual life!

CH. II. 1-12.

3. a. The Thessalonians are themselves witnesses, that the Apostle's was no vain entrance, but one of Divine power (vv. 1, 2). As he exercises his ministry generally, with no impurity of purpose or method, but, as one put in trust by God, before the eyes of God (vv. 3, 4), so in Thessalonica also he appeared in no flattering or selfish spirit (vv. 5, 6), but with the most generous love (vv. 7, 8) and self-denying labor (v. 9). They themselves and God are his witnesses, that he had shown himself throughout unblamable towards the believers, whilst he was careful about nothing else but, as a father, to exhort every individual to a walk worthy of God (vv. 10-12).

1 For yourselves, brethren, know [yourselves know, brethren,] our entrance 2 in [entrance, εἰσοδόν] unto you, that it was not in vain [hath not been vain]; but even after that we had suffered before and were shamefully entreated [but having before suffered, and been shamefully treated], as ye know, at [in, ἐν] Philippi, we were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with 3 [in, ἐν] much contention. For our exhortation was [is], not of deceit [delusion] 4 nor [yet] of uncleanness, nor in guile; but as [according as, καθώς] we were allowed of God [have been approved by God] to be put in trust with the gospel, even so [so, οὕτω] we speak; not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth [who 5 proveth] our hearts. For neither at any time used we words of flattery, as ye 6 know; nor a cloak of covetousness, God is witness; nor of men sought we [sought we of men] glory, neither of [from, ἀπό] you, nor yet of [nor from, οὐτε ἀπό] others, when we might have been burdensome [or: have used authority], 7 as the apostles of Christ [Christ's apostles, Χριστοῦ ἀπόστολοι]; but we were [were found] gentle among you [in the midst of you, ἐν μέσῳ ὑμῶν], even as a nurse 8 cherisheth her children [as a nurse would cherish her own children]; so [,] being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted [to impart] unto you not the gospel of God only [not only the gospel of God], but also our 9 own souls, because ye were [became] dear unto us. For ye remember, brethren, our labor [toil, κόπον] and travail: for laboring [working] night and day, because we would not be chargeable [that we might not be burdensome, πρὸς τὸ μὴ 10 ἐπιβαρῆσαι] to any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God. Ye are witnesses, and God also [and God], how holily and justly [righteously, δικαίως] and unblameably we behaved ourselves among you that believe [to, or for you, 11 who believed]; as [even as, καθάπερ] ye know how we exhorted, and comforted [encouraged], and charged [adjoined] [you, ὑμᾶς] every one of you, as a father 12 doth his children [as a father his own children], that ye would walk [should walk]" worthy [in a manner worthy, ἀξίως] of God, who hath called [calletth]" you unto [into, εἰς] His [His own, αὐτοῦ] kingdom and glory.

⁶ V. 3.—[See Eliott's note, p. 149 sq., on "the appropriate rendering in the different cases of continued negation."—J. L.]

⁹ V. 4.—[The τῷ before Θεῷ is bracketed by Lachmann, and cancelled by Tischendorf, Alford, Eliott, after B. C. D.¹ Sin., &c.—J. L.]

¹¹ V. 6.—οὐτὲ ἡγουμένους ἐξ ἀνθρώπων δοξάζειν. The Greek order is here followed by nearly all versions, English and foreign.—J. L.]

¹³ V. 7.—[ἀλλ' (B. Sin. ἀλλὰ) ἐναντίον. See ch. i. 5, Critical Note 6.—J. L.]

¹⁵ V. 7.—[ὡς ἂν τροφὴ θάλῃ τὰ ἑαυτῶν τέκνα. Webster and Wilkinson: "as a nurse (any nurse) would."—Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, Eliott: ἐάν, after B. C. D. E. F. G. &c., but not Sin.¹ Many, including Auberlen, have a colon or a period after ἐν μέσῳ ὑμῶν, and attach this clause as protasis to what follows in v. 8. Erasmus, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, Wordsworth, Eliott, place a comma before and after it, Eliott regarding the clause "both as an illustration of the preceding words, and as the protasis to the following." But this divided duty is somewhat distracting. The simile of the nursing mother no doubt suggests what is said in v. 8, but can scarcely be a grammatical protasis to it, and yet maintain a structural connection with what precedes. On the whole, I prefer the arrangement of our English Version, and would close v. 7 with at least a semicolon.—J. L.]

¹⁶ V. 8.—[οὕτως qualifies εὐδοκούμεν, not δοξαζόμενοι.—J. L.]

¹⁷ V. 8.—Instead of δοξαζόμενοι the common reading now is δοξαζόμενοι [all the uncials, and many cursives.—J. L.]

¹⁸ V. 8.—[The Greek order, followed by Wiclif and Rheims, and later versions generally.—J. L.]

²⁰ V. 9.—[ἀγαθόμενοι].—γὰρ after πυκτός should be cancelled [as it now is in nearly all critical editions. It is wanting in A. B. D.¹ E. F. G. Sin.—J. L.]

²⁶ V. 12.—[καλοῦντες. A. and Sin., with a few cursive manuscripts, read καλέσμενος.—J. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. (V. 1.) For yourselves know.—For the confirmation and clearer elucidation (γὰρ) of the statement of the foreign brethren regarding his entrance at Thessalonica (ch. i. 9), the Apostle now appeals at length, as he had done cursorily at ch. i. 5, to the recollection of the Thessalonians themselves on the subject. Hence the same expressions, ἐσθλὸς πρὸς ὑμᾶς. We might call ch. ii. 1-12 an explanation of the ἐσθλός, ch. i. 9, just as the πῶς ἐνεργήσατε is then carried out in ch. ii. 13-16. The third testimony, that of the Thessalonians themselves, serves to establish the second, that of the strangers, just as the latter serves to establish the first (comp. on ch. i. 8, Note 1). That ch. ii. 1 begins with the same αἰσὶν γὰρ as ch. i. 9 is, of course, accidental; our αἰσὶν does not stand opposed to that αἰσὶν as such (that, indeed, has quite another reference, to ἡμᾶς of v. 8), but to strangers generally, as in the sequel καὶ ἡμῶν of v. 13 corresponds to it.—The details that follow are, in fact, intelligible only on the supposition, that the Apostle has to confute certain aspersions on his person and ministry. Merely to strengthen the Thessalonians (CALVIN, LÜNEMANN, and most), he would not expatiate so much at large on the excellencies of his service amongst them, least of all with such solemn protestations (vv. 5, 10) and such frequent appeals to the recollection of the readers (vv. 2, 5, 9, 10, 11); but he enters on boasting for the same reason as in 2 Cor. x.—xiii., because he must defend himself. Only it is not here in Thessalonica any factious doings that he has to contend with, but simply the insinuations whereby the unbelieving Thessalonians sought again to withdraw from the gospel their believing kindred and neighbors. In what these insinuations consisted we learn from the negative clauses, vv. 1, 3, 5 sq. The very fact that nearly our entire section proceeds in clauses with οὐκ and ἀλλὰ (vv. 1-2, 3-4, 5-9) shows, that Paul (through Timothy) had been informed of false assertions in regard to his operations—falsehoods, to which it was necessary for him to oppose the truth. Already RIEGER has remarked on v. 3: A denial of this kind from the Apostle indicates, that such imputations had been cast on him and his preaching. And says ROOS more precisely: When the Thessalonian converts reflected on the change that had taken place with them, it might possibly occur to them that an unknown man, of the name of Paul, had come to them over the sea with certain companions, had preached of one Jesus whom he called Christ, and of whom they had previously heard nothing, and had exhorted them to believe in Him, and serve Him as their Lord. So now we are Christians, they may have thought, whereas formerly we were Gentiles or Jews. But, in making this change, have we done right? Is the name, the faith, the hope of Christians not a thing of vanity? Are we not suffering for it to no purpose? Has not Paul deceived us? Is it not some falsehood that he has talked to us? And, besides, our countrymen hold his teaching to be a fable. These thoughts are now met by Paul in ch. ii. 1-16.

2. Our entrance unto you, that it hath not been vain.—This is the first of the imputations. κενή, comp. 1 Cor. xv. 14, = empty, idle, without power or substance, unreal; ŒCUMENIUS: μῆτοι καὶ λόγοι; CALVIN: vana ostentatio; comp. ch. i. 5, οὐκ ἐν λόγῳ μόνον, and the antithesis there, as here in v. 2. Not, therefore, = in vain, fruitless (LUTHER, FLATT, &c.), nor yet at once powerless and fruitless (DE WETTE, [JOWETT]), nor again = deceitful, fallax (GRORIUS). The ὑπόκρισις, as distinguished from the simple ἡ or even ἐνέργεια, expresses the secure consciousness of an accomplished, unassailable fact. In the original the subject of the dependent clause is by a Greek idiom attracted as object into the principal clause.*

3. (V. 2.) But having before suffered, &c.—The cause of an idle babbler is one for which he does not submit to suffering, and still less, when he has just with difficulty surmounted one trial, does he again joyfully appear for the same cause, especially in a new conflict. A deep earnestness in suffering, and yet, along with that, an unwearied alacrity and fidelity in his calling, showed Paul to be a man whose appearance the Thessalonians needed only to recall (καθὼς οἴσασθε), in order to perceive the vanity of the suspicions alleged against him. Of what sort these were, may be inferred from Acts xvii. 6, 7: ringleaders, flatterers of the people, ambitious persons who sought their own advantage.—On the sufferings which the Apostle, immediately before (προσάδ) his arrival in Thessalonica, had endured at Philippi, see Acts xvi. 12 sqq. Paul adds ὁ βρ σ δ ἐστ, insultingly treated (comp. Matt. xxii. 6; Luke xviii. 22), not so much because προσάδ like πράσσει is a vox media (LÜDEMANN), but because with his strong sense of right he had peculiarly felt the treatment received by him at Philippi to be arbitrary and unjust; see Acts xvi. 37. To such slight features even extends the harmony between the Acts and our Epistles.

4. We were bold in our God &c.—παρρησιάζομαι, once again in Paul's writings, Eph. vi. 20, and in like manner of the preaching of the gospel; frequently in the Acts, and indeed, except ch. xviii. 26, only of Paul from his conversion onwards, chh. ix. 27, 28; xiii. 46; xiv. 3; xix. 8; xxvi. 26. Freedom and boldness in testimony was therefore a prominent characteristic of this Apostle. ΟΛΣΑΥΣΕΝ: παρρησία is the outward expression of πληροφορία (ch. i. 5). Moreover, παρρησιάζομαι is not here = to speak or preach freely, so that λαλήσαι should be an explanatory infinitive resolvable by: so that (DE WETTE, KOCH, [ELLIOTT]: so as to speak), or an infinitive of the purpose: in order that (SCHOTT); but, as in Acts iii. 46 [?] and xxvi. 26, = to act with freedom and alacrity, and λαλήσαι is simply an infinitive of the object (LÜDEMANN), as in v. 4 πιστευήναι. [And so ALFORD, who translates: We were confident. ELLIOTT, on the other hand, comparing Eph. vi. 20 and Acts xxvi. 26, agrees with DE WETTE in thinking that "the idea of bold speech, even though reiterated in λαλήσαι, can scarcely be excluded."—J. L.] We had, says Paul, this παρρησία, not in ourselves, especially after such experiences, but in our God (in whom, as in our spiritual life-element, we live and labor; see ch. i. 1, Doctrinal and Ethical, 1). Not merely was it no idle babbling with whom the Thessalonians had to do; it was not, speaking generally, any mere man, but God; and this God Paul dares to call his God, because God visibly owned him, and the Thessalonians perceived in their conscience (2 Cor. iv. 2; v. 11) that in the power of God Paul spoke and acted. Therefore also he purposely adds: the gospel of God; he had not brought to them any empty talk, nor any kind of man's word whatsoever (see v. 13), but the glad tidings which God Himself will have proclaimed in the world. Comp. on τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ θεοῦ Exeg. Note 4 to ch. i. 8, ὁ λόγος τοῦ κυρίου. Why Paul does not say: in Christ, the gospel of Christ, but in God, of God, see Doctr. and Eth., 8.

5. In much contention.—As Paul had testified of the Thessalonians, ch. i. 6, that they received the word in much affliction with joy of the Holy Ghost, so here he can testify of himself that in much contention, with joy in God, he had published the same. Ἀγών, not outward and inward contention ([CHRYSTOSTOM, BISHOP HALL], OLSHAUSEN, [JOWETT]), but the contention of outward suffering only, Phil. i. 30 (DE WETTE, and most).*

6. (V. 3.) For our exhortation is &c.—The verb to be supplied in v. 3 is not ἦν but, as λαλοῦμεν of v. 4 shows, ἐστιν. Paul confirms (γὰρ) the statement as to his entrance at Thessalonica by a statement de toto perpetuoque more suo (BENGEL). But since this general witness to himself might again also be called in question, people at Thessalonica knowing nothing from their own observation of his ministry elsewhere, it was necessary for him to establish this point likewise by again enlarging, v. 5 sqq., on the spirit and method of his labors in Thessalonica. Similarly Jesus: If ye believe not me, my witness of myself, at least believe my works that are done amongst you (John x. 38; xiv. 11).

* [Including LÜDEMANN, ALFORD, ELLIOTT, VAUGHAN. Yet, since there seems to have been no violent resistance to the preachers at Thessalonica, prior to the sudden outbreak which led to their immediate departure from the city (Acts xvii. 5-10), it is not well thus to restrict the reference. Comp. Paul's use of the word at Col. ii. 1; 1 Tim. vi. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 7. FRITSCHE and many (LÜDEMANN says, most) understand the word here of the Apostle's cares and sorrows. Why not take in both the inward experience, and the outward?—J. L.]

7. Our exhortation [German: Predigt, = preaching, discourse]. Very well LÜNEMANN: παράκλησις is a calling to, address; and, according to the different relations to which this address is applied, the word undergoes modifications of its meaning. In the case of sufferers it is consolation; directed toward a moral or intellectual need, it is exhortation and encouragement. Now, since even the first evangelical proclamation consists in exhortation and encouragement, to wit, in the summons to renounce sin and lay hold of the offered salvation (comp. 2 Cor. v. 20), παράκλησις might also be used generally of the preaching of the gospel; whether objectively of the contents of the discourse, or subjectively of the preaching itself. So here; see v. 4. BENGEL: totum præconium evangelicum [passionum dulcedine tinctum], as Bengel adds.—J. L.]; OLSHAUSEN: the work generally of Christian teaching. Paul uses this expression and not εὐαγγέλιον (ch. i. 5), λόγος, κήρυγμα (1 Cor. ii. 4), or such like terms, because here the question is about the preaching, not in so far as it is a proclamation, but as it wins and transforms the hearers.*

8. Not of delusion, nor yet of uncleanness, nor in guile.—ἐκ marks the source from which the preaching proceeds; ἐν, the way and manner in which it is performed. The Apostle names two sources, one on the side of knowledge and doctrine, πλάτης, and one on the side of disposition, ἀκαθαρσία. He first repels the reproach, as if the Christian faith preached by him were a superstition, a chimera, and he himself an enthusiast or a babbler, like the sorcerers or magicians (CHRYSTOST.). Opposed to this is the fact, v. 4, that he had been entrusted with the gospel by God. With an οὐδέ—a stronger disjunctive than οὔτε (θε and τε), like our nor yet, stronger than nor (comp. WINER, p. 432)—Paul passes to the second point. Ἀκαθαρσία, impurity, commonly in the sense of unchastity (Rom. i. 24; 2 Cor. xii. 21; Gal. v. 19; Col. iii. 5), but also moral filth and uncleanness generally (Rom. vi. 19); here either an impure mind, foul motives in general, or perhaps it answers better to our sordid [schmutzig], specially = concupiscence, selfishness (comp. ch. iv. 7; Eph. iv. 19; v. 8). BENGEL: ἀκαθ. est, ubi fructus carnis quæritur, cf. Phil. i. 16, οὐκ ἀγνῶς.—δόλος, craft, fraud, all kinds of dishonest tricks for cheating and ensnaring. It adds to the impure design the impure means for its accomplishment, and so lies in like manner on the practical side. Whilst, therefore, for the reading οὐδέ there may be alleged the difference of the prepositions, yet on internal grounds οὔτε is perfectly justifiable (comp. WINER, p. 436 sq. [and Critical Note 7]). In the antithesis likewise, v. 4, ἀκαθαρσία and δόλος are taken together in the sentence with οὔτε, since ἀνδρέσιν ἀρσένικοις answers to δόλος and δεῖ τῷ δοκιμάζοντι τὰς καρδίας to ἀκαθαρσία. So in the confirmatory verses 5 and 6 the λόγος κολακείας answers to δόλος, the πλεονεξίας and ζητούντες ἐξ ἀνδρέων δόξαν to ἀκαθαρσία. The proof of v. 1, in particular, that is given in v. 3, lies in οὐκ ἐκ πλάτης, answering to κενή of v. 1; but the confirmatory sentence, just like ch. i. 8, goes beyond that which it confirms, since with οὐδέ the Apostle adds new considerations, which are then again themselves confirmed and carried further in v. 5 sqq. This view is supplementary to Note 6.

9. (V. 4.) According as—so.—Καθώς, conformably to the fact that; οὔτε, according to that very rule: agreeably to the grace conferred and obligation laid upon us (LÜNEMANN).

10. Approved.—δοκιμάζειν means, first, to try, test, scrutinize; so at the close of our verse, and commonly in the New Testament, e.g. ch. v. 21; 1 Tim. iii. 10, and often; and then also of the result of the trial: to regard as tried, fit, worthy, and to choose accordingly for a position (1 Cor. xvi. 3); hence in the next place generally, to value, prize.* So here, and similarly Rom. i. 28. Paul does not in this mean to assume any worthiness of his own, as the Greek interpreters (CHRYSTOSTOM, THEOPHYLACT, EUCYMENIUS) from their dogmatic standpoint characteristically explain. Rather his aim is just this, to exalt his authority as from God (similarly 1 Tim. i. 12). He would have it understood that, so far is he from preaching human heresy, or considering himself out of his own fancy called to be a preacher (ἐκ πλάτης, v. 3), it is rather God Himself who, according to His gracious purpose (GRIOTUS, PELT, LÜNEMANN, and even THEODORET [ALFORD: free choice]) has vouchsafed to him the distinction of being entrusted with the glad, heavenly message to the world. So in the apodosis with οὔτε the main emphasis lies on δεῖ in opposition to ἀνδρέσιν. Comp. v. 2 and note 4; observe also the impressive sonorousness of the expression. The perfect δεδοκ. marks what has happened once for all, the security of it as a matter of fact. At the close of the verse Paul purposely uses the same word once again; he knows himself to be the object of a continuous Divine δοκιμάζειν. There δοκ. is, to try, to examine; yet perhaps not without an accompanying intimation of favorable judgment. In the translation we have sought to indicate this, as well as the identity of the verbs.† πιστευθήναι, infinitive of the object, denoting that which was vouchsafed to Paul. So Rom. i. 28. On Paul's frequent construction of πιστεύεσθαι, see Winer, p. 205. That Paul, moreover, here includes Silvanus and Timothy is obvious from the plurals καρδίας and ψυχὰς, v. 8, as LÜNEMANN properly remarks against DE WETTE, who appeals to v. 7 [6], ἀπόστολοι; but see Note 16. Of course, however, Paul speaks primarily and chiefly of himself.‡

11. (V. 4.) Not as pleasing men.—ὡς before the participle gives it a subjective character, that of the conception and intention: We speak not with

* [ELLICOTT: παράκλησις is "perhaps distinguishable" ἐκ διὰ and διὰ σκοπῆς, "as directed more to the feelings than the understanding." JOWETT: "The two senses of παράκλησις, exhortation and consolation, so easily passing into one another (compare v. 11), are suggestive of the external state of the early Church, sorrowing amid the evils of the world, and needing as its first lesson to be comforted; and not less suggestive of the first lesson of the Gospel to the individual soul, of peace in believing."—J. L.]

* [ELLICOTT states the gradation thus: (a) to put to the test; (b) to choose after testing; (c) to approve of what is so tested. This might perhaps be improved by transposing (b) and (c).—J. L.]

the thought of pleasing men, and so winning them with guile (ἐν δόλῳ, v. 3), but to please God who searcheth our hearts, and so knows and judges even impure designs (ἐξ ἀκαταρσίας, v. 3). Comp. Gal. i. 10.—[ALFORD: "ἀρέσκοντες, in the strict sense of the present tense: going about to please, striving to please."—J. L.]

12. (V. 5.) For we.—On the logical relation, expressed by γάρ, of v. 5 sqq. to what precedes, see Notes 6 and 8 (at the end).

13. Used we words of flattery &c.—ἡγνεσθαι ἐν, of things ch. i. 5, here of persons (comp. 1 Tim. iv. 15) = versari in re, to engage in any matter, be occupied therein. The flattering words thus answer to ἀνδράποισ ἀρέσκοντες, v. 4 (CALVIN: Whoever will please men, must basely flatter), and to δόλος, v. 3 (CHRYSOSTOM: We flattered not, as deceivers, who desire merely to draw people to themselves, and rule them). For the fact that he had not flattered them, Paul appeals to the recollection of his readers themselves: as ye know; but for what follows, that he had had no selfish aims, he can only appeal to God, who knoweth the heart: God is witness! Comp. Rom. i. 9; Phil. i. 8. This appeal answers to δεῖ τῷ δοκιμῶσιν τὰς καρδίας ἡμῶν (v. 4), as the repelling of the insinuation, that his mind had been set on earthly good and human glory (v. 6), answers to δεῖ ἀρέσκειν, v. 4, and οὐκ ἐξ ἀκαταρσίας, v. 3. Πλεονεξία corresponds to ἀκαταρσία, as in ch. iv. 6, 7; Eph. iv. 19; v. 3. Πρόφασις (from προφαίνω, not πρόφημι), properly, what appears; hence the pretext, behind which one hides his real thought, an excuse; so here parallel with λόγος: My speech was neither a word of flattery, nor a fair pretext, a plausible form for covetous ends.

14. (V. 6.) Nor sought we glory.—ζητοῦντες likewise is dependent on ἐγερθήμεν, and parallel to ἐν λόγῳ κολ., ἐν προφάσει πλεονεξίας. Such a change of structure is truly Pauline (comp. Rom. xii. 9 sqq.). As to the thought, there is a close connection with the latter point, as of ambition with avarice. On ἐξ ἀνδράπων δόξαν, comp. John v. 41, 44.

15. Neither from you, nor from others.—In vv. 5, 6 there are, first, three mutually coördinate οὐτε, then two subordinate to the clause of the last of these three, since οὐτε ἀπ' ὑμῶν &c. distributes the ἐξ ἀνδράπων. Ἀπὸ, essentially = de, brings to view the special source as distinct from the general.* From others, with whom we might perhaps have sought honor for ourselves through your conversion (comp. ch. i. 8, 9). Erroneously BENGE: Qui nos admirati essent, si nos superbius tradidissimus.

16. (V. 7 [6].)† When we might have used authority [or, been burdensome] as Christ's Apostles.—The participle δυνάμενοι is subordinated to ζητοῦντες, and is resolvable by although. Ἐν βάρει εἶναι: to be of weight, to appear important, dignified, to assume consequence. Against the connection, THEOPHIL, EWALD, and others: to be burdensome = ἐπιβαρεῖν, v. 9.‡ Ἀπόστολοι, so far as it refers also to Silvanus and Timothy (see Note 10, at the end), is used in the wider sense, as in Acts xiv. 4, 14 of Paul and Barnabas. But perhaps the old rule holds here: A potiori fit denominatio. As Christ's Apostles, as messengers and envoys (ambassadors) of the Anointed King of the whole world, solemnly appointed by God (Acts xvii. 3, 7), they might have stepped forth with dignity. Dicit Paulus se adeo abfuisse ab inani pompa, a jactantia, a fastu, ut legitimo etiam jure suo cesserit, quod ad vindicandam auctoritatem pertinet (CALVIN).

* [So LÜHMANN, and similarly ALFORD (de, the abstract ground; ἀπὸ, the concrete object;—a distinction on which he insists against ELLICOTT, who pronounces it "artificial and precarious.") That of SCHOTT, ascribed to by OLSHAUSEN and BLOOMFIELD, that de marks the immediate source, ἀπὸ the mediate, is rejected by LÜHMANN as here impossible. But, even if the two prepositions must be regarded in this place as synonymous, it is desirable that the translation should indicate the change. ‡ [MACCLEMENT adopts the rendering of the English mar-

17. (V. 7.) But we were found gentle in the midst of you.—Ἐγερθήμεν answers to the ἐγερθεῖς of v. 5. ἤπιος (from ἐπι, εἰπας, whence then ῥήπιος, insane) properly, affable, mild, kind, loving (comp. 2 Tim. ii. 24). Suavissimum vocabulum, de parentibus præcipue et de medicis dici solitum (BENGE). [Ἐν μέσῳ ὑμῶν, in the midst of you, surrounded by you, as a teacher by his pupils, a mother by her children, a hen by her chickens (BENGE). It marks the centre of a group or society, drawing all eyes to itself (comp. Acts i. 15; Luke ii. 46; Matt. xviii. 2): So that ye have all seen and experienced it (KOCH). RIGGENBACH].* Even this loving demeanor of the Apostle might be interpreted as flattery (v. 5), and so Paul confutes this reproach by showing it to be a perversion of his virtue into a fault. Then by the fuller description, ὡς ἐν &c., of this his tender and devoted love, he at the same time confutes the other reproach (vv. 5, 6) of his having been selfish or ambitious.

18. As a nurse would cherish her own children.—Before ὡς there should be a point with the force of our colon,† so that ὡς answers to οὐτως of v. 8. The sentence after ὡς is an explanation attached to what precedes by asyndeton, as in ch. i. 8; ii. 9, yet so that here also again the explanatory sentence contains at the same time an advance, an enlargement of the thought. Τροφός, nourisher, she who suckles; here not a nurse, but the mother herself, as appears from τὰ ἑαυτῆς τέκνα, in which moreover, especially with this arrangement of the words (comp. v. 8; otherwise v. 11), there exists the climactic intimation, her own children (see ALXX. BUTTMANN, Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Sprachgebrauchs, 1859, p. 97). With STIER, we have also expressed both in the version.‡ The figure of the mother (comp. Gal. iv. 19; Ia. lxvi. 13; xlix. 15) is still tenderer than that of the father (v. 11), but is here chosen especially for this reason, because truly a nursing mother with her child seeks not profit or honor, but is wholly bent on bestowing (not receiving) love. Ὀδᾶν likewise is a tender expression; properly to warm, then, like fovere, to foster and cherish (Eph. v. 29; comp. Deut. xxii. 6, LXX).

gin, but understands the Apostle to speak of his right to exact both obedience and maintenance. Perhaps, however, the other phrase, to be burdensome, no less admits of either reference, and it has the advantage of preserving—somewhat too strongly, indeed—the verbal affinity between vv. 6 and 9. † [But see Critical Note 15.—J. L.]

‡ [ut eius adugetis mater thre oligon Ktēr pſaget. It is obvious, however, that the maternal relation is indicated solely by the ἑαυτῆς τέκνα, and is not at all necessarily implied in τροφός. AUGUSTINE, Serm. de Ps. lxxii. 34 (lxxiii. 23): "Apostolus vero, germano et pio caritatis affectu, et nutricia personam suscepit, dicendo, fovet; et matris, addendo, filios suos. Sunt enim nutrices foventes quidem, sed non filios suos: item sunt matres nutricibus dantes, non foventes filios suos."—J. L.]

19. (V. 8.) So, being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing.—Ουσιπρόσμενοι, supported here by the best manuscripts, occurs in the New Testament only here, and but seldom elsewhere, in the LXX, &c.; in meaning it is = impetrandi (Recepta), and, like this, probably an enlarged form of impetrandi, which should perhaps be distinguished from the ordinary impetrandi (see Passow), and is used by Nicander in the sense of the common impetrandi (comp. Winer, p. 92) = ardently to long after any one, to love tenderly.—Εὐδοκούμεν is the imperfect without augment, as frequently; Winer, p. 66: we were pleased, were cheerfully ready, took delight therein (comp. 2 Cor. v. 8; Rom. xv. 26). In vv. 7 and 8 one feels in word and figure the tender heartiness and sweet breath of a first, fresh love, such as becomes the firstling of the apostolical Epistles.

20. To impart unto you &c.—μεταδοῦναι stands emphatically forward, in order to mark the love as one altogether giving, imparting. The two objects of μεταδοῦναι are joined to one another ascensively by not only—but also, so that the second is held up as the one of greater importance for the connection (τοῦτο μὲν ἵνα ἴδωμεν, CHRYSOSTOM). Ἐαυτῶν, moreover, is opposed to τοῦ θεοῦ, and the Apostle means to say: We were willing not only to fulfil our official service, entrusted to us by God, in delivering to you His gospel, but there was formed also a personal relation of the most devoted love, in consequence of which we were ready to sacrifice to you our own life.† [WEBSTER and WILKINSON: “not only that which you could share without loss to me, but that which I must lose in giving;” or, “not only that which I held in trust for others, had in charge to give, but that which was most my own.”—J. L.] The latter point was here the main thing, over against the imputations of covetousness and ambition. The comparison with the mother has reference to this personal love, which is therefore still made specially prominent in the additional clause with ἡμέρας (stronger and more distinctive than ἐν), which assigns the motive. How far now Paul with his attendants willingly gave up his own life to the Thessalonians, he shows himself by an example in v. 9, which is joined to what precedes, by γὰρ, and is therefore illustrative of it. At the risk of health and life, he performed along with his preaching strenuous manual labor day and night, that he might be burdensome to no one, just as a mother day and night with much labor and self-sacrifice cherishes her little child. Add to this, that the Apostle—and it is of himself that he speaks at least primarily—was probably of a weak and sickly constitution (2 Cor. x. 10; xii. 5 sqq.), and we shall the better understand how much there was here of a μεταδοῦναι τῇ ψυχῇ. μεταδοῦναι is indeed Zeugmatic, since out of it only the simple δοῦναι must be supplied to τὰς ψυχὰς (comp. Matt. xx. 28); but such constructions are frequent enough (see Winer, p. 548). On ἑαυτῶν = ἡμῶν αὐτῶν, see Winer, p. 136. [Bengel's phrase: Anima nostra cupiebat quasi immiscere in animam vestram—and similarly Chrysostom: τὰς ψυχὰς εἰς ὑμᾶς κενύσαι, effundere—though suitable to μεταδοῦναι, is opposed to the γὰρ of v. 9. and perhaps also contains a thought not quite apostolic, and only in seeming accord with the figure of the mother, since not the suckling as such, but the ἰδὲν is the tertium comparationis. To think of the gospel as the milk, according to 1 Pet. ii. 2; comp. Heb. v. 13 (Dr. Witte, Lünemann, and others), is quite as little in keeping, since it is really not the Apostle's gospel, but is expressly called the gospel of God, and since for that very reason, as has been pointed out, this consideration does not enter into the comparison with a mother. In μεταδοῦναι τὰς ψυχὰς the exposure of the life in danger and persecutions is commonly thought of; nor is this excluded, since v. 9 contains merely an illustrative example, such as was required by the context, and was fitted to repel the imputation of covetousness and ambition.—RIGGENBACH.]

21. (V. 9.) For ye remember our toil and travail.—Μνησθέντες, more sonorous than οἴσθε (vv. 1, 2, 5, 11); here with an accusative; ch. i. 3, with a genitive.—On γὰρ, see Note 20. [The reference of γὰρ to ἡμεῖς ἐνερθήσαμεν, v. 7, is too remote; that to ἀγανατοῖ ἡμῶν ἐνερθήσασθε (LÜNEMANN), unsuitable.—RIGGENBACH.] Κόπος is strengthened by the addition of μάχδος,* as at 2 Thess. iii. 8 (a verse which agrees almost verbally with ours), and 2 Cor. xi. 27. The expressions in their connection denote the most strenuous bodily labor at his handicraft as σκηνοποιός (Acts. xviii. 3), a maker of tents out of leather or cloth for shepherds, travellers, soldiers, &c. (Winer, Realwörterbuch II. pp. 218, 725). This κόπος and μάχδος is now explained in a sentence appended, as in v. 7, by asyndeton (γὰρ after νυκτός being superfluous), in which the emphasis lies on what stands foremost, νυκτός καὶ ἡμέρας ἐργαζόμενοι, as in v. 8 on τὰς ἑαυτῶν ψυχὰς. And now, as ἐκπύραμεν εἰς ὑμᾶς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ θεοῦ plainly answers to τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ θεοῦ of v. 8, so does νυκτός καὶ ἡμέρας ἐργαζόμενοι to τὰς ἑαυτῶν ψυχὰς, so that there accrues from this a new and more precise confirmation of our view of the γὰρ and of μεταδοῦναι τὰς ἑαυτῶν ψυχὰς.

22. Working night and day.—Ἐργάζεσθαι, of manual labor, as ch. iv. 11, and often. We [Germans] say day and night, as ἡμέρας καὶ νυκτός, Luke xviii. 7; Acts ix. 24, and frequently in the Apocalypse; but elsewhere, and always in Paul's usage [both in his letters and speeches, ch. iii. 10; 2 Thess. iii. 8; 1 Tim. v. 5; 2 Tim. i. 3; Acts xx. 31; xxvi. 7.—J. L.], νυκτός καὶ ἡμέρας or νύκτα καὶ ἡμέραν, because the Jews, as also the Athenians, begin the civil day with the evening. Here this order is emphatic,† because night-work is the more unusual and irksome. We are not, therefore, to suppose that Paul preached all day, and performed

* [ELLICOTT prefers to regard μειραιας as an apocopated, and μειραιας as a late and perhaps strengthened, form of μειραιας. To the derivation from μειραιας, WORDSWORTH objects the aspirated μ, and he adheres strongly to TAMMERTLACHT's account of the word as from μῆρος and εἶπος, = “apostolatus, bound to, twined together with you, and clinging to you.”—J. L.]

† [Our German, after Luther, gives Leben for ψυχὰς; and this interpretation is given by very many, including the English margin; comp. 1 John iii. 16, &c. But says ELLICOTT: There is “perhaps a faint reference to the deeper meaning of ψυχὰς, as pointing to the centre of the personality—our lives and souls (Fell), our very existences, and all things pertaining to them.”—J. L.]

* [ELLICOTT: “The former perhaps marks the toll on the side of the suffering it involves (see on 1 Tim. iv. 10), the latter, as derivation seems to suggest (connected with μῆρος, and perhaps allied to μῆρος, see Pott, Etym. Forsch. Vol. I. p. 283), on the side of the magnitude of the obstacles it has to overcome.” Nearly opposite to this is Wordsworth: “The former word expresses energy of action, the other indicates patience in bearing.” ALFORD: “No distinction can be established.”—J. L.]

manual labor in the night-time; on the contrary, the latter occupation filled up also a good part of the day, as on the other hand he preached likewise at night (Acts xx. 7); but, generally, day and night is, as with us, a vivid expression for without intermission (comp. especially Rev. xx. 10).

23. That we might not be burdensome to any of you, by his having to care for my support. So little did the Apostle seek any profit from the Thessalonians, that he sought not even the necessities of life from them but earned them for himself, that his intercourse with them might on his part be altogether one of giving. In hac etiam parte jure suo obtinuit (CALVIN; comp. Note 16). For the matter in question, comp. Acts xviii. 3; xx. 34; 1 Cor. iv. 12; ix. 7 sqq.; 2 Cor. xi. 8 sqq.; Phil. iv. 10 sqq., and Doctr. and Eth., 5.—On ἐπιβάρυναι, see Winer, p. 191.*

24. (V. 10.) Ye are witnesses and God.—The Apostle having in three sentences with οὐκ—ἀλλὰ (vv. 1 and 2, 3 and 4, 5 and 9) confuted the reproaches cast upon him, and which are summed up in the fewest words in v. 3—having shown that his doctrine is not an idle delusion, but the gospel of God, and that he himself has labored, not from selfish motives of covetousness and ambition, nor with impure methods of craft and flattery, but in the sight of God and with the most devoted love—he now at last opposes to that a brief, positive sketch of his ministry, and for this he again appeals to the Thessalonians and God as witnesses (comp. v. 5), by way of giving to his assertion so much the more of the impressive earnestness of truth. Men must witness for his manner of acting; God witnesses, in his conscience and theirs, for his inward disposition. This explanatory sentence likewise is added by asyndeton (comp. vv. 7, 9), a construction to which in the present instance the liveliness of emotion also contributes.

25. How holily, and righteously, and unblamably, &c.—ὁσίως, with perceptible, inward reverence of God; δικαίως, with due consideration of men, leaving and giving to every one his own (comp. Eph. iv. 24; Tit. ii. 12 [Luke i. 75; Tit. i. 8]); † ἀμώματως, unblamably, irreproachably in the whole deportment—the negative side to the two positive ones (LÜNNEMANN), especially to δικαίως (OLSHAUSEN). This qualification Paul adds, because reproaches had been cast upon him.† [BENGEL and others: toward themselves, in order to get the three references to God, men, themselves as in Tit. ii. 12; but this is here inadmissible, since all is referred to ὑμῖν τοῖς πιστεύουσιν—οἷως assigning merely the religious ground of the behavior toward the believers.—RIGGENBACH.] It is commonly not enough considered, that we have here before us, not adjectives, but adverbs (comp. Acts xx. 18., πῶς ἐξηγοῦμαι μὲθ' ὑμῶν); Paul is not speaking of his walk, his entire personal bearing (DE WETTE, HOFMANN)—otherwise we must have had οἷως, &c. (comp. οἷος, ch. i. 5)—but of the manner of his dealing with the believers (WINKER, p. 413).

26. To [for] you who believed.—ὑμῖν is simply the dative of direction or reference: to you, toward you (DE WETTE, KOCH) [not a dative of interest: for your advantage,* nor yet of judgment: appeared to you (ECUMENIUS and THEOPHYLACT, CALVIN, BENGEL, LÜNNEMANN); the adverbs in that case would scarcely be admissible.—RIGGENBACH.].† The addition τοῖς πιστεύουσιν, at first view apparently superfluous [JOWETT], must here as at v. 18 have its own ground and significance. The believers were told that their faith was credulity and superstition, that they had allowed themselves to be ensnared, abused, and misled by the stranger, and that this was now called faith. A similar way of talking to that nowadays, which confounds faith with opinion, notion, dim, baseless feeling. In opposition to this Paul dwells with emphasis on the word faith in its true import, and shows how he had never abused their confidence in him and his word so as to indulge himself in impurity of any kind, but rather, honoring their faith as faith in God and His word, he had in all his proceedings kept holy what was holy, and had with all earnest men exhorted them to a walk worthy of God. [Those, who explain the dative as a dative of judgment,† take τοῖς πιστεύουσιν restrictively: tametsi aliis non ita videremur; § BENGEL. Especially contrary to v. 13 (?).—RIGGENBACH.]—Ἐξηγήσμεν, as in vv. 5, 7; chap. i. 5.

27. (V. 11.) Whilst we, as ye know, &c. [Even as ye know how we, &c.]—καθὰς ὅσως is a parenthetical clause similar to καθὰς ὅσως of vv. 2, 5; it belongs to the following participial construction. This time the Apostle puts καθὰς ὅσως for καθὼς, because immediately after ὅς occurs twice. The first, ὅς belongs to ἐν ἡμέραις, and has here a strengthening force such as it carries also elsewhere in connection with ἡμέρας (see Passow under ἡμέρας), a usage very nearly akin to the connection of ὅς with superlatives. The corroboration ἐν ἡμέραις, of frequent occurrence in the New Testament, is found likewise in classic Greek (A. BUTTMANN, p. 105). With the double reinforcement, ὅς ἐν ἡμέραις, comp. Rev. xxi. 21; ἀπὸ ἐν ἡμέραις; Eph. v. 33: ὅπως οὖν καθ' ἡμέρας ἡμέρας. The participial clauses, vv. 11, 12, show to what extent Paul behaved holily and righteously and unblamably toward the believers (v. 10), and we have therefore resolved the participles by in that.‡ The main em-

The Greek order is this: "Ye are witnesses, and God, how holily and righteously and unblamably to (for) you who believed we behaved." Probably the precise import of the dative in this case must be left doubtful. ELLICOTT's objection to it as a dative of judgment, that "the Apostle would scarcely have appealed to God in reference to the judgment of the Thessalonians," is by no means decisive. Solemnly to remind converts of their earliest convictions and first love is a Scripture means of guarding them, or recovering them, from declension and apostasy. Comp. phasis of the participial construction rests on the conclusion, ἐὶς τὸ περιπατεῖν ἁγίως, &c. (LÜNMANN), and yet so that Paul would in connection therewith lay stress on two other considerations: 1. That he had taken pains to hold every one in particular to this worthy walk, and hence the doubly strengthened ἐκαστος; 2. That for this end he had exerted all his force of speech, and hence the combination of the three sonorous participles. The Apostle's unblamable deportment towards the believers was shown in his exhorting every individual with the whole power of his address to nothing else but a walk worthy of God. This is simply the connection of v. 10 with vv. 11, 12. The comparison with a father has reference to all three points: a father keeps his children singly in his eye, and trains every one according to his individuality; he employs all the force of exhortation in kindness and severity; he would keep his children only to what is good, and to no evil of any kind. Here, where the question is not, as in vv. 7, 8, about devoted love, but holy earnestness, Paul compares himself, not to a mother, but to a father. Paul never writes tautologically, but, even while repeating similar thoughts, advances to new and wider points of view. [Interpreters in general do not agree with me in regarding καθὼς οὖν οἶδατε as a parenthesis, but take οἶδατε as a governing verb, on which ὡς, apart from ἐν ἑκάστῳ, is dependent. But since ὡς is followed only by participles, they are obliged to supply the verbum finitum, and then, because ὡς is afterwards added, ἡγαθήσαμεν, οὐχ [sic] ἀφῆκαμεν, &c., is supplied to ἐν ἑκάστῳ (PELT, SCHOTT, and others), or to the entire clause ἡμεν (BEZA, GROTIUS, FLATT), or ἐγενήθημεν, from the previous context (BENGEL, LÜNMANN, [ALFORD, WORDSWORTH]), or, the supplement being left indeterminate, an anacoluthon is assumed (DE WETTE, [ELLIOTT]). With these grammatical inconveniences there is then connected also an erroneous and artificial view of the logical relation of vv. 11, 12 to v. 10, as that Paul speaks in v. 10 of his behavior generally; in vv. 11, 12, for confirmation of that, of the discharge of his duty as a teacher in particular (DE WETTE, KOCH, similarly HOFMANN); or that in proof of his own virtue he adduces the fact of his having exhorted the Thessalonians to virtue, it being here taken for granted that one, who has it so much at heart that others shall be virtuous, will be so himself (LÜNMANN). Independently of other objections to these views, they would require a καὶ after καθὼς οὖν or after ὡς.—RIGGENBACH.]*

* [Notwithstanding the above remarks, I adhere still to the ordinary construction of καθὼς οὖν οἶδατε, ὡς ἐν ἑκάστῳ, &c. The objections to it are more than counterbalanced by the exceeding awkwardness of the new arrangement proposed. As a parenthesis belonging to what follows it, καθὼς οὖν οἶδατε would be strangely misplaced. It is also very improbable that any considerations of euphony determined the use of καθὼς οὖν here, instead of καθὼς (v. 2, §; ch. i. 5. See ch. ii. 13, καθὼς ἴσθιν ἀλλήλοις). Perhaps it might rather be said, that the former was selected for the sake of still more strongly emphasizing the exactness of the correspondence between the personal and the official conduct of the Apostle.—J. L.]

† [It is wanting in Cod. Sin.—ELLIOTT speaks of it as a "collective ὡς," serving still more clearly to define all that were included—a defining and supplementary accusative, somewhat allied to the use of that case in the εὐχῆμα καὶ ὁλον καὶ μέρος.—J. L.]

BENGEL: Παρακαλ. movet, ut facias aliquid (libenter); παραμυθ., ut cum gaudio; μαρτυρ., ut cum timore. The two last participles really specify the twofold style and method of the παρακαλεῖν, and may be also grammatically subordinated to it, as, for example, δυνάμενοι of v. 7 [6] is subordinated to ζητοῦντες of v. 6, and καλοῦντων of v. 16 to μὴ ἀρεσκόντων καὶ ἐναντίων of v. 15 (comp. 2 Tim. i. 4). In favor of this are the facts, 1. that ἐὶς τὸ περιπατ. cannot depend on μαρτυρ., which must have either ἵνα (1 Tim. v. 21) or the simple infinitive (2 Tim. ii. 14); 2. that ὡς is unsuitable to μαρτυρ., which cannot have an accusative of the person after it, except in the here inadmissible sense of taking one to witness. Perhaps the pleonastic ὡς is put after παρακαλοῦντες for the very purpose of separating the subordinate participles from the superior one. Even as to form, παραμυθ. and μαρτυρ. belong together as of the middle voice, and are jointly distinguished from the active παρακαλοῦντες. Thus: We exhorted you with kindly encouragement as well as with earnest obtestation.* Comp., moreover, on the accumulation of participles Note 27.—The division of verses is here very unapt. †

29. (V. 12.) That ye should walk in a manner worthy, &c.—Εὶς τὸ περιπατ. is thus dependent on παρακαλ., and denotes the contents or object of the exhortation. [So also LÜNMANN, who thinks, indeed, that ἐὶς may be referred to all the three participles; but in that case ἐὶς must rather denote the purpose, as DE WETTE and KOCH understand it.—RIGGENBACH.]

thought, that it is God with whom believers have to do, and of whom he had been the mere but honest instrument (hence the leading position of δοξας in v. 10.—Comp. v. 13).

Thus: God calls you to a participation in His own kingdom, which will appear at Christ's advent, and in His own Divine glory, into which believers then enter through the change [of the living, 1 Cor. xv. 51.—J. L.] or through the (first) resurrection. It might be asked whether βασιλεία here is not to be taken in the active sense = kingly dominion; yet this signification of βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ does not, to my knowledge, occur in the New Testament. But certainly the participation of Christians in the βασιλεία will really be a participation in the βασιλεύειν. Their calling is indeed to be glorified (Rom. viii. 17), not, however, to be ruled over, but to the βασιλεύειν or συμβασιλεύειν (Rom. v. 17; 1 Cor. iv. 8; 2 Tim. ii. 12; Rev. xx. 4, 6; xxii. 5).—The motive to a holy walk is therefore a double one, which yet again is but one and the same: Christians are to walk worthily, that is, they should regulate all their proceedings and life-conduct in such a way as becomes 1. the holy majesty of God, with whom by their calling they have fellowship: and 2. their own destination, expressed in this calling, to a share in the full dignity, imperial and essential, of this same God. This pure light of glory excludes all impurity (comp. 1 Tim. i. 11, τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς δόξης, in connection with the preceding verses, and 1 John iii. 3). This section also, like the one before it, thus closes with an eschatological outlook. And, in truth, there meets us here the high practical importance of the Christian hope. As in suffering it begets patience (ch. i. 3), so in action a holy walk.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. (Vv. 1-12.) To the Thessalonians assailed on account of their faith Paul shows that there is something real about it, both in his case (vv. 1-12) and in theirs (vv. 13-16). As proof he here cites, not miracles, as, for example, in Gal. iii. 5, but simply the demonstration of the spirit and of power—what of Divine, self-evidencing light they had perceived in him, and experienced in their own hearts and consciences. It is worthy of note that the Gentile Apostle, in the very first Epistle written by him for the Gentile world, insists on this. And such is still to-day the twofold evidence of Christianity in the midst of a world estranged from God, where so frequently all power, all culture, all historical life stands, or seems to stand, in opposition to the gospel: the children of light, in whom, as nowhere else in the world, we perceive a perfect and blessed life (Matt. v. 14-16; Phil. ii. 15), and the purifying and quickening Divine influences which we experience in ourselves from the gospel (2 Cor. xiii. 5).

2. Our section is rich in self-praise, which, however, develops itself rather, step by step, as self-defence. A servant of Christ owes it, not so much to himself as his Master and his cause, to clear himself of unjust imputations, whenever they threaten to hinder the progress of the gospel, and prejudice the faith and love of the brethren. How in such a case one should express and demean himself may be learned from Paul, who first of all lets it be seen that he is Divinely certain of his cause, and is conscious of having acted with self-denial in the power of God and before the eyes of God, and then also he appeals freely to human testimony. The Lord knows how, by means of the oppositions of the world or other humbling experiences, so to dispose his servants inwardly, that when circumstances are such that the ends of the Divine kingdom require it, they can and ought to speak of themselves in a way, that to the judgment of a merely natural morality appears as self-praise. Here belongs also, for example, the fact that John distinguishes himself as the disciple whom Jesus loved; here belong many expressions in the Psalms and passages of Daniel, as ch. i. 17-20; ix. 2, 3; 2 Cor. x.-xiii.

3. Our section is a true pastoral mirror.* In the first and larger half (vv. 1-9) are two principal points of view, one of which concerns the cause, the doctrine; the other the individual, in respect partly of his inner motives, partly of his manner of acting and speaking. 1. For what concerns the doctrine, we must be able to testify that it is no misleading error, no idle, impotent human invention of any sort, that we preach, but the gospel of God, the glad tidings which God Himself would have to be published to men. We speak in the consciousness, and in the power, of a Divine commission, not as those who are enthusiastic for some self-contrived, human system, and such like, nor as idle babblers believing nothing. 2. For what concerns, a. the disposition and purpose in the discharge of the office, we know that we are free from impure motives of avarice and ambition, for we prosecute our work for souls in the continual presence of Him who knows the heart, and, to please whom, we have to prosecute it earnestly, and in fervent love to those entrusted to us. That we may offer no hindrance to the gospel, we willingly forego the honor and profit that we might otherwise properly claim. We are not satisfied with the faithful fulfilment of what is officially prescribed, but voluntarily undertake additional toil and trouble of every kind. We spare not our health or our life, where the honor of our Lord and the salvation of souls are concerned. In short, instead of seeking aught for ourselves, the soul of our work is self-sacrificing love. It is more blessed to give than to receive. b. As regards the means and manner of our working, we stand in no need of any sort of cunning or spurious pastoral shrewdness to draw the people to us, and secure for ourselves their respect. We never deal in flattering words. We aim not at all at pleasing men.—In the second half (vv. 10-12) Paul exhibits the holy and righteous behavior of a servant of Christ toward the believers, and shows how, 1. so far as concerns the Church, this consists in not merely proclaiming the word generally, but in also bringing it near to individual souls, so that in this way the special care of souls is added to preaching. 2. For what concerns the preacher himself, he should put forth all his strength, and in different ways, adapted to occasional circumstances, to individuals and spiritual conditions, point those committed to him to the right way. 3. With regard, finally, to the doctrine, it should aim at nothing else but to hold the hearers to what is good. But in Christianity that which is morally good has a thoroughly religious character. It is a walk worthy of God. Nor does even that exhaust the matter. It is not merely the relation of single souls, or even of the congregation, to God, that is to be held up to believers, but God has a kingdom, a corporate order of life, in which

* Comp. Lehrer- und Predigerpiegel 1 Thess. ii. 1-12 in Zeller's Monatsblatt von Beuggen, 1860, No. 10 sqq.

He really shares His glory with the creature. To this kingdom, already founded in Christ, but to be first manifested at His advent, we are called. Our walk should bear in itself the stamp of our so high destiny. We should act from motives drawn from the kingdom and the glory. The preaching, therefore, must teach what the kingdom is, and what the glory (comp. my Discourse: die biblische Lehre von Reiche Gottes in ihrer Bedeutung für die Gegenwart [The Bible Doctrine of the Kingdom of God in its importance for the present time], Basel, 1859).—Lastly, in our section there is this fact also to be particularly noticed, that the Apostle compares himself in his ministry to a father and a mother: the latter in the first half, the former in the second. The parental relation, that most original of all human relations (being preceded only by the conjugal), that image of God's relation to men, is itself again the natural, God-given pattern for all other relations of superior and inferior, and so especially also for preachers and pastors. A servant of Christ has in his own house a constant school for his office. What he feels and does for his own children, the same he should feel and do for his Church. Yet, not merely the earnestness of paternal love, but the tenderness and self-sacrifice likewise of the maternal, is in the Apostle. He speaks of the parental relation, not by way of making it the foundation of just claims, but with an eye to its obligations and performances.

4. (V. 2.) It is worthy of remark that in v. 2 Paul does not say: we were bold in Christ, to speak unto you the gospel of Christ, but: in God, of God; and so throughout the entire section (see vv. 4, 8, 9, 12, 13). To obviate the objections of the Gentiles and Jews, he purposely reverts to the ultimate ground, still common more or less to them and Christians. Against Jesus Christ, that historical Person, they might bring forward the same exceptions as against the Apostle himself; but God is His own immediate witness in the consciences of all men. And this Divine witness of conscience was, and is, on the side of the gospel of Jesus Christ (2 Cor. iv. 2; v. 11). To this we too, in contending with the adversaries, must always again revert. We must connect Christ with God, Christianity with religion, that is, with the religious and moral nature of man in general, the positive and historical with the ideal (comp. John vii. 17).

5. (V. 5.) Twice in our short section does Paul call God to witness, vv. 5, 10, as he does in like manner also elsewhere, Rom. i. 9; Phil. i. 8; 2 Cor. i. 23; comp. xi. 31; Rom. ix. 1; 1 Tim. ii. 7. A servant of God may often find himself in the same position, especially when meeting assaults, and where the question is about dispositions and prayers. A parallel to this is presented by the Verily, I say unto you, which is found so frequently in the mouth of the Lord, in the Synoptists with a single, in John with a double, amen. It was necessary for Him, in opposition to the unbelief or dulness of His hearers, to corroborate the often very paradoxical truth which he had to advance. Such assertions and protestations are approaches to the oath, to which some of them come quite close, particularly 2 Cor. i. 2, 3, and therefore contributions to the Scriptural view of the doctrine of the oath, and to the correct interpretation and application of Matt. v. 33-37; James v. 12.

6. (V. 9.) Paul insists strongly on the right of ministers to live of the gospel (1 Cor. ix. 7 sqq.; 1 Tim. v. 17, 18; Gal. vi. 6), and he himself also receives support from the Philippians and other churches (1 Cor. xi. 8 sq.; Phil. iv. 10 sqq.). But in Corinth (1 Cor. ix. 12; 2 Cor. xi. 7 sqq.) and Thessalonica and apparently in Ephesus also (Acts xx. 33-35) he accepted nothing during his work there, but provided for his own maintenance partly by manual labor (Acts xviii. 3; xx. 34), partly through the gifts of other Churches (2 Cor. xi. 9; Phil. iv. 16). He did this, that he might offer no hindrance to the gospel (1 Cor. ix. 12); at Corinth, in consideration of the false Apostles (2 Cor. xi. 12 sqq.); at Thessalonica, in consideration probably of the unbelievers, whose calumnies he foresaw, or was already even in some measure aware of. For that the Thessalonian Christians were poor, as CHRYSOSTOM and others suppose, there is nothing to indicate; indeed, according to Acts xvii. 4, there were at any rate not a few rich persons among them. At the same time the Apostle desired also in his own person to furnish an example of fidelity in a earthly calling, of strenuous labor, of devoted love (Acts xx. 35; 2 Thess. iii. 7 sqq.). We have now here before us one of the cases in which, as in so many outward things—for example, in regard to usages, the times and places of Divine service, &c.—it could not be but that changes, to wit, specific regulations, should gradually be forthcoming in the Church. Soon the clerical calling could no longer be united with a secular one. It had therefore to be furnished with a regular income, and this is in accordance with Paul's doctrine. If then, we neither can nor should directly imitate his practice herein; if indeed, speaking generally, the exemplariness of the Lord and His Apostles does not require from us a direct, outward imitation—this were really to turn the gospel again into law and letter (comp. ch. i. 6, 7, Doctrinal and Ethical, Note 5),—it is only the more important that we enter into the meaning and spirit of the Apostle, and act on this Apostolic view of the matter. Not to the Pope alone does his worldly dominion prove to be ruin; among us also earthly good has already become the curse and snare of many clergymen. This is one of the tenderest points in the relation between the shepherd and the flock, and by it is often insensibly closed the mouth of the shepherd and the heart of the sheep. There are certain portions of income, those that partake more of the nature of perquisites, which still fall immediately under the apostolic rule, not to burden those who would thereby be burdened, and rather to undergo privations, "lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ" (1 Cor. ix. 12). It deserves also to be noticed that the Apostle (1 Cor. ix. 14) says, that the Lord hath ordained that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel, should have wherewithal to live, and not more. With us, to be sure, and especially of late, care is commonly taken that we should not have it in our power to think of laying up treasures. The wish expressed by Schleiermacher in 1804, "that the relations of the preacher's position should be put more and more on such a footing, that it could present no external attraction to those who did not value it for its own sake," has already received a manifold fulfilment. Those, however, who have to struggle with want and privation, may seek and find a strong consolation in the fact, that they thus stand nearer to the apostolic model, than if they lived in abundance of everything. Comp. the flaming words of LUDWIG HOFACKER in his Life by A. KNAPP, 1852, p. 157 sq.: "Often enough have I been offended with a certain class of ministers. To lament over their poor pay is the" whole business, their main topic of conversation. Nowhere is there less of faith and contentment than among men of this sort. With them the earthly mind thoroughly predominates. In no class is there less of Divine understanding. In heaven we shall probably meet the smallest proportion of ministers; for it is well-nigh impossible that such an ease-loving, selfish minister should enter the kingdom of heaven. Is it not a real mercy that we are even kept a little short? How much money, then, must a preacher have on hand? Or how much must he have in furniture and pictures? On this absurdity I could descant for a day, and not exhaust the topic, dealing not with individual cases, but with the thing itself, nor yet out of illiberality of feeling, but from long observation. Ah, where is the imitation of Christ's life of poverty? No doubt, there are many who suffer, but why? because they fancy that a son is not saved, unless he gets to be a gentleman at the University. The true sufferers are they who are silent and endure, looking up to God."

[M. HENRY: There is no general rule to be drawn from this instance; either that ministers may at no time work with their hands for supply of their outward necessities, or that they ought always to do so.—J. L.]

7. (V. 11.) Paul emphasizes the fact that he had exhorted every single individual. Comp. Acts xx. 31, and especially the thrice repeated ἑκάστην ἑνὸς of Col. i. 28. Here, as in Rom. v. 12, 15, 18 sq.; 1 Tim. ii. 4 sqq., the emphasis is on ἑκάστην, since Paul is speaking of the spread of the Gospel among the Gentiles, of the removal of the distinction between Jews and Gentiles, of Jesus belonging as man to all mankind, and of every individual simply as a man having an interest in Him. This is that idea of humanity, of the infinite value of each individual human soul before God, which first came to light in the New Covenant, in Christianity, and of which the Gentile Apostle was pre-eminently the bearer. In ancient times, to which the Old Covenant still essentially belongs, mankind was as yet given up as fleshly to the forces of nature, and therefore also to national divisions. The opposition of Ἰσραὴλ and ἔθνη, λαός and ἔθνη stood in force, as that of Greeks and Barbarians; for God in His revelation condescended to the στραχία τοῦ κόσμου. Not yet was the individual of any consequence in himself as a man; he came into view merely as a member of the larger natural whole, the people. A relative advance in this respect is certainly not to be mistaken within the sphere of the old world, when, for example, we think in the Old Testament of the Psalms, in Greece of the schools of philosophy, in Rome of the domestic life of a Cato and others. But even the Psalmist, who knows that in covenant with his God he is strong and secure against all the world, is ever an Israelite; the Grecian sage is always a Hellene; and so forth. First on the cross of Christ was the flesh and the whole power of nature broken in pieces; first in Christ was the one new man created, so that now there is no longer a question of Jew, Greek, Barbarian, Scythian (Eph. ii. 15; Col. iii. 11); there was born the idea at once of humanity and of man; universalism, and along with that the true subjectivity and individualism, for every one singly to lay hold in faith freely from within on the salvation of God, and so attain to the fulness of human dignity (as was already represented in the call of Abraham, Rom. iv.; Gal. iii.). Not only did Paul recognize and preach this great truth; he likewise at the same time made practical application of it, on the universal side in his Gentile mission, on the other in his special care of souls. The nationalists, therefore, have lost, not their significance, but merely the sting of mutual antipathy, so far as their members are in Christ; in the future kingdom of Christ the curse, the covering, will be removed from the nations as such, as from individuals at present, so that the whole life of history shall be a regenerate life, a life from the dead (Rom. xi. 15: comp. Is. xxv. 7, 8).

8. (V. 12.) Glory (δόξα, קְבוֹרָה); for this Luther has also sometimes Klarheit [clearness, lustre], as for δοξάζειν verklairen [to illustrate]) is a radical term used in Scripture of God, which in theosophy has met with more consideration than in theology. It is the real, organic side in the conception of spirit, whereby the Absolute Personality is not a mere abstract Ego, but the Absolute Life, unfolding and shaping itself in a fulness (πληρωμα) of powers. What in earthly phrase has been called nature or the corporeity of God finds in the word glory—with which stand connected the expressions majesty, beauty, light, &c., when used of God—its Scriptural foundation and limitation. In glory is found the reason why the whole man, even as to his body, is called the image of God. By means of glory also is brought about, agreeably to its idea, the appearance or revelation of God. Christ's glorification consists essentially in this, that His human nature is raised into the condition of this Divine glory. He makes a real, inward communication of it to His own (unio mystica, the sacraments), so that they become partakers of the Divine nature (2 Pet. i. 4; John xiv. 23; xvii. 5, 22, 24), till in the resurrection they are manifested in this glory, even as to their body (Col. iii. 8, 4). BENIGL (on Acts vii. 2) calls glory divinitas conspicua; OETINGER, the unveiled holiness,—the great word that sums up the whole New Testament: J. T. BECK, christliche Lehrwissenschaft, p. 67, the self-manifestation of the living image of God, which has for man a hidden side, but also one visible in rich forms and degrees, and for special revelations assumes special local shapes.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vv. 1-12.—This section and its several parts are especially appropriate for texts of inaugural and ordination sermons, and such like; happy he, who can take from it also his farewell text! The principal thought of the two main divisions, vv. 1-9 and 10-12, are embraced in the Doctrinal and Ethical department, No. 2, and there already arranged also with reference to the Homiletic use.—J. MICHAEL HARR: Our Epistle was written to such as had been awakened for about half a year; it is thus rather for such as are weaker and for beginners. For this reason Paul strengthens and animates the Thessalonians by very circumstantial arguments from his own behavior, and that of Silas, among them; considering that with inexperienced souls one must deal more largely in details, than with those who are more spiritually developed.—THE SAME: That is it which in our days makes faith so difficult: sinful men dare to call in question the word of God, and to correct it, saying quite plainly that to a great extent it is just the word of man. This mischievous cavilling may in dark hours of temptation rack with doubts even the lovers of truth, and frequently, if they have thoughtful souls, they undergo no light struggle. But these doubts are by the lover of truth overcome, and tend to the strengthening and confirmation of faith; for as all things must work together for good to those who love God and truth, so likewise this, since it too belongs to the "all."—DIELRICH: For the Christian it is important frequently to review his previous guidance in Christ, that he may become ever more conscious of the work of the Lord, and also feel himself bound in hearty affection to those, through whom the Lord has come to us. To the calumniators of the Apostle we owe thanks to this day, for having been to him the occasion for such an exact self-portraiture. The enemies of the truth know not at all, what good service they often render to it.

Vv. 1, 2. J. MICH. HAHN: The great boldness after the contumelious suffering is a sound, valid proof of the truth of God's word, and of faith's real ground. How should human nature be able to act and suffer thus aimlessly? Its wont truly is, to seek and intend self in everything.—THE SAME: The Lord's true messengers are for the most part prepared in the school of suffering, and not in the society of trifling, young people, who in their frivolity often do not know what to go at. If one or another from that quarter is to prosper, he too is called out of the confusion into the school of the cross, like all the rest.—THE SAME: While the Spirit of glory rested on us (1 Pet. iv. 14), we had spiritual boldness, joy in God and with God, incomparable heart-joy; for the life of the spirit was so predominant, that we regarded nothing in nature.—RIEGER: Suffering does not weaken faith, and so it does not even abate boldness in opening the mouth. Suffering, indeed, undergone lovingly and willingly, assures a man that he is renewed into the image of Christ, and is treading in the footsteps wherein have walked all the lovers of truth, who in the world have been reviled. Suffering makes good salt; avoidance of the cross makes the salt insipid.—THE SAME: When we hear of the boldness of the Apostles, we often suppose that all fear had been blown away. But the Apostles themselves commonly put the two things together; on the one side, what through grace obtained the victory, namely boldness, and, on the other side, those assaults from nature and from the aspect of the world, through which they had to fight their way with great contention.—ZWINGLI: The preaching of the gospel does not go forward without a struggle, and indeed many struggles; for Christ is the sign that is spoken against.

[BURKITT: The Apostle calls his boldness a boldness in God, because a boldness for God and from God.—ALFORD: All true confidence is in God as our God.—M. HENRY: Suffering in a good cause should rather sharpen than blunt the edge of holy resolution.—J. L.]

Vv. 3, 4. RIEGER: It is still at present an easy thing for the world, when the gospel is propounded, to give it sometimes the appearance of error, superstition, peculiar notions; and in other cases, where some concession must be made to any one, to impute to him impure aims and self-seeking.—THE SAME: In preaching the gospel, much depends on the heart and its purity tried and approved by God; only in a good conscience can the mystery of the faith be put. Not merely in the beginning and on our first reception into His service does God prove our heart, but daily and hourly.—CALVIN: To please

God and to please men are brought together by Paul as things mutually opposed.—RIEGER: In striving to please, not men, but God, the gate is strait, and the way narrow. One should, of course, commend himself to the consciences of men—should so deal with them, that, without his pleasing them after the flesh, they shall yet think favorably of him, and not in distrust turn away their heart and ear—should show to every man all gentleness, condescension, and readiness to oblige, and yet so keep himself apart in the spirit of the cross, as to be intent on pleasing, not men, but God (1 Cor. x. 33).—DIEDRICH: We may well trust those, who, in their transactions with us, desire in everything only to please God; God certainly desires what is best for us. Such as would merely please us will at the least, and without their knowing it, be unfaithful to us.—RIEGER: Precious operation of the Spirit of glory, who rests on the sufferers, and, in their deepest submersion in the baptism of sorrow, instructs them still to keep their head up, and to say to their God: For he knoweth the secrets of the heart (Pa. xlv. 22).*

Vv. 5-7. RIEGER: We cannot do too much for the sake of winning men's souls; and, if the world calls that flattery, we are to regard it as little as Jesus left off eating and drinking with publicans and sinners on account of the Pharisees. When, indeed, one's aim with men is to steal some advantage for one's self or one's friends, and lull others to sleep to their own soul's hurt, in that case there may be danger of indulging in words of flattery: and therefore the Apostle immediately disclaims covetousness also.—CALVIN: Where avarice and ambition rule, there follow innumerable corruptions, and the whole man sinks into vanity; for these are the two fountains, whence flows the corruption of the entire ministry.—CHRYSOSTOM: Paul says not: We were dishonored, nor yet: We received no honor;—that were to have reproached the Thessalonians;—but: We sought it not. [ECUMENICUS extends the emphasis to ἐξ ἀνδράνων: "for the glory that is from God they both sought and received: τὴν γὰρ ἐκ θεοῦ καὶ ἐξ ἀνθρώπων καὶ ἐλάβανον.—J. L.]
J. M. HAHN: Although as ambassadors of the sovereign Lord of the whole creation we might have used authority, yet we did not seek to extort from you any such regard as that you should look upon us with fear and awe. This is the way nowadays of those who presume on their office. But what credit have they with the people, and what hearts trust them? That is the very reason why they are universally abandoned. Not so the Lord's ambassadors!—RIEGER: Therein consists a great secret of the kingdom of Christ, that by means of love, whereby the greatest becomes as the servant of all, He effects more, maintains a more fruitful order, than is achieved in any worldly empire by ever so rigorous a distinction of ranks.—THE SAME: Christians, it is true, are not an abject people; they deal in large aims and hopes. They do not, however, seek honor from men, nor in the present time, but take it on credit against the resurrection of the just.

[BURKITT: Flattery in any is odious, in a minister 'tis monstrous, both because spiritual men ought to be most plain-hearted, and also because flattery about spiritual things is most fatal and pernicious, both to the giver and receivers.—A. CLARKE: They that preach the gospel should live (not riot) by the gospel. But woe to that man who entered into the labor for the sake of the hire; he knows not Christ and how can he preach Him?—J. L.]

Vv. 7-9. The Apostle's motherly love to those committed to his care, as shown 1. in the most intimate heart-communications to them, 2. in tender affability, 3. in indefatigable self-sacrifice.—The connection of official fidelity with personal love.—New-born children often cry a great deal, get sick easily, give also every kind of annoyance, and need much care, and only a mother's love and a mother's patience can bear with them (BÜCHSEL: Erinnerungen aus dem Leben eines Landgeistlichen, Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, 1859).—Roos: Dost thou from hearty love undergo day and night toil and trouble, which no man imposes on thee, or repays?—CALVIN: Paul's unwillingness to have his wants supplied was in order that he might not hinder the gospel. For good pastors must be careful, not merely to run strenuously in their ministry, but of this also, that, so far as is in their power, they remove all obstacles from their course.—RIEGER: Ministers of the gospel never want occasion to practise many an economy in housekeeping, in the education of children, in clothes and comforts; whereby in some cases one has rather wherewithal to give to the needy, and in other cases our income suffices, nor is there any need to trouble ourselves and others with so many complaints, or with so much striving after changes. And again, there is always reason why we should not set so high a value on what we are compelled to add from our own means, but reflect whether it is quite as much, as when Paul along with his preaching labored as a handicraftsman.—Paul made no claims on this life—desired not to have things easy in the present world; and therefore also the world could do him no harm.—J. G. KOEB: He who has the Spirit of Christ is faithful also in his earthly calling. That is, he is not too lazy to apply his powers in that direction; and neither does he do too much, so as to waste his strength in vanity. He gives his time to securing the heavenly calling in the midst of the earthly one. Such a man is then so much more effective in the kingdom of God.

[V. 10. WEBSTER and WILKINSON: Only believers can rightly estimate holiness and righteousness; and it betokens high attainments in religion to be considered, and to be, an example of holiness and righteousness to them.—J. L.]

Vv. 10-12. RIEGER: He who in Divine things seeks not his own, but serves the will of God, acts holily; he who does no wrong to his neighbor in anything, but shows him all love, acts righteously; and he who, moreover, in his behavior, speech and entire conduct, puts it in no man's power to charge him with an offensive contrast between his teaching and his life, acts unblamably. A father has and exerts an authority, but it is that of love, not of law.—SPENER says in one of his farewell discourses: I cannot say that I am pure from the blood of all men; for I cannot say that I have not ceased to warn every one.—Paul a model, not merely in preaching, but also in the care of souls, and in the union of the two. The great Apostle, who filled the whole world with the sound of the gospel, at the same time went after individual souls with all zeal. The different ways in which salvation must be brought near to different men, and even to the same men at different times. We must learn to vary our voice.—[M. HENRY: We should not only be good as to our general calling as Christians, but in our particular callings and relations.—J. L.]

[V. 12. BP. DAVENANT, on Col. i. 10: By this form of speaking we are admonished, that Christianity consists in a perpetual journey towards the celestial country, and that no one must halt by the way.—WEBSTER and WILKINSON: The kingdom is glorious, and the glory kingly.—J. L.]

CH. II. 13-16.

3. b. The Apostle now on his part also reminds the Thessalonians, with thanksgiving to God, that they had received his word as the word of God, as they have since continually experienced in themselves God's mighty working (v. 13). They could not otherwise have endured such vexations from their countrymen, as the brethren in Judea had from the Jews (v. 14), whose enmity to the truth and the Apostles, moreover, need give the less offence, that they are thereby rather only filling the measure of their sins, and ripening rapidly for judgment (vv. 15, 16).

- 13 For this cause¹ also thank we [we also give thanks to]² God without ceasing, because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us [received from us the word of preaching that is of God],³ ye received it not as the word of men, but, as it is in truth, the word of God [ye accepted, not men's word, but, as it is in truth, God's word],⁴ which effectually worketh also [also work-14 eth]⁵ in you that believe. For ye, brethren, became followers [imitators, μιμηταί] of the churches of God which in Judea are [which are in Judea, τῶν οἰσῶν ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ] in Christ Jesus; for ye also have suffered [suffered, ἐπάθετε] like things [the same things, τὰ αὐτά]⁶ of your own countrymen, even as they have of the 15 Jews; who both killed the Lord [also killed the Lord]⁷ Jesus and their own prophets,⁸ and have persecuted [and persecuted, ἐδιωξάντων] us,⁹ and they please
16 not God, and are contrary to all men, forbidding us to speak [hindering us from speaking, κωλύόντων . . . λαλῆσαι] to the Gentiles, that they might [may] be saved, to fill up their sins always: for [but, $\delta\epsilon$] the wrath ¹⁰ is come [came] upon them to the uttermost [to the end, $\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ τέλος].

² V. 13.— $\kappa\alpha\iota$ $\eta\mu\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ $\epsilon\chi\alpha\rho\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon\mu\epsilon\nu$. The $\kappa\alpha\iota$ belongs, as usual, to what immediately follows it.—E. V. renders $\epsilon\chi\alpha\rho\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon\mu\epsilon\nu$ by to give thanks in ch. i. 2; v. 18; 2 Thess. ii. 13, and 23 times elsewhere out of 34.—J. L.]

⁶ V. 14.—[So Sin. B. D. E. F. &c., and the critical editors, instead of ταῦτά (Roc. after A. &c.).—J. L.]

⁹ V. 15.—[Or, as in the English margin: chased us out, ἡμᾶς ἐκδιωξάντων. Auberlen: uns vertrieben haben; Eliott, Alford: drove us out. Am. Bible Union: drove us forth; &c.—J. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. (V. 13.) For this cause we also give thanks— $\Delta\iota\alpha$ τοῦτο: Because it is God who calls you to His kingdom, therefore we thank Him that ye received our word, not as man's word, but God's.*— $\kappa\alpha\iota$ $\eta\mu\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ stands opposed to $\alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\iota$ γὰρ οἶδατε (v. i.)† and means Paul and his attendants, who now, in further explanation of ch. i. 6 and πῶς ἐπεστρέψατε of ch. i. 9 sq., remind the Thessalonians of their lively reception of the word of God, just as the Thessalonians were appealed to, vv. 1-12, as witnesses of the pure and powerful ministry of the Apostle among them; see on chap. i. 8, Exeg. Note 1. We have mutually received from one another the deepest impressions of an operation of the Divine Spirit: that is the third argument, adduced in ch. ii. 1-16, whereby Paul seeks to convince the Thessalonians of the reality of their faith. So deep an impression did he retain of the faith of the Thessalonians, with which they received his word as the word of God, that he has ever since felt himself moved to unceasing thanksgiving to God. If he speaks of the matter to God, and here repeatedly emphasizes this fact (comp. ch. i. 2), they may at once herein recognize a new indication, how little the question is about something merely human (comp. on $\delta\iota\alpha$ τοῦτο). So far τῷ θεῷ answers both to the previous τοῦ θεοῦ (v. 12) and to the subsequent λόγον θεοῦ. The discourse thus turns back here, at the end of the entire section, to the beginning (ch. i. 2. EWALD).

* [The same explanation of $\delta\iota\alpha$ τοῦτο is given by OLSEN, LÜNNEMANN, ALFORD. Others prefer a reference to "the general subjects of the preceding verses," the earnestness and seal of the Apostle and his associates" (ELIOTT; and similarly WEBSTER and WILKINSON). Less probable is VAUGHAN's reference to what follows.—J. L.]

† [Perhaps rather to $\eta\mu\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ of v. 10: Ye are our witnesses, and how we too are yours. Or as ZACHARIA: Not you alone ought to give thanks for this calling, but we also. And similarly ELIOTT. Either explanation is better than LÜNNEMANN's: We, as well as every true Christian that hears of your deportment; or ALFORD's reference to those expressly mentioned in ch. i. 7.—J. L.]

2. When ye received from us the word of preaching that is of God.— $\Pi\alpha\rho\alpha\lambda\alpha\beta\.,$ the objective, outward, matter-of-fact reception, in distinction from $\delta\epsilon\chi\epsilon\sigma\theta\alpha\iota$, the subjective, inward acceptance (comp. ch. i. 6).*—ἀκοή = $\pi\alpha\rho\alpha\lambda\alpha\beta\epsilon$, Is. liii. 1; Rom. x. 14-17 = pass. what one hears, a report, announcement, preaching, message. Λόγος ἀκοῆς (comp. Heb. iv. 2) is one of those genitive connections, which we in German are accustomed to express by a combination of nouns: Botschaftswort; EWALD: Pre-digtwort [as if we should say in English, message-word, preaching-word]. The addition of ἀκοῆς marks the audible, oral announcement, coming to men as a (new, hitherto unknown) message: comp. Rom. x. 17, where ἀκοή is distinguished from $\beta\eta\mu\alpha$ θεοῦ, the latter going forth from God to His messengers, the former from the messengers to the rest of men. The anarthrous λόγος ἀκοῆς should perhaps be translated a message, to indicate it as unknown, new; comp. λόγος κυρίου of ch. iv. 15 with δ λόγος τοῦ K. of ch. i. 8. With this message Paul appeared among the Thessalonians; he knew that it was from God; they could not yet of themselves know that. This he here represents to us in a measure by the purposely anomalous arrangement, παρ' ἡμῶν τοῦ θεοῦ: they received the word of the message immediately from him, but behind him stood God as the Author and Sender of the message. Παρ' ἡμῶν naturally depends on παραλαβ., to which also the preposition expressly points back (DE WETTE, KOCH [ELIOTT, WEBSTER and WILKINSON], &c.), [not on λόγος ἀκοῆς (BEZA, PELT, OLSEN, LÜNNEMANN, &c.), whereby the construction becomes very harsh and clumsy withal, since τοῦ θεοῦ would have to be a closer definition of the composite idea, λόγος ἀκοῆς παρ' ἡμῶν.—RIGGENBACH.]; τοῦ θεοῦ, on the other hand, depends on λόγος ἀκοῆς, and is a gen. auctorit., as in εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ θεοῦ of vv. 2, 8, 9, ὁ λόγος τοῦ κυρίου of ch. i. 8, (see there Note 4). It comes last with emphasis, the point in the subsequent context being that the preaching was the word, not merely of the man Paul, but of God. Thus the participial clause, παραλαβόντες—παρ' ἡμῶν τοῦ θεοῦ, takes in once more the contents of vv. 1-12; for there, from the beginning to the end (see especially vv. 2, 4, 12), it is shown that Paul had not labored among the Thessalonians in his own name or in an egotistic manner, but, as an agent of God, had brought them His message and call.

3. Ye accepted it, not as men's word, &c. [Ye accepted, not men's word, &c.].*—The Thessalonians, then, understood and acknowledged the real nature, the Divine character and origin, of the apostolic preaching. They perceived in the word such a supernatural, essential power, as can proceed from no mortal man, himself involved in the disorder of the world's sin. They felt the Godhead drawing near to them in the word of life; for the Holy Spirit was thereby active in their souls. And as the inward sense and instinct of the Divine light in the consciousness opened to, and allowed itself to be intimately pervaded by, the concurrent light in the word, mightily judging and irradiating their previous darkness (2 Cor. iv. 4-6; John iii. 19-21), they therefore accepted the preached word for what it is, as the word of God.—Ἐδέξασθε, comp. δεξιμένοι ch. i. 6—a text for general comparison. As immediate object, λόγον ἀκοῆς τοῦ θεοῦ must be supplied out of the participial clause; οὐ λόγον ἀνδρ. &c. is a second accusative of the predicate: to accept something as—WINER, p. 203 sq.—Λόγον ἀνδρ. in opposition to θεοῦ indicates the origin, and at the same time the quality, which necessarily passes over from the source to what springs therefrom (OLSHAUSEN). The plural ἀνδράπων stands with reference to the plurality of the preachers, and also indeed generically; comp. Matt. ix. 8. WINER, p. 188. Λόγον θεοῦ, the word which God Himself causes to be proclaimed by men, whom He by His Spirit equips as His instruments; comp. Rom. x. 17. RIEGER: An expression of God's heart concerning us.—Καθώς ἐστιν ἀληθές: a simple, forcible testimony to inspiration.

4. Who [which] also worketh in you that believe.—Οἱ can be referred either to λόγον (ECUMENIUS, OLSHAUSEN, LÜNEMANN, &c. [CONYBEARE, PEILE, JOWETT, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, WORDSWORTH, WEBSTER and WILKINSON, &c.]; comp. WINER, p. 231), and in favor of this it is alleged that elsewhere the active ἐνεργεῖν is used of God, and the middle ἐνεργεῖσθαι only of things (yet comp., for example, Col. i. 29; Eph. iii. 20)†; or to θεοῦ (THEODORET, LUTHER, BENIGL, &c.), and this is preferable, because the context treats, not of an energetic operation generally, but specially of a Divine operation; † BENIGL: Deus ostendens, verbum vero esse verbum Dei (ch. iv. 8, 9; Acts xiv. 3). On the former view the meaning must be: which also shows itself as such, &c. [comp. Acts xx. 32].—Καί adds to the acceptance of the word as God's word on the side of the Thessalonians the effective, and that a continuous, confirmation of it on the side of God (ἰδέεσθε, aorist; ἐνεργεῖται, present).* From that time onward you are in real communion with God, who shows Himself operative in you by the power of His heavenly Spirit, overruling everything human, as may be seen in the fact that even the strongest human ties cannot bind you, since you have suffered severely from your own relations and countrymen (v. 14). Τοῖς πιστεύουσιν: so far is faith from being some empty thing, that it is rather the organ for God's operations in us (comp. v. 10 and Exeg. Note 26; for the topics, Eph. i. 19).†

5. (V. 14.) For ye, brethren, became imitators, &c.—On γάρ, see Note 4. ὁμοίς resumes the immediately preceding ἐν ὁμῷ, v. 23, and stands with honorable distinction foremost. Μιμηταὶ ἐγενήθητε, as in ch. i. 6. There the Thessalonian believers are described as followers of the Apostle and of the Lord Himself; here, in terms of scarcely less honor and encouragement, as followers of the original Christian churches in Judea. The Apostle points out historically a fundamental law of the kingdom of God, that is now fulfilling itself in the case of the Thessalonians: The bearers of the Divine are always expelled by the natural community to which they belong (comp. Matt. x. 35-37). Thus the Thessalonian Christians by their associates of their own race, and the Jewish Christians by the Jews, who in like manner killed the Lord Jesus and the prophets, and now also have driven out the Apostle. So little need the Thessalonians allow themselves to be disconcerted by the injustice done them by their compatriots, that herein rather lies the evidence of the reality and power of the Divine influences present with them; for only that which is really Divine is hated by the world (comp. the forcible word of Jesus, John vii. 7; xv. 18 sq.), just as the strength to endure this enmity likewise rests on God's operation in believers. Ἐρράδετε denotes strictly nothing more than the actual experience (there has befallen you), but according to the connection it includes the inward endurance of what has happened. For in no other way can πάσχειν serve to establish the efficiency of the Divine word in them, and in no other way, especially, can the preterite ἐράδετε, which, being parallel to the ἰδέεσθε of v. 13, has primary reference to the time of their conversion, serve to confirm the present ἐνεργεῖται, than as implying that the Thessalonians have really encountered the enmity of their fellow-countrymen, and do not allow themselves to be thereby driven into apostasy. Taken together, vv. 13 and 14 thus answer pretty closely to the parallel statement in ch. i. 6; v. 13 to δεξιμένοι τὸν λόγον μετὰ χαρᾶς πνεύματος ἁγίου, v. 14 to ἐν δαίψει πολλῇ; comp. there Exeg. Note 14.

6. (V. 14.) Of the churches of God which are in Judea, &c.—Τοῦ θεοῦ answers to the threefold mention of God in v. 13; τὰν οὐρανῶν has been twice connected with it: in the first instance, ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ, it denotes the external, geographical sphere; in the other, ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, the inner, essential life-sphere, on which see ch. i. 1, Exeg. Note 3, and Doct. and Eth. 1. By the latter specification the Jewish-Christian congregations are distinguished

† [These two texts, in which the middle participle is connected, not with θεός, but with (the Divine) ἐνεργεῖα or δύναμις, cannot properly be regarded as exceptional.—J. L.]

‡ [It may quite as well be said, that in the context "the writer is magnifying the word, by way of justifying his continual thanksgiving to God for the Thessalonian reception of it" (Revised)—J. L.]

* [Καί is no less intelligible on the other view: "As it is God's word, so also, and in a manner that befits and proclaims its great Original, it worketh, &c. (Revision). ELLICOTT adds, that perhaps it suggests also "a contrast with the inoperative nature of the word, when merely heard and not believed."—J. L.]

from the Jewish, which also εἶναι δοκοῦσι congregations of God (ECUMENICS).—Τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν is also to be noted in this respect, that the Thessalonians were the first church out of Palestine that was persecuted as a church.

7. Countrymen.—Συμφυλ., those of the same tribe, exhibits the natural connection (Luther only too strongly: blood relations), and the epithet ἰδίων gives it additional force, in order the more clearly to show the gospel's penetrating, overcoming power as supernatural, Divine. By the συμφυλέται, therefore, as the contrast τῶν Ἰουδαίων shows, are meant chiefly [only] Gentiles (OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, LÜNEMANN, EWALD, [ALFORD, ELLICOTT, &c.] &c.), because the Thessalonian church was composed almost entirely of Gentile Christians (Acts xvii. 4). [Not Jews (CHRYSTOSTOM, &c.): CALVIN, BENGL, &c., think of Jews and Gentiles both.—RIGGENBACH.]—Αὐτοὶ are the members of the churches in Judea; constructio ad sensum.

8. (v. 15.) Who also, &c.—Kal is not perhaps to be connected with the kal following = as well—as also, since several kal follow one another in simple series: it rather adds to what precedes something new and correspondent: The Jews have not only persecuted the Christian churches in Judea, but also killed the Lord Jesus, &c. The subsequent strong expressions respecting the Jews are at first sight somewhat strange, indeed almost displeasing, especially because one does not well see, at least not at once, how the Apostle was led to them by the context. Looked at more closely, they fall apart into two divisions, the first consisting of past participles (ἐποκταίνοντων, ἐκδιώξαντων), the second of present (ἀρσενούντων with ἐναντίον, καλυόντων). Both divisions end in something that has reference to the Apostle: ἡμᾶς ἐκδιώξ., v. 15, καλυόντων ἡμᾶς, v. 16. Thus, the point in question is the relation of the Jews to the Apostle, on which comp. Acts xvii. 5. This seems also to have been used against the Apostle by the countrymen of the Thessalonians. They might say: "How can you still believe that stranger? His own people, in fact, have driven him out, and are utterly unwilling to have him draw you over to his side;"—an objection which might have the more weight for the Thessalonian Christians, because most of them had previously been proselytes (Acts xvii. 4), and so accustomed to seek and find the truth among the Jews. To this Paul now answers: "Yes, they have persecuted me, but no otherwise than they did the Lord Jesus and their own prophets; nor are they willing to endure it, that I should publish salvation to you, and the Gentiles generally; but in this they are merely contrary to God and men, and fill up the measure of their sins." Thus regarded, vv. 15 and 16 have a meaning and significance in where they stand, and thus also is set aside the offensive harshness that seems to lie in the words; it is set aside from the same point of view, which in the earlier sections removes the offence of self-praise or of the praise of the Thessalonians. But the treatment of this matter is attached to this particular context for the reason that it falls under the same law as the suffering of the Thessalonians from those of their own race (see Exeg. Note 5): Paul had the same experience from his countrymen, as they from theirs; and as they were preceded by the Jewish Christians, so he himself by the Lord and the prophets. With such predecessors, and with this uniformity of experience, the offence must surely cease. It is moreover evident that the example in v. 14 is there selected with an eye to the fact, that Paul means presently to speak of the Jews. And this point he has kept to the close of the entire section; for having fully re-established his own authority with his readers, he can the more powerfully subvert their earlier authority, the Jews. [While expositors generally deal with the difficulty, some of the expedients adopted by them in accounting for vv. 15 and 16 are very far-fetched. OLSHAUSEN: "Paul foresaw that the Judaizers, standing on the same level as the Jews, would damage him in this Church also, and therefore, by way of precaution, he here expressed himself on the points in regard to which he was usually blamed." But would any one attack the Jews beforehand, in order to resist a possible, later incursion of Judaizing Christians, to whom, besides, several things are here inapplicable, whilst their characteristic peculiarities, especially their legality, are wanting? VON HOFMANN, on the contrary, supposes that some desired to persuade the Thessalonians, that the gospel was purely a Jewish affair, and that it is in opposition to this notion that Paul here speaks. But one cannot understand how this objection could arise, since the Jews were certainly the first and most vehement adversaries of the gospel in Thessalonica; and then an attack on the Jews would still have been a very indirect and extravagant way of defending himself against that objection. DE WETTE contents himself altogether with the remark, that the Apostle seizes the opportunity to give vent to his displeasure with the Jews. LÜNEMANN is correct in finding the occasion of the philippic, vv. 15 and 16, in the fact, that in Thessalonica the Jews were the real instigators of the persecutions of the Christians, and that in other places likewise they manifested the same obdurate spirit of contradiction; but with this generality he stops, and so fails to account for the complexion of the entire passage, as well as its particular phrases, and overlooks the reference to Paul. CALVIN, who is followed by CALIXTUS, comes nearest the truth: Poterat Thessalonicensibus hoc venire in mentem: si hæc vera est religio, cur eam tam infestis animis oppugnant Judæi, qui sunt sacer Dei populus? Ut hoc offendiculum tollat, primum admonet, hoc eos commune habere cum primis ecclesiis, quæ in Judæa erant, postea Judæos dicit obstinatos esse Dei omnis sanæ doctrinæ hostes. The only mistake here is, that Calvin, whilst he too overlooks the special reference of vv. 15, 16 to Paul, and understands συμφυλ., v. 14, principally of the Jews, brings to bear on v. 14 the point of view, that is applicable to v. 15 sq.—RIGGENBACH.]

9. The Lord Jesus and their own prophets, &c.—Τὸν κύριον stands emphatically first, and is still more marked in being separated by ἐποκτείν. from Ἰησοῦν: Yea, the Lord Himself they killed (comp. 1 Cor. ii. 8); is it to be wondered at, if they persecute the servant (comp. John xv. 20)? What is expressed in the case of Ἰησοῦν by the prominent putting forward of τὸν κύριον is in the case of τοῦ προφήτου expressed by the addition of ἰδίων: their own prophets, ὧν καὶ τὰ τεύχη περιέρονται (CHRYSTOST.), they treated no better than they have done the Gentile Apostle. This internal evidence is favorable to the genuineness of ἰδίων; if regarded as spurious, this makes no change whatever in the thought; we lose merely that particular stroke. Τοὺς προφήτας might grammatically be connected, as Koch would have it, with what follows; but commentators correctly refer it to what goes before, both because in other places also mention is made of the Jewish murder of the prophets (Matt. xxiii. 31, 37; Luke xi. 47 sq.; xiii. 34; Acts vii. 52), and on account of ἐκδιωξάντων, of which presently.—When Paul now proceeds: καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐκδιωξάντων, we are by this time so well prepared for it, that it can no longer furnish an objection to him, but rather an argument for him and against the Jews. Ἐκδιώκειν is no doubt in the Sept. Pa. xlv. 17 [16]; cxix. 157 the strengthened διώκειν (DE WETTE, LÜNEM.); but the proper meaning of the word (see, for instance, Passow, who indeed gives no other meaning) is to pursue forth, chase out, expel, persequendo ejicere (BENGEL, who adds: frequens verbum apud LXX.), and so the word stands in the only other passage where it occurs in the New Testament, Luke xi. 49 (in the parallel passage, Matt. xxiii. 34, διώξετε ἀπὸ πόλεως εἰς πόλιν)—a point of so much the more importance, as Paul probably has here in his eye that expression of Christ. In this case we are (with J. MICHEL, HAHN, BAUR, &c.) to think simply of the expulsion of Paul and his companions from Thessalonica (see Acts xvii. 5, 13), the very thing at which many believers might stumble. [BENGEL, PELT, SCHOTT, LÜNEMANN, (ELLICOTT), think of the persecutions of Paul and the Apostles generally; but this extension of ἡμεῖς is against the context, see vv. 16 and 17, as well as v. 13; besides, the aorist participle leads us the more readily to think of a single act, since the Jewish persecutions of the Apostles in general still continued (see Acts xvii. 13; xviii. 6, 12), so that it must have been ἐκδιωκόντων as well as afterwards καλυόντων.—RIGGENBACH.]

10. And they please not God, &c.—The participles now pass from the aorist [ALFORD: definite events] into the present [ALFORD: habits] and, as τῶν καὶ τὸν κύριον—ἐκδιωξάντων hangs closely together, so again does all that follows as far as σωθῶσιν. For not to please God and to be contrary to all men are correlatives, and καλυόντων, &c. adds to it nothing new and independent, but, having no καὶ before it like all the previous participles, is to be subordinated to ἀρεσκ. and ἐναντίον [with LÜNEM., though he makes it depend only on ἐναντίον (and so ALFORD.—J. L.).—RIGGENBACH.], comp. v. 6 sq.; 11 sq. The subordinate clause shows to what extent the Jews displease God, and are contrary to all men; and thus at the same time these strong expressions lose much of their harshness.—Θεῷ μὴ ἀρεσκόντων: the Jews were jealous at Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 5), as they were elsewhere both before and afterwards (ch. xiii. 45; xviii. 6–13; comp. ch. xxii. 21 sq.; xxvi. 19 [21]), because through Paul so many Gentiles were converted, and this jealousy was with them a zeal for God and His kingdom in Israel (Rom. x. 2), whereby they thought to please Him (comp. John xvi. 2). In opposition to this Paul now says; they please not God. Thus the subjective negative μὴ does not imply placere non quærentium (BENGEL, &c.); but, on the contrary, it denies the ἀρέσκειν as conceived by the Jews and also by the Thessalonians (WINER, p. 428 sq.)* Ubi dicit non placere Deo, hoc vult, indignos esse, quorum ratio inter Dei cultores habeatur (CALVIN). The very softness of the expression has a peculiar force.—Πᾶσιν ἑνθρ. ἐναντίον: as contrary to God, so contrary to men; but the former passively = objects of the Divine displeasure, the latter actively = hostile to all men. πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις, of course, excepting themselves, and so, as to the sense, = τοῖς ἔθνεσιν in the explanatory clause. But Paul purposely holds up to view the inhumanity of this state of mind. When heathen writers, as interpreters are here in the habit of reminding us, reproach the Jews with adversus omnes alios hostile odium (Tac. Hist. V. 5; Juv. Sat. xiv. 103 sq.; Jos. c. Ap. ii. 10–14, etc.), they do not at any rate properly distinguish in this thing the Divinely sanctioned particularism of Israel, and the proud, narrow-minded exclusivism of the Jews. Paul, of course, blames only the latter, which would not acknowledge that God Himself had now abolished the former.

11. (V. 16.) Hindering us, &c.—Καλυόντων, see Exeg. Note 10. Λαλῆσαι ἵνα σωθῶσιν, either: to preach to the Gentiles, in order that they may be saved, (BENGEL, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE; thus taking λαλ. as a meiōsis or tapeinosis for εὐαγγελί(σ)σαι); or ἵνα is weakened, as in the New Testament it so often is, and marks the object (WINER, p. 299 sqq.) = λαλῆσαι περὶ τῆς σωτηρίας, λαλῆσαι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον V. 2 (LÜNEMANN, [ELLICOTT, WEBSTER and WILKINSON], &c.). The latter method is the more simple.

12. To fill up their sins always.—Εἰς τό, &c., belongs, not merely to καλυόντων, but to the whole description from v. 15. The result is here presented as an unconscious purpose, just as we say: to fill up the measure (DE WETTE). [εἰς, then, is not = ὥστε, of the result as such (PELT, &c.); but neither does it mark God's purpose in the sins of the Jews (OLSHAUSEN, LÜNEMANN)*: the expression belongs not so much to the Pauline style of thought, as to ordinary speech.—RIGGENBACH]:—αὐτῶν stands emphatically before τὰς ἀμαρτίαις: their sins, while they are persecuting others, God's messengers, as sinners.—Ἀνατλήσασθαι, comp. Matt. xxiii. 32, καὶ ὑμεῖς πληρώσατε τὸ μέτρον τῶν πατέρων ὑμῶν [also Gen. xv. 16]. The compound ἀνατλήρ. means to fill up, to fill again higher, so that, as it were, the still empty space in the vessel becomes ever smaller. We thus get a simple explanation of πάντοτε (which is thought to be difficult by DE WETTE, and strange by OLSHAUSEN, who, with BRETSCHNEIDER, would take it as = πάντως, παντελῶς). The subsequent clause likewise with its εἰς τέλος, will in this connection obtain its natural interpretation. Πάντοτε means always, at every time, by the persecution of the prophets, of the Lord, of the Apostle, the sins were always again filled up, filled higher, till now the measure is full.

18. But the wrath came upon them to the end.—Δέ opposes to the sin its punishment, and to the ever fresh increase the end. Parallel to the heaping up of the sin went the heaping up of the judicial wrath of God (Rom. ii. 5), which now, however, is come to the end, to the uttermost, where it must discharge itself (LÜNEMANN). On ἡ ὀργή [JOWETT: either the long-expected wrath, or the wrath consequent upon their sins.—J. L.] see ch. i. 10, Exeg. Note 14. Εἰς τέλος is to be connected with ἐξθᾶσθαι, which means simply pervenit (Vulgate, CALVIN, DE WETTE, LÜNEMANN, &c.), not provenit (BEZA, SCHOTT, PELT, &c.), since in the New Testament, with the exception of 1 Thess. iv. 15, φθάνειν occurs only in the later, weakened sense of reaching to, with eis (Rom. ix. 31; Phil. iii. 16), εἰς τινα (Matt. xii. 28; Luke xi. 20; comp. Dan. iv. 25), ἔρχομαι τινός (2 Cor. x. 14). Here it is connected with two prepositions of the direction, one of which (eis τέλος) indicates the inward development to the end; the other (ἐκ αὐτοῦ), the outward movement. [At this many interpreters needlessly stumble, and have either taken eis τέλος adverbially (= finally or totally), or have thought it necessary to refer it to ἡ ὀργή: the wrath which lasts to the end of the world, or for ever (THEODORET, THEOPHYLACT, EUCYMENIUS, &c.), or till its full manifestation (OLSHAEUSES),* or to the destruction of the Jews (GROTIUS, PELT, FLATT, &c.). The last view is shared also by DE WETTE, EWALD, &c., who connect eis τέλος with ἐφθάρη in the sense of 2 Chron. xxxi. 1; Dan. ix. 27,—to utter ruin, to complete extinction. —RIGGENBACH.]—Paul knows that the Jews, having likewise rejected the Messiah and the spiritual witness of his Apostles, are now ripe for judgment, which accordingly followed soon after in the Roman destruction of Jerusalem. He neither appeals to any revelation that he had received on this subject, nor does he merely draw inferences from the political situation of the Jews [JOWETT: "To the Apostle, reading the future in the present, the state of Judea at any time during the last thirty years before the destruction of the city, would have been sufficient to justify the expression, 'wrath is come upon them to the uttermost.'"—J. L.], but in the light of prophecy of the Old Testament and of the Lord Himself (EWALD mentions Matt. xxiii. 37-39; xxiv. 16 sqq.; Dan. ix. 24 sqq.) he discerns with clear spiritual glance the interpretation of the signs of the time. With this earnest word on the near imminence of the Divine judgment on the principal adversaries of the gospel the section closes, and so again in a measure with an eschatological prospect (comp. ch. i. 10; ii. 12). While the Jews fall under wrath, Christians are saved from wrath (ch. i. 10), and called to God's kingdom and glory (ch. ii. 12).

* [ELLICOTT: "It is not correct always to find in the μὴ (as ALFORD here) a reference to the feelings or views of the subject connected with the participle (compare on Gal. iv. 8). It sometimes refers to the aspect in which the facts are presented by the writer, and regarded by the reader." In this correction ALFORD now acquiesces.—J. L.]

* [ALFORD and ELLICOTT also agree in thinking this the main reference of εἰς τό, considered not grammatically, but theologically. JOWETT: the object and the result blended together in one; the natural event, as the Apostle regards it, in the order of Providence.—J. L.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. (V. 13.) It may seem strange that Paul should thank God for something that the Thessalonians had done (ἰδέσασθε). We are not to infer from this, that their acceptance of the word, or their faith, is thought of as an operation of God to the exclusion of man's free receptivity. Had Paul meant to say this, he must have expressed himself otherwise, as thus: We thank God that He wrought the acceptance, or faith, in you. But the indication in ἰδέσασθε of free receptivity is the more marked, as it is only afterward that the operation of God in them is named in confirmation of the Divine character of the freely accepted word (ὅς καὶ ἐνεργεῖται ἐν ὑμῖν τοῖς πιστεύουσιν).† Nevertheless, Paul can and must thank God for the faith of the Thessalonians, partly because it would not have existed but for

His preparative grace, and the accompanying influence of His Spirit, whereby the Thessalonians were convinced that Paul's word was God's word, and thus faith is no independent act of man (Olshausen), but really rests on a Divine causality; partly because for every good thing that happens to the Christian, and makes him glad—and the faith of the Thessalonians was for Paul something in the highest degree exhilarating (vv. 19, 20)—he gives thanks and honor to the Father of lights, under whose providential guidance and control stand even the free actions of men (Lünemann). Comp. ch. i. 6, and its Exegetical Note 14, and Doctrinal Principles, No. 3.

2. Paul calls his word God's word. To what extent he knew himself to be justified in doing so has been shown already, especially in vv. 2, 4 and ch. i. 5. God Himself, by a miraculous call and the light of revelation had entrusted him with the proclamation of His glad tidings to the world (comp. Gal. i. 11-16; 1 Cor. ii. 6-16; Col. i. 25-29; Eph. iii. 1-12), and now in Thessalonica, as in Corinth and elsewhere (1 Cor. ii. 4, 5; Rom. xv. 18, 19), he has preached the gospel in the energy of the Holy Ghost. There are thus two essential points in the case: 1. The apostolic call and illumination (inspiration), which, effected by special acts of God, concerns the whole man, and assigns to him an official mission, a fundamental position and significance in the kingdom of God (comp. Eph. ii. 20); 2. the separate acts of proclamation, performed on the ground of that general inspiration, and yet again in every particular instance, "in power and in the Holy Ghost and in much assurance," or "in demonstration of the spirit and in power." Now what is true of the oral proclamation of Apostles holds good of the written. "For the relation between word and writing is ordinarily this, that the writing compresses the copiousness of the spoken word into a settled elementary form—the final expression, made clear and strong by deliberate reflection, of the inspired thought—and so in Holy Scripture we have the ripe, developed fruit of inspiration" (MARTENSEN, Dogmatik, 2d ed., p. 455). We are therefore at liberty, and are bound, to call also the written word of Apostles (and Prophets) the word of God. And down through all centuries the Church has borne to it in the power of the Spirit the same witness, that the Thessalonians did to Paul's oral proclamation; she has freely recognized and accepted it as God's word. The testimonium Spiritus Sancti continually asserts itself as the subjective correlative and living evidence of inspiratio.—But now, as regards the uninterrupted oral proclamation of the word of God in the preaching of the Church, on that point Paul says in the Pastoral Epistles, which may be regarded as his legacy to the Church in its gradual transition from the first age of the Apostles into the common course of history: "Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me," and: "The thing that thou hast heard of me, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (2 Tim. i. 13; ii. 2). He will thus have the Church's doctrine and preaching expressly bound to the fundamental apostolic word, and, though here too the reference is to what is spoken and heard, yet we properly may and ought once more to think of the written word, which, indeed, is the only authentic tradition of the oral for later generations (1 John ii. 7, 24; i. 3, 4; 2 Pet. i. 13-16). Essentially, therefore, the Church's doctrine and preaching is a

* [LÜNEMANN: "even to its—the wrath's—end, that is, the wrath of God has come upon them to its extreme limit, so that it must now discharge itself; now must judgment take the place of the previous long-suffering and patience." To the same effect ALFORD and ELLICOTT. See the note in Revision.—J. L.]

propagation, reproduction, an ever new appropriation of the apostolic word. But as the preaching Apostles would not have fulfilled their task by a mere dry communication of God's revelations, but for every announcement they had to be freshly endued with the Spirit from on high, that the gospel might be brought powerfully to bear on the heart and conscience of the hearers according to their general and special needs, as, for example, on the Jews otherwise than on the Gentiles, so likewise for our preaching the objective agreement with apostolic, orthodox doctrine does not suffice, but there must always be a subjective fullness, and that in conjunction with the Holy Spirit. It is not the preaching, but the preacher, that preaches (comp. ch. i. 5, and its Exegetical Note 12, and Doctrinal Principles, No. 4). This, in fact, is precisely what is proposed in the oral word, to bring near to men in a human way the objective gift of God—to convey it to them with a spiritual, personal vivacity. The preacher is not a mere messenger, who may have no interest in the intelligence he has to bring; he is a witness, guaranteeing what he says by all that he is (John xv. 27; Luke xxiv. 48; Acts i. 8, 22; 1 John i. 2). And, accordingly, he too can and should testify to his hearers the one apostolic truth in the freedom of the spirit, ever according to their needs, in this or that form, from this side or from that. The more these two elements mutually interpenetrate, the objective agreement with the apostolic doctrine and the subjective, spiritual fullness of the individual, so much the more may even the preaching of the Church be called the word of God. At the same time we here perceive that the Divine does not in its revelation and communication exclude or suppress the human, but assimilates it, fills it with itself, and so consecrates it for its own organ. [When our Confessions teach: "Sacramenta et verbum propter ordinationem et mandatum Christi sunt efficacia, etiamsi per malos exhibeantur" (Conf. Aug. 8; comp. Heb. i.), this contains a truth, no doubt; and yet there is here a somewhat hasty making of a virtue out of necessity, and especially the difference between the word and sacrament, in relation to the personality of the minister, is not duly considered. Comp. 1 Cor. i. 14–17—RIGGENBACH.] Thus, in the connection of our passage with earlier statements in the Epistle, and in its harmony with expressions of the Apostle elsewhere, it furnishes essential features to the doctrine of the verbum divinum, both as written and as preached.

3. (Vv. 13–16.) At that time there had arisen even among the heathen a searching after truth. The great world-empires had along with the populations shaken also the gods and the religions. Light and happiness were sought in schools of philosophy, in the renewal of the mysteries, from the Goëtes, &c. There had ensued, as in our day, a dissolution of the spiritual life—a confused, conflicting throng of all possible standpoints and attempts at deliverance. The point then was, to discriminate between man's word and God's. For this end the conscience is of service (2 Cor. iv. 2; v. 11), which is given to us as a compass on the swelling sea of life. When it is aroused, a separation is made between what is Divine and what is human. At this time many, at Thessalonica also, had already attached themselves as proselytes to the Jews, because even in the preparatory revelations of God they found the best satisfaction of their needs of conscience. Such were in a peculiar degree prepared, inwardly and outwardly, to accept the Gospel as the word of God. They were so more than the Jews, because the latter generally held the law and the prophets in the way merely of outward tradition, whereas the former consented thereto with heart and life. Thus frequently upright men, belonging as to their external position to the world, are nearer to the kingdom of God than others, who have perhaps from their youth up been associated with the pious. In like manner churches, which assume to be those in which alone salvation is to be had, or which boast of their orthodoxy, are not exactly those which bring forth the most children to the Lord, because the Spirit departs in a measure proportioned to the reliance placed, as by the Jews, on institutions, the form of doctrine, &c. (Rom. ii. 17 sqq.)

4. (Vv. 14–16.) We can here almost perceive the growth in Paul of his leading view of the position of Gentile Christians in relation to Jewish Christians and Jews. The latter are the proper enemies of the gospel, not only amongst those of their own nation, but also in the Gentile world; for this reason he sees the judgment now breaking in on them. On the other hand, he recognizes in the Gentile Christians the followers of the Jewish Christians, of the true congregation of God in Israel. They belong—this thought here presents itself as a matter of course—to the genuine seed of Abraham, and take the place of the excised branches (Rom. iv. and xi.). The condition for this is simply faith, on which such special stress is laid in v. 13; through faith a man quits his natural connections, and enters the circle of the Divine operation in the world (the connection of vv. 13 and 14). To the Jews were entrusted the λόγια τοῦ Θεοῦ (Rom. iii. 2); to believers from among Jews and Gentiles is not merely entrusted outwardly the λόγος Θεοῦ, but God thereby works in them with a living power (v. 13). We have thus here, in regard to the history of the kingdom of God, the genesis of Paul's objective, fundamental view respecting the setting aside of the Jews and the participation of the Gentiles in that kingdom, just as in Acts xiii. 38, 39 we have the genesis of his fundamental view of subjective salvation, of the doctrine of justification by faith. Then in the Epistle to the Romans both views are developed jointly.

5. But it must not be forgotten, that our text is not the last word of the Gentile Apostle respecting the Jews. It is rather in the Epistle to the Romans (chh. ix.–xi.) that he has uttered this. There, with an extreme, self-denying love, he expresses his profound, continual sorrow on account of the rejection of Israel (ch. ix. 1–3; x. 1, 2). He places the ultimate aim of his Gentile apostleship in this, that by means of the converted Gentiles the Jews should be provoked to emulation (ch. xi. 13, 14). He makes it the duty of Gentile Christians not to be proud and severe in regard to the Jewish branches broken off on account of their unbelief, because otherwise the same fate awaits us (ch. xi. 17–22). To his Gentile Church, accordingly, which has so often, alas, actually fallen into that spirit of arrogance toward the Jews which he repudiates, and is still for the most part ensnared therein, he has rather bequeathed it as her task, by means of her walk of faith before Israel, and her loving sorrow in their behalf, to win over the blinded people. The Church has a mission of faith and love to the Jews; she has and should have a Jewish mission. If among us evangelicals this obligation is again here and there acknowledged and discharged, yet these efforts are but feeble, slight germs and beginnings. The Jewish mission is still far too much a thing singular, peculiar; it is too little sustained by the intercessory sympathy of the believing Church. We must in this thing learn to walk more fully in the steps of our Apostle and of the Lord Himself, of whom in reference to this very people Matt. ix. 36-38 stands written. The Jewish mission, moreover, is in a quite special sense the mission also of hope. For the very last word of the Gentile Apostle respecting Israel is this, that the entire people shall yet be saved, and from the receiving of them again shall a new life stream forth to the nations of the world (Rom. xi. 12, 15, 23 sqq.). This national conversion of Israel is, indeed, not a matter that we can introduce; with other developments in the kingdom of God, it is connected with the coming of Christ (Matt. xxiii. 39; Acts iii. 19-21) [Zech. xii. xiii. xiv.—J. L.]. But in order to this, to say nothing of the salvation of individual souls, the Jewish mission has to perform the office of a forerunner, and prepare the way.

6. The result of the entire development of the Jewish people during more than fifteen centuries was their division into a believing minority (v. 14) and an unbelieving majority (vv. 15, 16), which oppressed and persecuted the former. Already, indeed, had the prophets prophesied of the remnant which alone should be converted (comp. Rom. ix. 27-29; xi. 1-10). This division [Scheidung] being completed, there came the crisis [Entscheidung], the judgment (xplais includes both) in the destruction of Jerusalem, from which the believers were delivered (Pella, &c.), whereas ruin befell the unbelieving people. The same result will follow the development also of the New Testament Church and of the Christian nations. On this rests the deep, biblical truth of the distinction between the visible and the invisible Church. We too stand in the time of separation, and are advancing toward the crisis.

7. (Vv. 15, 16.) It is worthy of notice that the ideas of vv. 15 and 16 obviously lean on a sentence of the Lord, and are evolved from it. Comp. with v. 15 Matt. xxiii. 34; Luke xi. 49: ἀποστέλω προφήτας καὶ ἀποστόλους καὶ ἐξ αὐτῶν ἀποκτενοῦσιν καὶ ἐκδιώκουσιν, and with v. 16 Matt. xxiii. 32: καὶ ὁμοῖς πληρώσατε τὸ μέτρον τῶν πατέρων ὑμῶν, and v. 36: ἔξει ταῦτα πάντα ἐπὶ τὴν γενεάν ταύτην. We thus see how, under the illumination of the Spirit, the words of the Lord and the Apostle's own experiences originated his thoughts. At another time it was words of the Lord, which the Apostle received in immediate revelations from heaven. In his eschatological teachings which we shall have later to consider, we shall see both kinds of words coöperating, and along with them Old Testament prophecy. The sayings of Jesus were evidently not unknown to Paul. With him they frequently sound still in a freer form (preceding the written determination of them).

V. 13. RIEGER: Where we said: I am glad, I over think of it without joy, there the spirit, in which Scripture is written, impels us to say: We thank God, that He may ever be acknowledged as the Giver of these joyful providences, and that joy itself may be so seasoned with salt, that the flesh shall be less able to attribute ought to itself.—J. MICHAELIS: How greatly must it rejoice a servant of the Lord, when he is permitted also to see fruits of his labor! Or are we going to find fault with this joy, even though it be a joy in the Lord? Or have we perchance any cause to blame the Apostle, when, for the strengthening of the faith of those dear to him, he exhibits to them something of the fair fruits of the Spirit? Did not Jesus Himself first tell His churches of whatever good things they had, and then of their evil, if they had any?—RIEGER: Perhaps some one thinks, it was possible for the Thessalonians at once to accept as the word of God the word from the mouth of such a gifted Apostle; but who will require of us now, that we accept for God's word everything that sounds from pulpits? That time also had its own difficulties. Paul was not regarded at Thessalonica with quite the same degree of respect that we can now feel toward him. Outwardly he was to be looked upon as a mechanic (v. 9); inwardly the opposition he had to endure gave him great trouble. The acceptance in these circumstances of his word as the word of God was promoted by means, that would still be effective in the case of our expositions at the present day—by searching the Scriptures, whether those things are so (Acts xvii. 11). That at least accept as God's word, which thou canst so accept with the concurrence of thy conscience.—The apostolic word (the word of the Bible) is God's word, and certifies itself as such by its Divine, spiritual working in us (the witness of the Holy Ghost).—ROOS: You experience a Divine working within you. Before you believed, there was none of this Divine working. It exists while you believe, and ever since you believe. You feel it, and may thence infer that what you believe is the word of God.—THE SAME: Is it not the effect of the Divine working, that you can allow yourselves to be harassed by people of your nation, without becoming thereby disheartened or enraged? Who has at any time seen this fruit of the Spirit in an unbelieving Gentile or Jew? Thus the patience and faith of the saints (Rev. xiii. 10; xiv. 12)—these two main elements of the suffering and contending Church—are likewise the main proofs of the Divine character of her foundation, as laid in the apostolic word. In this sense the Church is the proof of the Divine character of Scripture (comp., at ch. i. 6, 7, Doctrinal Principles, No. 6). This is, indeed, no glorious proof, such as might strike even the natural sense, the merely logical or mathematical understanding. On the contrary, it is a proof from her humiliation. But the very fact that the Church of Jesus amidst all depressing and adverse circumstances, and while having the whole world opposed to her, still endures, is a proof that supernatural, Divine powers here rule—that Jesus has given to her the glory which He received from the Father (John xvii. 22; 1 Pet. iv. 14).—The preached word as God's word (comp. Luke x. 16): What this includes, 1. for preachers (see Doctrinal Principles, No. 2), 2. for hearers: a. the obligation not to carry themselves with indifference or even offensively toward the word, but to receive it as a real message from God attentively and willingly; b. the blessing, that from the word thus received there proceed Divine influences upon us.—PFAFF: God's word cannot be without stir and fruit, wherever it is but allowed to rule, any more than fire and light in cold and darkness.—ZWINGLI: The persecutors of God's word, in order to render it odious, put forward the name of Luther or Zwingli. The believer alone can decide whether it is God's word or man's; that is, when God works in the hearers, and arouses and quickens within them the external, preached word, so that a new man is born.

V. 14. See on v. 13.—ROOS: Novices in Christianity are commonly spared by the Lord sharp trials; but this was not the experience of the Thessalonians, the Lord often indeed showing that He does not always act according to one rule.—Though in our Christian world relations are in part changed from what they were then, yet even now also the convert has often to suffer, and that severely, from kinsmen and other companions. But let us be thoroughly penetrated by the power of the Divine word, and we are thereby enabled to hearken unto God more than unto the dearest of men. Then too have we the best hope of drawing after us those connected with us, when they see how the truth is sacred and precious to us above all things else; this inspires them first with respect for it, and afterwards perhaps with love to it.—BENGEL: The same fruits, the same afflictions, the same experiences of believers of all places and times afford an excellent criterion of evangelical truth.—ROOS: A congregation or a household of believers may take comfort from the example of others, and, in particular, converts in Christianity may do so from the example of older Christians.—ZWINGLI: The churches in Judea believed first on the Lord Jesus, and then the Gentiles also followed them; they did not, therefore, follow the Roman church or the Pope. [Moreover, the promise given to Peter, Matt. xvi. 18 sq., was fulfilled in Jerusalem at Pentecost and afterwards, Acts ii sq., not in Rome.—RIGGENBACH.]

[MATTHEW HENRY: The cross is the Christian's mark: if we are called to suffer, we are called only to be followers of the churches of God; so persecuted they the prophets that were before you, Matt. v. 12.—J. L.]

Vv. 15, 16. On the Jews, see Doctrinal Principles, Nos. 3-6.—The sin of the Jews was peculiarly grievous, and more grievous than that of the Gentiles; for it consisted not merely in the doing of evil, but in the rejection of the help offered them against the evil, in their hostility to the messengers of salvation, in hardening themselves against the ever new and higher revelations and more urgent invitations of God (Matt. xxi. 38 sqq.; xxii. 3-7). Indeed, the real sin is unbelief (Mark xvi. 15 sq.; John xvi. 9; v. 46 sq.). What was true, therefore, at that time of the Jews is now true of Christians; since the light shines now for us, for us is the day of salvation.—BENGEL: Stubborn resistance to the word is that which most of all fills up the measure of sin. And RIEGER: He who neglects his own salvation grudges to see in others greater zeal for their salvation; and so by the persecution of others is the measure of sins commonly filled up.—DIEDRICH: To love Christ, and that alone, is truly to love humanity; for true humanity is in Him alone, and by His word it is propagated and trained.—There is among us Christians also a Jewish illiberality, which thinks to please God by drawing the circle in some one sense very tight. This is a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge (Rom. x. 2), a zeal which, as with the Jews, is ever connected somehow with self-righteousness (v. 3), and does not duly understand Christ as the end of the law (v. 4). Let us allow grace to be really grace, and we shall recognize it also in its universality, nor will we make the strait gate still straiter. We learn to unite with a strict conscience a wide heart and a free vision.—PFÄFF: God seldom punishes the first sin, but He suffers iniquity to mount for a certain period and to a certain pitch. When it has reached the measure fixed by Him, He breaks in with His judgment; but this limit is not very discernible before the event. Foretokens of it, however, are not obscurely to be inferred from, for example, the long duration and heinousness of the sins, from contempt of the richly proffered means of grace, from obduracy, &c.—BURKITT: It is a singular support to suffering saints, to consider that Christ and His Apostles suffered before them, and by His sufferings has sanctified a state of affliction and persecution to them.—A spirit of persecution seems oftentimes to run in a blood, and passes from parent to child through many generations. The Jews killed Christ, stoned the prophets, and persecuted the Apostles.—Paul ranks them that are enemies to the preaching of the gospel with the obstinate shedders of Christ's blood; they are enrolled amongst the capital enemies of mankind.—J. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. (V. 17.) But we.—'Ἡμεῖς, emphatic in itself and by its position in front: As to what concerns us. Having spoken, vv. 13-16, of the Thessalonians (comp. the ὑμεῖς standing foremost with like emphasis in v. 14), Paul again reverts to himself, in order to do away with a second imputation or doubt, as if, since he has been gone from the Thessalonians, after they had been readily persuaded and won over, he had left off caring for them. Suspicionem contemtus et negligentia praevenit (CALVIN; similarly PELT and others). Thus, as the first section (ch. i. 2-ii. 16) sketches for us a lively picture of Paul's ministry at Thessalonica and of the founding of the church there, a like sketch is given in the second section (ch. ii. 17-iii. 13) of the manner in which, during the interval of some six months that has since elapsed, the founder of the church has cared for it and been active in its behalf. This authentic information respecting the Apostle's doings in the establishment and rearing of churches is of high value.—[Ἡμεῖς, resumed from v. 13, and now contrasted—δὲ—with the persecuting Jews of vv. 15, 16. So LÜNMANN, ALFORD, ELLICOTT.—J. L.]

2. Bereaved of you.—CHRYSTOSTOM: Paul does not say separated, but more than that. Ὀρφανός and ὀρφανίζω are even in the classics used, not merely of children bereaved of their parents, but also of parents bereaved of their children, and in other similar relations. The expression is one of tenderness, and belongs to the same category as the figure of the mother (vv. 7, 8) and of the father (v. 11) [so that Paul does not really compare himself to a child, as CHRYSTOSTOM &c. improperly assume.—RIGGENBACH]. The Apostle would, first of all, intimate to his readers, that, so far from having forgotten them, his separation from them has been for him a painful experience. Hence also the two additions: for the space of an hour, that is, only a very short time, as we say: for a moment (elsewhere πρὸς ὥραν, for a short time, Philem. 15; Gal. ii. 5; 2 Cor. vii. 8, or πρὸς καιρὸν, for a time at least limited, Luke viii. 13; 1 Cor. vii. 5; here both are strengthened by being joined together), and: in presence only, not in heart, which ever remained with you (dative of reference, comp. 1 Cor. v. 3; and, on the opposition between πρόσθεν and καρδιά, 2 Cor. v. 12; 1 Sam. xvi. 7, LXX.). Thus: We had almost no sooner been parted from you, and that only outwardly, not inwardly, than we again had a great longing to see you. [Πρὸς καιρὸν ὥρας does not state that the separation altogether lasts but a short time, as if Paul here anticipated the fulfilment of the wish expressed in ch. iii. 10 (DE WETTE, KOCH), or even thought of the reunion at the approaching parousia (OLSHAUSKY).—RIGGENBACH].

3. Endeavoured quite earnestly [the more abundantly endeavoured].—When the idea, with which the comparison exists, is at once understood from the context, it is not uncommon for the comparative to stand alone, and it then has the force of a positive, as in Acts xvii. 21; especially does this happen with the comparative of adverbs, as τῶν, μᾶλλον, περισσοτέρως.* ALEX. BUTTMANN, Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Sprachgebrauchs, 1859, p. 72 (on the form περισσοτέρως, ibid., p. 61). If it is desired to specify the idea round which the comparison turns, it is evidently from the connection the πρόσθεν purposely repeated in opposition to καρδιά: Because the Apostle was not separated from them in heart, though in face [presence], he therefore strove the more keenly to see again their face also.† Less suitable supplements are introduced by others.‡ Ἐν πολλῇ ἐπιθυμίᾳ is a reiterated confirmation of ἐσπουδάσαμεν. The one confirmation stands at the beginning, the other not less emphatically at the close, of the sentence. Here also the Apostle's love again shows itself so fervent, and as it were that of a bridegroom, that CHRYSTOSTOM, impressed thereby, remarks: ἐρώμενος ἦν ἡμῖν τις καὶ ἀνδρακτός καὶ ἀκατέργητος εἰς φίλιν.—To see your face is a select phrase of love, instead of the more prosaic to come unto you of v. 18; comp. ch. iii. 10.

4. (V. 18.) Wherefore we wished to come unto you.—From the general disposition, v. 17, proceeded positive resolutions, for the non-fulfilment of which Paul is not to be blamed.—Ἐγὼ μὲν Παῦλος: μὲν solitarium for the greater prominence of the subject. From this too we see, as from καρδίας v. 4, and ψυχῆς v. 8, that in the first person plural Paul intends to include Silvanus and Timothy (LÜNEMANN). Had he meant himself alone by it, the addition of ἐγὼ μὲν Παῦλος would have been unnecessary. But here especially he had to distinguish himself, because indeed Timothy had in the meanwhile come to Thessalonica. But having once singled himself out, he afterwards speaks even of himself alone in the plural; so even in our verse ἡμεῖς, and with peculiar distinctness in ch. iii. 1, 2.—Καὶ ἅπαρ καὶ δις, not simply δις, nor yet ἅπαρ καὶ δις (which is used indefinitely = more than once), but stronger than the former expression and more precise than the latter: both once and twice, not only once but twice (comp. Phil. iv. 16): "testatur non subitum fuisse fervorem, qui statim refrigerit, sed hujus propositi se fuisse tenacem, quum varias occasionem caplaverit." (CALVIN).

* [Περισσοτέρως occurs eight times in Paul's other Epistles (besides Heb. ii. 1 and xiii. 19), and in some of those instances does it stand for the positive.—J. L.]

† (So DE WETTE, KOCH, ELLICOTT, and others. The objection to this is, not merely that, had the separation been in heart, there would have been no desire whatever to see them again (LÜNEMANN), but that οὐ καρδιά is simply an incidental, parenthetical correction of the main thought, ἀπορφανισθέντες ἀπ' ὑμῶν. I prefer CALVIN's explanation: The writer's love, instead of being lessened by absence, was rather the more inflamed thereby (and so ARNTZ, GILL, WINER, WORDSWORTH, VAUGHAN, and others).—J. L.]

5. And Satan hindered us.—Instead of δέ, Paul chooses the Hebraistic connective, which in this case is almost the more energetic.—Satan, the personal devil (comp. ch. iii. 5), in whose existence, therefore, Paul not merely believes, but refers to his agency even such comparatively trifling and external matters, because therein there lies prepared a hindrance to the kingdom of God (comp. Eph. vi. 12; otherwise at Rom. i. 13; xv. 22; Acts xvi. 6 sq.). The Apostle, then, does not everywhere, and as a matter of course, speak of Satan, but he knows how with testing insight to distinguish. There is nothing about him of mere cant. In what the restraint consisted, we know not; only it cannot have been an accumulation of business, or anything of that sort, but must have been something of evil—whether on the side of the Thessalonians or on that of Paul. In the first case we should have to think with DE WETTE &c. of the enemies of the gospel at Thessalonica, whose hatred had been a source of danger to the Apostle on his arrival in Thessalonica; in the other case, either, with CHRYSOSTOM and others, of trials in the churches where Paul had since been, which rendered a removal from them impossible for him, or, perhaps better, of some sickness of the Apostle, and in connection with this we might think of Satan's messenger, 2 Cor. xii. 7—a topic, it is true, on which we know just nothing very clear and certain. (Comp. also ch. iii. 7.) It is even very possible that both kinds of reasons concurred; that the first time, for example, and this would best agree with v. 17, Paul desired to turn back again to Thessalonica from Berea, but was hindered in that by the Thessalonian Jews (Acts xvii. 13.—See CALVIN, BENGEL, and others.)

6. (V. 19.) For.—Paul gives the reason of his longing after the Thessalonians, and of his repeated purpose to come unto them. Illum desiderii ardorem inde confirmat, quia in ipsis felicitatem suam quodammodo repositam habeat; perinde enim valet hoc sententia ac si dixisset: Nisi me ipsum obliviscar, necesse est ut vos expelem (CALVIN).

7. Who* [What] is our hope, &c.—ἡ οὐχὶ καὶ ὑμεῖς belongs to τῆς, and it is, of course, merely incidental that ἡ is coincident with the ἡ before χαρά and στέφανος; ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ κυρίου &c. belongs to ἐλπίς ἡ χαρά &c.† But ἡ οὐχὶ καὶ ὑμεῖς is purposely put between, so that ἔμπροσθεν &c. attaches itself immediately to these words, because the Apostle would have it observed that, so far from his relation to them being a transient one, it is rather to reach on to the coming of Christ, and verify itself before the eyes of the Lord.—Hope and joy, here, of course, objective = the subject of hope and joy. This the Thessalonians are not, in so far as Paul hopes in regard to them that they shall be found blameless (LÜDEMANN), but in so far as they are the fruits of his ministry, after which the Lord at His return will inquire (see Luke xix. 15). To this also there is special reference in στέφανος καυχῆσεως, an expression derived from the garland that crowns the competitor at the goal in the successfully contested race (1 Cor. ix. 25; 2 Tim. ii. 5; iv. 8). Καύχῃσιν, moreover, is not glory in the objective sense, but glorying; not gloria, but gloriatio; and so a crown for glorying = in which I may glory (comp. Ez. xvi. 12; xxiii. 42; Prov. xvi. 31; LXX.). ROOS: We hope on your account to have some great experience at the coming of Christ; we shall then be able to rejoice over you; we shall be able to parade with you, as one parades with a crown won in a contest of the games.—Ye also, as well as other churches; those, for example, in Philippi or Corinth (see Phil. iv. 1; 2 Cor. i. 14—parallelisms also for the expression).

8. (V. 20.) Ye are verily* [For ye are], &c.—Γὰρ confirms and strengthens the readily understood affirmation in the oratorical question of v. 19 (comp. WINER, p. 396). Our glory and joy. The expression glory [Herrlichkeit] is properly retained in translation here also by EWALD and J. MICH. HAHN, and is by the latter emphasized in a theosophic way. Δόξα is weakened, when rendered merely by renown or honor [LÜDEMANN: Ruhm; LUTHER, DE WETTE: Ehre.—J. L.] (Comp. 1 Cor. xi. 7, where the woman is called the δόξα of the man, the man the εἰκὼν καὶ δόξα of God; and 2 Cor. viii. 23, where approved brethren are distinguished by the title, δόξα Χριστοῦ.) As δόξα in God Himself is His life-impression, life-form (see at v. 12 Doctrinal Principles, No. 8), so with such genitives it denotes the representation of the life, resting on the communication of life,—the copy, standing in essential connection with the original, belonging to it, and forming as it were one whole with it, so that the latter is surrounded by it with a halo, as the sun by its beams, as the head by the crown (δόξα parallel with στέφανος καυχῆσεως). Thus it is with the man and the woman taken from him; with Christ and believers; with Paul and the spiritual children begotten by him.—That such objective, actual glory then becomes in the subjective experience a matter of joy, lies in the nature of the case.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. (V. 18.) Satan appears in Scripture in a three-fold activity; as tempter and seducer, as accuser, as destroyer. In the first relation he is the first and perpetual author of sin amongst men (δ πειράζων, ch. iii. 5; Matt. iv. 3; δ πλανῶν, Rev. xii. 9). As accuser (κατήγωρ, Rev. xii. 10), he seeks, when the sin is accomplished, to make the most of it with lying exaggeration before the Divine Judge (Zech. iii. 1), and also to exhibit it in the worst possible colors before our inner judge, the conscience, in order to bind the sinner inwardly, rendering him fainthearted and paralyzing his resistance to sin. Here belong the two most common names of the devil, the Hebrew שָׂטָן, properly adversary, especially in court (comp. יְשָׁעָה, Zech. iii. 1, and ἀντίδικος, 1 Pet. v. 8), and the Greek δῖδσολος, informant, slanderer, defamer, properly one who strikes through with words. As destroyer (comp. Ἀπολλῶν, Rev. ix. 11) Satan works, in so far as he, as prince of the fallen world, sets in motion all the powers of physical and moral evil against salvation, the kingdom of God, and in behalf of mischief, which in the last instance is ἀνάστασις, eternal damnation. It is thus that he appears in our text. In the two first relations he is a liar; in the last, and—in so far as that lies as the ultimate aim at the bottom also of the earlier—in all three, a murderer (John viii. 44). In the case of Judas he succeeded first in his trade as a seducer, then in that of an accuser; hence the end of the former in despair and suicide, whereby he fell a prey to the destroyer.

* [So LUTHER, and other German versions.—J. L.]

* [Ihr seid ja—making the γὰρ intensive, as is done also by LUTHER, SCHOLEFIELD, FILLICOTT, and many others. But the rendering of our common version is quite as good;—the 20th verse now justifying, as if "after reconsideration" (WEBSTER and WILKINSON), the confident tone of the previous question by the triumphant assertion of what is there only strongly implied. The reader will notice likewise the emphatic forte.—J. L.]

2. (Vv. 19, 20.) Paul's hope is to be adorned with the fruits of his ministry before the Lord at His coming. Holy Scripture everywhere lays stress on this point, that every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labor (1 Cor. iii. 8). The fundamental relation of every man to God in respect of faith or unbelief decides the question of his happiness or misery (Eph. ii. 8; Mark xvi. 16; John iii. 18, 36; v. 24). But within these two great classes there is still possible an extraordinary diversity in the life-acting of faith or unbelief—in practical honesty and dishonesty. Through faith we are become children of God; but now we must yield ourselves to be also trained as such, and renewed ever more and more into the image of the Father and of our First-born Brother (ἡδύς πατέρον, Tit. ii. 11, 12; comp. Heb. xii. 7-10; Col. iii. 10; Rom. xii. 2; viii. 29; 2 Cor. iii. 18), that we remain not weak, new-born children, but grow to the ripe age of a perfect man (Heb. v. 13, 14; comp. Eph. iv. 13, 14). We are rooted in the right ground and soil, and bear within us the full germ of life; but for that very reason it concerns us now to grow and bring forth fruit (Col. ii. 7; i. 10, 11; Matt. xiii. 23; Mark iv. 28-29; John xv. 2; Phil. i. 9-11). The whole walk of a man contributes to the formation of his disposition and character; all the issues of the life exert a formative reacting influence on our inner man—impress and stamp themselves also in ourselves (character from χαρακτῶν). In the Divine judgment, therefore, justification and condemnation are made to depend even on our words (Matt. xii. 36, 37); but especially is our fate determined according to our works, or (in the singular) our work, life-work, so far as therein is exhibited the total result of the religious and moral life, rearing itself on the foundation of faith or unbelief (Rom. ii. 6; 2 Cor. v. 10; Rev. ii. 23; xx. 12 sq.; xxii. 12; Matt. vi. 27; John v. 29). As a man walks, so he becomes; and as he becomes, so is he also in death; his works do follow him (Rev. xiv. 13), and agreeably thereto his destiny in that other world spontaneously shapes itself; on which account there will be among the blessed and among the lost very different degrees of glory or of torment (comp., for example, Luke xix. 17-19; xii. 47 sq.; Matt. xi. 22-24; 1 Cor. iii. 12-15). Of course, this is not the place to go into more precise definitions respecting heaven, hades, hell, the first and second resurrections, &c.). By this view justice is done also to the scriptural idea of reward, without our falling into the Catholic idea of merit. And in this way, especially, sanctification, a spiritual walk, inward growth, and the outward activity of the life, here acquire an importance which in the original Protestantism was not duly recognized and acknowledged—a defect, that has been in many ways prejudicial, and here and there is so still, to our evangelical doctrine and practice. It is true, our Confessions teach emphatically, that faith by an inward necessity brings forth good works; and yet the main point of view, from which they had to handle this doctrine over against Catholicism, was the negative one: that righteousness and salvation depend neither for their attainment nor their preservation on good works. For this reason, and the kindred one, that for the doctrine of faith and justification that of regeneration was neglected, it was impossible for the idea of sanctification, and what is connected therewith also in eschatology, to reach fully its positive, scriptural development and significance. Meanwhile, there is by no means any want of good suggestions, particularly in Melancthon's excellent discussion de dilectione et impletione legis in the Apology for the Augsburg Confession.

3. (Vv. 19, 20.) Whatever work we perform in an earthly calling, even in art and science as such, belongs to the domain of the perishable—of means, not of everlasting ends. Only what of good or evil is wrought in the souls of men is of eternal import. And the highest service is to help a soul to the life in God. On this rests the singular dignity, and also the responsibility, of the ministerial office. In an altogether peculiar sense, this is work for the day of Jesus Christ, whether we are now good shepherds or hirelings.

4. Paul hopes on the day of the Lord to be surrounded by those converted through him, as by a glory. This δόξα, this crown of glorying, is the true halo, when, coming into the presence of the heavenly Judge, one is able to say: Behold, I and the children whom God hath given me. At His coming the Lord will present to Himself His entire Church glorious, without spot or wrinkle (Eph. v. 27; 2 Cor. xi. 2). But the Church is an organism, not merely in the sense that the body as a whole depends on the head, but also in that it is composed of various members, the weaker depending on the stronger. Thus do spiritual children hang on their spiritual fathers, and are as it were embraced in them, and ruled by them. In this sense Paul hopes to be surrounded by his Gentile churches; in this sense is the promise made to the Twelve of ruling the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 29, 30). This agrees with the fundamental view which Scripture, in this case also, the true interpreter of experience, takes of humanity. It regards it, not as an atomic mass of individuals, but as an organism, depending for its natural life on Adam, for its spiritual life on Christ; and that in such a manner, that from these two genealogical heads the membership branches off to every single individual. Hence the importance of progenitors and their primitive doings in the sphere itself of nature and of race (Adam, Shem, Ham, Japheth, Abraham, David, &c.; Adam's fall, Ham's misdeed, Abraham's faith, the gracious treatment of David's descendants for David's sake, &c.), just as prominent prophetic and apostolic persons are centres of light and union in the spiritual sphere. The case is similar with the Lord of the world's history.

V. 17. The Apostle's loving union with his churches even when absent from them. J. MICH. HANN: In the Apostle, who certainly loves all the children of God, and even all the Lord's dearly redeemed, with a priestly, cordial love, there is yet a predilection for his spiritual children (1 Cor. iv. 15;

Gal. iv. 19). The reason of that is the closer affinity of spiritual kindred. If it is so in the earthly nature, and cannot be said to be improper, who then shall blame it in the spiritual? Whoever blames it, would mend an arrangement of the Creator, who is also our Redeemer.—RIGGER: As matters now stand with us, we are unable to estimate what a benefit it was to come together in person, and strengthen one another concerning the common faith.—DIEDRICH: Christians may well even long to see one another, whilst they are in the flesh; worldlings are soon fain to get out of one another's way.—[The same principles of the new creature, that led the primitive Christians to delight in personal intercourse with one another (comp. Acts iv. 23; xx. 38; Rom. i. 11; xv. 24; 1 Thess. iii. 6; 2 Tim. i. 4; 2 John 12; 3 John 14), were still more powerfully operative in their relations to their Lord (comp. John xiv. 3, 19; Phil. i. 23; 1 Thess. iv. 17; 1 John iii. 2; &c.—J. L.)]

V. 18. CALVIN: It is certain, that whatever opposes the work of the Lord proceeds from Satan. Would that it were a firmly settled conviction in all pious souls, that Satan is continually making every effort to retard or hinder the edification of the Church! We should certainly be more intent on resisting him; we should have more at heart the preservation of sound doctrine, of which Satan takes such eager pains to rob us.—A part of that sound doctrine is the doctrine of Satan himself.—[BISHOP WILSON: Non-residence. N. B. It is the work of Satan, and his desire, to keep a pastor from his flock.—J. L.]

Vv. 19, 20. It is important that a man should not merely be assured of his gracious standing and salvation, which, indeed, is the first thing and most important, but should also be zealous to bear fruit for the day of the Lord, and to be able hereafter to say to the Lord: Lord, my pound hath gained ten pounds (Luke xix. 16). He can also set his aim too low, and cover with false humility his own drowsiness and sloth.—A great and main point for the preacher, that he appear not empty before the Lord in His day.—CALVIN: At the last day Christ's servants will obtain glory and triumph according as they have spread abroad His kingdom. Therefore should they even now rejoice and glory in nothing save the blessed result of their labor, in seeing the glory of Christ advanced through their service. In this way also they will attain to a true love for the Church.—THEODORET: Paul has compared himself to a mother (v. 7), and mothers are wont to call their young children their hope, joy, &c.—CHRYSOBOSTOM: Who would not exult in such a numerous and well-bred troop of children?—To whose lot fall these joys of spiritual paternity? Do we even know any thing of them?—The Apostle's joys and cares of spiritual fatherhood are a pattern for us also in regard to our children after the flesh, how we should be faithful in our families, and should carefully engage that not one of the members be lost.—To keep the coming of the Lord at all times before our eyes, that is to be likeminded with the Apostles.—RIGGER: In the gospel the Lord's coming shines in upon us so near, that it affords us already at every step much light for our feet.—[MATTHEW HENRY: The Apostle here puts the Thessalonians in mind, that though he could not come to them as yet, and though he should never be able to come to them, yet our Lord Jesus Christ will come; nothing shall hinder that.—BENSON (MACKNIGHT, BARNES, &c.): Paul expected to know his own converts again in the great day; and particularly to rejoice in them. We may, therefore, hope to know our friends in the future state.—J. L.]

* [In this suggestion THEODORET, as usual, follows CHRYSOBOSTOM. WORDSWORTH: "These are my jewels," as the Roman mother, Cornelia, said of her offspring. Comp. Prov. xvii. 8, στέφανος γερόντων, τίνα τέκνω, καὶ ἅμα δὲ τέκνω πατέρες αὐτῶν.—J. L.]

CH. III. 1-5.

2. Being unable to come himself, Paul sent Timothy.

- 1 Wherefore, when we could no longer forbear [endure, στέγοντες], we thought it good [thought good, εὐδοκήσαμεν; Sin., as B.: ὑποδοχήσαμεν] to be left at [left behind
- 2 in, καταλειφθῆναι ἐν] Athens alone, and sent Timothy our brother, and minister of God, and our fellow-labourer [our brother and fellow-labourer with God] in
- 3 the gospel of Christ, to establish you, and to comfort you [exhort] concerning [in behalf of] your faith, that no man [no one, μηδένα] should be moved by [in, ἐν] these afflictions; for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto
- 4 [unto this we are appointed, εἰς τοῦτο κείμεθα]. For verily [For even, καὶ γάρ] when we were with you, we told you before that we should suffer tribulation [are to be afflicted, μέλλομεν θλιβεσθαι]; even as [as also, καθὼς καὶ] it came to
- 5 pass, and ye know. For this cause, when I [I also, καὶ γὰρ] could no longer forbear [endure, στέγων], I sent to know your faith, lest by some means [lest haply, μήπως] the tempter have [had] tempted you, and our labour [toil, κόπος] be [should prove, γένηται] in vain.

1 V. 2.—Among the many variations is that one which first lies at the basis of the different readings, and presents a suitable advance: τὸν ἀδελφὸν ἡμῶν καὶ συνεργὸν τοῦ θεοῦ (1 Cor. iii. 9). [This reading is followed by Griesbach and nearly all the later editors, as well as by our text. Cod. Sin. thus: τὸν δὲ ἡμῶν καὶ διδασκόντων θεοῦ.—J. L.]

2 V. 3.—[ὑπερακαλῶσαι, as in ch. iv. 1; v. 14; 2 Thess. iii. 12; &c.; here closely connected with its object in v. 3.—

The second ἑμᾶς is rejected by Schott, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, Ellcott, Wordsworth (after Sin. A. B. D.* F. G. &c.), and by our text.—J. L.]

* V. 2.—[cures Glaubens halber. This represents the reading, adopted by Griesbach and later editors generally, of ἑμᾶς (Sin. A. B. D.* &c.), instead of ἐπι.—J. L.]

* V. 3.—The Recepta τῷ is supported only by minuscules; the best manuscripts [including Sin.] give τὸ (see Winer, 8th edit. § 44, 5. 3).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. (V. 1.) Wherefore (because ye are thus our joy, ch. ii. 20; my crown of glory, which I hope to bring before the Lord, ch. ii. 19),* when we, &c.; more exactly: † as those who could not longer endure it. Ἰστῶν, in old Greek, to cover, then (of a vessel), to contain, and then (Philo and Paul), to endure; so 1 Cor. ix. 12; xiii. 7. This suits our place; but not, to conceal. No longer endure, namely, to be separated from you, and hindered from coming to you (ch. ii. 18).† There is tenderness in the fact, that his anxiety is scarcely hinted at, is at most intimated in the expression στέγνωτες, and is not more distinctly announced till v. 5.

2. We thought good, were pleased (ch. ii. 8; the imperfect, continuously); here the aorist (on one occasion); CALVIN: promtam animi inclinationem designat. § The plural, according to the restriction already introduced by the explanation in ch. ii. 18, of Paul alone; for ch. iii. 1 sqq. is closely connected with what precedes; equivalent, therefore, to the singular in v. 5. Otherwise GROTIUS, BENGE, ROOS, HOFMANN, who, because the singular first comes at v. 5, think that the plural here does not denote Paul alone (and so ROOS and HOFMANN at v. 8 also). But all three (ch. i. 1) cannot be meant; Timothy, being sent forth, is not one of those left alone. We should thus have to understand by the plural two out of the three; but that is more arbitrary than to explain it (after ch. ii. 18) of Paul alone, [as is done by SCHOTT, DE WETTE, LÜNMANN, ALFORD.—J. L.] Generally, indeed, it is he who decides. With this too Acts xviii. 5 is at least more readily reconciled.

3. (V. 2.) In Athens, &c., and sent, &c.; therefore from Athens. According to Acts xvii. 15 Paul sends a message from Athens to Berea, that Silas and Timothy should come to him with all speed; according to Acts xviii. 5 they both came to him at Corinth from Macedonia. With this agrees 1 Thess. iii. 6: Timothy comes from Thessalonica (Macedonia) to Paul, with whom Silvanus also is present during the writing of the letter. The narrative in the Acts has in the interval a gap, that can only be filled up conjecturally. Either (1 a.) both had come to Athens, and from that place had again been sent to the north, Timothy to Thessalonica, Silas perhaps to Philippi (also in Macedonia). (If ἐντέμψαντες included also Silvanus, this would be a necessary supposition.) Or (1 b.) only Timothy had come to Athens, and been sent to Thessalonica, Silas being still detained in Berea (likewise in Macedonia). Or lastly (2.) both did not come to Paul, so long as he lingered in Athens, but the latter (moved, it may be, by accounts of persecutions in Thessalonica) sent after the first order (for them to come) a second in like manner from Athens to Berea; that Timothy, instead of coming to him directly, should rather go in his stead to Thessalonica, and only after that follow in his route (so HUG; WIESELER, Chronol. des apostolischen Zeitalters, 249). He would thus have countermanded Timothy's expected arrival in Athens. This would accord well with ἐπιμψ. (without ἔκειθεν); less naturally with καταλειψθῶν, which, strictly taken, signifies not merely left alone, but left behind alone. Difficulty there is none, only a gap, which cannot be filled up incontestably in only one way.

4. Our brother, &c.—The Cod. B. gives, our brother and fellow-laborer; A. and Sin., our brother and God's servant; others, and God's servant and fellow-laborer; the Recepta (not altogether after late authorities only), our brother and God's servant and our fellow-laborer, where the arrangement is wanting in solidity; we should have to justify it perhaps thus: as God's servant he is our fellow-laborer. But the reading which first lies at the basis of all the variations is that followed above (D. Ambrosias ter); δίδκονος θεοῦ is common, sometimes in a comprehensive (2 Cor. vi. 4), sometimes in a narrower sense (Acts vi.; 1 Tim. iii. 8). My fellow-laborer, says Paul, Rom. xvi. 21; God's fellow-laborers, 1 Cor. iii. 9. In the glad tidings of Christ; in the act, that is, of preaching the same.—It can scarcely be said that Paul gives Timothy these several titles of honor involuntarily, and on account merely of the latter being his faithful helper (LÜNMANN); he probably means also to show the Thessalonians what a helper he has deprived himself of for their sake (CHRYSOSTOM); quo melius ostenderet quam bene illis consultum voluerit (CALVIN); and at the same time to certify his own perfect agreement with Timothy, and confirm whatever he has done (VON GERRACH). Somewhat too refined perhaps is HOFMANN's conjecture, that they were not, because Paul had not come himself, to think too highly of the coming of Timothy, and that he desires to guard against this.

5. To establish you (in the persecutions; that Timothy was to do) and to exhort, literally, to call to, which is to be understood, according to the context, either of exhortation or of comfort (Acts xv. 32; 2 Thess. ii. 17). But Paul expresses no distrust of their standing as believers. That the oldest authorities omit ἑμᾶς after παρὰ, makes no difference in the sense; nor yet that they read τρέφ instead of ἐπι. For the former likewise means on account of, in consideration of, as in Rom. xv. 9; 2 Cor. i. 8; 2 Thess. ii. 1; at least, it is not necessary, with LÜNMANN [JOWETT, ALFORD, ELLICOTT], to press the signification in favor of, for the benefit of (in order to support your faith).

6. (V. 3.) That no one should be moved, &c.—Ἰσχυε (from είω, εἰλω), in the New Testament only here, means to move to and fro; of dogs, to wag the tail; hence to flatter, deceive through flattery (so in many places in Wetstein). Thus BENGE that no one be deceived by enemies, relations, his own heart); similarly RÜCKERT: blanditiis corruptum

* [So LÜNMANN; but better, with ALFORD and ELLICOTT after THEODORET and CALVIN: Because of our affection, and unavailing desire to see you.—J. L.]

† [As better representing the subjective μυκρῶν with the participle.—J. L.]

§ [This is not expressed by our Common Version, which ELLICOTT follows, though his paraphrase also is: "no longer able to control my longing, &c."—J. L.]

¶ [Rather, a conclusion, determination of the judgment and will, as ALFORD, ELLICOTT, &c.—J. L.]

|| [So MACNIGHT, PALEY (see his Herm. Pauline, ch. ix., No. iv., with JOWETT's unsatisfactory criticism), ELLICOTT and others. Comp. CONYBEARE and HOWSON's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, London ed., vol. I. p. 408, and the Note at the end of ch. xi.—J. L.]

[a sense suggested also by WORDSWORTH, after THOPHYLACT; likewise JOWETT: "not simply moved, but rather moved to softness."—J. L.] On the other hand, the Greek interpreters (familiar with the language), and so the moderns generally, including LÜNMANN, understand by it, to be moved, shaken, like σαλευθήναι of 2 Thess. ii. 2. HOFMANN disputes this explanation, reduces even Lünemann's examples from the classics to the sense of deluding, and understands thus: in (in the midst of, not by means of) the persecutions seeming well-wishers might delude you with suggestions.—Τῷ could not mean because that (as in 2 Cor. ii. 12 [13]), but must be equivalent to eis τὸ, for the end that, like the Hebrew ל. But this were without example, and, besides, the accusative τὸ is attested by almost all the uncials. The latter LÜNMANN [ALFORD] understands as in apposition to eis τὸ στήν, &c.: that is to say that; which is as much as to say that;—not good. Others [SCHOTT, KOCH]: in reference to, as in Phil. iv. 10 (where, however, another view is possible); best (EWALD, HOFMANN [WINER, DE WETTE, ELLICOTT, WEBSTER and WILKINSON]): it marks the purport of the charge, of the παρακαλεῖν; comp. ch. iv. 1, 6.

7. In these afflictions; which after Paul's departure befell the Thessalonians as well as him (ch. ii. 14). From v. 4 it is inferred that they immediately subsided. That they might return any day, and did actually break forth again, is shown by 2 Thess. i. 4. CHRYSOSTOM and others err in supposing that he speaks of his own afflictions, by which the Thessalonians were rendered anxious, as soldiers are by the wounding of the general.

8. For yourselves know, without any repeated admonition of ours; know then also, that I am right in requiring, μηδὲνα σάλευσαι.—That unto this we (Christians generally) are appointed; κειμεθα like τιθέμεθα (Luke ii. 34; Phil. i. 16). Improperly KOCH: are prostrated (in misfortune and suffering); Phil. i. might perhaps be so understood, but not Luke ii. Rather: by God ordained, thereunto appointed; eis τούτοις, to afflictions, as the way into the kingdom of God (Matt. v. 10-12; x. 21, 32, 34 sqq.; John xv. 18 sqq.; xvi. 2; Acts xiv. 22; 2 Tim. iii. 12).

9. (V. 4.) Καὶ γὰρ, for even, for indeed.—You should therefore know it, from our telling you before.—That we are to be afflicted, μέλλομεν δελεῖσθαι. (again, Christians generally), that there awaits us; not simply equivalent to the future, but: according to God's purpose; because darkness is opposed to light, the flesh strives against the spirit. Notwithstanding such undisguised forewarning, the gospel wins believers. An example of how far the Apostle's word was from flattering speech (ch. ii. 5).—As also it came to pass (with you, as with us), and ye know; not: that it must come to pass, that were tautological with v. 8; but: that according to our forewarning it has come to pass. By this remembrance there accrued from an outward event an inward experience. As the subject of κειμεθα (v. 8) and μέλλομεν (v. 4), therefore, we understand Christians generally. HOFMANN, on the contrary: the same as in the case of ἡμεῖς and προελεγόμεν, and so only the Apostles. No doubt, in the clause, "when we were with you," the we can only mean the Apostles. But in the case of κειμεθα there is nothing before to suggest this limitation; and opposed to it is the fact, that thereby the most natural connection with what precedes is disturbed. To comfort the Thessalonians in their afflictions, he reminds them of the rule that affects all Christians. But, if we understood him to say: "that we Apostles are appointed thereunto," it is only in an ingenious, roundabout way that we could get at the point of the confirmation and exhortation: Admit no such insinuation, as that we misled you into misery, while we secured ourselves.

10. (V. 5.) For this cause (on account of these afflictions; unnaturally HOFMANN: because we eis τούτοις κειμεθα), when I also, &c. OLSHAUSEN interpolates: as you in your care for me;—LÜNMANN: as the others, Timothy and the Christians in Athens; * but there is nothing said of their having no longer endured;—HOFMANN even: as we two, Silvanus and I, sent Timothy, so now also I alone (the singular) sent some one unnamed! On the other hand, DE WETTE would refer the καὶ in καὶ γὰρ to the whole sentence; without proof. Just as here after διὰ τούτοις, so it stands at Eph. i. 15; comp. Col. i. 9 [both texts cited by De Wette.—J. L.]. And, just as there, it opposes to what was said of the Thessalonians (ye have had experience of suffering) † what he too now had done.—Sent, &c. is a resumption of v. 2. He says nothing any more about whom he sent; he merely adds, for what purpose. Nor is it any longer here, as at v. 2, what Timothy was to do, but what he thereby sought for himself. At no time mere tautological repetition. For PELT and OLSHAUSEN erroneously refer γνώριον to Timothy, though indeed not named, as the subject; it belongs rather to the subject of the principal verb (LÜNMANN).

11. Your faith, whether [lest], † &c.—Everything concentrates in this, whether they stand in the faith. Without our supplying φοβούμενος, μήπως expresses solicitude, and first indeed, with the indicative preterite, in reference to what was past: whether perhaps it has already occurred; there exists oppression from without; now he is anxious to know, whether haply this had wrought inwardly so as to become a temptation for the Thessalonians, that is, to the disturbance of faith;—then, moreover, with the subjunctive, in reference to what was impending, which in this case might possibly occur; for, even though the πειρασμός should have already occurred, this would still be by no means decided; the temptation might, indeed, still be resisted, and the entire frustration of the work still be ward off. Similarly Gal. ii. 2; comp. WINER, 6 ed., 56, 2. † The tempter is Satan (ch. ii. 18); the substantival participle marks his settled characteristic (Matt. iv. 3); that is what he is always after. That the subject and the predicate are from the same stem gives emphasis to the expression. For eis κενόν, to come to nothing, to be frustrated, comp. Gal. ii. 2; Phil. ii. 16; Hebr. כִּי־לֹא, אֵין, לֹא־יָבִי, Is. lxx. 23; Jer. vi. 29; Mic. i. 14.—Our toil; you surely do not mean to make me so poor? he thus speaks to

* [ALFORD: "A delicate hint that Timotheus also was anxious respecting them; or it may have the same reference as καὶ ἡμεῖς, ch. ii. 13—viz. to the other Christians who had heard of their tribulation."—REVISION: "I no more than my companions."—WEBSTER and WILKINSON: "I in my sympathy with you."—J. L.]

† [Better at least than ELLICOTT: "As they had felt for the Apostle (more fully so in v. 8), so he &c."—J. L.]
‡ [REVISION: "As follows many of the best interpreters, whose names are given in my Revision of the verse, Note 3. But, as is there remarked, "I do not find that either the simple μή, which occurs so often, or μήπως, which occurs other 11 times (and, excepting Acts xvii. 28, always in Paul's Epistles), is ever thus used"—that is, as an indirect interrogative—"in the New Testament."—J. L.]

their heart. It would be to their own hurt, if they fell away. But he in his love for them would reckon it a sensible loss for himself (RIGGER). Now at last and in such an affectionate manner, after he has already strengthened them, does he mention the danger by name.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. (V. 1.) It was a sacrifice, to remain in so difficult a position without the outward and inward support of faithful helpers; rather to dispense with something himself, than allow the Thessalonians to want for anything. Love gives others the precedence (comp. Phil. ii. 19 seq.). CALVIN: Desiderii illius sui fidem facit, se majorem illorum quam sui rationem habuisse ostendit. It is at the same time an instance of that so frequent change in his plans, which was misinterpreted to his disadvantage at Corinth (2 Cor. i. 17). What was said of another servant of God is to its full extent true of him: "The singleness of his eye kept him steadfast to his purpose under all the varied and trying circumstances of his life. He changed his plans according as he observed a change in the intimations of Providence, but his purpose remained fundamentally the same—the furtherance of the gospel by all means." Berleburger Bibel: A servant of the Church must accommodate himself to the circumstances of the Church, and yet in such a manner that, while doing one thing, he do not neglect another.

2. (V. 2.) The mission to Thessalonica was no small task for the youthful Timothy (1 Cor. xvi. 10, 11; according to 1 Tim. iv. 12 he needed encouragement in the presence of older men). In the Acts the presence of Timothy at the founding of the church there is not once mentioned; plainly because he was less conspicuous, and for the same reason the persecution did not affect him. Paul, however, would not have entrusted a stranger to the church with such an important commission. The Apostle understood the wisdom of selecting a gentle manager, who yet was no skulk, but in a spirit of self-sacrifice sought, as few others, the things that were Christ's (Phil. ii. 20-22). The difference of gifts is of service for different tasks. It is not every one that can root out stumps and stones, nor is this always in order. There is a time also for easy going—careful watering, and ministers with gifts adapted to that work. Even in war different enterprises are promoted by different sorts of weapons.

3. (V. 2.) Timothy, the brother. Care is to be taken that the name of brother do not become trite, nor yet be so claimed for a particular circle, as if it belonged to that especially, and to every member of it officially and as a matter of course. Rather it is due to all living Christians, to whom Christ addresses it (Matt. xii. 49, 50). Only on this basis is official brotherhood a truth. Elsewhere Paul calls Timothy his beloved, faithful, genuine child (1 Cor. iv. 17; 1 Tim. i. 2 [and 18]). The child, dependent on his father, grows up to be an independent brother. In the spiritual life it is possible for the degrees of kindred to become variable without damage, since through hallowed, tender love they co-exist, yet without confusion. Even the common human relations show images of this. A son when grown up may find his friend in his father.

4. That we are called God's fellow-laborers, is for us a high dignity. God will not drive everything through alone (RIGGER), but will act also by means of our agency, weak as it may be, yet strengthened and continually sustained by Him alone. For He it is, indeed, that worketh in us to will and to do, and then gives the increase (Phil. ii. 13; 1 Cor. iii. 6, 10); nevertheless he requires of us faithfulness (1 Cor. iv. 2)—that we lay hold of what He proffers.

5. (V. 3.) Confirmation and exhortation are needed even by believers, to arm them against threatening and temptation. A comfortable support is communion in prayer. CALVIN: The communion of saints includes this, that the faith of one member should be a comfort to others. But to fasten on to men as men would be unsound and unprofitable, unless we allowed ourselves to be aroused to the recollection of what lies in our own consciousness of faith (ye yourselves know)—unless, animated by the example, we made use for ourselves of the open way of access to the Lord.

6. CHRYSOSTOM: Who has ears to hear, let him hear: The Christian is appointed to suffer affliction. It is, therefore, just when we are appointed to a time of refreshing, that a strange thing happens to us (1 Pet. iv. 12). According to the world's sentiment (and that of our natural sense), it is to our discredit when things go troublesome and hard with us; we almost suspect that everything is wrong with us. According to the word of God, that is rather a badge of Christians, a badge of honor; hac lege sumus Christiani, CALVIN. The Lord, indeed, must even again show Himself as the Breaker* (2 Cor. vi. 8-10; Rom. viii. 37). Besides, affliction that befalls us as Christians on account of our faith is still something different from such natural trouble or temptation of one's own flesh, as all men must meet with. But Christians, after all, are really nothing but men on whom the Divine training takes effect; and all suffering sent by God, not merely persecution proper, can and should be turned into a cross, and as a cross be taken up and borne—as a crossing of our self-will. To be sure, our scriptural knowledge, and, on the other hand, our lively recognition of facts and ready acceptance of whatever is plainly laid on us, very often do not keep pace with each other. Hatred for Christ's name's sake is not to be provoked by us (Phil. iv. 5); † provided only we do not escape the trouble by reason of our excessive worldliness, our compliances, denials, and quenching of the pursuit of holiness. But the question always concerns only what God lays upon us, not a studied self-torture. When external persecutions fail, there may come upon us inward assaults from flesh and blood, refined and enhanced by the spirits that rule in the air—daily piercings of a needle, more irksome than the blows of a club.

7. (V. 4.) The forewarning obviates much vexation (John xiii. 19; xiv. 29; xvi. 1). Hardship, instead of frightening, is then an actual confirmation of the prediction; hostility itself must rebound to the glory of the Lord. CHRYSOSTOM compares to the physician, who foresees the course of the disease, and thereby quiets his patient. God, however, beholds beforehand not merely what will happen, as if it happened without Him, but what, even of that which is wicked and hurtful, He will work as Judge, according to the relation between the seed and the harvest (Gal. vi. 7, 8); and so the Divinely opened vision discerns this working of God even in the wickedness of men.

8. What must the gospel be as a divine power, that, with prospects so little flattering to the flesh, it yet wins believers! It is true that to a certain degree even an equivocal cause may gain by persecution. To make martyrs of men is to call forth and strengthen the spirit of contradiction. That is a noble impulse (of an independent character) caricatured (resistance to essential truth). But only in the element of truth is there a steadfast and lasting perseverance. Berlenburger Bibel: But is it wise management, to talk of the cross to young Christians? True wisdom conducts into a school, where we learn to be blessed. The lost blessedness is to be regained in no other way than the strait and narrow one. Tribulation, however, is laid on us, not as a legal burden, but as an evangelical condition. And this very distress must serve to purify us.

9. (V. 5.) Affliction from without becomes temptation within, insinuates itself as a trial of faith, urges to the experiment, whether we might not have less of the cross. The same word πειρασμός LUTHER translates sometimes by Versuchung [temptation], sometimes by Anfechtung [trial].* This corresponds to the two sides of the idea. The design of Satan, who against his will must serve the purpose of God, is the wicked one of overthrowing by temptation; thus it is said: God tempts no man; and even Satan finds scope for his temptations only in man's own lust (James i. 18 sqq.); and yet we are not to think it strange, we should rather count it joy, when we fall into divers temptations [LUTHER: Anfechtungen] (1 Pet. iv. 12; James i. 2 sqq.), as Abraham was tempted (Gen. xxii.), or Israel (Gen. xv. 25; xvi. 4). This is temptation with the Divine purpose of trial and proof, and to this end, therefore, should the prayer: "Lead us not into temptation," be directed; not: Avert from us all trial, but: Restrain it within such bounds, and give to it such an issue (1 Cor. x. 13), that it become not to us an overpowering temptation. Thus Satan himself must serve the Lord in the salvation of men. From this wonderful complication of motives, Divine, devilish, human, is explained, even alongside of the word: "We are appointed to the suffering of affliction;" that other word again: "I endured it no longer." This is neither impatience nor a faint-hearted anxiety, but the faithfulness of love in doing its own part and neglecting nothing. He has no thought of setting aside or deprecating all Divine πειρασμός; but he would assist those under trial, so that no Satanic πειρασμός should overpower, alarm, or deceive them; for both fierce foes and seeming well-wishers (Matt. xvi. 23) can work to his mind. Paul is withal a wise instructor even in this, that he just as tenderly avoids agitating them beforehand with images of terror, as he again openly announces the danger.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

V. 1. What diligence in watering is shown by Paul! In the case of young plants this is especially necessary. But the tender and encouraging treatment has no other aim, than to lead them on to a Christian self-dependence. Thus Paul not merely passed through among them as a proclaimer of the word, but he was their father, and continued to be their pastor.—A true Apostle is intimately knit to the souls of his children, and can never forsake them. Such a spirit of love and truth forms the true apostolic succession.

V. 2. STARKE: He incites others to do what he cannot (Eph. vi. 22).—THE SAME: A few faithful laborers can accomplish more than many unfaithful ones (1 Cor. xv. 10).—Towards laborers worthy of the name, therefore, must the prayer of Matt. ix. 36 be directed, and also the attention of church-rulers. It is well for an assistant, whom an approved principal can commend, as Paul did Timothy.—STARKE: No man can be a true servant of God and helper in the gospel, unless he be a child of God, and on this account also a brother in Christ.

[Vv. 1, 2. MATTHEW HENRY: Those ministers do not duly value the establishment and welfare of their people, who cannot deny themselves in many things for that end.—J. L.]

V. 3. HEUBNER: The Christian's honorable calling; Christianity's first welcome: The position of a Christian, a position under the cross.—STÄNKELIN: The best ground of comfort, to save us from fainting in tribulation, is to consider well and firmly believe, that God in His goodness and wisdom has appointed to every one what in his station, and according to the measure of the powers granted to him, he is to suffer. Comfort and tribulation are by turns our heavenly companions; God be praised for both!—HEUBNER: We must have a hard heart toward the temptations of sin, but a soft one toward the sufferings of our brethren.—RIEGER: It is better to be appointed to suffering in time than to wrath (ch. v. 9); to you it is given to suffer—as great a gift as: to you it is given to believe (Phil. i. 29).—DIEDRICH: We must have tribulation, for we contend with the whole world, and a mighty prince.—[BURKITT: Seeing then that afflictions are appointed to us, and we appointed to them; seeing there is a decree of God concerning them, a decree as to the matter of them, as to the manner of them, as to the measure of them, as to the time of them, when they shall commence, how far they shall advance, how long they shall continue, seeing everything in affliction is under an appointment, how meek and humble, how patient and submissive, ought the Christian's spirit to be under them, and with what steadiness of expectation may and ought he to look up to heaven for a sanctified use and improvement of them!—J. L.]

STARKE: The word of the Apostle is confirmed by all the history of the Church. Here open enemies, there false brethren. But contending Christians have the surest hope of victory over their enemies, because they contend under One as their Leader, who has overcome the world and the prince of the world.—THE SAME: Before a man rightly understands the mystery of the cross, he is offended thereby, and supposes that, if a person acts properly, outward things must also at the same time go well with him; and therefore beginners in the Christian profession should be guarded betimes by good instruction against this offence.—To others applies the word of CHRYSOSTOM: Of you also it holds true, that ye have not yet resisted sin unto blood; and well it is, if only that is true, and not rather this: Ye have not yet even despised riches, &c. So much has Christ suffered for us enemies; and we for Him? nothing for Him, but only from Him innumerable benefits.

* [A similar variation marks the Common English rendering of πειρασμός and its cognate verb. Generally, indeed, our Translators use the word temptation, but sometimes with the other shade of meaning predominant.—J. L.]

* [This reference is scarcely to the point, since Paul there compares what Divine grace enabled him to do with what was done by the other Apostles.—J. L.]

V. 4. To find one's bearings by the word of prophecy—this was a great consolation for the Lord Jesus in His career of suffering (Luke xviii. 31; John xvii. 12; Matt. xxvi. 54); to say nothing, then, of ourselves. For us, when in tribulation, it is indispensable that we know, that so it must be—it was told us before.

V. 5. HEBURNER: The Apostles, like Jesus, did not deceive by empty promises.—Partnership helps to carry the burden. Am I to be my brother's keeper? Not in the sense of a faint-hearted carefulness, as if we could guard him, as if he were not in a far better Hand; but, just because we believe this, ought we to be intent in faithful love, as God's fellow-laborers, not to neglect our ministry; to look diligently after our brethren, not to pore in curious speculation; to encourage them by examples and intercession; to hold forth to them the prophetic word; to arouse the remembrance of their own experience of the truth of God; to point them to the gospel of Christ, who, stronger than the strong one [Luke xi. 21 sq.], knows well how to keep faith firm.—HEBURNER: These were church-visitations, where the inquiry was as to the state of the heart.—Even the loving consideration, that, to please their spiritual fathers, they should contend stoutly, may be made available for the strengthening of zeal; there is a sense of honor in the spiritual family.

[Observe the apostolic style of address to individuals and churches, as liable to fall away from their Christian standing and profession.—Faith, the Christian's defence against Satan's devices; comp. Eph. vi. 16; 1 John v. 4.—BURKITT: Though the labor of faithful ministers shall not be in vain with respect to themselves—their reward is with the Lord (the careful nurse shall be paid, though the child dies at the breast)—yet with respect to their people they may be in vain, yea worse, for a testimony against them; Mark vi. 11.—MATTHEW HENRY: Faithful ministers are much concerned about the success of their labors.—J. L.]

3. Timothy having brought good tidings, Paul is full of joy and thankfulness to God, to whom he at the same time says without ceasing, that he may be enabled to come unto them, and supply the deficiencies of their faith.

- 6 But now, when Timotheus came [But Timothy having just now come, ἀπὸ δὲ ἐλθόντος Τιμοθέου] from you unto us [to us from you, πρὸς ἡμᾶς ἀφ' ὑμῶν], and brought us good tidings of your faith and charity [love, ἀγάπην],* and that ye have good remembrance of us always, desiring greatly [longing]¹ to see us, as

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. (V. 6.) But, Timothy having just now, &c.—Casual, resumed afterwards in διὰ τοῦτο.—"Aprē, just, at present (Matt. ix. 18; 1 Cor. xvi. 7), is best referred, with GROTIUS, BENDEL, PELT, EWALD, HOFMANN, [ALFORD, WORDSWORTH, WEBSTER and WILKINSON, ELICOTT in the Commentary; his Translation follows the Common Version.—J. L.] to the participle; the Epistle was written immediately after Timothy's return, and hence the fresh joy and gushing love. DE WETTE and LÜNMANN [JOWETT] would connect ἀπὸ with (the somewhat remote) παρεκλήθημεν, v. 7, thus making the main thought to consist in the prominence given to the consolation in opposition to the sending of Timothy. But we should then be compelled unnecessarily to find an anacoluthon in διὰ τοῦτο. To us, that is, Paul; possibly even, Paul and Silas, if the latter had already arrived before Timothy.

2. And brought us good tidings, &c.—εὐαγγ., Heor. בְּשָׂרָה (1 Sam. xxxi. 9, Septuagint); here in its original signification, as at Luke i. 19 of the birth of the Baptist; elsewhere, throughout the New Testament, of the good tidings κατ' ἐξουσίαν, the tidings of redemption. The birth of John, moreover, is a part of these tidings of salvation. And here too there is something peculiarly earnest, an expression of his great joy, in the fact that Paul uses this word. It is to him a sort of gospel, a fruit of the gospel in the specific sense, the announcement of a Divine work, when he hears a good account of their faith (the root, without which love were merely a work of nature), and of their love (the fruit, the evidence of the living existence of faith; comprehensive love, as 1 Cor. xiii.; comp. 2 Thess. i. 3). CHRYSOSTOM: So great a good does he consider their confirmation to be. And thus he, the bringer of glad tidings, himself receives the glad tidings of the Divine work, the fruit of his gospel.

3. And that ye have (retain) a good (a truly loving, thankful, prayerful) remembrance of us; that they had thus not even been misled in regard to their teachers (HOFMANN). Not: ye make honorable mention of us (GROTIUS; that were frigid, and would require μνησθῆτε, LÜNMANN). This personal interest is connected with the main topic. If they continue in faith and love, the natural result of that is attachment to the Apostle. The ἀδελφές, always, and so immovably, we most naturally refer to the preceding ἐπερ ἐμεῖς (not, as HOFMANN, to what follows); the further explanation, as to how the remembrance shows itself, is given by ἐκινεσθεύετε: in that ye earnestly long; or, if the word is equivalent to the simple verb (KOCH, 252, after FRITZSCHE): * for this ye long, to see us. BENDEL: A sign of their good conscience.

4. (V. 7.) For this cause—embracing the contents of the participial construction in v. 6; as the Greeks sometimes elsewhere use ὁρῶς for resumption; we were comforted over you, on your account,* not superfluous even with διὰ τοῦτο; the persons are named in whom he finds comfort; then special mention is made of that quality of theirs, that is comforting to him: by your faith (the medium of the comfort); it was their faith about which he had been anxious. Between the two is a second ἐπὶ, denoting the situation in which he found himself: in † (2 Cor. vii. 4) all, our whole; the distress, taken together as a totality; not: every, which would have required ἑκάστη without the article. Ἀνάγκη denotes the distress from without, the evil condition; ἀλγίς, its inward operation, affliction, anguish.‡ It would be improper to ascribe to the former any special reference to pecuniary need.§ Altogether to be rejected is the idea of anxiety about the Thessalonians; for this would now certainly have been removed; whereas the ἐπὶ shows that he intends a distress that still continues, but in which he was comforted by the faith of the Thessalonians (LÜNMANN).

5. (V. 8.) For now we live, &c.; comp. Ps. xlii. 27 [26. WEBSTER and WILKINSON refer to Gen. xlii. 30; 1 Sam. xviii. 1; Gal. iv. 19]. He thus explains his having been comforted. Life in the full sense, opposed to distress and anguish, which is a death, a dying daily (1 Cor. xv. 31). CALVIN: Here we see, how Paul almost forgot himself for the sake of the Thessalonians. Rom. vii. 9, where he speaks of a death by sin, goes yet deeper. Seldom does Paul use ζῆν of the mere bodily life. If ye (emphatic) stand fast, remain steadfast; στέκετε, a later verbal form, derived from στήκειν, frequently employed by Paul: Rom. xiv. 4; Phil. i. 1; in the Lord, as your life-element, most intimately united to Him, rooted and sheltered in Him. He again employs ἕως for the future as wanting confirmation; not, however, as doubting them, but merely as a stimulus: It depends on you, to help in preparing for me death or life. Calvin: Hæc gratulatio vim exhortationis habet. He thereby precludes all rising of vanity in himself and the Thessalonians; but especially by means of the thanksgiving that follows.—HOFMANN, it is true, finds it impossible that the Apostle should make his present life depend on a condition, the occurrence of which only the future could show. He would therefore refer the words διὰ τῆς ὑμῶν πίστεως to what follows, so that we should have to assume an inversion at ἐπὶ;—

† (German: bei. ELICOTT describes this ἐπὶ as having what he calls a semilocal force, and as carrying the idea of "ethical contact." WEBSTER and WILKINSON: "with all. The ideas of succession and coexistence are involved in ἐπὶ thus used, principally the latter: comfort came after sorrow, but while the sorrow was still felt—came as a remedy or alleviation. Comp. 2 Cor. i. 4, and the exactly parallel circumstances and expressions in 2 Cor. vii. 4-7."—J. L.)

‡ [An altogether untenable distinction. DE WETTE refers both words to the Apostle's inward anxieties; LÜNMANN (followed by ALFORD and ELICOTT), to his outward troubles.—J. L.]

§ [A suggestion of MACKENZIE, and allowed by SCHOTT.—J. L.]

* [And so likewise ALFORD and ELICOTT make the ἐπὶ directive, not intensive.—J. L.]

unnecessary, for even in the strongly emphatic νῦν there lies a sufficient expression of the present condition for present life: "now (just because ye believe);" * and if the words, in Hofmann's construction of them, support the addition, as to the sense, of: and shall continue to live, if ye continue to believe, then so they do also in the ordinary construction. On the whole, Hofmann's division of the clauses in vv. 7-10 is extremely artificial and cumbersome.

6. (V. 9.) For what thanks, &c.—Thereby Paul confirms the weighty οὖν [ALFORD: "accounts for, and specifies the action of, the οὖν just mentioned."—J. L.]: What greater blessing could we have, for which to give thanks? The ἀνταποδοῖναι (ἀντδ), Joel iv. [iii. in the English arrangement.—J. L.] 4, Septuagint marks the thanksgiving as a return, requited for what was received; in 2 Thess. i. 6 it is used of primitive retribution. In the sphere of free, spiritual love it is thanksgiving, Pa. cxvi. 12. For the third time, and this time most emphatically, he expresses his thanks (ch. i. 2; iii. 13); this time also for the ascertained stability of the Thessalonians.—Περί, on your account; ἐν, on occasion of all the joy (the article marks the joy as a whole), wherewith we joy. [WEBSTER and WILKINSON: he has two subjects of thankfulness, their fidelity, and his own satisfaction therein.—J. L.]; § by attraction for ἵνα, since the accusative should have stood (Matt. ii. 10; Winer, § 32. 2). The dative, indeed, occurs also without attraction, John iii. 29; comp. Luke xxii. 15; WINER, § 54. 3. But in these places the dative of a substantive cognate to the verb goes to strengthen the verbal idea, like the Hebrew infinitive absolute. We might, therefore, rather compare such texts as Acts ii. 30; xvi. 28, where the dative is to be understood instrumentally.—Δι' ὧν belongs to χαίρομεν, not to what follows, which is already sufficiently defined; likewise ἐμπροσθεν &c. (before our God, who is ours and we His) still belongs to what precedes; for, referred to what follows, it would make the sentence drag, whereas, connected with χαίρομεν, it is by no means superfluous (EWALD, HOFMANN); rather is the import already given quite correctly by CALVIN: vere et absque simulatione ulla; LÜNMANN: with a pure joy, therefore, to which nothing earthly adheres (ALFORD: one which will bear, and does bear, the searching eye of God, and is His joy (John xv. 11).—J. L.]

7. (V. 10.) Night and day, &c.—Comp. ch. ii. 9; as according to that place his manual labor, so according to the present his fervent supplications also (2 Tim. i. 3) are prolonged into the night; very exceedingly, above measure exceedingly; a lively Pauline climax (ch. v. 13 (var.); Eph. iii. 20 (var.); comp. Mark vi. 51).—According to LÜNMANN [ALFORD: praying as we do, ELLICOTT, &c.] the participle δεόμενοι should depend on δυνάμεθα, v. 9. Not only, however, does that lie too far off, but, as regards the sense also, it is little suitable, since that δυνάμ. has an interrogative force, and presupposes the answer: We cannot indeed say what thanks would suffice. LUTHER and VON GERLACH take v. 10 as the answer to v. 9: What thanks! in that we pray; the thanks, that is, that we pray;—a fair sense, but too artificial. We do better, therefore, to take δεόμεν. as in apposition to χαίρομεν (DE WETTE): wherewith we joy, while we (at the same time) unceasingly pray.

8. That we may see, &c.—The object of the prayer is expressed in the form of a purpose: We pray, in order to see; as ch. ii. 12; 2 Thess. ii. 2.—Your face, as ch. ii. 17. Not merely, however, to luxuriate in sensibilities, but with the holy aim of redressing, supplying, completing; καταρτίζειν, from ἀρτος, integer, to mend, restore what has been damaged; the nets, Matt. iv. 21; spiritually, 1 Cor. i. 10; Gal. vi. 1; but also to complete what has not been damaged; the creation, Heb. x. 5; xi. 3. Nor in this case is it meant to convey a reproach of degeneracy; synonymous with προσκαταλθεῖν, 2 Cor. ix. 12.—Τὰ ὑστερήματα, the deficiencies, that wherein one is behindhand; of poverty in external things, 2 Cor. ix. 12; what is still outstanding of sufferings, Col. i. 24. We may distinguish, but not separate, deficiencies in the insight of faith from deficiencies in the power of faith in the life. They need instruction, exhortation, intercession. The ἰδὲν of v. 8 had already reminded them that no one, so long as he lives in the flesh, must imagine that he stands and cannot fall; ch. iv. shows, that Paul exhorts the Thessalonians in matters of practice, as well as instructs them in those of theory (LÜNMANN, against OLSHAUSEN).

9. (V. 11.) But * may He Himself, &c.—LÜNMANN: But may God Himself, our Father— refers ἡμῶν without reason to πατρί only [and so ALFORD, ELLICOTT, &c.]. We understand (against DE WETTE) that there is here a contrast with the Apostle, who prays that God Himself would do His work, and that in a twofold respect: 1. when he directs, smooths, expressly guides, our way to you (Luke i. 79, the feet; 2 Thess. iii. 5, hearts; comp. Rom. i. 10 [Sept. Ps. v. 8]), only so do we escape from empty places of our own, which Satan thwarts (ch. ii. 18); 2. but you (v. 12), whether we come or not (BENGLI), the Lord alone can duly confirm; we are, indeed, merely instruments for the καταρτίσαι, which proceeds from God.

10. Our God and Father and our Lord Jesus Christ: God gives only through Jesus; Christ also is invoked with the Father, comp. 2 Thess. ii. 16 sqq.; 1 Cor. i. 2; the verb in the singular shows, that the two are yet not two, but one Divine essence.†

11. (V. 12.) But you, may the Lord make, &c.—Πλεονδύσαι and περισσεύσαι, as previously κατευδύσαι, are three singulars of the optative aorist active, not infinitives (that would require the accent περισσεύσαι, and could only be understood as an arbitrary ellipsis); πλεονδύσειν occurs elsewhere in the New Testament only as an intransitive, here transitive (like the hiphil), and so in the Septuagint (of things, not persons), Num. xxvi. 54; Ps. lxxi. 21; περισσεύειν, generally intransitive, but also transitive: of things, 2 Cor. ix. 8; and the passive (Matt. xiii. 12) implies a transitive active. So then: May He make you perfect ‡ (not: through increase

* [δὲ—not simply μεταβαρύνειν (ELLICOTT: Now), but with its proper adverbative force: But—in spite of all Satan's hindrances, and notwithstanding the failure hitherto of our own repeated attempts and ceaseless longings.—J. L.]

‡ [German: er mache euch vollkommen;—a needless departure from the strict meaning of πλεονδύσαι, and one not justified by the parenthesis.—J. L.]

of numbers, but, as no doubt connected with that,) in love (dative, as in ch. ii. 17), and richly to abound; toward one another, therefore in brotherly love (ch. iv. 9), and toward all (who are not yet brethren); not merely: toward all other Christians, so that the first member should mean only; toward you Thessalonians one with another; still less is the second member merely expegetical: and that indeed all (Thessalonians). A groundless narrowing of the comprehensive sense.—Even as we also do toward you. Since the word is ἡμεῖς, not ὑμεῖς, we cannot supply an optative, but only περισεύομεν (intransitive) τῇ ἀγάπῃ. (GROTIUS: ἀγαπῶν.) We are in fact your model, as was said already, ch. i. 6; ii. 10; and that (HOFMANN) in love even to those who are not yet brethren; otherwise, indeed, we should not have come to you. Had we not loved you, before you were Christians, you would never have become such.

12. (V. 13.) To the end He, &c.—The final aim and effect of being perfected in love is the establishment of the heart; to become unblamable is the result of the συνήθειαι; on the day, not to the day, because the end is regarded as attained; breviloquence, for eis τὸ εἶναι ἀμώμους, 1 Cor. i. 8, and often. WINKER, § 66. 3. The negative (ἀμώμους) stands in the positive: in holiness (belongs to ἀμώμους). That should be the issue with the Thessalonians, as with the Apostle (ch. ii. 10). Holiness, the result of sanctification (ch. iv. 8), comprehends the whole life in and from the Spirit. The unblamableness in holiness has place before God's scrutinizing glance at the coming of the Lord Jesus. Μὲν &c. leans closely on παρουσία; it does not belong to the more remote ἀμώμους. Therefore: when He comes (παρουσία) with all His holy ones; His, Acts ix. 13, that is, Christ's (not, as LÜDEMANN would have it, contrary to the arrangement of the words, God's). In that lies the stimulus: see to it, that ye come along with them.—But who are the ἄγγελοι? The angels, His angels, are Christ's attendants at the judgment (Matt. xxv. 31; xiii. 41; xvi. 27; 2 Thess. i. 7); they are called in the Old Testament מַלְאָכִים, Septuagint simply ἄγγελοι, Ps. lxxxix. 6 [5] (?); Dan. iv. 10 [13]; viii. 13; at Zech. xiv. 5 it might be doubted whether angels only are meant. In the New Testament, on the contrary, ἄγγελοι without any addition never elsewhere denotes the angels, always Christians, Col. iii. 12, and how often! At Col. i. 26 one might possibly (comp. Eph. iii. 10) think of holy men and angels together. But do holy men come with the Lord? Rather, to Him, to meet Him (ch. iv. 16, 17), says PEITZ. In the meanwhile, however, they are with Him immediately after death (Phil. i. 23; 2 Cor. v. 8), and He will bring them with Himself (ch. iv. 14); rising before the living [before the rapture of the living.—J. L.], they may be described as coming with Him [caught up to meet the Lord in the air, they then do come with Him.—J. L.]; and with this must be compared 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3; xv. 23, 52; 2 Thess. i. 10. Thus, in favor of the reference to the angels (DE WETTE, LÜDEMANN, and others) is what is said of them elsewhere, and the Old Testament phraseology; against it is that of the New Testament (on which account VON GERLACH, HOFMANN and others, understand by the word the sleeping believers). We should then perhaps have to suppose, that the style of Daniel prevails in our Epistle, as likewise in 2 Thess. ii.—BENGEL and STARKE [ALFORD, ELLICOTT, WEBSTER and WILKINSON, &c.] understand by ἄγγελοι angels and glorified men together, and in favor of this very view reference might be made to Daniel, where besides angels men also, members of the people of God, who take the kingdom, are called קְדָשִׁים (ch. vii. 18, 22). Moreover, Heb. xii. 22, 23 puts the angels in company with the Church of the perfected first-born, who indeed have become λοδογματοῦν. (Luke xx. 36). The Lord is Head of the Church, as of principalities and powers (Eph., Col.).—Ἀμήν, which is added by A. D.¹ E. Sin. It. Vulg., suits the devotional strain, but for that very reason may have been of liturgical origin, or added by the copyist.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. (V. 6.) Faithfulness to the gospel is naturally connected with thankful love to those who publish it. ROOS: It is well, when after some time matters stand thus between teachers and their former hearers, whose spiritual fathers they are. Backsliders cannot think kindly of their former spiritual fathers, and have no longing desire to see them again, since shame and fear, or even a malignant bitterness, do preclude this.—The Apostle is far from fostering a false dependence, that leans on men rather than on the Lord Himself (1 Cor. i. 13 sqq.; iii. 4 sqq.). When a separation is necessary to a proper independence, the Lord brings it about for the upright in due time.

[BURKITT: Christian love doth earnestly long to evidence itself in Christian fellowship, and passionately desire the communion of saints, for the mutual comfort and spiritual advantage of each other.—J. L.]

2. (V. 7.) A man of faith, like Paul, needs comfort, and says so without disguise (Rom. i. 10); he takes no such high stand, as if he had no need of it. We scarcely form to ourselves an adequate idea of the agony of his soul for all his churches, and easily mistake in thinking generally of highly endowed and advanced Christians, forgetting that in the conflict they are most exposed and harassed.

3. In v. 7 Paul speaks only of the faith of the Thessalonians, the root; whereas at v. 12, the root being firm, his desire is turned simply to their increase in love, that expression of faith in the life, whose growth then again reacts to the strengthening of faith. Happy he, to whom the faith of others is a comfort, that enables him to disregard, yea, to vanquish, his own troubles. Only then, indeed, is there life (v. 8) full, blessed, worthy of the name, when such love finds its occasions of thankfulness.

4. (V. 10.) What we could not allow grammatically, that the prayer is the answer to the question, What thanks can we render? is yet perfectly true in reality. Prayer is the chief part of thanksgiving (Heidelberg Catechism, Qu. 116), according to the riches, that is, of God's goodness, which we honor by receiving out of its fulness grace for grace. Supplication is thus thanksgiving, and leads to thankfulness for what has been already received, as on the other hand thanksgiving is supplication for the continuance of the blessing, and impels to further and unceasing supplication.

5. Paul has to touch on the deficiencies of the Thessalonians; and how affectionately does he do so; with as much fatherly frankness as tenderness, and in a manner remote from all pedantry; not until he has testified his greatest joy. And they certainly agree with him—are in this also sensible of his pure love—say not: Have we any deficiencies?—STRÄHLIN: A true faith is still always defective. Frequently there is wanting a really convincing knowledge, whence doubts afterwards arise; frequently an assurance of the truth and sincerity of faith, and this arouses a struggle of self-denial; frequently growth in the same, when for many reasons a man is compelled for a long time to exercise himself in expedients alone; frequently the strength to do all things duly in faith. Through the word and prayer these deficiencies are supplied.—BERLENBRAGER BIBEL: Faith is a thing that can (and should) grow. We are not to stand still and become careless, as if we thought: Now the Church is planted. For the Church has enemies, and those planted are still novices.

6. (V. 11.) That, even when the matter on hand concerns the promotion of outward arrangements, as of a missionary journey, Jesus also is invoked, though not so prominently, almost exclusively, as the Saviour is among the Moravians,—this shows how the Apostles understand Matt. xxviii. [18]: all power in heaven and in earth. Not merely, therefore, in the heart, by means of the truth; that were to be a Prophet without being King. But this can be nothing else but the return of the glory, which He had before the world was (John xvii. 5). The Socinian theory, favored also by later writers, of the glorification, deification, of a man, who was not God from the beginning, is irreconcilable therewith. GESS: If for God to become man is something miraculous, for a man to become God is something monstrous. To make a creature Mediator between God and the creatures is to change the Mediator into a partition wall. If New Testament believers are not to be put in a lower position than those of the Old Testament, who depended on Jehovah Himself,* then must Jesus not be a mere man.

7. The Apostle's desire and prayer was first granted years after (Acts xx.). How much higher, then, truly are God's thoughts than even an Apostle's thoughts, and His ways higher than an Apostle's ways! His object, the confirmation of the Thessalonians, was attained through other means, especially even by means of his letters.

8. (V. 12.) Brotherly love and universal love are concentric circles—the centre, Christ. The narrower circle is not an occasion of bigoted exclusiveness, but a focus of refreshment for the wider one (2 Pet. i. 7). All, indeed, are called to be brethren. Between such as are so already, and such as have yet to become so, there exists before God an essential difference; before the eyes of men the transition is often imperceptible; no guild; no see here, see there. Where God really fills the heart, there also does love. But God only can give proficiency in this fulfilling of the law, as well as a beginning in it. He requires from us what exceeds our powers, that we may learn to obtain from Him by prayer the power to perform it (CALVIN). To become perfect in love imparts to the heart a steadfastness in willing nothing that is contrary to the will of God, Rom. xiii. 8, 10 (HOFMANN).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

V. 6. CHRYSOSTOM: Who is like Paul, who regards the salvation of his neighbors as his own, feeling toward all as the body toward its members?—RIEGER: What love to the sheep, that good news of them could so vivify him!—DIEDRICH: So does the shepherd's love identify him with the flock. This is the difference between the shepherd and the hireling.—Jacob revives on hearing that Joseph is alive; still more blessed is his joy, who has a faculty for hearing good in the highest sense of another (3 John 4; Luke xv. 7).

* [But not without the blood of sacrifice, and priestly intercession, and both as types of Him who was to come.—J. L.]

CHRYSOSTOM: Hear, how scholars are admired, who have a good remembrance of their teachers; how they are esteemed happy!—RIEGER: The Apostle regards the remembrance of him and the longing after him as in themselves good impulses, and as a proof of the value which they put on the gospel, and so likewise on strenuous laborers therein.

Vv. 7, 8. HEUBNER: The steadfastness of others strengthens ourselves.—In God's gift and work we find life. Without that, it deserves not the name.—SENKA: Etiam in longissima vita minimum est, quod vivitur.—[The spiritual welfare of the Church, and the strength and joy of her ministers, alike depend on the Church's faith.—J. L.]

V. 9. We cannot sufficiently give thanks! It were often more true to say: We do not sufficiently give thanks, even as we might. God's kindnesses, however, are in any case greater than that we should be able to repay them.—[MATTHEW HENRY: When we are most cheerful, we should be most thankful. What we rejoice in, we should give thanks for.—ADAM CLARKE: How near his heart did the success of his ministry lie!—J. L.]

V. 10. The calm collecting of holy thoughts in the night season—intercessory prayer in times of sleeplessness—is a good imitation of the Apostle.

HEUBNER: The more prosperous the beginning, with so much the greater zeal prosecute the work.—Along with joy over a good condition, two things are always needed to save us from falling into conceit, ostentation, presumption, self-sufficiency, and vain glorying in men: that the honor be given to God, and that we do not lose the recollection of actual deficiencies.—CALVIN: Even those, who are far ahead of others, are still far from having reached the goal.—No standing still; faith would be, not merely once established, but ever newly cherished and promoted.—[MATTHEW HENRY: When we are most thankful, we should also give ourselves to prayer; and those we give thanks for, yet have need to be prayed for.—J. L.]

V. 11. The Apostle's fervent spirit overflows in prayer, not merely in his chamber, but in the Epistle itself.

HEUBNER: All our steps and ways are in God's hand; to everything He must give His consent (Gen. xxiv. 40; Jer. x. 23; James iv. 13-15).—[To commit our way unto the Lord, the grand secret of a safe, contented, happy, and truly prosperous life.—J. L.]

V. 12.—HEUBNER: Love should not be scanty, poor, but rich, exuberant.—CHRYSOSTOM: Love after God's kind embraces all. If thou lovest this man, and that man not at all, this is nothing but a friendship after a human sort.—[MATTHEW HENRY: We are beholden to God not only for the stock put into our hands at first, but for the improvement of it also.—The more we are beloved, the more loving we should be.—J. L.]

V. 13. ROOTS: Establishment of the heart comes through growth in holiness, and this consists especially in love.—CHRYSOSTOM: By it the heart be comes unblamable, from which otherwise proceed evil thoughts, that cannot be there without outward act. There is no sin that is not consumed by the power of love, as by fire.—Love, feeding on the hope of heaven (Col. i. 4, 5), can only confirm, not prejudice, the salvation of souls.—[BENSON: Before God—it is a small matter to be accounted holy among men.—J. L.]

CH. IV. 1-8.

- 1 Furthermore, then, we beseech you, brethren, and exhort you [Finally then, brethren, we beseech you, and exhort]¹ by [in, ἐν] the Lord Jesus, that,² as ye have received of [according as ye received from]³ us how ye ought to walk and to please God, [even as also ye do walk,]⁴ so ye would abound more and more [ye would abound yet more].⁵ For ye know what commandments we gave you by the Lord Jesus. For this is the will of God, even your sanctification [God's will, your sanct., θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ, ὁ ἁγιασμός ὑμῶν]; that ye should abstain [ye abstain] from fornication; that every one of you should know how to possess his vessel [every one of you know how to possess himself of his own v.].⁶ 5 in sanctification and honor, not in the lust of concupiscence [in passion of lust, ἐν πάθει ἐπιθυμίας], even as the [also the, καὶ τὰ] Gentiles which [who] know not God; that no man [one] go beyond and defraud his brother in any matter [in the matter his brother, ἐν τῷ πράγματι τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ]: because that the Lord is the avenger of all such [an avenger for all these things, ἐκδικος . . . περὶ πάντων τούτων], as [even as, καθὼς] we also have forewarned [also told you before]⁷ and testified [fully testified].⁸ For God hath not called [did not call, οὐ . . . ἐκάλεσεν] us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness [for uncleanness, but in sanctification].⁹ He therefore [Wherefore then he]¹⁰ that despiseth, despiseth [rejecteth, rejecteth]¹¹ not man, but God, who hath also given [also gave]¹² unto us His Holy Spirit [His Holy Spirit unto you].¹³

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. (Vv. 1, 2.) Finally.—ἁπλῶς (for which the evidence here preponderates, comp. 2 Cor. xiii. 10), not materially different from τὸ ἁπλῶς, 2 Thess. iii. 1; Phil. iv. 8 is used either with a temporal meaning: henceforth, now (Matt. xxvi. 45), or in the sense of moreover; but not, as CHRYSOSTOM explains it: exmore. In the second signification it introduces the close of the discourse; GROTIUS: locutio propterantis ad finem. That is the case even here; from that is personal Paul turns to the closing exhortation, which indeed is prolonged.* He advances from wishing to exhorting (Roos). That they may become unblamable (ch. iii. 13; with which the οὖν forms an immediate connection), he beseeches and exhorts in those particulars, in which there is yet room for improvement in the deficiencies of their faith; thus letting the καταρτίσας begin meanwhile by letter, first in vv. 1-12 in reference to their walk, then in vv. 13 seq. in reference to their knowledge. In the classics ἐπαιρῶν means only to ask a question, but in the Septuagint it already stands for δοῦναι (Ps. cxxii. 8), and in the New Testament it often means to beseech (2 Thess. ii. 1).—And exhort, by virtue of apostolic authority; but the evangelical exhortation is a friendly entreaty, which respects freedom. The entreaty and the exhortation are exercised in the Lord Jesus; the fellowship of His life is the element (2 Cor. ii. 17); the Apostle acts as Christ's organ: he reckons not himself sufficiently worthy even to beseech or exhort. The object of the exhortation is marked substantively by τὸ (Luke xxii. 23, 24; Rom. viii. 26; WYLER, § 18. 3). The aim of the walk is to please God (as the Apostle pleases Him, ch. ii. 4). [WEBSTER and WILKINSON: "Θεὸς without art, such a being as God is."—J. L.]—Even as also ye do (actually) walk, recognizes what they already are; and this is implied also in the μᾶλλον: yet more (than you now do) should you become rich and abound (here intransitive)† therein. But not: You are to do more than is commanded.—For, confirms the exhortation by an appeal to their own knowledge of what commandments (1 Tim. i. 5, 18; the verb at v. 11 and 2 Thess. iii. 4) they had received (comp. 1 Cor. xv. 1; Gal. iv. 13).—The Lord Jesus, is not quite equivalent to ἐν of v. 1; we might have expected him to say: Jesus gave them by us; but he says on the contrary: We gave them by Him the Mediator of all truth and all authority; not δι' ἐμαυτοῦ did I command; comp. Rom. xv. 30. Synonymous with ἐν δυνάμει, 2 Thess. iii. 6; διὰ τοῦ δυνάματος, 1 Cor. i. 10.

2. (V. 3.) For this is God's will, &c. (ch. v. 18); [WEBSTER and WILKINSON: "The art. with Θεὸς draws attention to the circumstance that God had just been spoken of as one to whose will it should be our main object to conform, 'our God,' the God we serve."—J. L.]; with this begins the special detail of the παράγγελια. The subject is τοῦτο; the predicate δέλημα (according to the best authorities, without the article). What follows does not embrace the entire will of God on all its sides; multa sunt voluntates, Acts xiii. 22; BENGEI.*—In apposition to τοῦτο,† and substantially the subject of the statement, is ὁ ἀγιασμός, which differs from ἀγιασθήναι, ch. iii. 13, in that the latter denotes the religious and moral character, but ἀγιασμός the religious and moral process, the work of sanctification. Not materially different is HOFMANN's view, according to which ὁ ἀγ. were merely appositional (to δέλημα?), and the proper definition of the τοῦτο would be first given by the following infinitives. In our Epistle Paul has as yet no occasion, as in Rom. iii.-vi., to develop, in polemic opposition to Jewish legality, justification as the basis of sanctification; nor is that the case in the Corinthian Epistles; Paul has no set form; but the soul of his thought and action is this: "By the grace of God I am what I am" (1 Cor. xv. 10). OLSHAUSEN, like some of the older interpreters, would understand ἀγ. as opposed to the immediately following πορνεία, in the special sense of chastity. But that is ἀγγελία. Not even in Rom. vi. 19; 1 Tim. ii. 15, is the narrower sense found. And ἀκαθαρσία likewise, v. 7, is more comprehensive, including also covetousness, as in ch. ii. 3, 5. Though γὰρ of v. 7 shows indeed that v. 6 must come under the contrast between uncleanness and sanctification, yet it does not at all follow from that, that the idea of the former is here limited to unchastity (see on v. 6). Rather, abstinence from fornication is merely one (chief) instance of the sanctification which he recommends.

3. (Vv. 3-5.) That ye abstain, &c.—The (accusative with infinitive is exegetical or appositional to ἀγιασμός. On the subduing of fornication, comp. 1 Cor. vi. and vii. CHRYSOSTOM: When he says, "from all fornication," he leaves it to those who know, to think of the various kinds of lewdness. With the negative Paul couples the positive in the form of a coördinate accusative with infinitive: that every one of you know, εἰδέναι as scire, understand how to, be able to—(we only properly know, what we can also do)—acquire, get,‡ not possess, which must have been expressed by the perfect κεκτήσθαι; no other tense means to possess, not even Sir. vi. 7; li. 20. By σκεῦος, however, vessel, utensil, tool, ἔργον, some (TERTULLIAN, CHRYSOSTOM [and the other more eminent Greek commentators, THEODORET, THROPHYLACT, EUSEBIUS.—J. L.], CALVIN, GROTIUS [Bishops HALL and WILSON,

* [ELICOTT would explain the absence of the article simply by reference to the substantive verb preceding.—J. L.]

† [ELICOTT [after ALFORD] says, "to the preceding δέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ." But his previous remark, that one reason why τοῦτο, the subject, is placed somewhat emphatically forward is, that it may "direct the reader's attention to the noun in apposition that follows," naturally suggests the other and, I think, better view.—J. L.]

‡ [German: erwerben, for κτάσθαι. JOWETT and ELLICOTT: get himself. In the Revision I suggested: possess himself of—a phrase which Vaughan has adopted. WORDSWORTH: "acquire and hold"; WEBSTER and WILKINSON: secure the possession of.—J. L.]

HAMMOND, WHITEY, &c.—J. L.), BENIGEL, OLSHAUSEN, PELT [WORDSWORTH, WEBSTER and WILKINSON]* understand the body; others (THEODORE of Mopsuestia, AUGUSTINE, THOMAS AQUINAS, ZWINGLI, WEISTEIN, SCHOTT, DE WETTE, LÜNMANN, EWALD, HOFMANN [JOWETT, ALFORD, ELLICOTT]), † the wife. The former say that Scripture in still other places speaks of the body in this sense—does not treat it contemptuously as the prison of the soul—recognizes indeed the trouble that it makes for us as the seat, not the origin, of sin—but requires that it stand in the Lord's service as a sanctified organ of the Spirit (1 Cor. vi. 13); comp. 2 Cor. iv. 7 (where, it is true, the epithet δοτράκω is not to be overlooked); the Rabbins, moreover, use בשר of the body; Philo says repeatedly: τὸ τῆς ψυχῆς ἀγγεῖον τὸ σῶμα; Barnabas, 7. 11: σκεῖος τοῦ πνεύματος; but also, ch. 21, simply: τὸ καλὸν σκεῖος. In our text ἐαυτοῦ might, if necessary, take the place of πνεύματος. But how does κτᾶσθαι, to get, to obtain, suit with this? For to possess is not the meaning of the word, but acquire—an argument already employed by WEISTEIN. Accordingly κτᾶσθαι would have to signify to get the mastery over; CHRYSOSTOM: Only through sanctification do we gain the body for a σκεῖος; sin, on the contrary, gains it, when we are impure. As this is of itself somewhat artificial, so it is entirely at variance (DE WETTE, LÜNMANN [KOCH, ALFORD, ELLICOTT]) with the fact, that to κτᾶσθαι really belongs also the negative definition (v. 5), μὴ ἐν πάθει ἐπιθυμίας (the genitive as in ch. i. 3; passion peculiar to lust, concupiscence; ἐπιθ. is the natural element of sin (Rom. vii. 7), which swells to passion; comp. πάθη ἀτιμίας, Rom. i. 24, 26). So then: You are to acquire the σκεῖος in sanctification, not in passionate lust; this does not suit the assumed meaning of σκεῖος; for, in truth, it is only by sanctification that the mastery over the body is gained; by lust comes the opposite, the loss of the mastery. Gain the mastery over the body, not in passion, were to give an absurd turn to the prohibition.†

We are thus driven to the other explanation, for which, it is true, Scripture furnishes as little as for the first any perfectly exact parallel. For passages where man is described generally as a figure of clay (Is. xlv. 9, and often), or expressions as σκεῖον ἁλόως, Rom. ix. 23, and such like, are too dissimilar. The one that comes nearest seems to be 1 Pet. iii. 7; but even there the wife is described as the weaker vessel, to wit of the Divine grace, merely in the relation of contrast, over against the stronger vessel, but not as the vessel or instrument of the man. Among the Rabbins, however, the latter idea is found (with the blunt explanation: cui immittitur semen): vas meum quo ego uxor, Megill. Esth. 1. 11; and, besides, κτᾶσθαι is used of taking a wife (Ruth iv. 10, Septuagint; Sir. xxxvi. 29 [24]).

It is objected, 1. that this would be to speak too meanly of the wife, as of a dependent instrument of the man, contrary to the reciprocity of 1 Cor. vii. 4; 2. that the opposition to πορν. would be taken somewhat too narrowly, especially if we understand the matter thus: You are to contract marriage in sanctification, not in lust; in this way the exhortation would be, not for such as still remain single, or for widowers, and for others, even only in regard to the formation of the marriage tie; 3. (a point made by OLSHAUSEN, and also by CALVIN before him), that the exhortation would thus not at all apply to the woman. It may be replied (with DE WETTE and LÜNMANN), 1. that the wife is not in every respect viewed as the instrument of the man, but only in the special relation suggested by the opposition to πορν. Keep yourselves from vaga libido; procure rather every one his own instrument, to wit, for the instinct in question, not as one in πορν. procures a σκεῖος, not his own, in passionate lust. Here, as in 1 Cor. vii., Paul speaks plainly and undisguisedly, but yet briefly and decently. 2. This exhortation is generally applicable; that is to say, those who do not possess the gift of continence (1 Cor. vii. 2, 9) are, for the sake of avoiding πορν., to take to themselves every one his own regular wife (if they are still single or widowers), and not use a σκεῖος that is not their own; but neither are they to marry in a merely fleshly way, and just so they are not to lead their married life in that spirit. It concerns both the formation of the marriage relation and the subsequent life therein, when it is said: Obtain your σκεῖος (at first and ever afterwards) in sanctification and honor. 3. This exhortation Paul directs with perfect propriety to the men as the specially active parties, who readily allow themselves greater liberty in this thing. The inference as regards Christian women was self-evident.

LÜNMANN thinks that in sanctification and honor is merely an explanation of what is implied in the expression, his own vessel. But the sense is richer, if we thus distinguish: 1. Let every one acquire his own vessel, and that, indeed, 2. in the proper way, as it should be acquired (and then also kept accordingly). It is not enough that one have a wife; it is likewise important, in what way he has got and now holds her. "For a man may be drunk even on his own wines." The proper mode of the κτᾶσθαι is therefore described: in sanctification inwardly, before God, so that there is an imitation of the love of Christ (Eph. v.) and a mutual furtherance in the service of God and in the rule of the spirit; whence follows in the relation between man and man: and in honor (Col. ii. 23; 1 Pet. iii. 7); in maintaining one's own honor, and in the respect or manifestation of honor that is shown to the wife; as opposed to the ἀτιμία of him who sinks himself below the beasts, desecrating and degrading the σκεῖος by a sinful abuse through παθ. ἐπιθ. in fornication, or even in carnal excesses within the limits of marriage.

Even as also the Gentiles; καὶ in comparisons, v. 13; Rom. iv. 6; ἐδρῆ, as frequently for ἐδρῆκολ.

4. (V. 6). That no one go beyond, &c., is added by asyneton, with this variation, that now τὸ stands with the infinitive. Τὸ μὴ ὑπερβαίνειν

* [I should say, a majority of all the commentators.—J. L.]

† ELLICOTT: "and apparently the majority of recent expositors." Most of the older commentators go the other way.—J. L.]

‡ [I must still question whether the above argument, however plausible, is quite as demonstrative, as has been supposed. As I remarked in the Revision: "If the writer really meant to say: 'Instead of serving divers lusts and pleasures (Tit. iii. 3, δουλεύοντες ἐπιθυμίας κτλ.), and thus making the body your tyrant (Rom. xvi. 18; 2 Pet. ii. 19) and your God (Phil. iii. 19), let every one of you seek to get possession and control of it, in a holy and honorable use, not in a vile abuse,' it does not appear that such a construction would be in any respect more harsh and difficult than what is often met with; e. g. Rom. iii. 8; 1 John iii. 12." Comp. 1 Cor. ix. 27. JOWETT: "The words ἐν πάθει ἐπιθυμίας, though forming an antithesis to ἐν ἀγιασμῷ καὶ τιμῇ, need not necessarily, when applied to the heathen, carry us back to κτᾶσθαι τὸ σκεῖος. In v. 5 these latter words are lost sight of, and some general idea gathered from them, such as 'living' ἐν πάθει ἐπιθυμίας."—J. L.]

cannot depend on εἰδέναι; if on account of the article it could not be parallel to ἀπέχεσθαι and εἰδέναι, then neither is it parallel to κτίσθαι, which without the article depends on εἰδέναι. BENDEL sees in the asyndeton a proof that Paul is proceeding with the same topic, the τὸ bringing confirmation and climax to what was last said. It is, on the whole, supposed by many (CHRYSOSTOM: the subversion of marriage is worse than the robbery of treasures, JEROME, ERASMUS [Bishop Wilson], WESTSTEIN, OLSHAUSEN, PELT, VON GERLACH [JOWETT, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, VAUGHAN, WORDSWORTH, WEBSTER and WILKINSON, and most others]), that πλεονεκτεῖν (to overreach, injure) stands here, not in its ordinary meaning, but figuratively of violated marriage, as Prov. vi. 29-32 compares the thief and the adulterer (that, however, is not to describe the adulterer figuratively as a thief); comp. 2 Sam. xii. (but that is an express parable), and the tenth commandment (of the Reformed division),* which embraces both kinds of sins. Paul (they think), having said before that fornication is contrary to sanctification, and therefore to God, now goes on to say that it wounds also brotherly love—is, so to speak, a greedy grasping at conjugal property, an injury to the rights of a brother. The specification, ἐν τῷ πράγματι, would then be used euphemistically: "in the matter" (that mentioned in vv. 4, 5; 2 Cor. vii. 11). On any other view, it is thought, there would be a quite abrupt introduction by asyndeton of a new subject, whereas even the γὰρ of v. 7 shows that v. 6 speaks of the uncleanness of lewdness.

Against the last remark, see Exeg. Note 2 (on v. 3); ἀκαθαρσία is all impurity of the natural man, the dominion of the flesh over against the spirit; covetousness also belongs to it. On the other hand, there is no example (for a parable like that of Nathan is not one) of the asserted figurative use of πλεονεκτεῖν; and even the asyndeton does not prove what these interpreters wish. Indeed, closely viewed, something even false would be the result of this. That is to say, were τὸ μὴ &c. of v. 6 merely appositional to vv. 4, 5—if nothing but a new side of πορνεία were to come out of it—then the adulterous πλεονεξία must be a characteristic of all πορνεία; a man, in other words, must thereby invade the rights of his brethren; which yet is not the case, for there is many an instance of πορν., which violates no brother's right of possession; that is the case only in a single definite relation, and must consequently have been mentioned as something new, not simply as an apposition to what precedes. Even LÜNMANN is here too punctilious, when on account of the τὸ he would take μὴ ὑπερβ. as coordinate, not with ἀπέχ. and εἰδέναι, but with ὁ ἀγασμός: The will of God is 1. your sanctification, abstinence from fornication, and so forth; and 2. the μὴ ὑπερβαλεῖν. But in this way there results the awkwardness of understanding ἀγασμός of v. 3 in the narrower sense of chastity, whereas in v. 7 it is understood by LÜNMANN himself (who takes v. 6 as an exhortation against covetousness) in the wider sense. We cannot be driven to this by that article.

Even if we had to acknowledge in this a slight ruggedness of style, we should yet say with HOFMANN, that the very article shows that something new, and of a different nature, now comes in. The difficulty disappears, as soon as (in reading) we punctuate somewhat more strongly after ἀγασμός ὑμῶν, and again after μὴ εἰδόντα τὸν θεόν. Thus (with ORIGEN, CALVIN, ZWINGLI, GROTIUS, DE WETTE, LÜNMANN, EWALD, HOFMANN, and others) we recognize in v. 6 a new exhortation to a second evidence of sanctification (along with chastity as the first) in honesty of dealing, instead of a reckless and covetous overreaching. Many take ὑπερβαλεῖν absolutely, without an object, modum excedere; LUTHER: to grasp too far; IL 9. 501; PLATO, Rep. 386. A But since the one τὸ μὴ takes the two verbs close together, we shall do better by referring also, with HOFMANN, the addition ἐν τῷ πρ. and the object to both verbs; and then ὑπερβ., to go beyond, is the same thing as to take no notice of, recklessly to disregard; in what? even in πλεονεξία, the desire to have more. The verb is transitive also in 2 Cor. xii. 17, 18; τῷ enclitic, for τῷ, as GROTIUS explains it, is not according to New Testament use—not even in 1 Cor. xv. 8; ἐν τῷ πρ. means: in the business (Rom. xvi. 2), or even lawsuit (1 Cor. vi. 1), on hand at any particular time.*

His brother—is this to be understood of brother in the widest sense, as equivalent to πλησίον? That, however, is contrary to the usage. Even ὁ denotes a member of the people of God. But should the limitation, as in Deut. xxiii. 19 sq., indicate a difference in the treatment of brethren and of strangers? By no means; it does not consist with the context, that those who are not brethren should be otherwise treated (comp. ch. iii. 12); Paul, looking simply at the intercourse of Christians with one another, requires that the same should be fraternal, and he uses the name of brother as an argument against unbrotherly overreaching; atologia fugienda transgressionis, BENDEL; just as in 1 Cor. vi., where in like manner the transition from fornication (ch. v.) to covetousness is by asyndeton, hurried and abrupt. In other places also Paul puts close together these two capital vices, Eph. iv. 19; v. 3, 5; Col. iii. 5.

Confirmation of the warning: Because that (Rom. i. 19, 21) the Lord (BENDEL: Christus iudex) is an avenger (vindex, Rom. xiii. 4) for all these things; the most diverse sins (suits better, if the previous discourse was at least of two kinds of sin, and not merely of two forms of the same sin); comp. 1 Cor. v. 11; vi. 9, 10; Gal. v. 19 sqq.†

* [Per contra, ELLICOTT: "The clause is not merely parallel to the anathrous εἰδέναι, but reverts to the preceding ἀγασμός" (ELLICOTT on this point agreeing with LÜNMANN), "of which it presents a specific exemplification more immediately suggested by the second part of ver. 4. First, πορνεία is prohibited; then a holy use of its natural remedy affirmatively inculcated; and lastly, the heinous sin of μοιχεία, especially as regarded in its social aspects, formally denounced. So rightly Chrys. (ἐνταῦθα περὶ μοιχείας ὁποῖον ἀντιτίθεται δὲ καὶ περὶ πορνείας πάσης), and after him Theod., Theophyl., Ecum., and the majority of modern commentators. To regard the verse with Calv., Grot., and recently De Wette, Lünemann, Koch, as referring to the fraud and covetousness in the affairs of life, is (a) to infringe on the plain meaning of τῷ πράγματι; (b) to obscure the reference to the key-word of the paragraph, ἀκαθαρσία, ver. 7; (c) to mar the contextual symmetry of the verses; and, lastly, to introduce an exegesis so frigid and unnatural, as to make us wonder that such good names should be associated with an interpretation so seemingly improbable." So ALFORD and JOWETT. Comp. Notes a and b in the Revision of this verse.—J. L.]

Even as we also told you before, not merely before this Epistle; that idea lies simply in the aorist (when we were with you, even then our oral teaching was to no other effect); but the πρὸ (comp. πρὸς with πρὸς, Gal. v. 21) contains a reference to the coming of Christ to judgment: "before it happens;" and (by way of corroboration) fully testified (ch. ii. 12 [11]). 5. (Vv. 7, 8.) For God did not call, &c.—What prompted the exhortation, a return to the fundamental idea of v. 3. The change from ἐπὶ to ἐν is not without design. The former might possibly mark the condition: on the ground of. But to specify a ground, even in a negative way, does not accord with the free grace of the call. But, since the purpose of an action is the motive of it, ἐπὶ may also express for the purpose of, hac lege ut casum, Gal. v. 13; Eph. ii. 10; WINKER, § 48, C. [WEBSTER and WILKINSON: "on the understanding of"—J. L.]. 'Er, on the contrary, is internal; it may be understood by brevilence (in order to be) as equivalent to ἐν (WINKER, § 50, 5; 1 Cor. vii. 15 with Col. iii. 15); but also of the essential nature of the καλεῖν (BENCKE, HOFMANN): in the offer and operation of sanctification the καλεῖν existed; that was the element in which the καλεῖν moved. The Apostle does not think so specially as we do of sanctification as a gradual subdual of the flesh, but it is for him separation from the world for God, the being made partakers of His Spirit; ἐν as Gal. i. 6; Eph. vi. 4.

Wherefore then he that despiseth [reject-eth]; *—ἀσχεῖν, to invalidate, treat as null; more rarely with a personal object: to reject (Luke x. 16); in the Septuagint frequently for ῥῖπ. Is. xxi. 2; xxiv. 16. To the participle some supply ἐμὲ, others τοῦτο, τὴν ἐν ἀγασμῷ κλήσιν, τὰς παραγγελίας (v. 2), not incorrectly as regards the sense, but grammatically it is better to take it (with DE WETTE, LÜNEMANN, HOFMANN [JOWETT, ALFORD, ELLICOTT]) as without an object, substantively: the despiser [rejecter]. In what follows we must not take οὐκ for οὐ μόνον, which weakens the force of the statement, but thus: The man, through whom the commands were conveyed to him, does not even come into view by the side of the despising of God, from whom they spring. In the case of ἀνδρῶν, to think with OECUMENIUS, PELT, of the overreached brother, v. 6, or even with HOFMANN of the misused woman, and the brother injured through covetousness, is still more out of the way.†

In the addition: who (also, ‡ together with the calling) giveth (continuously), or gave (once) His Holy Spirit unto you, lies the climax of the exhortation. With the reading, unto us, one might think of the Apostles, who speak from the Spirit (1 Cor. vii. 40), whose word therefore is not to be despised, or again (since this apologetic assurance is here uncalled for) of Christians generally. The better attested δυνάμει, however, is for the readers: He giveth (or gave) into you [in euch hincin, for ἐν δυνάμει] His Spirit, the Holy Spirit, who incites to sanctification, to dwell in you; and thus (DE WETTE, OLSHAUSEN), along with the commandment, the gift also of discernment, illumination through the prophets among you (ch. v. 20), and the spirit of discernment in yourselves (ch. v. 21), so that ye are able to judge whether I speak from myself—so that ye are θεοδιδάκτοι (v. 9); and thus to you, moreover, sanctification is made a possible thing, for surely ye have not in vain received His Holy Spirit (EWALD); ye are, therefore, also the more inexcusable, if ye despise His commandments, grieve the Holy Spirit, and resist His discipline (Eph. iv. 30; LÜNEMANN, HOFMANN).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. (V. 1.) There is danger in knowing the way, and not going forward (James i. 22). Standing still tends to backsliding. The point is, to walk continually, step by step, even to the mark. CHRYSOSTOM: The earth returns more than is given to it.—But this as fruit, from the living force of the seed; no opera supererogationis. The true παρασθέν is not any acting over and above the commandments (v. 2), but a more and more willing fulfilment of the commandments. ZWINGLI: No one can here be perfect, and he that standeth, let him take heed lest he fall. Daily we fall and sin; let us also daily arise.—That requires an ever fresh exhortation and admonition in the midst of the frivolity of an age, which heedlessly despises the judgment of God.—RIEGER: When one has once received from another something pertaining to instruction in the matter of salvation, this forms a tie between hearts, such that one may hope to effect a still further advance. A word received with love into the heart communicates to us also an impulse to become ever more perfect. [MATTHEW HENRY: The Apostle taught them how to walk, not how to talk.—ADAM CLARKE: God sets no bounds to the communications of His grace and Spirit to them that are faithful. And as there are no bounds to the graces, so there should be none to the exercise of those graces.—J. L.]

2. (V. 2.) BENCKE remarks, that in the Epistles to the only recently founded church at Thessalonica the Apostle speaks frequently of his commands; but seldom in Epistles to churches of longer standing. Evangelical freedom is no antinomianism. The ordinances of God require the obedience of faith. Absolute autonomy and creaturehood are mutually irreconcilable. The way to true Christian freedom lies through the obedience of faith.

3. (V. 3.) Sanctification is separation from the things of the world, purification from the pollution of the flesh, the surrender of ourselves to the service of God, to the dominion of the spirit over the flesh, for a pure offering to God who is holy, that is, who abides like Himself, asserting Himself in His spirituality, and therefore with an absolute superiority, not only to everything impure, but to all that is created. Lev. xix. 2, Ye shall be holy, for I am holy.—RIEGER: Under the impulse of His Spirit it pervades the whole man, so that all his powers and members are occupied in the service of righteousness. To this points even the emotion of shame, wherein is proclaimed a consciousness of the fall, and a longing after original innocence.—THE SAME: We must not regard sanctification as such a lofty the word things, and nearly all commentators agree in making the pronoun neuter.—Our author's remark on ἐν τῇ χάριτι—made frequently by those who take his view of τὸ μὴ ὄντως κ.τ.λ.—is of no weight. Why may not the reference be to the various forms of fleshly uncleanness?—J. L.]

* [See Critical Note 11.—J. L.]

† [ELLICOTT: "a man, any man, with a latent reference to the Apostle."—J. L.]

‡ [The author brackets the καὶ also in the translation. See Critical Note 12.—J. L.]

virtue, that only a very few are required to strive after it (comp. Heb. xii. 14).

4. (V. 3-6.) We need not be surprised at this warning against gross sins. The gospel does not cut off magically at one blow all danger of seduction. Gross sins on one side, great workings of the Spirit on the other—such is the mighty contrast in the primitive churches. Nowadays everything is brought much nearer to a level. Besides, the lust of the flesh and the thirst for gain are the capital vices, not merely of heathenism, but to this very day especially of so many a rich commercial town.

5. (8-5.) Sensuality is a peculiarly powerful lust of the natural man, and strives against sanctification. Heathen laxity accounts it a matter of indifference, unless some right of wedlock is infringed; nay, by a reciprocal influence of error and lusts (Eph. iv. 22), and in consequence of a wicked ignorance of the holy God, heathenism, while deifying the natural instinct, sanctions even a "holy" debauchery, and that even to the most unnatural abominations (comp. my Discourse on the calling of the prophet Hosea, Basel). Even the nobler heathens, e. g. PLATO in the Symposium, sometimes commend in the wise man as a sublime continence that without which a Christian were no Christian, while they speak of shameful things without any holy abhorrence. How feeble is their protest even against pederasty! And, sure enough, what a state of things was that of the Roman world at that time! A quite different spirit of earnest opposition was shown already even by the law of the Old Covenant (Lev. xviii. 30; Deut. xxii. 21; xxiii. 17); and the gospel thoroughly enforces the demand for resistance even to the secrecy of the thoughts (Matt. v. 28). On one occasion the Apostle appeals to the Christian sense of honor: Ye will not, surely, take the members of Christ, and make them the members of a harlot (1 Cor. vi. 15)? and then again as here: Ye will not be willing, I hope, to live as do the heathen? Such admonitions are still needed by us. For the prevailing tendency is to think far too lightly of the fleshly lusts, which yet war against the soul.—RIEGER: When a stale Christianity is ever anew reviving all heathenish vanities in operas, plays, novels, shameful pictures and images, it falls again likewise, along with heathenish unbelief, into heathenish fornication.—To subdue it is not an affair of a single resolution, but of continuous practice.—CHRYSOSTOM: of an earnest discipline—grounded in a knowledge of one's own bodily and mental disposition, and showing itself by caution in intercourse, avoidance of all temptations, of all impurity in look, gesture, touch, of all seductive reading, whereby the evil treasure of the heart is enlarged, by laying hold of the Divine help, turning to account past experiences, perseverance in prayer, serious contemplation of the shortness of life and the preciousness of the faculties vouchsafed, by exerting the same with faithful diligence, and, above all, by overcoming in the blood of Jesus (Rev. xii. 11).

A principal means, and one of Divine appointment, is the holy and honorable use of marriage; "incontinentia medicina et continentia ipsa," C. Heb. 29. But it must not be contracted in a way of carnal frivolity, nor carried on in a spirit of carnal license. Paul speaks of these things without any absurd prudery or spurious spirituality; what belongs to nature he mentions without disguise, does not dispute what is due to a natural necessity, but insists on discipline and a hallowed method in the satisfaction of this instinct. We ought to be thankful for this sober teaching, equally remote as it is from a false burdening of the conscience through monkish perverseness (comp. 1 Cor. vii. 8-5, in opposition to a merely nominal marriage), and from a privileged explanation of immoderate fleshly lust. Nor are we at liberty to decline even the humiliation implied in the assignment of motive, 1 Cor. vii. 2.

ZWINGLI: Paul does not altogether forbid the affection²—quis enim sine affectu cohabitavit uxori suae?—but whatever in that regard is immoderate and disorderly.—What is essential in holy wedlock is the helping of one another to grow in the rule of the spirit (RIEGER: sanctification with reference to God and His service); this Divine aim in connection with what is humanly noble, to be mindful of one's own honor, and not less of the honor and dignity of the woman in a due regard to her personality. This requires a constant modesty; for the Divinely ordained instinct (Gen. i. 28; ii. 24) is no longer since the fall to be regarded as uninjured (Gen. iii. 7). Whoever abandons himself without reserve to lust, in his case it degenerates for his punishment into a ruling passion, of which he becomes the slave.

6. (V. 5.) That the Gentiles know not God (Gal. iv. 8; Eph. ii. 12; iv. 17 sqq.); this statement seems to be contradicted, not merely by so many beautiful expressions of the heathen respecting Divine things, but by the Apostle's own words, when he pronounces them inexcusable, Rom. i. 19 sqq., for the very reason that they know God by His creation. But the principle of reconciliation is found in the last mentioned passage itself. When they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, and thus their thoughts became vain and their foolish heart was darkened. They held down* the truth in unrighteousness. They consequently do not know God as the God before whom we stand, the Holy One with eyes of flame, who is Spirit and not flesh; whom we know only in proportion to our sanctification; for it is only when we are willing to strive after that which is the will of God, that we receive also the witness of the Spirit, and attain to the full knowledge of Him as the Searcher of our life. Even of men, whom we know merely by sight or from hearsay, not from personal intercourse, we do not say that we know them. In this full, living sense, therefore, the heathen know not God (τὸν Θεόν, the one, true God). This is a guilty ignorance, of which the general and the individual guilt are in an inverse proportion. But even the better views—how fragmentary are they, and how little do they amount to an undoubting, salutary, popularly pervasive knowledge!

7. (V. 6.) Paul frequently brings together the two capital vices, lust and covetousness; comp. also Heb. xiii. 4, 5. Between these two diverging sins there is affinity and contrast. Both are characterized by unfaithfulness, unbelief, as if God did not see or avenge—as if He were not a Spirit, nor holy. The man who is unfaithful to God in regard to his body, that nearest of possessions, is easily so likewise in reference to property of every kind, and vice versa. Or perhaps sin develops itself in a one-sided way. Libertines may be loyal and generous in money matters; honest people are frequently covetous, niggardly, bent on their own advantage. Indeed, covetousness is the vice of upright people, and is often joined to a pharisaic religionism; it is also much more rarely confessed than other sins. BINK gives us the statement of a Catholic confessor, that in twenty years innumerable sins had been confessed to him, but not in a single instance covetousness. Then perhaps, in circumstances of special temptation, the mischief breaks out also in the other direction. Not being thoroughly faithful, they have no power of resistance.

8. (Vv. 7, 8.) The Divine call, and, along with that, the communication of the Holy Spirit, enhance responsibility (Luke xii. 48). And indeed the final measure of all sin is not the injury done to our neighbors, but the contempt put upon God (Ex. xvi. 7; 1 Sam. viii. 7). People are fain to put forward as an excuse their dislike to men.—ZWINGLI: The parson I will not listen to, the false teacher, the heretic;—such is the talk of those who do not dare openly to reject God.—To what extent may the cause of the teacher be identified with that of God? A wicked, hierarchical abuse is certainly possible, and occurs when the privilege of the teacher's position is throughout, and without question, asserted as infallible; contrary to Matt. xvi. 17, 23; Gal. ii. 11 sqq.; 1 Cor. x. 15; 2 Cor. i. 24. Nevertheless, Luke x. 16 remains in force, in so far as the servants of Christ take upon themselves, above all things, the obligation implied in this promise. And all penitential confession is complete only in the direct personal reference to God (B. li. 6 [4]); when the sinner begins clearly to perceive, that God's commandments are no human fancies. The more light a man has received, so much the more heinous is his transgression. To grieve the Holy Spirit, with an ever-increasing constancy to do Him despite, may grow into the sin that is never forgiven. Comp. on this point my Discourse in the apologetische Beiträge von GESS und RIGGENBACH, Basel, 1863. For this reason the exhortation, which began with beseeching in Christ, becomes at the close a menace pointing to the vengeance of the Judge. The gospel knows nothing of the idea, that the fear of God's judgment is an inadmissible motive. Its preaching is throughout two-edged.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

V. 1. To beseech, where one might command, a model for Christ's ministers (2 Cor. v. 20).—HEUBNER: The exhortation proceeds, 1. on the command of Christ, not of men (nor yet arbitrarily); 2. by His love to us; 3. by our love to Him; 4. by His future appearing.—Burlenburger Bibel: God beseeches and exhorts, though according to His right and His power he might well threaten and command. Therein appears his kindness and love toward man [Tit. iii. 4]. With so much the greater force should this gracious style of injunction shame and subdue the otherwise hard natural heart.—[See Bishop BERRIDGE'S Brief Notes on this verse.—J. L.]

V. 3. STÄHELIN: First holy, then peaceable; this will of God thou wilt not be able to annul.—HEUBNER: All commandments have one object, sanctification. The special Christian motives to sanctification: 1. It is an obligation of gratitude; 2. it is the sign of the reconciliation received [Rom. v. 11]; 3. Christ is made unto us sanctification [1 Cor. i. 80]; 4. we owe it to the world; without it, we do the world an injury, and dishonor Christ.—THE SAME: The call of Christianity, a call to sanctification.—Burlenburger Bibel: To this point is the sum and substance of all Holy Writ directed, that the people of God should also live godly. It is not possible that an unholty person should come into fellowship with God, the Holy One.—[For this is the will of God, your sanctification;—the text of MASSILLON'S third Sermon pour une profession religieuse.—J. L.]

HEUBNER: Christ the Guardian of our chastity.—CHRYSOSTOM: Men are led to fornication by luxury, wealth, levity, idleness, leisure. These occasions must be cut off. In particular, he gives an impressive warning against adultery, as the consequence of the early practice of fornication. "Bear with me, if I seem to speak what is impure, as if I had laid aside shame and blushing; for it is with reluctance that I submit to this, but for their sakes, who are not ashamed of the deeds, am I compelled to utter the words. You are ashamed to hear of it? It is, however, the deeds that you are ashamed of, not of the words." He speaks of these things, he says, as a surgeon probes a festering wound. "It is not youth that is responsible for them, otherwise all young men must be licentious; but we fling ourselves into the funeral pile."—Burlenburger Bibel: A man may restrain himself from all outward eruptions of evil lust, and yet be inwardly full of the stench of the filthiest thoughts and desires.

V. 2. Who is allowed to say that he knows God? The man who loves Him, keeps His commandments, stands in sanctification.

Vv. 3-6. The similarity and difference of the two capital vices mentioned by the Apostle.—Covetousness itself is an uncleanness.

[V. 7. LEIGHTON: It is sacrilege for you to dispose of yourselves after the impure manner of the world, and to apply yourselves to any profane use, whom God hath consecrated to Himself.—J. L.]

Vv. 6-8. Dread of the Judge and Avenger is not set aside even by the gospel. 1. Servile fear, indeed (Rom. viii. 15), hath torment and is not in love (1 John iv. 18); but every one who does not fear is not therefore a child of God; better than careless or insolent frivolity, the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom. 2. Nay, within the sphere of grace, it is needful to use it with fear and trembling, that it be not turned into lasciviousness (2 Cor. v. 11; Phil. ii. 12 [Jude 4]). 3. But the fear of God, the only Judge, is identical with trust in Him, the only Saviour and Protector (Matt. x. 28-31).—[LEIGHTON: Men are ready to find out poor shifts to deceive themselves, when they have some way deceived their brother, and to stop the mouth of their own conscience with some quibble and some slight excuse, and force themselves at length to believe they have done no wrong. Therefore the Apostle, to fright them out of their shifts, sets before them an exacter Judge, who cannot be deceived nor mocked, who shall one day unveil the conscience, and blow away these vain self-excuses as smoke; and that just Lord will punish all injustice.—J. L.]—Burlenburger Bibel: The despising [rejecting] occurs also through a hypocritical faith, when the way of sanctification is refused as savoring of legalism. The flesh makes ever-fresh trials, whether it may be able to regain its old ascendancy.

Vv. 1-8. STOCKMEYER (in a series of manuscript Sermons, of which he has most kindly allowed us the use): Exhortation to sanctification: 1. Why is it still a necessity for a church even of true Christians? Their standing is already in sanctification, but they need to become ever more perfect: a. they are still far from having attained to the measure of Christ's example; it behooves them to strive against the temptation to a self-satisfied stationariness; b. the tendencies to sin are powerful; earlier habits of sin still retain an influence; whereas no department of life is to remain unsanctified, and no toleration is to be given to stubbornness, indolence, excuses, or palliations; otherwise sanctification gradually expires. 2. What are the particular points made prominent by the Apostle according to the special need of his readers? the two capital sins of the heathen world, fleshly lust and greed of gain. a. To offer wanton apologies for the former is to sink back into heathenism, which knows nothing of God. b. The second is a reckless encroaching on one's neighbor. Against this Paul warns, at the same time that he fully recognizes brotherly love (vv. 9, 10); for a man may contribute to charitable objects, and yet all the while seek advantages in trade, that are an overreaching of his neighbors. But he who on these points is free from reproach, let him try himself whether there are not others, in which his sanctification is still defective. 3. What is the serious admonition with which the Apostle confirms and strengthens his word of exhortation? The proclaimer of evangelical grace speaks of punishment from an avenging God. On all ungodliness of men rests God's wrath; he, therefore, who scorns the way prepared by God's grace for escaping that wrath, forsakes the way of grace, and must be overtaken by the wrath; yea, he is worthy of a far sorer condemnation than heathens and Jews, just because to him the Spirit was given. Yes, help to achieve the victory is proffered to him in the strength of the Spirit.

Incitement to growth in brotherly love, and, that love be not prejudiced, to quiet and sober industry.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. (Vv. 9, 10.) But concerning brotherly love, &c.—The exhortation here turns to a new side of sanctification. Brotherly love (ch. iii. 12) is love to our fellow-Christians, who have the same Father (1 John v. 1), and is the centre of love to all men (2 Pet. i. 7), the Christian loving generally his neighbors on account of the hope, to which he knows and believes them to be called (Col. i. 4, 5*). The proof of love which Paul praises in the Thessalonians (ποιεῖτε, v. 10), is perhaps chiefly, yet not exclusively, the rendering of actual help to those in distress.—The reading ἔχετε with γράφειν LÜNE-MANN declares to be meaningless. But the two variations, ἔχομεν or γράφεισθε, might still suggest as the more difficult the reading rejected by LÜNE-MANN. As the subject of γράφειν we must supply ἡμᾶς, or assume that it is used impersonally: that one write unto you (of the writing to you ye have no need). Regularly it would be in the passive, as at ch. v. 1 (Heb. v. 12, τοῦ διδόναι ὑμᾶς τινά, is, of course, somewhat different*). On the use of the infinitive

* [A very questionable reference. The love there spoken of is love to the saints; and, besides, the δέ of v. 5 is best connected, not with τῶν ἀγαπῶν of v. 4, but with ἐνχαριστοῦμεν of v. 3.—J. L.]

* [Besides that the τινά there is often read τίνα, and construed with τὰ στοιχεῖα.—J. L.]

active, where the passive might have been expected, comp. WINER, § 44. 8, Note 1. LÜNEMANN, indeed, would allow of the application of this rule only where the infinitive is used simply as a substantive, not where it governs a case.—OLSHAUSEN (with the reading ἐχομεν) finds the antithesis: When God teaches you, I may be silent. But ἐχετε likewise gives an antithesis: Ye need not that one write unto you; for ye yourselves are, &c.* Taught of God, θεοδιδασκτο, not respecting God, but according to the analogy of such compounds, by God (comp. John vi. 45; Is. liv. 13; Jer. xxxi. 34; Ps. xvi. 7); not merely, that is, historically, but of God's word in the Old Testament, or from Jesus' commandment of love (John xiii.), or through the prophets amongst you (ch. v. 20), but inwardly through the Holy Ghost (v. 8).—Εἰς τὸ, as ch. iii. 10 and several times already, marks the end and aim of the teaching.—For ye also do it (the ἀγαπᾶν), and thus show by deeds that ye are taught of God. Toward [all] the brethren that are in the whole of Macedonia, not merely in Thessalonica; which implies a lively intercourse with the Christians in Philippi, Berea, and perhaps at small scattered stations, offshoots from the central churches. Of this zeal of love he must have been informed by Timothy. The interval since their conversion was long enough for the purpose (against BAUR).—But why was it necessary to write to such persons against fornication, and especially against πλεονεξία, according to our view? Was not this excluded beforehand by brotherly love? Well, the very purpose of his warning is, that temptation should not overthrow them. He certainly makes no such reproach as: "There are amongst you many πόρνοι;" nor yet: "many πλεονέκται;" merely this: "You might be threatened with it; temptation is strong;" and even with a good disposition a man, whose integrity is not perfect, may deceive himself in regard to prevailing sins. It is with individuals that the evil begins (a little leaven, &c., 1 Cor. v. 6); and there are particular sinful tendencies, the criminality of which is less recognized (again: a little leaven). There are, in fact, inward contradictions, imperfect conditions; and so even a tendency to uncleanness, to greediness, where there is yet, on the other hand, a zealous love. Now, the Apostle would strengthen them, while he writes encouragingly: You know truly what brotherly love requires, and act accordingly; only it is still important, that ye become ever more perfect; then too will you be ever less in danger from πλεονεξία. Thus in "Ye have no need that one write unto you" we have no mere figure of speech (transitio; [CHRYSOSTOM, THEOPHYLACT, PELT, LÜNEMANN, ELLICOTT]), no delicate turn of mere urbanitas [SCHOTT], but what was intended as a serious acknowledgment of the actual existence amongst them in power of brotherly love. The figure of speech is real; it appeals to what is already true of them, and then says: Go on, improve (so DE WETTE). To abound yet more, was the general exhortation of v. 1; it recurs in v. 10 in this particular relation;—in brotherly love, not in a mere outward spending for cases of necessity. (Unnatural is EWALD's reference of περισσεύειν to what follows: Yet far more and emulously to be quiet!)

2. (V. 11.) And to place your honor therein [And to study]*.—We are not to supply from what precedes, in brotherly love. Opposed to this is the fact, 1. that φιλοτιμείσθαι commonly governs an infinitive, and most naturally, therefore, in the present instance, the immediately following ἡσυχάζειν &c.; for, 2. unless the latter be allowed to depend on φιλοτ., it would stand (awkwardly) attached by asyndeton. The word φιλοτ. has two meanings: to be ambitious, fond of honor; with the infinitive: to place one's honor in a thing, to emulate, zealously strive (2 Cor. v. 9; Rom. xv. 20). Here, in what? in something that the world does not highly value. BENGE notices the "Oxymoron: φιλοτιμία politica erubescit ἡσυχάζειν." It is, therefore, instead of shining and seeking a false renown, to seek honor rather in being quiet; tranquil, calm in God (in contrast with a wordy volubility, ῥητορ); concerned about the training of the hidden man of the heart (1 Pet. iii. 4); comp. ἡσυχία, 2 Thess. iii. 11, 12; 1 Tim. ii. 2, 11, 12; where the opposite is περιεργείσθαι, πολυπραγμοσύνη, a loud, ostentatious officiousness—the driving disposition, which with its zeal about incidental matters affects a deceptive substitute for Phil. ii. 12. This ἡσυχ. branches out in the sequel on two sides: a. τὰ ἴδια πράσσειν, and b. ἐργάζεσθαι ταῖς χερσίν, which is not the same thing. The former—in the classics, τὰ ἑαυτοῦ ἢ ἑαυτῶν πράσσειν (see Wetstein)—is to attend to one's own affairs, and so to serve God with fidelity in the calling which every individual has received for himself, instead of that bustling, obtrusive meddling with other men's matters (1 Pet. iv. 15), in which spiritual conceit finds occupation. This, consequently, belongs to the spirit of the calling, according to its individual characteristics; and the manifestation of this proper feeling is to work with one's own hands. The work does not jar with the quietness, but is promotive of it. It is only by a multiplicity of aims that the quietness is disturbed. With the hands, as Paul did (ch. ii. 9; Acts xx. 34).—According as we commanded you. This exhortation, therefore, belonged also to the commandments which he had given from the first (v. 2); comp. 2 Thess. iii. 10. From the beginning he clearly foresaw the possibility of an unwholesome deterioration; nor did this require longer time for its development (against BAUR). Most of the Thessalonians, it is probable, were literally handicraftsmen, and hence the expression, from which then follows an application of the principle to every calling. But even spiritual employments were connected with manual labor (Paul). And in Pa. xc. 17 the expression, the work of our hands, goes beyond mere handicraft.

3. (V. 12.) That ye, &c.—This statement of the purpose is by EWALD made dependent on παρηγγελάμεν, and so on the parenthetical clause; better by LÜNEMANN, HOFMANN and others, on the verb of the principal clause, παρακαλοῦμεν—φιλοτιμ. &c.; it not merely was, but it still is, the object of his ex-

* [φιλοτιμείσθαι—found also in Rom. xv. 20 and 2 Cor. v. 9. ELLICOTT: "In all, perhaps, some idea of τιμή may be recognised, but in 2 Cor. i. c. and in the present passage that meaning recedes into the background." In most versions and commentaries, however, it is retained, as by our German: die Ehre davor zu setzen; and WOLFFENBUTEL: "The love of glory, the moving passion of their vainglorious activity, loving ever to be seen, and exulting in the foam and spray of its own restlessness, into a quiet lake of religious life, clear and deep, reflecting in its peaceful mirror the calmness of heaven." And he quotes Is. xxx. 7.—J. L.]

hortation. This object likewise again divides itself into propriety, seemliness of deportment (1 Cor. xiv. 40; vii. 35), and a generous independence; such will be the result of a quiet performance of one's own business, and of diligence in labor. The first thought was of God; then come the brethren; and finally those without also are not forgotten. This was the title given by the Jews to the Gentiles; by the gospel, to those who are outside of the true Church, whether Jews or Gentiles (1 Cor. v. 12). Toward them also Christendom has an obligation of love, the Missionary office (comp. Col. iv. 5; 1 Cor. x. 32).—And may have need of nothing [or, of no one]. As people who earn their own bread. Μηδὲν ἰσὺς is by CALVIN (nulla re), BENIGL, LÜNEMANN [JOWETT, ALFORD, &c.], taken as neuter: want for nothing [Rev. iii. 17]; LÜNEM.: "To stand in need of no man is for man an impossibility." But the limitation of the idea is obvious from the context [so ELLICOTT]. If Lünemann did not twist the idea into that of indigence, he would have to object to his own explanation, that it is not less impossible for a man to stand in need of nothing. Of course, it cannot absolutely be proved neither, that the word must be taken as masculine. The strongest argument is its proximity to τοὺς ἑξω. To have need of no one—of those without? but to them they could least apply;—of the Christians? for this there is least in the context. We do best to take it (with SCHOTT, DE WETTE, HOFMANN) quite generally and without more precise definition: Through honest labor and quiet trust in God you will be free from the necessity of having recourse to men. Where an exigency arose invincible even by the most faithful diligence, there was then scope for the exercise of brotherly love.

4. (V. 9-12.) But a question still remains as to the connection of the two halves of this section, and particularly of vv. 10 and 11. In the close connection of the two infinitives περισσ. and φιλοτ. by means of καὶ many, since CHRYSOSTOM, THEODORET, &c., have recognized the indication of an inward union; CHRYSOSTOM: It is the part of love, not to receive, but to give. Others otherwise. Many, as DE WETTE: I exhort you to grow ever in brotherly love, still to increase in your readiness to benefit your brethren, and also in your care not to endanger love through indolence, whereby you would become a burden to one another (ch. v. 14), and would at last incur the blame of rendering it impossible, that all should any longer love the brethren aright. This would be said especially to the poor: Beware of abusing this doctrine. Ye too may practise brotherly love, if ye walk orderly; ye too would fall into πλεονεκτην through indolence, particularly that of a seemingly spiritual sort. But LÜNEMANN protests with reason against the division of the church into two classes. Even φιλοτιμ. &c. is said to all, and the working with their own hands comes in only secondarily, being preceded by that about being quiet and doing their own business, which concerns all. LÜNEMANN, however, appears to be mistaken in regarding φιλοτιμ. as something new hastily fastened on, and having no reference to what goes before. The connection of the two infinitives by καὶ binds them together as one exhortation: Still to grow in love, and also in your zeal for being quiet, every one working out his own salvation, and faithfully performing also his external labor—every one emulously inciting his neighbor, and allowing himself to be incited, to fidelity; this too belongs to love (Heb. x.

24, 25). Thus, the new exhortation likewise is added with a view to saving brotherly love from being damaged; and even outwardly among the worldly-minded the opposite course of conduct would create offence, and so in that quarter also would violate the obligation of love (HOFMANN compares Eph. iv. 28).

The excitement, against which Paul has to warn the Thessalonians, is not at all of a political (ZWINGLI), but religious nature. They were adrift in a new world of ideas, and in more than one instance perhaps had thus been deprived of bread. NEANDER and most assume an eschatological complexion, as if they were absorbed in the kingdom of heaven. DE WETTE, on the contrary, would confine himself to pious excitement generally, because Paul makes no mention of the eschatological ground, but rather speaks quite freely (ch. v. 1 sqq.) of the last things, and indeed in such a way precisely, as might easily through misapprehension occasion an increase of the agitation; which he would hardly have done, had the agitation already been of that character. He therefore confines himself to the supposition of an idle officiousness, proselytism, concern for the salvation of other people's souls, &c. [WORDSWORTH also speaks of the spirit of περιεργία, πολυπραγμοσύνη, and ἁλλοτρισεπικλοπία as "characteristic of the Greek population long before the gospel appeared. Comp. Acts xvii. 21; 1 Tim. v. 13; 1 Pet. iv. 15; and the commentators on Juvenal, iii. 61-70."—J. L.] Still LÜNEMANN is right in holding fast to the idea, that the expectation of the last things, whereby earthly interests were reduced in importance in their eyes, had formed the centre of their excitement. To this, he thinks, we are led by the context, the transition to the eschatological question, v. 13 sqq., being well accounted for by the association of ideas, and the writer then resuming, ch. v. 12 sqq., his practical exhortations (somewhat differently HOFMANN, see on v. 13). We only add, that even the section ch. iv. 13-v. 11 results in practical exhortations, against despondency, and to a sober vigilance. In giving heed to the ῥήφωμεν of ch. v. 6, 8, they would not be cut off from watchfulness and waiting for the Lord, but only from an unsound πολυπραγμοσύνη. The Apostle's words, therefore, contain really nothing, whereby a spurious excitement, even if it were of an eschatological nature, could be increased.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. (V. 9.) Christian beneficence was a new virtue, altogether unknown to the heathen. "See, how they love one another!" was the saying amongst those, who still looked on from without (comp. John xiii. 34, 35; 1 Pet. i. 22; 3 John 5, 6). But the outward manifestation must not be separated from its inner root, brotherly love. Almsgiving from sympathy with external suffering, doing good generally on principles of humanity, philanthropy, faith in mankind, these things are not to be despised, but must be distinguished from Christian brotherly love. In many philanthropic enterprises there has been exhibited a remarkable persistency that may well put Christians to shame; but frequently also motives of selfishness, calculation, ambition have betrayed a temper at variance with the Christian spirit. The Christian, understanding by his own case the ruin of man, knows that the deep est root of an enduring love, the true strength of an unwearied patience, the assurance of the highest aim over and above the mere outward relief, consists only in his loving his neighbors as sons of the same Father through the One Son of the Father. Wherever this life from God really exists in force, there is found the capacity of a vigorous, unobstructed love. And this is no spirit of particularism—as little so, or even less so than the Old Testament separateness of the people of God. Human perversity, it is possible, may turn it into a matter of narrow sectarian partisanship, and thereby vitiate love itself. The truth is that love to those, who are already brethren in fact, is the hearth at which the flame is fed, that we may further love those also who are still to become so. This brotherhood, however, does not stand in a formula, but in the life from God, of which the first token is a sense for what is holy.

2. To be taught of God is the great end to which all are called. God, who is love, teaches to love; "doctrina divina vis confluit in amorem," BENIGL. With regard to the means: God's word of the Old and New Testaments, expounded by its living preachers, is not to be refused; but it does not elucidate what is most vital, the immediate relation between God and man, between Spirit and spirit. In the consummation no one will teach his brother, saying, Know the Lord, for they will all know Him, and that from their own experience of the forgiveness of sins (Jer. xxxi. 34). This does not exclude, as the way to this highest end, mutual assistance, the edification of one another (ch. v. 11), the service, especially, of gifted members (1 Cor. xii. 8, 28); and this is the ordinary way, for the Divine illumination is not one independent of means, or magical, but an introduction to the historical salvation. But even now, in this preparatory stage, with the full use of means through instruction and education, a point is reached, where human help must cease, and those alone are made manifest as true disciples (μαθηται), on whom the light of the Spirit moving in the word arises inwardly—for whom the lessons received from the word are inwardly interpreted, made illuminating, written on their hearts. Only an evil, hierarchical turn of mind regards with distrust this growth of an independent Christianity; * to a godly-minded instructor it is the greatest joy, when he detects it in those under his care (comp. John iv. 42). It is the Spirit bearing them witness that they have received a life from God, and shedding into their heart the love of God (Rom. v. 5; viii. 15, 16; 1 Cor. ii. 12; 1 John ii. 27; v. 6). It is a teaching, which is at the same time an influence, such as the law cannot exert. And, moreover, with the testimony that this is a Divine, holy, blessed, eternal life, there is joined an assurance that we have received this life from this source, and from none other. The witness of the Holy Ghost certifies to us that we are the children of God, and certifies us at the same time, that no otherwise do we become, or have we become so, than through being begotten of the incorruptible seed of the Divine word (James i. 18; 1 Pet. i. 23). In the last passage likewise there is connected with this an exhortation to brotherly love (v. 22); comp. 1 John v. 1.

3. (Vv. 10, 11.) We perceive the Apostle's deep insight in this, that, after the warning against covetousness, he now also directs his warning to the opposite side, that they who are careless and indifferent in things of earth may not fancy that they are in no danger. Above all, a still inexperienced spiritual character may easily degenerate into a certain vain perverseness. What is true in the matter of mutual exhortation is recognized by Paul (ch. v. 11); but it is something different, when a man pragmatically sets up for a guardian of souls, without warrant takes the brethren under his charge, gratuitously troubles himself about others—as if there were no longer need for us to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling. A singular instance of this perversity is given by the Apostle, 1 Tim. vi. 2. There is already a taint of unsoundness, when one connects the Christian character so closely with the outward appearance, that he values, for example, a simple, faithful nursery-maid less highly than he does a deaconess. It is not Christianity that is to be blamed for this, but the heart of man in its abuse of Christianity. True fidelity, again, in the care of other souls can proceed only from the man who looks well to his own.

4. With this fidelity in working out our own salvation the Apostle joins in particular, the faithful industry of humble labor in our earthly calling. He tolerates no neglect of the ordinary duty of labor under a spiritual pretext. A certain officiousness, which under pious pretences abandons itself to sloth, allowing itself to be supported by others, and giving most reasonable offence to worldly-minded persons, shows itself especially in great cities (VON GERLACH). (In the country people know one another more intimately.) Our passage is very important as pointing out the true position of the Christian in regard to the tasks of this earthly life. By example and exhortation Paul checks all shame of a false spirituality, all arrogant and sluggish pretension, as if Christians were too good to labor in the sweat of their face. He teaches us to recognize the worth of industry. True, the Christian should have his treasure and heart in heaven (Matt. vi. 19 sqq.); should not be bent on becoming rich (1 Tim. vi. 9; comp. v. 17 sqq.); should have as though he had not (1 Cor. vii. 29 sqq.); and yet he is not to suppose that he must flee out of the world (John xvii. 15); in the world to be kept from the evil, that is his aim; to seek, not worldly gain, but yet an economical independence; no religiose vivere in the hermit's sense (THEOPHYLACT: Is fasting, or sleeping on the ground, to work with the hands?); no morality without the religious foundation; but at the same time no religiousness without moral authentication. Such is the apostolical order. The moderns, perhaps, were not the first to set this light on the candlestick, but our Reformers restored it to its place (bona opera iuxta vocationem). Faithful industry is a test of humility and sincerity, a means of discipline and self-control. The sons of Indian princes must on their conversion stand this test. The objection, that Christianity disqualifies for a life on earth, affects not Christianity itself, but merely its unwholesome corruptions. History shows what a blessed influence the Christian spirit has exerted in all the departments of human activity. This is shown in the largest sphere, and not less in the smallest and most inconspicuous. Indeed it is precisely in this devoted fidelity that a main proof must be given of a sincere Christian feeling.

5. The Apostle is possessed by an earnestly expectant hope in the coming of the Lord, and, even when his business is to calm the emotions, he cannot do it by saying to them like the wicked servant (Matt. xxiv. 48): My Lord delayeth His coming. But what is great and admirable is the discretion with which, with all his liveliness of aspiration, he yet avoids all revolutionizing of this alors, and notwithstanding that he hopes for the Lord's coming as nigh at hand, nay, on account of this hope, he only the more insists on daily fidelity in earthly things (1 Cor. vii. 20 sqq.). "O world, thou art for us too small!" This he understands throughout not in any monkish, but in a sound and sober sense. Sobriety consists in never neglecting our daily duty—in being at all times faithful in ordinary, every-day, petty and extraneous concerns, not indeed because the material of our labor, but because the exercise of fidelity on that material is of importance for eternity. Two men working together in one field, two women at one mill—such is the order until the coming of the Lord. The difference, according to which they are taken or rejected, is in their inward spirit at their work.

6. (V. 12.) With worldly-minded persons the predominant consideration has respect to their equals. Christians inquire first, as to God, then as to the judgment of their brethren who have some understanding of Divine things, and lastly as to what others say;—lastly; and therefore they are not entirely indifferent to that. This were contrary to humility and wisdom, which are willing to be told a truth even by the malevolent; and it were also a violation of the missionary obligation, and consequently of love. ROOS: Give no occasion to those without to say, that faith in Christ makes idlers and beggars. Indeed, CHRYSOSTOM already mentions, that the heathen called healthy beggars Χριστιανούς. But not begging merely, a lazy enthusiasm also could not but discredit the gospel. This it was important to avoid. That the Church should be respected, that even her enemies should not be able to upbraid her with anything, and that no other reproach than that of Christ should rest on her (1 Pet. ii. 9, 12), is an advantage towards which every one must be careful to contribute his share, and a condition of a blessed outward efficiency. The gospel does not destroy, but sanctifies, the delicate sense of honor and self-reliance—fostering the independence of a character which has its foundation in God. This is something quite different from a haughty severity, and is quite compatible with the simple acceptance of that which God, in a time of Divine visitation, presents also by the hand of brotherly love.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

V. 9. HEUBNER: Brotherly love was to be the most familiar thing for every Christian.—THEOPHYLACT: What is extremely important needs not to be taught; it is obvious to all.—Berlenburger Bibel: For what reason may the admonition about brotherly love follow that respecting continence? That we may understand it of no other than a pure love.—HEUBNER: The Christian is a genuine divine, taught by the Spirit, not formed merely by others' teaching.—THE SAME: He who does not practise what he knows, has learned nothing yet from God.—Berlenburger Bibel: He knows it merely after the law and the letter, but not after the Spirit.—THE SAME: Not until God takes us into His school do we learn anything aright.—His teaching is at the same time a conferring of strength, pleasure, impulse.

V. 10. Wisdom unites encouragement with incitement.—THEOPHYLACT: Halt not behind expectation under the idea that you are already perfect.—DIEDRICH: True love never satisfies itself, and would willingly be urged to ever higher performances.—STARKE: Thinkest thou that thou art already rich enough in love? Thou earnest greatly, and art still weak in thy knowledge.—The debt of love is never fully paid off (Rom. xiii. 8). The further one gets, the greater becomes his task.—Berlenburger Bibel: They who dwell together are neighbors to one another. But true Christians do not confine their love so narrowly, but spread it abroad to all. God is essentially boundless Love; the love of believers is boundless through grace.

V. 11. VON GERLACH: The Christian should live more inwardly than outwardly. The inner quietness will then show itself also in a quiet, industrious life, in which each man cares first for himself and those belonging to him, before he will help others.—This is not selfishness, but fidelity in one's calling.—STARKE: The spiritual or inner Sabbath of souls.—The obligation to work exists also for the rich; for women.—RIEGER: A man's mere intentions about some matter give him more trouble than the business itself. The one ensnaring thought of a determination to become rich is more fatal to quietness, than hands full of necessary work.—THE SAME: Occupation and work are not hostile to quietness, but promotive of it.—[BARROW has two Sermons on this verse.—J. L.]

Vv. 11, 12. True honor, not in the first instance from men, but from God, and so at last from men also; כבוד, is an essential, weighty glory; δόξα, amongst men merely an empty show.—RIEGER: Oh what a great thing it would be, if we could only restore to men the true conception of honor, and divert them from much false seeking for honor in what is sheer vanity; so that one should seek his honor in quietness, in the education of the inner man of the heart (1 Pet. iii. 4). Carefulness to please God supplies a stronger motive to an honorable walk, than ever comes from inculcating ever so largely the desire of honor.

V. 12. The value of independence, not merely from a human, but from a Divine point of view. Abraham, Gen. xiv. 22 sqq.—Berlenburger Bibel: Whoever desires much from the world must be its slave; which is not becoming in the royal priesthood.

HEUBNER: Two reasons for industry: 1. The honor of Christianity before the world demands it; 2. A noble independence of human bondage exists not without it.—1 Thess. iv. 1-7 is the Epistle for the Sunday called Reminiscere [2d Sunday in Lent].

CH. IV. 13-V. 11.

Instruction and Exhortation in regard to the Coming of the Lord.

CH. IV. 13-18.

1. They who have fallen asleep will rise again, and so at the Lord's Advent will suffer no loss.

- 13 But I would [we would]¹ not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep [those who are falling asleep],² that ye sorrow³ not, even as others [the rest also]⁴ which [who] have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again [arose],⁵ even so them also which sleep in Jesus [so also those who fell asleep through Jesus]⁶ will God bring with Him. For this we say unto you by [in, ἐν] the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain [who are living, who are being left over]⁷ unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep [shall in no wise precede those who fell asleep].⁸ For [Because, ὅτι] the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God [with voice of arch., and with trumpet of G.],⁹ and the dead in Christ shall rise [arise] first;¹⁰ then we which are alive and remain [who are living, who are being left over]¹¹ shall be caught up together with them [shall together with them be caught away]¹² in the clouds [in clouds],¹³ to meet the Lord¹⁴ in the air [into the air];¹⁵ and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words.

² V. 13.—A. B. Sin. give the rarer κοιμώμενων; the other majuscules, the more frequent κεκοιμημένων; only one manuscript of a late date has the aorist, as in vv. 14, 15. (κοιμώμενων = are falling asleep from time to time, comp. περιλειπόμενοι of vv. 15, 17;—or simply, are sleeping; so Am. Bible Union, Alford, Ellicott. Alford quotes the epitaph: ἡρὸν ὑπλόν κοιμάται.—J. L.)

⁴ V. 13.—[καὶ οἱ λοιποί. The καὶ belongs to οἱ λοιποί as one member of the comparison, not, as might be inferred from our Common Version, to καθώς.—J. L.]

¹⁰ V. 17.—[The same phrase as in v. 15 (though Sin. has here περιλειπόμενοι). See there Note 7.—J. L.]

¹² V. 17.—[ἐν νεφέλαις, as in Mark xiii. 26.—J. L.]

¹³ V. 17.—[Literally: unto meeting of the Lord; German, zur Begegnung des Herrn.—J. L.]

¹⁴ V. 17.—[eis ἀέρα—connected with ἀπαγγεσόμεθα. Riggenbach follows the modern German versions in changing Luther's in der Luft into in die Luft. And similarly Alford, Ellicott (the Commentary—to which, however, the Translation, as occasionally happens, is not conformed), Vaughan, &c.—J. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. (V. 13.) But we would not have you to be ignorant, &c.—This or some kindred phrase is frequently used by Paul, when he would introduce some new and important instruction (1 Cor. x. 1; xii. 1; Col. ii. 1; Phil. i. 12); occasionally also in communicating something personal, in which he feels a special interest (Rom. i. 13). Here in particular he now begins to supply their deficiencies (ch. iii. 10) in respect of knowledge; in a very kindly spirit, in a way not of rebuke but of encouragement, there being no occasion for him to censure any deliberate perverseness. With a lively transition (as in 1 Cor. v. and xii. and frequently) he leads in medias res. The Thessalonians perhaps had asked a question, or Timothy may have given information respecting their uneasiness about some of their number who had died. Whether these were many or few, or even none at all, so that they were troubled merely by the imminent peril of death, they had no clearness of view as to their fate. On the connection with what goes before, see on ch. iv. 9-12 the Exegetical Note 4. Formerly HOFMANN likewise so understood the matter; now (since what follows is not instruction generally respecting Christ's return, but merely a consolatory addition with regard to those asleep) he rather assumes as the connecting thought their brotherly love in its anxiety about the departed. That ye sorrow not, he says; not: that ye be not excited. Ch. v., however, adds still another admonition to sobriety. In questions of this sort no decision of exclusive validity can be hit upon.—Those who have fallen asleep (perfect); or those who are falling asleep (present); who are continually going to sleep;—as afterwards: the living, who are being left over, continually; so he calls the dead, by a gentle euphemism, 1 Cor. xi. 30 (present); xv. 20 (perfect). Comp. Soph. El. 509; then the Septuagint Is. xliii. 17 for $\alpha\sigma\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha$; Job iii. 13, for $\alpha\sigma\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha$; Dan. xii. 2, Septuagint $\alpha\sigma\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha$. But it is more than merely an expression to veil a terrible reality, nor does it denote merely the refreshment of rest, deliverance from earthly trouble; on the contrary, it is the promise of an awaking, now especially that there is an Awakener (John xi. 11). We are not to think of a sleep of the soul, an entire unconsciousness. The figure is taken from the body, a dead man resembling one asleep. ZWINGLI, CALVIN and others oppose with reason the Psychopannychians, whose dogma expressly contradicts other passages—the parable, Luke xvi. 19 sqq.; the promise, Luke xxiii. 43 (To-day!); the apostolic statements, 2 Cor. v. 8; Phil. i. 23; Rev. xiv. 13 (Blessed from henceforth—with the Lord). Even here the circumstance that Paul opposes to their sorrowfulness the resurrection, and only with this connects the being with Christ (v. 17), by no means implies that those asleep in Christ are not yet blessed, or are not with Christ, as Phil. i. expressly teaches. He looks beyond the intermediate state, because he would offer the entire fulness of consolation, and that with reference to the anxieties of the Thessalonians, of which Note 4 will speak.

2. That ye sorrow not, even as the rest (of men, those not Christians) also (in comparisons, see v. 5) &c., $\lambda\upsilon\pi\omicron\upsilon\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha$; who have no hope. Here he speaks not exclusively of the heathen, as in v. 5: who know not God. In Eph. ii. 12, indeed, it is specially the heathen whom he describes as strangers to Israel's promises, having no hope (in the widest sense, with reference to all Messianic promises), and without God in the world. Israel, on the contrary, had promises and therefore also hopes, and if the Sadducees rejected these, there is yet in that place no thought of them. There is indeed, however, still a difference between having the promises and the actual living holding fast of the hope, and it is not merely among the heathen that the latter is wanting. Even supposing that he has them especially in his eye, it is yet not without reason that the expression is kept general. But the Apostle does not require that Christians shall not sorrow at all (LUTHEMANN: because the phrase is not, $\mu\eta\ \tau\omicron\sigma\sigma\omicron\upsilon\sigma\theta\epsilon\iota\varsigma$), but simply: their sorrow should not be of the same sort as, etc. ($\alpha\lambda\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$, as in Eph. iv. 17. HOF-

3. (V. 14.) For if we believe, &c.—He thus gives the reason why they should not sorrow in a heathenish way; $\epsilon\iota$ is not used in the sense of si quidem, but the hypothetical turn just so much the more challenges their assent: if, as we at least have no difficulty in believing (ch. i. 3, 10; ii. 13); if we not merely hold it to be true, but build thereon with confidence (the meaning of $\pi\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\iota\varsigma$), making it the foundation of our life;—from this he then draws the conclusion, from which we in our ready despondency hang back.—That Jesus (he uses the human name) died (here not, fell asleep, but without any disguise he speaks of death). And did not every one believe that? Certainly we are not to assume here (with some Greek interpreters) a caution against a Docetic denial of the bodily death. Christ's death and resurrection are really to him the two inseparable pillars of the faith: He died (for us, ch. v. 10), and what more? did he remain in death? no! died and arose; as the Firstfruit (1 Cor. xv. 20), He brought to light a victorious life. But he arose out of death, was not glorified without passing through death; not even Christ.—So also those who, &c. Ὁμοίως is not simply a sign of the apodosis (OLSHAUSEN), any more than it is so at v. 17, but: so, as the Crucified arose (Rev. xi. 5); or: so, as the consequence of that (Rom. v. 12); still better: so, as made like Him in death and resurrection;—God will bring them with Jesus; it is not said: He will awake them.* The turn which the apodosis takes is concise and forcible, the clause, if we believe, being followed, not by another of the subjective kind: so we believe also, but objectively, by a matter of fact: so God will do thus and thus. If this faith of ours is the truth, if on this truth of God we firmly rely, then it follows, &c. Otherwise KOCH and HOFMANN; if we believe expresses, they think, a condition: then, in that case, so will God—that is, bring with Jesus those who in this faith have fallen asleep. But this is a harsher incongruity than what HOFMANN censures in the other explanation; it must then have been said: So will He, when we fall asleep, awaken us.—It is still disputed, to what $\delta\iota\alpha\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \text{Ἰησοῦ}$ belongs. Almost all the moderns (DE WETTE, LÜDEMANN, HOFMANN, and others) refer it to $\acute{\alpha}\kappa\epsilon\iota$, as being unsuited to $\kappa\omicron\iota\mu\epsilon\tau\epsilon\rho\alpha\varsigma$, which would require $\epsilon\upsilon\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \text{Ἰησοῦ}$, as at v. 16 $\epsilon\upsilon\ \text{Χριστῷ}$, and so 1 Cor. xv. 18; and because to say that $\epsilon\upsilon$ stands for $\delta\iota\delta$ [$\delta\iota\delta$ for $\epsilon\upsilon$]. So JOWETT still; also WEBSTER and WILKINSON.—J. L.], and both for $\alpha\iota$, is obsolete. But $\acute{\alpha}\kappa\epsilon\iota$ has already its more precise specification in $\sigma\upsilon\upsilon\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon$, and with $\kappa\omicron\iota\mu\epsilon\tau\epsilon\rho\alpha\varsigma$ it is desirable to find their Christian character, not merely indicated by the context, but expressly declared (opposed to the view of KOCH and HOFMANN). The meaning, moreover, may well be this: those who fell asleep through Jesus, whose falling asleep is through the mediation of Jesus [WEBSTER and WILKINSON: $\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \text{Ἰησοῦ}$ —the article referring emphatically to Jesus as presented in the first member, Jesus who died and rose again.—J. L.]; so CHRYSOSTOM, LUTHER, CALVIN, GROTIUS, BENGEI, HILGENFELD, and others.† He will bring them with

* [ALFORD, ELLICOTT, WEBSTER and WILKINSON, agree with LUTHEMANN; of course, without denying the lawfulness of such sorrow as is spoken of in John xi. 33, Phil. ii. 27, &c. They understand the Apostle to be thinking solely of a sorrow occasioned by the apprehension that death is in some way a calamity to believers, and that sorrow he forbids absolutely.—J. L.]

* [ALFORD errs in making the bringing of departed saints = "their being raised when Jesus appears." Their resurrection is implied in their being brought.—J. L.]

† [Several, as MUSELIER, AETIUS, HAMMOND, TILLOTSON, &c., unduly restrict the reference, as if martyrs only were meant: who fell asleep on account of Jesus, for Jesus

Him (Jesus)—this many take as pregnant for (awaken and) bring. (Through Jesus as Mediator God effects the work of quickening, John v. and vi.) But it is still simpler, if we understand brings as above explained: so He will bring them, when conformed to Jesus in death and resurrection, along with Him (as the Shepherd, whither He goes); LUTHER: thither, where Jesus abides; ROOS: to glory, to rest, to the goal of their hope; STARKE: with Him, when He shall come to judgment; HOFMANN: when He brings Jesus into the world again (Heb. i. 6), He will bring them, cause them to come, along with Jesus, will let them share in His heavenly manifestation. How he comes at this they, is shown vv. 16, 17.

4. (V. 15.) For (to explain) this we say unto you, etc.—He thus illustrates what was said in v. 14, first negatively (v. 15), then positively (v. 16, 17). This (what follows) we say unto you in a word of the Lord; for, as in 1 Cor. ii. 7, marks the medium in which the discourse moves; not in my words do I speak; my statement confines itself within the sphere of a word of the Lord; comp. for the matter 1 Cor. vii. 10, 12, 25, and for the expression 1 Kings xi. 35, בְּדִבְרֵי יְהוָה, lxx. PELT supposes him to refer to Matt. xxiv. 31; to which EWALD adds Luke xiv. 14; HOFMANN, Matt. xvi. 27 sq.; ZWINGLI and others, Matt. xxv. 1 sqq., John v. 28 sq. THEOPHYLACT and CALVIN think of a word orally uttered by Christ, and so probably a λόγος ἑξαφός, like Acts xx. 35. But such a one is in that place introduced differently; and not one of the texts cited makes the special disclosure that here follows, respecting the relation between the dead and those still living. It is therefore more correct to think (with CHRYSOSTOM and other Greeks, BENGE, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, LÜNNEMANN) of a revelation from the exalted Lord, an ἀποκάλυψις τοῦ μυστηρίου (Chrysostom, it is true, adduces not only 2 Cor. xiii. 3 on one side, but also Acts xx. 35 on the other). At 1 Cor. xv. 51 also Paul says something similar on a similar occasion; comp. Gal. i. 12; Rom. xi. 25.—That we who are living (here: in the earthly body), according to the more precise explanation: who remain over (are left over by God) unto the coming (return) of the Lord (that is: who live to see that coming), shall in no wise precede those who fall asleep: οὐ μὴ in the New Testament indifferently with the aorist subjunctive or the future indicative; WINER, § 56, 3. This coming (1 Cor. xv. 23) is coincident with Matt. xxiv. 31; Rev. xix. 11 sqq.; xx. 5 (not xx. 11 sqq.). Here we learn to understand the trouble of the Thessalonians. They sorrowed on the supposition that whoever does not live to see the Advent suffers loss (in the Fourth [in the English Apocrypha, the Second] Book of Esdras, ch. vi. 13, we meet with such ideas; see WIESLER, Chronol. des apost. Zeitalters, p. 250). But how did they conceive of this loss? Evidently LÜNNEMANN goes too far, when from the words: Ye are not to sorrow as they who have no hope, he (as CALVIN and others before him) draws the inference that they believed in no life at all after death, and supposed that the dying were absolutely excluded from the kingdom. That does not lie in the comparison, any more than v. 5: "Indulge not in lust, even as the Gentiles who know not God," charges them with not knowing God; rather, because ye know Him, be not like those who know Him not." And so here: "Sorrow not as those who have no hope; ye do have a hope." He then reasons, as in 1 Cor. xv., from the connection between Christ and believers, the Head and His members, as an indissoluble unity: "The Head cannot forsake His members." He does not in this imply the existence of any deniers of the resurrection, as at Corinth; what we allow is simply that they suffered from dimness of apprehension. To the Greeks generally the resurrection was a difficult topic (Acts xvii.). The Thessalonians, indeed, expected with firm faith the coming of the Lord (ch. i. 10; and in ch. iv. also it is presupposed). But the significance and operation of that event they did not duly perceive. They seem with Grecian fancy to have taken up the idea of the outward splendor of the appearance, without considering with sufficient earnestness that the Crucified One, who arose from the dead, will come again; the Conqueror of sin and death. Paul therefore reminds them of this fundamental truth, and thence infers that we shall not precede those fallen asleep, shall not be admitted to the Lord earlier than they. It is only by ingenuity that LÜNNEMANN can here hold fast to his idea: Paul, he thinks, is engaged with the figure of a race, where those who are outstripped, and have to lay behind in mid course, do not reach the goal at all. But Paul does not intimate that he has here any thought of this figure; and besides, such a preoccupied of salvation, as would deprive others of it, is not within the compass of truth. This were a one-sided pressing of the figure of a race, that would turn it into an untruth. Rather, in saying: We shall not anticipate the dead, he lets us see that the Thessalonians cherished such an idea; but that this leaves open all the while an undefined prospect at least for the later comers. But what prospect? On this point their view is not clear to us, perhaps was not so even to themselves. OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, HOFMANN and others suppose that they had no doubt about the resurrection at the final consummation, only they did not distinguish between the first and the second resurrections; that, in fact, they knew nothing of the first resurrection (of the just), of the hailing of the returning Lord by His risen ones, and of their fellowship with Him during the glorious period preceding the general judgment; that their idea was, that in the kingdom just at hand the dead would have no part; that, however, they really believed in the remote, final resurrection after the kingdom of glory, but found in that no living consolation. Still it is by no means clear how they should have mastered and believed in such a precise arrangement of all the stages of the last things (Advent, Kingdom of glory, Last Resurrection) with only the single exception of the First Resurrection at the Advent; nor yet how the Last Resurrection should have been of so little consequence in their estimation. Are we, then, to be driven back on LÜNNEMANN? Not that either; but we suppose that Paul had powerfully preached in Thessalonica the coming of Christ to set up His kingdom, but had not had time to enter into all questions of detail. Now the Thessalonians, with note. Others, as MICHAELIS, SCOTT, BARNES, ALFORD, WORDSWORTH, ELLICOTT, VAUGHAN, &c., make the idea to be that through Jesus the death of Christians is rightly accounted a sleep. ELLICOTT, however, allows that which of the two connections is the right one "must remain to the last an open question." It is in favor of that with after, that both in the Bible, and in profane literature, classical as well as modern, the figure of sleep is used for death in general; and that the other connection would rather have had: τοὺς δὲ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ κοιμήσοντας. See my note in the Reviser's—J. L.] a lively impression of this message, had yet a rather dim, worldly understanding of it, from their conceiving of every miraculous occurrence as rather simply an exhibition of power, and not duly considering that the path lies through death to resurrection, through deace to the new life. To be gathered unto the Lord (as even in Matt. xxiv. 31 the resurrection is not expressly named)—for them this desire absorbed everything. Whoever lives not to see that, he suffers loss—such was their thought. They did not, like the Corinthians, deny the resurrection of the dead, for the Apostle certainly does not reprove them as he does those; and quite as little perhaps can it be asserted so positively as OLSHAUSEN assumes, that they believed only in the last resurrection; but whether there was anything, and what, still to be expected for the dead, this was to them an obscure matter; their whole hope and aspiration was bent on the one point, to remain exempt from death;—the thing that Paul likewise desired (2 Cor. v. 4), but not so partially. This anxiety was such as could be felt only in the first period of instruction still imperfectly apprehended. (See the Introduction, p. 12. On we who are living, see Exeg. Note 7.)

5. (V. 16.) For He Himself, the Lord [Because the Lord Himself], &c. For, not that (Koch); † he shows how there is no such thing as φθίνειν. DE WETTE and HOFMANN would here, as at ch. iii. 11, understand merely: He, the Lord; but here, as there, the Apostle makes an emphatic antithesis both of subjects and predicates; not: “We shall first come to Him,” but: “He Himself will descend,” otherwise no one at all would come to Him. Εν signifies in, with, attended by, as 1 Cor. iv. 21; Rom. xv. 29. Κέλευσμα (another form, κέλεσμα) LUTHER translates Feldgeschrei [war-cry], and understands by it the joyful exclamation of the angelic host, “the van and guards;” English Bible: with a shout; but more correctly the Vulgate: in jussu; for the word signifies a shout of command, proceeding from the leading huntsman, or from the pilot of a ship, requiring the rowers to keep time, or from a clarion, or a general; Prov. xxx. 27, Sept.; also Thucydides ii. 92: ἀπὸ ἐνδὸς κελεύσματος ἐμβόησαντες, where κελ. does not denote the battle-cry of the combatants, but the meaning is that at a word of command they shouted. Christ is, therefore, described as a victorious Captain, whose order summons to battle, for the destruction of His enemies and the extermination of the antichristian power (2 Thess. ii.; Rev. xix. 11 sq.). To this is added: with the voice of an archangel, summoning the other angels, the great hosts of heavenly spirits, who sympathize in man’s salvation, coöperating at the giving of the law (Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19) and afterwards at the judgment (Matt. xiii. 41; xxiv. 31; xxv. 31); which last event brings a consummation also for themselves (Eph. i. 10). In canonical Scripture the archangel Michael appears again only at Jude 9; Gabriel is not so called, nor the seven angels before God (Rev. viii. 2 = Tob. xii. 15). Yet to the name archangel, prince of angels, corresponds the designation מַלְאָכִים אֲרֻכָּהִים, Dan. x. 13, 20; and already Joab: v. 14, מַלְאָכִים אֲרֻכָּהִים, Sept. ἀρχιστράτηγος θυμάρχης κυρίου. By the archangel AMBROSIASTER [JEREMY TAYLOR] and OLSHAUSEN would understand

Christ, the Lord of angels; others still more unsuitably, the Holy Spirit; but he must be an angel, the highest amongst the angels, answering to the high priest as compared with the priests. Lastly, with a trumpet of God (the last, 1 Cor. xv. 52); this is not merely a nota superlativi, the very great, though it is indeed the Divine, and not a human, majesty that is antithetically described; but, besides that, we are to understand it thus: which is used by God’s command, in God’s service, which belongs to Him; DE WETTE compares κέρας τοῦ θεοῦ, Rev. xv. 2. What should it be? How will it sound? is not to be searched out. The future reality is depicted in images of present reality. It will be heard, as the sign will be seen, Matt. xxiv. 27, 30. As to its import, it is the conclusive echo of Sinai, the highest form of all the signals, whereby the people are called together before the Lord, that by which the enemy’s stronghold, mightier than Jericho, falls (Num. x.; Is. xxvii. 13; Zech. ix. 14; Rev. viii. Seven trumpets). This is not a mere notion of Jewish Rabbis, but the prophetic word receives apostolic sanction. LÜCKMANN and HOFMANN would understand the archangel’s voice and the trumpet as in apposition to κέλευσμα,* but without reason. [WITTIUS, after GRIOTIS, identifies the archangel’s voice with the trumpet as blown by him.—J. L.] We have rather to recognize three particulars, following each other in rapid succession: the Commander’s call of the King Himself; the voice of the archangel summoning the other angels; the trumpet, which awakes the dead, and collects the believers. [Dr. JOHN DICK: “Three sounds are distinctly mentioned, but I do not pretend to know what they are.”—J. L.]

The descent from heaven presupposes the ascension thither (Acts i. 11). And the dead in Christ shall arise first; ἐν Χριστῷ, though without the article, belongs to oi νεκροί (WINER, § 20, 2). He speaks here only of the resurrection of the just (Luke xiv. 14), τῶν τοῦ Χριστοῦ at His coming (1 Cor. xv. 23), who have died in the Lord (Rev. xiv. 13), qui in Christi corpore continentur (CALVIN); not of all without distinction arising in Christ. The correction in Codd. F. G., oi νεκροί oi is not at all necessary. The same Codd. together with D.¹ read (instead of πρώτων) πρώτοι; Itala and Vulgate, primi, which is altogether unsuitable, for the contrast here is not (as THEOPHYLACT and others suppose) between such as rise first and others who do not rise till afterwards; but between what will take place first (the resurrection of those who fell asleep in faith), and what next (ἐπειτα) occurs in the case of the living.

6. (V. 17.) Then we &c. shall together with them be snatched away, caught away; has-

* [And so Bishop HALL, OLSHAUSEN, JOWETT, ALFORD, ELLICOTT. I do not perceive why this view should be reckoned “more plausible” (ELLICOTT) than the other. It might much rather be said to be inferior in martial precision and grandeur. See the note of WASSERMAN and WILKINSON. In favor of ascribing the κέλευσμα to the Lord Himself, they refer to the parallel of the delivery of the law, where, besides the ministry and voice of angels, the sound of the trumpet, and the fire, we have also the voice of God (Ex. xix. 16, 18, 19; xx. 18, 19; Deut. iv. 12, 13, 33; v. 4, 22-26; &c.); likewise to John v. 28, 29; Heb. xii. 19, 20, 23-27; Job xiv. 12-15; Ps. l. 1-6; Matt. xiii. 30, 41; xxiv. 31. So Milton:

“The Son gave signal high,
To the bright minister that watch’d; he blew
His trumpet, heard in Orb since perhaps
When God descended; and perhaps once more
To sound at general doom.” Par. L., l. xi.—J. L.]

tily, swiftly, irresistibly, by the overpowering might of God; this lies in the expression (also 2 Cor. xii. 2, though in a different application); in (on)* clouds, as one received the Lord (Acts i.); not into the clouds (eis), but in the clouds (inwrapped), or on them (throned, as on chariots of God; CHRYSTOSTOM); comp. Matt. xxiv. 30; xxvi. 64; Rev. xi. 12; xiv. 14; unto meeting of the Lord, ἕως συναντήσεως; instead of ἀπὸ τοῦ κυρίου others (weaker authorities) give ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ. Both words, ἀπὸ τοῦ κυρίου or ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, govern the genitive (Matt. xxv. 1) or (like the verb) the dative (Acts xviii. 15). CHRYSTOSTOM and other Greeks: "to meet Christ, as persons of distinction meet a king to salute him, while others must wait for him, as criminals for the judge." For the matter, 2 Thessa. ii. 1 is to be compared. It is a description, so to speak, of the Church's Ascension, in which the Head brings His members to Himself. Possibly the clouds here, as in Acts i., indicate a veiling of the transaction. But at any rate this rapture necessarily presupposes the previous sudden change (1 Cor. xv. 52; 2 Cor. v. 2 sqq.), which is here only not expressly mentioned, but without which a soaring away into the air were not conceivable. Only by means of the glorified corporeity (Phil. iii. 21) can such an event take place. LUTHER (appealing to Heb. ix. 27) insists that all men must once die, that is, leave this life and enter another. For those left over, therefore [die "Ueberlinge," as if we should say, the over-living—J. L.], the change would be their death. These shall not sleep, but in a twinkling will die and live again.—And so (as those who have been caught away into the air, the risen and changed ones, or, still better: as those who have thus met Him) shall we ever be with the Lord; HORMANN: continually, not meeting with Him merely in transient or occasionally repeated salutation; σύν expresses the intimate union, μὲρ simply outward companionship. This is the main point of comfort which he had in view: to be with the Lord, inseparably united to Him. Thus we reach the ἀγειν σὺν αὐτῷ (v. 14), the marriage supper of the Lamb (Rev. xix. 7-9). But it is not in the air that this being ever with Christ takes place (as PELT, USTERI, WEITZEL think, with a quite mistaken appeal to Eph. ii. 2: the air as the region of spirits, but of evil spirits!). Only the meeting takes place in the air, not the abiding. Already AUGUSTINE (De Civ. Dei, xx. 20, 2) saw the truth: Venienti ibitur obviam, non manenti. The Lord is come from heaven, but not quite to the earth, so that a rapture into the air leads to His presence. He comes to fetch them (John xiv. 2, 3) into the heavenly kingdom (2 Tim. iv. 18), which is so called, not merely because it is of a heavenly quality, and even the earth receives a heavenly glory, but because at the coming it really transports the glorified into heaven; they shall be with Him, as BENIGEL says, non modo in aëre, sed in celo unde venit. Others think of a coming with Him to the earth to judgment. HILGENFELD thinks that the meeting is followed by the coming with Him to the glorified earth. But that may even be reserved† for a later date. In fact, the description is not one that exhausts all particulars; it is carried only so far as is necessary to make it clear, that the dead shall be in no way inferior to those who survive. (See the Doctrinal and Ethical Notes, 5.)

7. (Vv. 15, 17.) We who are living, who are being left over.—Here Paul evidently reckons himself among those of whom he considers it possible, and a thing to be desired and hoped for, that they may live to witness the Advent; just so 1 Cor. xv. 51 sqq. (according to the correct reading of the text. rec., and also of the Cod. Vat.)* The strange evasions, by means of which the Fathers and others sought to make out, that Paul nevertheless is not speaking of himself, are justly set aside by LÜDEMANN. (To this class belongs the explanation of ECUMENIUS, that the dead are the bodies, the living are the souls; &c.) Nor ought it to be imputed to him, that he uses ἡμεῖς merely in the way of communicatio (THEOPHYLACT: representing in his own person all who shall then be living), though knowing that he will not be present; of this knowledge we see nothing, rather a hope inconsistent with it. But it were just as inconsiderate to say bluntly, that the Apostle's expectation has been plainly convicted by the event as erroneous; as if thus the whole eschatological prediction collapsed. In that case, indeed, Paul would be a false prophet (Deut. xviii. 20 sqq.), and his appeal to the Lord's word an untruth. This word of the Lord, as even LÜDEMANN allows, told him only generally in what relation the dead would stand to those surviving, not who belongs to each of the two classes; it was, therefore, not: "Thou, Paul, shalt be of the number;" otherwise he could not again have spoken doubtfully on the point at Phil. i. 21 sqq.; ii. 17; 2 Cor. v. 9, and in still a different tone at 2 Tim. iv. 6. Altogether, just as here, in speaking of those who live to the Advent, he says ἡμεῖς by communicatio in the sense of hope (GROTIUS: pulavit fieri posse), he elsewhere says as freely by communicatio on the opposite side: "God will raise us up," 1 Cor. vi. 14 (this alongside of ch. xv. 51); 2 Cor. iv. 14; comp. 1 Thessa. v. 10; Acts xx. 29. He expressly reminds us at ch. v. 1 sqq., that we know not the times and the seasons, and were not to know them; as the Lord declares even of Himself in his condition of self-denial (Mark xiii. 32), and as He represents to his Apostles (Acts i. 7). Had he meant to set it down as certain: I shall not die, that would really have been at least a knowledge of the χρόνοι; and not less so, had he asserted: I shall die before that, it will not happen in my time. Moreover, if ἡμεῖς expressed the definite expectation: I shall yet be there, it must equally follow that to all his readers of that age included with himself in ἡμεῖς he makes the promise, that they shall live till the Advent; which were indeed utterly absurd. Rather, he opposes the two classes to each other; here those asleep, and on the other side the living, those remaining over; he himself, of course, is among the living; but both classes are in a state of constant flux. What did not come to pass in the case of Paul and his cotermporaries, then holds good for those who follow after, and shall actually live till the Advent. Certainly the Apostles do all of them ex-

It is also worth noting that, as I remarked in the Lectures, "there are only three other places in the New Testament where the phrase press often enough the expectation of the Coming as near; c. g., 1 Pet. iv. 7; 1 John ii. 18; James v. 8; and Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 29 sqq.; Rom. xiii. 11, 12; Phil. iv. 5; this, however, not as a dogma whereby the ignorance of the χρόνοι would be removed, but merely as a living hope and longing expectation. See HÖLEMAN, Die Stellung St. Pauli zu der Frage um die Zeit der Wiederkunft Christi, Leipzig, 1858; and the Doctrinal and Ethical Notes, 6.

8. (V. 18.) Wherefore comfort one another with these words; ἔστω with a following imperative also at Phil. iv. 1; and so διό, ch. v. 11. The comfort should check the sorrowing (v. 13); with these words, which rest on the word of the Lord, not rationibus, argumentis, but simply the words of the evangelical message.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. (V. 13.) It is not sorrow altogether for the dying that Paul forbids; he rather takes it for granted that they will have to sorrow; only let it not be as the sorrow of the hopeless. Nowhere does Scripture overstrain unnaturally its demand, as if death should cause no pang. It merely rebukes despondency, as if God were not God, and home were not home. But strength of faith is not a thing to be commanded, nor can its triumph be enforced.* Christ Himself shed tears, and Paul knew what it is to sorrow even for the dying (Phil. ii. 27). On the whole (STARKE): The believers of the Old Testament and of the New wept and sorrowed, but within such limits as the law already prescribed (Lev. xix. 28; Deut. xiv. 1), and the light of faith illustrates. The Apostle requires no Stoic insensibility, no icy hardness. CALVIN: "aliud est frænare dolorem nostrum, ut subjiciatur Deo, aliud abjecto humano sensu instar lapidum obdurescere." And for this reason hope is an important element of the Christian life; ch. i. 3; Rom. v. 2-5; viii. 24 sqq.; 1 Cor. xiii.

2. The rest, who have no hope, are in the widest sense all who stand not in Christ, the only Source and Guarantee of true life. In the Old Testament is the sound of many lamentations over the life in the shadowy realm, as being no life, but as gloomy as in the Homeric songs (Is. xxxviii. 18 sq.; Ps. vi. 6 [5]; lxxxviii. 11-18 [10-12]; cxv. 17; Job x. 21 [and 22]; &c.); not because the right conception is still wanting, but because the actual curse of death is not yet broken. The gleams of prophetic hope (Ps. xvi. 9 sqq.; xlix. 16 [15]; Prov. xiv. 32; xv. 24; xxiii. 14; Is. xxvi. 19; Hos. xiii. 14; Dan. xii. 2) are first realized through Christ. But it is especially the heathen, of whom the Apostle's judgment holds good. It might, indeed, be a question here, as at v. 5, whether he does not assert too much. For do we not find among all nations some hope of immortality? and among the philosophers, as Socrates, Plato, &c., elevated thoughts on that topic, and arguments in its favor? True; but, measured by the full resurrection-life, what a state of death is that which the heathen call the other life! And how isolated is the more cheerful hope, how slender its thread, how feeble its knowledge, for the very reason that it is founded, not on the actings of God, but on disputable, more or less problematical arguments, accessible only to the refined thinker. How weak are the Consolationes of a Cicero, Seneca, Plutarch! nothing but probabilities. Even now observation shows how those who do not rely on the written word, and, inquiring merely about the immortality of the soul, would thus simply recognize a permanent separation of soul and body (though this would be a permanent reign of death),—how these persons with all their arguments never get the better of their doubts; nay, how more and more the most decided amongst them no longer have or allow any hope. It were easy to bring together a number of disconsolate sayings from the classics; for example, Æschylus, Eumen. 638 (648): ἔναρ θανάτου οὐκ ἔστ' ἀνδοταῖς. Theocritus, Idyll. 4, 42: ἐλπίδες ἐν ζωοῖσιν, ἀνέλιπτοι δὲ θάνατος. Catullus, 5, 4: Solus occidere et redire possunt: Nobis, cum senex occidit brevis lux, Nox est perpetua una dormienda. STARKE: In Plutarch's time people mocked at the ἐλπιστικὸς. It was an affected witticism of the dying Vespasian: van, puto deus fio. And this is as it should be; it is proper that we should not get to be certain of our personality, until we are sure of our God and Saviour. On this true basis, however, Scripture regards as normal the undivided life, when the spirit and the body are together; being equally remote from materialism, which seeks in matter for the root and strength of all spiritual life, and from idealism, which sees the most perfect spirituality in being released from the body. The glorified body as the perfect organ of the ruling spirit—this is the reestablishment and consummation of the condition originally designed by God (Phil. iii. 21). LUTHER: We shall again receive enriched and improved that which we lost in Adam; for we should have had it in Paradise (Works, ed. Walch, xii. 2628).

3. Death a sleep; STARKE: (1) Because in both the body rests, the soul remains alive; (2) because from both the body also awakes; (3) because both are a desirable release from trouble and toil; (4) because after both we again joyously salute and wish one another good morning.—Still the likeness exists only for faith, not for sight. According to what is visible, the word of triumph: "O death, where is thy sting?" sounds frequently like a scoff. DIERICH: The death of those dear to us still confronts us often as a frightful mystery.—Not only does the Old Testament call him the king of terrors [Job xviii. 14], his name in the New Testament also is still the last enemy. A natural horror in the presence of death is expressed by the Apostle himself in 2 Cor. v., and is seen in Gethsemane.* Corruption wears a different aspect from sleep. So much the greater must the Awakener appear to us.

4. (V. 15.) Paul appeals to a word of the Lord, like the old prophets (1 Sam. iii. 21; Is. i. 10; Jer. i. 2); not as one who steals and deceitfully gives out the Lord's word (Jer. xiv. 14; xxiii. 30); not as one who has merely adopted rabbinical opinions. (Whence, indeed, have the Rabbins the substance of their doctrine?) Nor does he speak in heaped-up images of a transcendental vision (when he really had such a one, with what modest reserve does he speak of it! 2 Cor. xii.); but his words have a clear and sober import. From the most intimate converse with the Lord he gives forth his explanations respecting the course of the kingdom of God, the crises of Divine providence, and its final issues: Eph. iii. 3, 5 sqq.; Rom. xi. 25; 1 Cor. xv. 51 sqq.; and here. It is a weighty problem, and, God be praised! it is also a privilege vouchsafed in ever larger measure to our times, to bring one's self into living communion with the prophetic word. Our very reverence for it should, indeed, restrain us from precipitate conclusions.

* [Whatever is matter of duty is properly matter of precept; Eph. vi. 10; 1 Thess. v. 16. Faith's brightest triumph is amidst the tears and struggles of nature; Ps. cxli. 4.—J. L.]

* [A statement strangely erroneous in both its members. The Apostle expresses no horror whatever of death. His groans are forced from him, not so much even by the pressure of present suffering, as by the earnestness of his longing for the heavenly state. And still more objectionable is the reference to Gethsemane, in so far as it overlooks the supernatural elements in our Lord's passion.—J. L.]

5. (Vv. 15-17.) Our passage furnishes no complete doctrine of the last things. In Scripture generally there remains over for curiosity a multitude of unanswered questions; and even the legitimate desire of knowledge must acquiesce. Whatever is necessary to salvation, and serves to further the process of sanctification, is nowhere wanting. In this spirit should the doctrine of the Christian hope be dealt with (LUTHARDT, die Lehre von den letzten Dingen, Leipzig, 1861). Our passage says nothing beforehand of the condition that immediately follows death; nothing beyond calling it a sleep. A preliminary judgment, an introductory stage of blessedness, is indicated by the passages cited in Exeg. Note 1. A being with Christ is there promised to such as die in Christ; yet must it be inferior in fulness and power to the life of the resurrection (comp. Rev. vi. 9-11), without our being able to define precisely the difference. Paul takes the less notice here of this topic, from his having to correct the anxiety of the Thessalonians in regard to the disadvantage which the dead might be under at the Advent. What is of use to this end he holds up to their view. Nor does he in our passage go further. But it easily admits of being combined with other passages into a general representation. Now what Paul says of the Coming was understood by the Reformers altogether of His Coming at the Last Judgment; as by CALVIN, in express opposition to the Chiliasts, though under the supposition, to be sure, that they teach the wild doctrine of a resurrection for only a thousand years. But even in the Apocalypse there is no mention of any such thing. If we take into view the passage in the Revelation, xx. 1-6, the question is, whether and in what way it may be reconciled with the doctrine of the Apostle Paul. An obvious expedient apparently is to identify the Advent here, v. 15, and 1 Cor. xv. 23, with the return at the setting up of the (millennial) kingdom, and in like manner the first resurrection of the Apocalypse with the resurrection of the just (Luke xiv. 14) or the gathering together of the elect (Matt. xxiv. 31), but positively to distinguish this from the final judgment on the whole world (Matt. xxv. 31; Rev. xx. 11 sqq.); * this last judgment, including the general resurrection, would then be comprehended in the end of which Paul, after making mention of the resurrection τῶν τοῦ Χριστοῦ, says: εἰτα τὸ τέλος (1 Cor. xv. 24). More closely examined, however, the passages do not quite so readily admit of mutual adjustment. In the first place, at the text last mentioned no one without the Apocalypse would think, that this εἰτα embraces a thousand years.† And for this reason, accordingly, the Reformers, disregarding the Apocalypse, conceived of the raising of the dead as occurring at one and the same time, and supposed that such passages as John v. 28, 29; Acts xxiv. 15; 2 Cor. v. 10 speak of a simultaneous resurrection of the just and the unjust, and that Matt. xxiv. likewise refers to no other coming of Christ than Matt. xxv. In like manner, and this is the second point, Matt. xxv. shows us the saved alongside of the lost, and says nothing of a first resurrection which had already, a thousand years before, brought the elect to glory. In our passage, indeed, and just so in 1 Cor. xv., Paul is entirely silent about those who are lost. CALVIN: The object here is, not to alarm the ungodly, but to heal the immoderate grief of the pious. The resurrection to judgment, therefore, might be thought of as contemporaneous with that of the pious, or on the other hand as following at a later date. Only it is to be noticed that 1 Cor. xv. represents the raising of those who belong to Christ as something done once for all; then follows the end, when He shall deliver up the kingdom to the Father, after He has abolished all hostile rule. This does not sound as if still another host of those belonging to Christ would not share in the salvation till a later and final judgment, as must yet be the case, if Matt. xxv. speaks of this final judgment. On the whole, as it is important to fulfil the condition on which alone we can be sure of salvation, so it is difficult, if not impossible, to set up unexceptionable tests, according to which some are made partakers of the first resurrection, others only of the second, who are nevertheless saved. After all, the relation might rather be this, that the Pauline statements, as well as the passages which speak briefly of the last day, the last hour (John vi. 39, 40; 1 John ii. 18; comp. 2 Pet. iii. 10, 12), comprehend the coming of the Lord in one view, which the Apocalypse then distributes into various stages. But as the day of the Lord divides itself in the later revelation into a series of steps, so also the resurrection of those belonging to Christ, since the first resurrection by no means merely passes by the raising of the lost to judgment, but shows likewise a later resurrection to life as still possible. To the end belongs the glorification also of the terrestrial world (Rom. viii.; Rev. xxi. xxii.); and after that the saved have reigned together with Christ in the kingdom (2 Tim. ii. 12), and have co-operated with Him in the judgment (1 Cor. vi. 2, 3). That is to say, from their heavenly thrones (Rev. xx. 4) the kingdom will pass into its stage of highest fulfilment, when God shall be all in all (1 Cor. xv. 28). In many places, however, these stages are viewed together indiscriminately. Such a comprehension of details, which are only kept apart by later prediction, meets us also elsewhere in all prophecy.

6. The last remark affords us light also in regard to the hope of the nearness of the Advent (see Exeg. Note 7). From the patriarchs down through the entire line of the prophets every one contemplates the future salvation as one whole, with all its details, without any one being able to say: There is here a want of perspective, an optical illusion. Rather, the living fulness of the future is conjoined with the varying standpoint of the present in one bud. The certainty, that the Lord is coming with His salvation, is so stirring, bright, overpowering, that the man who is full of it says: Quickly! The Assyrian period is Isaiah's horizon, into which he sees Immanuel enter, bringing salvation (Is. vii. xix. 17). And again there was a delay of four hundred years, before the promise in Malachi (ch. iii.) began to be fulfilled. Prophecy is not the knowledge of the history of the future, but a contemplation of the essential steps of development. Instructive is such a passage as Ezek. xii. 22 sqq.; especially even because it is there shown to us, how long-suffering delayed the judgment, and how contempt of the long-suffering accelerates it. Thus there came to pass finally what for so long a time the prophets had promised and threatened, and the scoffers had scoffed at; it came, according to human reckoning, later than had been supposed, yet not too late for any one, rather too soon for many. And as the New Testament time came, so will come the final term promised by Christ and the Apostles. Yea, they declared with truth that it had already arrived. With Christ began the world's last hour, and there comes none later, to establish another and higher relation between God and humanity. If the period of waiting for the revelation of the Lord has reached much further than the Apostles supposed, and even than the words of Christ gave them reason to expect (Matt. x. 23; xvi. 28; xxiv. 29), it is to be considered, first, that in this very way scope was afforded for the development of the series of stages in His coming; and, secondly, that it behoves us to recognize long-suffering in the fact that, after the first step of the judgment (on Jerusalem), the second was deferred (2 Pet. iii. 8, 9, 15). But, while acknowledging His sparing long-suffering, we acknowledge also that His government is so arranged as to admit of modification according to the faithfulness or unfaithfulness of men; that we are wrong, therefore, in taking, much more than we are aware of, necessitarian views of prophecy. So much the more short-sighted were it to say, that a disappointment respecting the date is proof that such last things are not to be expected at all. A denial of the world's end would require us also to assert that humanity has never had a beginning; and this would imply that the life of humanity has no aim, and that the establishment of a perfect, holy reign of God is not to be looked for. But he alone is a Christian, who directs his life toward this mark. Of the time and the hour he knows nothing. "The Lord delayeth His coming!"—that he leaves the wicked servant to say; that the Bridegroom may tarry, he is well aware. There are also things that must still precede; not the conversion of the nations, but the preaching of the gospel among all nations (Matt. xxiv. 14); along with this, the universal security of those who believe in no Advent, and by means of their unbelief are witnesses for the truth (1 Thess. v. 3; Matt. xxiv. 37 sqq.; Luke xviii. 8); the apostasy of Christendom from the faith (2 Thess. ii.). All these signs are perceptibly growing. The life of humanity, including the individual life, goes forward on the brink of eternity and to eternity. It is readily conceivable that the experience of a longer duration of the world, according to man's measurement, has modified in some degree our views of the last things, and turned the eye chiefly toward the death of individuals. But only too frequently does this way of thinking assume such a form, that the longing for the coming of the Lord and the glory of His holy kingdom, as well as sympathy in the fortunes of the Church at large, is too much impaired. At times, on the other hand, and amongst the pious, when the life of faith rules in due force, we again meet likewise with the apostolic hope and aspiration in living freshness. That watching and hoping are so unfamiliar to us, is a defect. The more we become heavenly in our character and thoughts, the more also does the stream of human history appear to us as a hastening towards the coming of the Lord.

7. (V. 17.) The being caught away to meet the Lord is in the Irvingite* interpretation erroneously explained in a manner that seems to bear the dignity of an inviolable dogma. Comp. the work, which otherwise contains many good practical exhortations, by E. L. GEERING, Mahnung und Trost der Schrift in Betreff der Wiederkunft Christi, Basel, 1859. It is there taught (p. 55) that, previous to the coming tribulation, the company of disciples, who are witnessing for Jesus and waiting for Him, is brought into a condition of safety. Indeed, the saints will with Him judge the world (1 Cor. vi. 2); their deliverance, therefore, through being taken away, precedes the Lord's return; and on p. 60 mention is made of servants of Christ who are not, it is true, recklessly profane nor yet hypocrites, but still are not looking out for the coming of the Lord, nor striving towards it, and, as their punishment for this, have no part in the rapture of the faithful servants, but must undergo the rule of Antichrist's reign. They have forfeited their title to be kept from the hour of temptation, of the great tribulation, which comes on all (Rev. iii. 10). They might have been preserved and taken away from it.—This whole interpretation has at least no sort of foundation in our text. The German word entriicken (to snatch from) might give the impression that it refers to the taking away from a threatening danger. But Paul speaks of a swift-coming to meet the Lord, without regard to the question whether this is before or after the endurance of tribulation. To the view of Christendom in general he holds up, as prior to the coming of the Lord, the coming of the apostasy, and the tyranny of the Man of Sin (2 Thess. ii.). The keeping which the disciples need is not necessarily a being kept from the experience of this persecution, as if to be kept in the midst of it, to be kept while in the world from the evil—the thing which the Lord seeks in prayer for His disciples (John xvii. 15)—were a penal condition. There are various ways in which the keeping may rather take place: 1. by a previous death (Is. lvii. 1, 2; Rev. xiv. 13); 2. by endurance of martyrdom without renouncing the faith (Matt. x. 28 sqq.; 2 Thess. ii.; Rev. xi. 7; xiii. 15; xx. 4); perhaps also, 3. by remaining hidden, in the case especially of the humble class, like the seven thousand in the time of Elias (Rom. xi. 4). There may be a participation in the judgment by those caught away to the Lord (as assessorees judicii, BENGEL), without the interpretation which we oppose. Altogether it is possible to love the coming of the Lord Jesus, without adopting the peculiar Irvingite exegesis. To represent the two things as inseparable, and to determine accordingly the reward of being caught away or the penalty of being left—this is, 1. in itself a wrong, as in every case where a human dogma is set up, and salvation connected with the acceptance of it; 2. it misleads to a groundless confidence, and is a sort of illusory promise, that is not free from an effeminate fear of suffering. Comp. LUTHARDT, l. c. p. 37 sqq.

* (The reference is to that in many respects remarkable body of Christians, which chooses to call itself the Catholic Apostolic Church. The other name of Irvingites they expressly disclaim as a misrepresentation at once of the origin and the spirit of the movement.—J. L.)

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

V. 13. It is a heathenish ignorance of which a Christian must be ashamed, when he knows nothing of hope for the dead.—He who does not believe is ignorant; faith is not opposed to knowledge.—ZWINGLI: When we fear death, it is a sure sign that we have no love to God.—In so far as there is still selfishness in our love, and for that reason discomposure at the death of our friends, to the same extent are we not yet duly taught of God.

Death a sleep, but only through Christ; and only for faith, which knows the Awakener.—ROOS: Death has an entrance, and also an outlet. We must and we desire to go the way that Christ went.

Scripture does not forbid us to mourn, but only to mourn as those without hope.—RIEGER: By the examples of others, that nearly concern us, the thoughts of our hearts are revealed to us—our own dying agony.—LUTHER: Holy Scripture not merely indulges, but commends and praises those who are sorrowful, and lament for the dead (Abraham, Joseph, the people at the death of Aaron and Moses). The Apostle simply distinguishes between the mourning of the heathen and that of Christians.—THE SAME: It is an artificial virtue and fictitious fortitude of heathens and schismatics, when they pretend that we must entirely extract what is creaturely in us, and hold no terms with nature. Such a hard heart has never truly loved, and would fain dissemble before people. He is a Christian, who, while experiencing sorrow, yet so restrains himself therein that the spirit rules over the flesh.—We are allowed to weep for death. It is one thing, when Christ, who wept Himself, dries our tears, and another thing, when men would forbid them to flow. But we have no occasion to weep for the lot of those who have fallen asleep in the Lord. Whoever laments without measure or restraint, acts as a heathen acts.—BENGL: The effect of the Christian faith is neither to abolish nor yet to aggravate grief for the dead, but gently to moderate it.—DIEDRICH: We need not be in a state of fearful uncertainty about any Christian, whether living or dead.—HEUBNER: Christianity teaches men to rise superior to natural sorrow, yea, to rejoice therein.—The ancient Christians called the day of the believer's death his birthday.

[Ignorance of the truth and purposes of God, so far as these have been revealed, injurious to our spiritual comfort and edification. "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren"—a common scriptural formula.—DODDRIDGE: Let us charge it upon our hearts, that we do honor to our holy profession in every circumstance, and particularly in our sorrows as well as our joys.—M. HENRY: All grief for the death of friends is far from being unlawful; we may weep at least for ourselves, if we do not weep for them; weep for our own loss, though that may be their gain. Yet we must not be immoderate or excessive in our sorrows.—J. L.]

V. 14. LUTHER: Our death Paul calls not a death, but a sleep; Christ's death he calls a real death, which has swallowed up all other deaths. [So BURKITT: Jesus died, the saints sleep. . . I do not find that Christ's death is called a sleep; no, His death was death indeed, death with a curse in it.—J. L.] —LUTHER: If Christ is risen, that must surely not be in vain and without fruit.—[The text of Archbishop TILLOTSON'S Sermon on "The certainty and the blessedness of the resurrection of true Christians."—J. L.]

Vv. 13, 14. RIEGER: The two main sources of all comfort, and of all resignation in dying, lie in the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus (Rev. i. 18). Whatever is trying and severe in death comes either from attachment to the visible from which we are separated, or from the uncertainty in which we stand in regard to the invisible. The former trouble is relieved by the death of Jesus, the second by his life.—STÄHELIN: If thou thyself wouldest not, or if thy friends are not to sorrow, see that thou fall asleep through the Lord Jesus.—Hast thou hope? 1. On what is it founded? on the belief that Jesus died and rose again; 2. To what does it impel thee? to a life in Christ, that we through Christ may fall asleep; 3. Of what does it assure thee? that God will bring us with Jesus.—[Bishop Wilson has a Funeral Sermon on these verses.—J. L.]

V. 15. LUTHER: God has spoken the word, not Paul out of his own head.—It is with the Apostle a great certainty: The Lord speaks through me. It is a folly that we find it so much harder to trust to the word of the Lord with our whole heart than to that of men, who are yet but dust, and liars to boot. As disciples of these men of God, we should endeavor, in what we say of Divine things, to say it as the word of God in the assurance of faith (2 Cor. iv. 13).—LUTHER: The voice or word of all teachers, who preach the gospel pure and simple, is not their word or voice, but God's (Luke x. 16).—STARKE: Man's words have little power, but God's word penetrates the heart, is strong to comfort, and endures in sorrow and death (Rom. xv. 4).

The experience, that the coming of the Lord has been delayed longer than the Apostles hoped and desired, is indeed a severe discipline for us while waiting. It is nevertheless a weakness, when watching and longing are relaxed, and drowsiness seizes even the wise virgins.—RIEGER: In the unbelieving world the feeling of security is diffused from one generation to another, and comes to its height amongst the last scoffers; and so, on the other hand, in the communion of saints readiness for the coming of Jesus spreads from one generation to another.—Berlenburger Bibel: The word is prophetic, and goes through all times.—VIETOR (zwei Osterpredigten, Bremen, 1859, p. 24): In the world there is derision and laughter, when a man would say, that he knows not whether the Lord will not come during his lifetime. The world can conceive of nothing wilder or crazier. Passing on in unbelief, the world says: "The Lord comes not at all." Passing on with a show of faith and a half-faith, the world says: "My Lord comes not yet for a long time." Oh, see to it, that thy heart consent not to either speech.

V. 16. The Lord comes to take us to Himself; only thus can we come to Him.—LUTHER: What the trumpet is, I know not; we would not gloss Paul's words, but let them stand just as they are. In another place: These are merely verba allegorica. He would fain represent the matter, as one must represent it to children and simple people.†

[J. LILLIE: No phantom, nor providential sub-

* [The parallel would be more complete, if, as has sometimes been inferred from Mal. iv. 5, 6 and Rev. xix. 7, 8, as well as from the analogous work of John the Baptist before the first appearing of the Lord, the last generation of the Church is to witness a special work of preparation for the marriage-supper of the Lamb.—J. L.]

stitute, nor even the vicarious Spirit; but the Lord Himself—the personal Lord—this same Jesus.—VAUGHAN: Not a mere amelioration, gradual or sudden, of the condition of the Church or the world; not a mere displacement of evil and triumph of good; not a mere crisis of human affairs, issuing in times of universal blessing and happiness: it shall be a personal coming. Matt. xxiv. 30; Acts i. 11.—J. L.

They who are asleep in the Lord are still, even as dead persons, always in Christ (Luke xx. 38).—STARKE: Whoever is found to the last in the holy life of Jesus, falls asleep through Jesus.—Comp. Pa. xvi. 15, and Luther's comment, Werke, ed. Walch, iii. 2652 sqq.
